The celebrated preacher and native of Damascus Abu 'l-Hasan 'Ali Ibn Ibrahim Ibn Naja Ibn Ghana'im al-Ansari (descended from one of the Ansars), a member of the Hanbalite sect, and surnamed Zayn al-Din (the ornament of religion), but generally known by the appellation of Ibn Nujayyah, gives the following verses as the production of Tala'i' Ibn Ruzzik and mentions that, when he was in Egypt, they were recited to him by their author:

"Your hoary age has cast off the dark tint of youth, and the white falcon has settled in the nest of the crow.<sup>4</sup> You slumber in apathy, but misfortune is awake and the tooth of affliction will wound you and not be repelled. How can you preserve the treasure if you squander it away uncounted?"

The poet 'Abd Allah Ibn As'ad surnamed al-Muhadhdhab.<sup>5</sup> a native of Mosul, but an inhabitant of Emessa celebrated the praises of al-Salih Talai' in a poem rhyming in K, and beginning thus:

"Will it not suffice you that I perish under your correction? You only punish me for the excess of the love I bear you."<sup>6</sup>

It is an excellent qasidah and expresses in these lines the draft of the author:

"Why then be angry if secret foes say, I have forgotten these? knowest thou not that I can never forget these? May the friendship be withheld from me if what they say is true, and may my thirst be never quenched by the generosity of the son of Ruzzik!"

Were I not afraid of lengthening this article too much, I should transcribe here the entire poem, which is both long and instructive.<sup>7</sup> On the death of al-Fa'iz who was succeeded by al-'Adid,, al-Salih not only continued to hold the wazirate, but was treated by the new khalif

4 This mean in simple language; Your grey hairs have taken the place of your black ones.

5 The life of al-Muhadhdhab 'Abd Allah Ibn al-Dahhan will be found in the next volume.

6 The word جسا an incorrect expression, is equivalent to جبي لك The first تلافى comes from the root تلفى and the second from تلف with greater honour than ever: he married his daughter to al-'Adid whom he held in complete subjection (in the palace), and, seduced by long prosperity, he neglected the precaution of prudence. Fatigued at length with his thralldom, the prince devised a plan against his wazir's life, and formed a conspiracy for that purpose with the portion of the regular troops called the Awlad al-Ra'i (the sons of the shepherd).<sup>8</sup> These men were to remain concealed in a part of the palace which he indicated, and on the passage of al-Salih, either by day or by night, they were to kill him. They lay there in wait, and as the wazir was about leaving the palace, they rose to attack him, but the door through which they had to pass was locked by the mistake of one of the band whilst endeavouring to open it, and their design was thus frustrated for that night; 'God having had some motive for allowing their intended victim to live a short time longer. Another day they posted themselves in their place of concealment, and, when al-Salih entered the palace, they sprung upon him and covered him with wounds, some of them in the head. The alarm was immediately given, and the persons, who had accompanied al-Salih came into his assistance and slew the murderers. He was carried home, the blood flowing from his wounds, and he died the same day, Monday, 19th Ramadan, A.H. 556 (September, A.D. 1161).* His birth was in the year 495 (A.D. 1101-2). The pelisses of investiture were then borne to his son Abu Shuja'al-'Adil Muhi al-Din Ruzzik, him of whom we have spoken in the life of Shawar, No. 271. He thus became wazir, on Tuesday, the day after his father's death, and received the honorary title of al-'Adil al-Nasir (the just, the protector). The jurisconsult, 'Umarat al-Yamani lamented the death of al-Salih in a long qasidah commencing thus:

7 'Imad al-Din gives this poem in his Kharidah; see MS. of the Bib. du Roi, No. 1414, for. 177.

"Is there in that assembly a person well informed to whom I may apply? for the grief I feel has troubled and expelled my reason, I have heard a rumour which makes me envy the deaf, which shocks him who hears it and strikes dumb him who relates it. Can I have an answer to encourage my hopes and make the truth of this fatal news appear less probable than its falsehood? The aspect of things only increases my fears; I see the throne set out, but he who filled it is absent! Has he retired (merely for a time) and his son is to replace him, or has he departed never to return? I see sadness upon all faces such as shows that the faces (chiefs of the kingdom) are orphaned by his loss."

---

8 Ibn al-Athir says in his Annals; "Among the Egyptian amirs, he who took the most active part in the murder of al-Salih was the person named Ibn al-Ra'i (the son of the shepherd)."* Al-Maqrizi, in his Khirat, speaks of al-Salih and gives a short account of his death; according to him, he was attacked and wounded by a Batinite. An account! nearly similar is given in the Nujum.

* 11 September,—Ed.

It contains also this passage:

"Leave me! this is not the moment for weeping? Later our tears shall descend as the dew and as the showers. Suspect not the sincerity of my grief; that shower (of generosity) in which I placed my hopes has been dissipated from over me. Why should we not weep for him and deplore his loss, now that our children are orphaned and bereft? After a life of beneficence he has vanished from our eyes; O that I knew the fate which God reserves for us! Shall your guest, the stranger whom you protected, find still an honourable treatment and be induced to remain, or must his baggage be packed up for a prompt departure?"

Salih was interred at Cairo in the Palace of the wizarate founded by al-Afdal Shahanshah, whose life we have given, (No. 272;) but on the 19th of the month of Safar, A.H. 557 (February, A.D. 1162),* his son al-'Adil caused the body to be taken up, and having placed it on a bier, he followed it to the cemetery of the Grearer Qarafah, had it deposited in the tomb which is still called the Mausoleum of al-Salih. 'Umarat al-Yamani composed, on this subject another good qasidah, containing the following passage relate to the bier (tabut):

"Like the ark (tabut) of Moses, it contained dignity<sup>9</sup> and gravity."

He made also a number of other elegies on his death. This was the Salih who built the mosque outside the Gate of Zawilah<sup>10</sup> at Cairo. In the life of Shawar we mentioned the flight of al-Salih's son, al-'Adil Ibn Ruzzik, from Cairo with the date of that event (see No. 271); he took with him treasures to an immense amount, and accompanied by his family and domestics, he put himself under the

---

* 7 February--Ed.

9 Dignity; in Arabic, sakinah, See M. de Sacy's observations on this word in his Chrestomathie, tom II. page 77.

10 According to al-Maqrizi, al-Salih built this mosque for the reception of the mortal remains of al-Husayn, the son of 'Ali, which were at that time interred at 'Asqalan and in constant danger of being profaned by the Frank army.

protection of Sulayman--some say, Ya'qub--Ibn al-Nis'<sup>11</sup> al-Lakhmi, an old friend of the wazir's family and indebted to them for the ample fortune which he then possessed. He received them in his house at Atfih,<sup>12</sup> but immediately went off to Shawar and informed him where they were. Shawar sent back with him a troop (of soldiers) who arrested al-'Adil and brought him to the door of the palace, where he kept him waiting for a long time and then sent him to prison. He afterwards said to Ibn al-Nis; "Al-Salih reserved you for his son as a previous treasure, and I shall reserve you for mine," he then ordered him to be starangled. Al-'Adil remained in prison for some time and was at length put to death by Shawar's orders; his head was then brought forth to the great officers of the empire. It is a singular coincidence that al-Salih was nominated wazir on the nineteenth day of the month, that he was murdered on the nineteenth day of the month, that his body was disinterred and that the authority of the Ruzzik family ceased on days of a similar date. Zayn al-Din Ibn Nujayyah, the preacher above mentioned, was born A.H. 508 (A.D. 1114-5) at Damascus; he passed his youth in that city and visited Baghdad a number of times; he married Umm 'Abd al-Karai Fatimah, the daughter of Abu 'I Hasan Sa'd al-Khayr Ibn Muhammad Ibn Sahl Ibn Sa'd, descendant from one of the Ansars and a native of Valencia in Spain.<sup>13</sup> Before his death, he removed to Egypt and there taught the Traditions. He died in the country on Wednesday, the 8th of Ramadan, A.H. 599 (May, A.D. 1203).*

---

* The editor of Cairo edition gives البيض al-Bid.--Ed.

11 I here follow the reading of the autograph.

12 'Atfih is situated on the east bank of the Nile, about forty miles above Cairo.

13 Abu 'I-Hasan Sa'd al-Khayr Ibn Muhammad the Traditionist descended from a family of the Ansars and was born at Valencia in Spain. He travelled to the East and went as far as Sin (China), for which reason he was surnamed al-Sini al-Balansiyyi. At Baghdad he studied the law under Abu Hamid al-Isfara'ni and learned the traditions from Abu Abd Allah al-Ni'ali النعماني and other doctors. When in Isbahan he took lessons from Abu Sa'd al-Mutarriz, and it was in that city he got married; it was there also that his daughter Fatimah was born. His authority as a hafiz was cited by Ibn 'Asakir, Abu Sa'd al-Sam'ani, Abu Musa al-Madini, and others. He died at Baghdad in the month of Muharram, A.H. 541 (A.D. 1146), and the funeral prayers were said over his corpse by the Qadi 'I-Qudat al-Zayrabi. He was interred near the tomb of 'Abd Allah, the son of the imam Ibn Hanbal.-(Al-Maqari, M.S. No. 704, fol. 288).

* 21 May, Ed.

290. ABU YAZID AL-BASTAMI

Abu Yazid Tayfur al-Bastami the famous ascetic, (زاهد) was the son of 'Isa Ibn Adam Ibn 'Isa Ibn 'Ali. His grandfather was a Magian, but became a convert to Islamisin, and his two brothers, Adam and 'Ali, were, like himself, devout ascetics, but in an inferior degree. Abu Yazid, being asked how he had acquired his knowledge (of the spiritual world), answered that it was by means of a hungry belly and a naked body. A person said to him. "What is the greatest suffering which you have undergone in the way of God?" to which he replied: "It cannot be described." He was then asked what was the slightest mortification which he had inflicted on himself?<sup>1</sup> and he said: "As for that question, I can answer it; when I summoned myself to do an act pleasing to God, if I replied not with a good will, I deprived myself of water for a year." He used to say: "When you see a man possessing miraculous powers so as even to mount into the air let not that deceive you, but see if he observes God's commands and prohibitions, if he keeps within the bounds imposed by religion, and if he performs the duties which it prescribes." His sayings are very numerous, his works of mortification and devotion are highly celebrated and his miraculous gifts were clear and evident. He died A.H. 261 (A.D. 874-5); some say, 264. Bastami means belonging to Bastam, which is a well-known town in the province of Qumis;<sup>2</sup> some persons state it lies just within the frontier of Khurasan near the border of 'Iraq.

ط

291 ABU 'L-ASWAD AL-DU'WALI

Abu 'l-Aswad Zalim Ibn 'Amr Ibn Sugyan Ibn Jandal Ibn Ya'mar Ibn Hils Ibn Nufathah Ibn 'Adi Ibn al-Din Ibn Bakr was surnamed al-Dili or al-Du'wali, but a great diversity of opinions exists relative to his name, his genealogy and his surname. He was one of the most eminent among the Tabi'is, an inhabitant of Basrah, and a partisan

---

1 The word ملك has been omitted by mistake in the Arabic text after نفسك

2 This province lies towards the south-eastern extremity of the Caspian Sea.

of 'Ali Ibn 'Abi Talib, under whom he fought at the battle of Siffin. In intelligence he was one of the most perfect of men and in reason one of the most sagacious. He was the first who invented grammar: it is said that 'Ali laid down for him his principle, the parts of speech are three: the noun, the verb, and the particle, telling him to found a complete treatise upon it. Others say that he was instructor to the children of Zī'ad Ibn Abih, who was then governor of Arabian and Persian 'Iraq, and that he went to him one day and said: "Amīr, may God direct thee! I see that the Arabs have become mingled with these foreign nations and that their tongues are altered (so that they speak incorrectly); wilt thou then authorize me to compose for the Arabs something which may enable them to know their language?" or, according to another relation, "to use correctly their language?" Ziyad refused permission, but some time afterwards, a man came to him and said: "Amīr! may God direct thee! tuwaffia bana wa taraka banun<sup>1</sup> (mortuus est patrem nostrum et reliquit filu);" on this he sent for Abu 'l-Aswad and told him to prepare for the public that which he had previously forbidden him to compose. It is related by others that as he entered his house on a certain day, one of his daughters said to him: "Papa! ma ahsanu 'l-samani? (what is most beautiful in the sky?)" to which he answered; "Its stars:" but she replied: "Papa I do not mean to say what is the most beautiful object in it; I was only expressing my admiration at its beauty." "You must then say," he observed, "ma ahsanu al-sama'a (how beautiful in the sky)." He then invented the art of grammar. Abu Harb al-Duwalī's son, related as follows: The first section (of the art of grammar) composed by my father was on the verbs of admiration"<sup>2</sup> Abu'l-Aswad having been asked where he had acquired the science of grammar, answered that he had learned the first points of it from 'Ali Ibn Abi Talib. It is said that Abu 'l-Aswad never made known any of the principles which he had received from 'Ali, till Ziyad sent to him the order to compose something which might serve as a guide to the public and enable them to understand the Book of God (the Qur'an). He at first asked to be dispensed (from such a task), but on hearing a man recite the following passage out of the Qur'an; Anna 'llahu bariyun mina' l-Mushrikina warasuluhu, which last word the reader pronounced

1 The man should have said abuna, not abana, and banin, not banun.

2 See M. de Sacy's Grammaire Arabe, and his edition of the Alfiyah, page 66. The best published treatise on this subject is contained in Ibn Aqil's commentary on the Alfiyah printed at Bulaq, A.H. 1252; the most satisfactory work on Arabic grammar which we possess. It can be only surpassed by Ibn Hisham's Mugh Mughni 'l-labibi a profound and truly philosophical treatise, but not yet printed.

resulihi, he exclaimed; "I never thought that things would have come to this."<sup>3</sup> He then returned to Ziyad and said: "I shall do what you ordered; find me an intelligent<sup>4</sup> scribe who will follow my directions." On this a scribe belonging to the tribe of 'Abd al-Qays was brought to him, but did not give him satisfaction; another then came and Abu 'l-Aswad said to him: "When you see me open (fatah) my mouth in pronouncing a letter, place a point over it; when I close (damm) my mouth, place a point before (or, upon) the letter and when I pucker up (kasar) my mouth, place a point under the letter." This the scribe did. The art (of grammar) was called nahwu because Abu 'l-Aswad had said: "I asked permission of 'Aqil Ibn Ali Talib to compose in the same way (nahwa) as he had done." God knows best, if this be true<sup>6</sup>.

3 This passage is contained in the third verse of the ninth surat. If read correctly, it signifies "This is a declaration - that God is clear of the idolaters, and his apostle also, but if the last word be pronounced rasulihi, it means, that God, is clear of the idolaters and his apostle also, but if the last word be pronounced rasulihi, it means, that God is clear of the idolaters and of his apostle."

4 The autograph has لنا in place of لنا the sense is the same.

5 These are the red points still found in some of the old Kufic MSS. of the Qur'an.

6 The following particulars relative to the origin of Arabic grammar are taken from the notice on Abu 'l-Aswad al-Duwali in Abu 'l-Mahasin's al-Bahr al-Zakhir, year 69. "It once went in," said Abu 'l-Aswad, to the khalif 'Ali and found him in deep reflexion, on which I said to him. 'Commander of the faithful! What are you thinking of? He answered: 'I heard in your town faults of language, and I wish to compose book on the principles of Arabic.' I replied: 'If you do so, you will give us new life. Some days afterwards I went to him and he handed me his book مصنف in which was this passage:

The parts of speech are the noun, the verb, and the particle; the noun designates a thing which has a name, the verb indicates the motion of the thing which has name, and the particle is that which is neither noun nor verb. He then told me to follow that up and add to it the observations which might come into my mind; I therefore collected many and submitted them to him.

'Anbasah learned grammar from al-Duwali, Maymun al-Aqran الاقرن from Anbasah, 'Abd Allah Ibn Abi 'l-Hasan al-Hadhrami from Maymun, 'Isa Ibn 'Umar from al-Hadhrami, al-Khalil Ibn Ahmad, the inventor of prosody, from 'Isa, Sibawayh from al-Khalil al-Akhfash Sa'id Ibn Mas'adah from Sibawayh, and the knowledge of it then spread among the public." (MS. No. 659 A.). The author of the Fihrist says that Sa'd, a newly converted Persian, happened to walk past Abu 'l-Aswad al-Duwali and was asked by him why he went on foot? To which he replied: "Because my horse is lame," saying وان فرسى ظالما instead of ان فرسى ظالع Some persons present

(Contd.. on next page)

Abu 'l-Aswad had a house in Basrah, but as he was continually suffering from the maliciousness of a neighbour, he sold it; and some person having said to him: "you have then sold your house?" he replied: "Say rather, I have sold my neighbour;" a saying which laughed at the mistake, but Abu 'l-Aswad then conceived the project of rendering Arabic of easy acquisition to newly converted Muslims from foreign countries, and he composed the chapter treating of the governing and the governed parts of speech باب الفاعل والمفعول ..... (Fihrist fol: 55) ..... The following extract from the same work proves that Abu 'l-Aswad did really compose a treatise on grammar bearing this title: it contains some things not relating to the subject, but they are sufficiently curious to merit insertion. Muhammad Ibn Ishaq says: there was a man in the city of al-Hadithah whose name was Muhammad Ibn al-Hasan, but was generally known by the surname of Ibn Abi Basrah بصره. He was a book-collector and possessed a library, the like of which I never saw for its extent. In the division of Arabic books were treatises on grammar, philology, and literature, with some old books besides. I met this man a number of times, and he at length became intimate with me, though he was in general very reserved, and apprehensive that the Hamdan family (the sovereigns of Aleppo) might seize on what he had. He then pulled out a large trunk containing about three hundred pounds weight of parchments folded double, and of Egyptian card paper (qartas), Chinese paper (warraq sinii), paper of Tehamah, and paper of Khurasan. These contained passages of pure Arabic I learned from the Arabs of the Desert, a few of their qasidahs, and some notes on grammar; with anecdotes, historical relations, stories, genealogies, and other branches of knowledge peculiar to that people. He told me that he had received them from a native of Kufah, whose name I forget, and who was an eager collector of ancient autographs (al-khutut al-qadimah). This person, being on the point of death, left these writings to him because he was a Shi'ite and had thus obtained his friendship. I looked at the documents (said Muhammad) and was struck with admiration; they were all more or less injured by time, but on each quire or roll was a series of certificates to the number of five or six, all in the handwriting of men eminent for their learning, and each of them declaring the preceding to be really in the handwriting of the person whose signature it bore. Among them I saw written: Qur'an in the handwriting of Khalid Ibn Abi 'l-Hayyaj, one of 'Ali's partisans; then followed these words: This volume came into the possession of Abu 'Abd Allah Ibn Hani. Among these papers I remarked some in the handwriting of the imams al-Hasan and al-Husayn; others contained protections and charters (uhud) in the handwriting of the Khalif 'Ali, etc. Among the autographs of the grammarians and philologists, were those of Abu 'Amr Ibn al-'Ala, Abu 'Amr al-Shaybani, al-Asma'i, Ibn al-'Arabi, Sibawayh, al-Farra, and al-Kisa'i. Among those of Traditionists were some by Sufyan Ibn 'Uyaynah, Sufyan al-Thawri, al-Awza'i etc. And I discovered also in these papers a proof that grammar was invented by Abu 'l-Aswad; it was document in four sheets, on Chinese paper, I believe, and bearing this title:

(Contd.. on next page)

became proverbial.<sup>7</sup> He went in one day to 'Ubayd Allah Ibn Abi Bakrah Nuqay'<sup>8</sup> Ibn al-Harith Ibn Kaladah al-Thaqadi; on seeing him clothed in a tattered cloak which he often wore, said to him: "Abu 'l-Aswad, are you not tired of that cloak?" To which he received this answer: "There are tiresome things which it is impossible to quit." When Abu 'l-Aswad withdrew, the other sent to him one hundred coats, on which he recited the lines which follow: (some say, however, that it was between him and al-Mundhir Ibn al-Jarud that this passed):

"A generous brother, prompt to assist (nasiru), clothed me when I asked it not, and therefore do I praise him. If you are grateful, that man best deserves your thanks who makes you presents while your self-respect remains undiminished."

* In this verse, the word nasiru is sometimes read yasiru; the meaning of the first reading is clear, as it comes from nusrah (assistance); the second reading implies pity and compassion; thus they say: "Such a one has compassion (yasiru) on such a one."- Abu 'l-Aswad composed a great deal of poetry;<sup>9</sup> one of his pieces is as follows:

"It is not by wishes alone that you can procure your livelihood; you must send your bucket down into the well with those of others; sometimes it will come up full, and sometimes with mud and but little water."

His poetical works have been collected into a volume. He is the author of this verse:

---

Dicourse on the governing and governed parts of speech, by Abu 'l-Aswad, in the handwriting of Yahya Ibn Ya'mar' one of Abu 'l-Aswad's disciples, (see Fihrist, f. 55 v.) underneath were inscribed in old character (bikhatt 'atiq) these words: This is the handwriting of such a one the grammarian: then followed a note by al-Nadr Ibn 'Shumayl. When the owner of these papers died, the trunk and its contents disappeared and we never heard more of it."- (Fihrist) fol. 54 et seq.

7 Al-Yafi'i remarks that the proverb is this: I have sold my neighbour, not my house; and that a common saying is. Al-jar qabl al-dar, examine the neighbourhood before you buy the house.

8 This is the reading of the autograph.

* M. de Slane has omitted a sentence which runs thus; For ملوك ملوك is a variant reading.-Ed.

9 In the Arabic text read اشعار

"Omayyah dyed our hands with blood, but Omayyah withheld from us their wealth."<sup>10</sup>

It is related that Abu 'l-Aswad had an attack of the palsy, and that he used to go to the market himself although scarcely able to draw his leg after him, and yet he was rich and possessed both male and female slaves: a person who knew this accosted him one day and said: "God has dispensed you from the necessity of moving about on your own business; why do you not remain seated at home?" To which he replied: "No; I go in and out, and the eunuch says; 'He is coming, and the boy says: 'He is coming,' whereas, were I to continue sitting in the house, the sheep might urine upon me without any person's preventing them," -Khalifah Ibn Khayat states that when 'Abd Allah Ibn 'Abbas governed Basrah in the name of 'Ali Ibn Abi Talib,<sup>11</sup> he had to make a journey to Hijaz, and left Abu 'l-Aswad to replace him: the latter continued in his post from that time till the death of 'Ali. He was notorious for his avarice, and he used to say: "If we listened to the demands made by the poor for our money, we should soon be worse off than they." He said also to his sons: "Strive not to rival Almighty God in generosity, for He is the most bountiful and the most glorious; had he pleased, he would have given ample wealth to all men; so: strive not to be generous, lest you die of starvation." He once heard a person say: "Who will give a supper to a hungry man,?" "Let him come to me" he replied. When the supper was over, the man left the table and was going out, but his host called after him: "Where are you going?" "To my people;" replied the other "That," exclaimed Abu 'l-Aswad, "I shall by no means allow; when I gave you to sup, my sole motive was to prevent the true believers from being troubled by you for this night at least." He then put him in the stocks and kept him in confinement till this next morning. Abu 'l-Aswad died at Basrah of the plague in the year 69 (A.D. 688-9), aged eighty-five years; some persons mention, however, that he died of the palsy before the plague broke out; others again state that he died in the Khilafat of 'Umar Ibn 'Abd al-'Aziz; now this prince came to the throne in the month of Safar A.H. 99 (September-October A.D. 717), and died at Dayr

---

10 Correct the Arabic text and read دينا Ibn Khallikan might have explained this verse and mentioned the fact to which it makes allusion. ALYafi'i says of it; This seems to mean: The Umayyads sent us to fight, but were too avaricious to recompense us.

11 AL-Yafi'i says in his Annals, A.H. 68 that Abu 'l-Aswad was qadi of Basrah.

Sam'an<sup>12</sup> in month of Rajab, A.H. 101 (February, A.D. 720). When Abu 'l-Aswad was on the point of death, someone said to him: "Rejoice, God's forgiveness awaits you;" to which he replied; "But where is the shame which I should feel if any of my deeds required forgiveness?— Dili and Duwali mean belonging to Duwil, which is a branch of tribe of Kinanah. In forming the relative adjective from Duwil, they say Duwali and not Duwili, so as to avoid a succession of kesras or i's: it is thus that from Nomirah, the name of another tribe, they form Namari; this is a general rule. Duwal is the name of an animal between the weasel and the fox.<sup>13</sup> The true pronunciation of the word Hils is given by al-Wazir al-Maghribi in his Kitab al-'Inas;<sup>14</sup> it is often written incorrectly, and I have found some differences of opinion subsisting respecting it, but Hils is right orthography.

292 ZAFIR AL-HADDAD

Abu 'l-Mansur Zafir Ibn al-Qasim Ibn Mansur Ibn 'Abd Allah Ibn Khalaf Ibn 'Abd al-Ghani al-Iskandarani<sup>1</sup> generally known by the surname of al-Haddad (the blacksmith), was a poet of talent and celebrity. He celebrated the praises of many eminent persons in Egypt, and greater part of his collected poetical works is very fine. The hafiz al-Silafi and other illustrious men taught, with his authorisation, some of the poems which he had composed. One of his best known pieces is the following:

"Had he taken refuge in an exemplary patience, his tears had not gushed forth in dews and showers. The troops of love ceased not to attack his heart till it was broken and torn to pieces. His passion has not left him any remains of life, except the mere principle of existence contained in the (sole) fragment of his heart (which still remains). He who desires to live in safety should always avoid the languishing eyes of the fair. Let not that languor deceive you; those glances wound your heart even when they

---

12 Dayr Sam'an lay in the neighbourhood of al-Khunasarah, a town at about two days' journey east of Aleppo.

13 Perhaps a species of ichneumon.

14 See No. 187.

1 The autograph has الاسكندراني (native of Alexandria); most of the other MSS. read الاسكندري, a word bearing the same signification.

give it pleasure. Charming gazelle! thou whose eyes lance arrows which pierce to the inmost heart! who arranged those pearls which shine in thy mouth? who prepared the intoxicating moisture in which those pearls are bathed? what artist gave such straightness to the lance of thy figure? with what steel were pointed the arrows of thy glances? Use thy body gently, lest it melt away; I fear lest thy silken vest (soft as it is) may hurt it. The magic effects of thy beauty surpass the enchantments of harut,<sup>2</sup> yet he is the ablest in the art; tell me<sup>3</sup> now who is his master? By Allah! if once a man is captured by thy charms, all human art can scarcely set him free. Thou hast sent love to attack the hearts of men, and they willingly submitted, for its victorious power had already reduced them to the last extremity.

I knocked at every door which leads to fortune, I spared no efforts; why then does she always fly and shun me? Avoid the vain wishes hope inspires; the favourite of fortune is (as wretched) as he whom she oppresses, and the man enriched by her favour is still a beggar for more.

A poem<sup>4</sup> of Ibn Durayd gained him the heart of men, when Baghdad, the place of his dwelling, rejected him. Subdued by the charm of his verses, they hoped to retain him among them, and that troop of foes whom he had prostrated by the power of his talent or—rather the enemies who wished to tear him to pieces—disparaged and left him unharmed (5). The Being who hath granted thee His richest favours cannot be offended by thy spending them on others.”<sup>5</sup>

The qasidah from which these extracts are taken is of the highest beauty; but I must here notice a singular circumstance: my professor ‘Imad al-Din Ibn Batish<sup>6</sup> has inserted these verses in his work entitled

2. Harut and Marut, two rebel angels, were chained at Babel, where they taught men magic.

3. The autograph has تری in place of یری the sense is nearly the same.

4. Literally: A poem rhyming in dh; (with a point). The autograph has ذالیه which is no doubt the true reading. The poet here recalls to mind the effects of a poem by Ibn Durayd in the same letter as his own qasidah. The fact to which Ibn al-Haddad alludes is not mentioned by Ibn Khallikan in the life of Ibn Durayd.

5. I have been obliged to paraphrase a very obscure verse, in order to make its meaning intelligible.

6. See No. 84 note. on Abu ‘l-Majd.

the Mughni (sufficient), which contains the explanation of the obscure passages met with in (Abu Ishaq al-Shirazi's) treatise on Jurisprudence the Muhammadhab, and gives a short account of the persons whose names are mentioned in that work; he then comes to speak of Abu Bakr Muhammad Ibn al-Haddad, a doctor of the sect of al-Shafi'i and a native of Egypt, and after giving an account of him, he says: "He composed "some fine poetry, and a certain jurisconsult recited to me a number of verses from a qasida which he attributed to him;" he then cites some of the verses, and they are the same as those given above. But this is an error into which he could only have been led from confounding Zafir al-Haddad with the jurisconsult Ibn al-Haddad. The following lines also are by Zafir:

"(The family of my beloved) have departed, and did I not hope for thier return, I should die. By Allah! it was not they, but my own heart from which I then was separated."

Imad al-Din mentions these lines in his Kharidah but attributes them to al-'Ayni,<sup>7</sup> and then says: "Al-'Ayni was an able officer and noted for his bravery; he died A.H. 546 (A.D. 1151-2)." But the truth is, that they are by Zafir, and Imad al-Din himself given them again in the life of that person. One of this poet's qasidahs contains the following verse:

"Lovers speak ill of the spies who beset them; O that I was in such favour with my mistress as to be in dread of spies!"

He died in Egypt in the month of Muharram, A.H. 529 (October-November, A.D. 1134). We have already spoken of the surname of Judhami (No. 65).

*The following lines on the weaver's loom were composed by Zafir:

"Look at the beauty of my products, admire my construction and the skill of Him who made me. I resemble the hands of two lovers, clasped in each other on the day of separation, the fingers of one inserted between those of the other."

'Ali Ibn Zafir Ibn Mansur praises him highly in his work entitled Bada'i' l-Badayah,<sup>8</sup> and relates the following anecdote respecting him, on the authority of the qadi Abu 'Abd Allah Muhammad Ibn al-Husayn al-Amidi, who had been acting for sometime as deputy to the qadi of Alexandria. "I went," says he, "to see al-Amir al-Sa'd (the fortunate amir) Ibn Zufar whilst he was governor of the city, and I found him putting some drops of oil upon his little finger. Having asked him the reason, he answered that the tightness of his ring had caused his finger to swell, on which I observed that it would be best to have the ring cut off before things grew worse. He then asked me who would be a proper person to do it, and I sent for Abu 'l-Mansur Zafir Ibn al-Qasim al-Haddad, who cut the ring, and extemporised these verses:

7 See Kharidah, MS. No. 1374. ff. 58 et 76.

* From 'The following' to end not, in the autograph.—Ed.

8 This work is noticed by Hajji Khalifah, who states that its author, the playming Wazir Jamal al-Din Abu l-Hasan 'Ali Ibn Zafir, a member of the tribe of Azd and native of Egypt, died A.H. 623 (A.D. 1226).

"The human race could not reckon all thy excellent qualities, even were thier prose-writers and their poets copious in thy praises. A ring must be too small for the finger of him whose generous hand is as ample as the ocean".<sup>9</sup>

"The amir was pleased with the lines, and gave the ring, which was of gold, to their author. There was a tame gazelle lying at the amir's feet with its head on his lap, and Zafir extemporised on it these lines:

"I wondered at the courage of that gazelle and the boldness of its conduct. I marvel to see it crouching down; how can it be tranquil near you who are a lion?"

"The amir and the company present admired this piece even more than the preceding, and Zafir, having then remarked a net placed before the door to keep out the birds, recited as follows:

"I saw a net at your exalted door, and that caused me some embarrassment: but after reflecting in my mind, I said: The sea is the place for nets."<sup>10</sup>

"He then retired and left us in admiration at the readiness of his wit and the elegance of his talent.

---

9 Literally: To whom the sea is a hand.

10 He calls the amir a sea for his vast generosity.

Ibn Khallikan's

WAFAYAT AL-A'YAN

WA ANBĀ' ABNA' AL-ZAMĀN

(A Biographical Dictionary)

Vol. 3

Eng. Translation
M. de Slane

Edited by
Dr. S. Moinul Haq

BASIC CONCEPTS OF THE QUR'AN

By MAULANA ABUL KALAM AZAD

Translated by DR. SYED ABDUL LATIF

Being a Resume of the views advanced by him in his Commentary of the Surat-ul-Fatiha, the opening chapter of the Qur'an

The volume sets out on a brief canvas the ideology of the Qur'an as estimated by the late Maulana Abul Kalam Azad and should serve as an illuminating Introduction to the Study of the Qur'an.

ISBN 81-7151-217-8 23x36/16 pp. 16+118 1996

Book Code No. B00075

Rs 60/-

AN ORIENTAL BIOGRAPHICAL DICTIONARY

T. W. BEALE

Thomas Beale's Oriental Biographical Dictionary, revised and edited by H.G. Keene, is still the most comprehensive work of its kind. It provides detailed biographical information on all the main figures in the history of the East from the first century A.D. to the nineteenth century.

The Dictionary is an outstanding work of scholarship and has been highly acclaimed by Oriental scholars and historians all over the world. It is indispensable for scholars and students of the history of Muslim India, consisting as it does material gathered from Persian Arabic, Urdu and European sources. The history of the Maratha and Rajput States and Kingdoms is also covered in full detail. Students of Muslim India's art, music and literature will find much of great interest and use in the volume.

More than 4500 entries are listed according to the English variant of each individual's name together with their Persian form in the parenthesis.

ISBN 81-7151-214-3 20x26/8 pp. 8+432 1996

Book Code No. O00018

Rs. 300/-

KITAB BHAVAN

1784, Kalan Mahal, Darya Ganj

New Delhi-110002 (India)

Phones : 3274686, 3277392-93

Telex : 31-63106 ALI IN

Fax : 91-11-3263383

Ibn Khallikan's
Wafayat al-A'yan

wa
Anbā' Abna' al-Zamān
(A Biographical Dictionary)

(M. de Slane's English Translation)

VOLUME III

Edited by:

S. MOINUL HAQ

M.A., Ph.D.

KITAB BHAVAN

New Delhi - 110002 (India)

KITAB BHAVAN

Exporters & Importers
1784, Kalan Mahal, Daryaganj
New Delhi-110002, [India]

Phones : 3274686, 3277392, 3277393

Fax : 91-11-3263383

Telex : 31-63106 ALI IN

ISBN 81-7151-170-8 Set
ISBN 81-7151-173-2 (Vol. III)

First Published in India      1996

Published by:

Nusrat Ali Nasri for Kitab Bhavan
1784, Kalan Mahal, Daryaganj
New Delhi-110002

Printed in India at:

Johar Offset Printers
Maujpur, Ghonda
Delhi-110053

CONTENTS

	PAGE
Introduction	1
294 'Aṣim Ibn Abi 'l-Najūd	13
295 Abū Burdah Ibn Abi Mūsa	13
296 Al-Ṣha'bi	16
297 Al-'Abbās Ibn al-Aḥnaf	19
298 Al-Riyāshī	23
299 'Abd Allāh Ibn 'Umar	24
300 'Abd Allāh Ibn al-Mubārak	28
301 Ibn 'Abd al-Ḥakam	31
302 Ibn Wahb	32
303 'Abd Allāh Ibn Lahī ah	35
304 Al-Qa'nabī	37
305 Ibn Kaḥīr the Qur'ān-Reader	38
306 Ibn Qutaybah	40
307 Ibn Durustūyah	43
308 Al-Ka'bī	44
309 Al-Qaṣṣāl al-Marwazī	44
310 Abū Muḥammad al-Juwaynī	45
311 Abū Zayd al-Dabūsī	47
312 Al-Murtaḍā Ibn al-Ṣhahruzūrī	47
313 Ṣharaf al-Dīn Ibn Abi 'Uṣrūn	52
314 Ibn As'ad al-Mawṣili	56
315 Ibn Ṣhās	60
316 'Abd Allāh Ibn al-Mu'tazz	61
317 Abū Muḥammad Ibn Ṭabāṭaba	67
318 'Abd Allāh Ibn Ṭāhir	70
319 Abu 'l-'Amaythal	76
320 Abu 'l-'Abbās al-Nāshī Ibn Ṣhirshīr	79
321 Ibn Ṣarah al-Ṣhantarīnī	80

KITAB BHAVAN

Exporters & Importers

1784, Kalan Mahal, Daryaganj

New Delhi-110002, [India]

Phones : 3274686, 3277392, 3277393

Fax : 91-11-3263383

Telex : 31-63106 ALI IN

ISBN 81-7151-170-8 Set

ISBN 81-7151-173-2 (Vol. III)

First Published in India      1996

Published by:

Nusrat Ali Nasri for Kitab Bhavan

1784, Kalan Mahal, Daryaganj

New Delhi-110002

Printed in India at:

Johar Offset Printers

Maujpur, Ghonda

Delhi-110053

CONTENTS

	PAGE
Introduction	1
294 'Aṣim Ibn Abi 'I-Najūd	13
295 Abū Burdah Ibn Abi Mūsa	13
296 Al-Ṣha'bi	16
297 Al-'Abbās Ibn al-Aḥnaf	19
298 Al-Riyāshī	23
299 'Abd Allāh Ibn 'Umar	24
300 'Abd Allāh Ibn al-Mubārak	28
301 Ibn 'Abd al-Ḥakam	31
302 Ibn Wahb	32
303 'Abd Allāh Ibn Lahī ah	35
304 Al-Qa'nabi	37
305 Ibn Kathīr the Qur'ān-Reader	38
306 Ibn Qutaybah	40
307 Ibn Durustūyah	43
308 Al-Ka'bi	44
309 Al-Qaṣṣāl al-Marwazī	44
310 Abū Muḥammad al-Juwaynī	45
311 Abū Zayd al-Dabūsī	47
312 Al-Murtaḍā Ibn al-Shahruzūrī	47
313 Shāraf al-Dīn Ibn Abi 'Uṣrūn	52
314 Ibn As'ad al-Mawṣili	56
315 Ibn Shās	60
316 'Abd Allāh Ibn al-Mu'tazz	61
317 Abū Muḥammad Ibn Ṭabāṭaba	67
318 'Abd Allāh Ibn Ṭāhir	70
319 Abu 'I-'Amaythal	76
320 Abu 'I-'Abbās al-Nāshī Ibn 'Shirshir	79
321 Ibn Ṣārah al-Shāntarīnī	80

		PAGE
322	Ibn al-Sid al-Baṭalyawsi ... ..	83
323	Ibn Nāqiyā ... ..	86
324	Abu 'l-Baqa al-'Ukbari ... ..	87
325	Ibn al- Khashshāb ... ..	90
326	Ibn al-Faraḡī ... ..	92
327	Al-Rushāṭī ... ..	94
328	Ibn Barri ... ..	95
329	Al-'Āḍid ... ..	97
330	Abu 'l-Raddād ... ..	99
331	'Ubayd Allāh Ibn 'Abd Allāh ... ..	103
332	'Ubayd Allāh the Mahdī ... ..	104
333	'Ubayd Allāh Ibn 'Abd Allāh Ibn Ṭāhir ... ..	107
334	Abu 'l-Ḥakam al-Maghribī ... ..	110
335	'Abd al-Rahmān Ibn Abī Layla ... ..	113
336	Al-Awzā'i ... ..	113
337	Ibn al-Qāsim al-Mālikī ... ..	115
338	Abū Sulaymān al-Dārānī ... ..	117
339	Al-Fūrānī ... ..	118
340	Abū Sa'd al-Mutawalli ... ..	119
341	Fakhr al-Dīn Ibn 'Asākir the Jurisconsult ... ..	121
342	Abu 'l-Qāsim al-Zajjāji ... ..	121
343	Ibn Yūnus the Historian ... ..	122
344	Ibn al-Anbārī the Grammarian ... ..	124
345	Abu 'l-Faraj Ibn al-Jawzī ... ..	125
346	Al-Suhayli ... ..	128
347	Abū Muslim al- Khurāsānī ... ..	130
348	Ibn Nubātah the Khaṭīb ... ..	140
349	Al-Qāḍī 'l-Faḍīl ... ..	142
350	Ibn Jurayj ... ..	148
351	'Abd al-Malik Ibn 'Umayr ... ..	149
352	Ibn al-Mājishūn ... ..	150
353	The Imām al-Ḥaramayn ... ..	152
354	Al-Aṣma'i ... ..	156
355	Ibn Hishām, the Author of the Sīrah ... ..	161
356	Al- Tha' ālībī al-Naysāpūri ... ..	162

		PAGE
357	Suḥnūn ... ..	164
358	Abū Hāshim al-Jubbā'i ... ..	166
359	Dik al-Jinn ... ..	167
360	Abu 'l-Qāsim al-Dārakī ... ..	171
361	Ibn Nubātah the Poet ... ..	173
362	Ibn Mughallis al-Andalusī ... ..	177
363	'Abd al-Šamad Ibn 'Alī al-Ḥāshimī ... ..	178
364	Ibn Bābak the Poet ... ..	179
365	Abu 'l-Maḥāsin al-Rūyānī ... ..	180
366	Al-Babbaghā ... ..	182
367	Abū Maṣṣūr al-Baghdādī ... ..	184
368	Abu 'l-Najīb al-Suhrawardī ... ..	185
369	Abu 'l-Qāsim al-Qushayrī ... ..	187
370	Abū Sa'd al-Sam'ānī ... ..	191
371	Ibn Ḥamdīs al-Šaqallī ... ..	195
372	Abu Ṭālib al-Ma'āfirī ... ..	198
373	'Abd Al-Razzaq al-Šan'ānī ... ..	199
374	Abū Naṣr Ibn Al-Šabbāgh ... ..	199
375	'Abd Al-Wahhāb Al-Mālikī ... ..	201
376	The Ḥāfiẓ 'Abd al-Ḡhanī Ibn Sa'id ... ..	205
377	'Abd al-Ḡhāfir al-Fārisī ... ..	206
378	Abu 'l-Waqt al-Sijazī ... ..	207
379	Ibn Kulayb al-Ḥarrānī ... ..	210
380	The Kātib 'Abd al-Ḥamid ... ..	210
381	'Abd al-Muḥsin Ibn Ḡhalbūn al-Šūrī ... ..	213
382	Al-Ḥāfiẓ al-'Ubaydī ... ..	217
383	'Abd al-Mūmin al-Kūmī ... ..	220
384	Abu 'l-Qāsim al-Anmāṭī ... ..	224
385	Ḍiyā al-Dīn al-Hadbānī ... ..	225
386	Taqī al-Dīn Ibn al-Šalāḥ ... ..	226
387	Ibn Jinnī ... ..	230
388	Abū 'Amr Ibn al-Ḥājib ... ..	233
389	Al-Malik al-'Aziz the son of Šalāḥ al-Dīn ... ..	236
390	The Shaykh 'Adī Ibn Musāfir al-Hakkāri ... ..	239
391	'Urwah Ibn al-Zubayr ... ..	240

		PAGE
392	Rukn al-Din al-Ṭāwūsī ...	245
393	Shayḍhalah ...	246
394	ʿAṭa Ibn Abi Rabāḥ ...	248
395	Al-Muqanna' al- K hurāsānī ...	250
396	ʿIkrimah ...	252
397	Zayn al-ʿĀbidīn ...	255
398	ʿAlī al-Riḍā ...	258
399	Abu ʿl-Ḥasan al-ʿAskarī ...	261
400	ʿAlī Ibn ʿAbd Allāh Ibn al-ʿAbbās ...	263
401	The Qāḍī Abu ʿl-Ḥasan al-Jurjānī ...	268
402	Ibn al-Marzubān ...	271
403	Al-Māwardī ...	272
404	Abu ʿl-Ḥasan al-ʿAshʿarī ...	275
405	Al-Kiyā al-Ḥarrāsī ...	277
406	The Ḥāfiẓ Abu ʿl-Ḥasan al-Maqdisī ...	283
407	Sayf al-Dīn al-ʿĀmidī ...	284
408	Al-Kisāʿī ...	287
409	Al-Dāraqutnī ...	289
410	Al-Rummānī ...	293
411	Abu ʿl-Ḥasan al-Ḥawfī ...	294
412	Al- A khfash al- A ṣghar ...	295
413	Al-Wāḥidī ...	297
414	Ibn Mākūlā ...	298
415	Abu ʿl-Faraj al-Iṣṣahānī ...	300
416	Ibn ʿAsākir, the Ḥāfiẓ ...	303
417	Al-Simsimānī ...	307
418	The S harīf al-Murtaḍā ...	308
419	Al- K hilaʿī ...	312
420	Al- S hābushī ...	315
421	Ibn al-Qābisī ...	316
422	Ibn al-Qaṭṭāʾ ...	318
423	Ibn Ḥazm al- Z āhiri ...	320
424	Ibn Sidah ...	326

			PAGE
427	Al-Raba'ī the Grammarian	...	332
428	Al-Fasiḥī	...	333
429	Ibn al-'Aṣṣār	...	333
430	Shumaym al-Ḥilli	...	334
431	'Alam al-Dīn al-Sakhāwī	...	335
432	Ibn al-Bawwāb the Kātib	...	337
433	Shaykh al-Islām al-Hakkārī	...	342
434	'Alī al-Harawī al-Sā'ih	...	342
435	'Izz al-Dīn Ibn al-Aṭhīr al-Jazarī	...	346
436	Al-'Akawwak	...	346
437	'Alī Ibn al-Jahm	...	351
438	Ibn al-Rūmi	...	354
339	Al-Bassāmī the Poet	...	359
440	Al-Qāḍī al-Tanūkhī	...	363
441	Al-Nāshī 'l-Aṣghār	...	366
442	Al-Zāhī the Poet	...	369
443	Ibn al-Munajjim al-Nadīm	...	372
444	Ibn al-Munajjim the Poet	...	373
445	Abu 'l-Faṭḥ al-Bustī	...	375
446	Al-Tihāmi the Poet	—	377
447	Ibn Nūbakht the Poet	...	380
448	Ṣarī' al-Dila	...	381
450	Al-Bākharzi	...	384
451	Ibn Aflaḥ the Poet	...	386
452	Ibn Muṣḥir al-Mawṣilī	...	388
453	Ibn al-Sā'atī	...	390
454	Abu al-'Āmidī the Qāḍī	...	381
455	'Imād al-Dawlat Ibn Buwayh	...	396
456	Sayf al-Dawlat Ibn Ḥamdān	...	398
457	Al-Zāhir al-'Ubaydī	...	405
458	'Alī Ibn Munqidh	...	407
459	Al-Ṣulayḥī	...	409
460	Al-'Ādil Ibn al-Sallār	...	416
461	Al-Malik al-Afḍal, the son of Ṣalāḥ al-Dīn	...	420
462	Abu 'l-Ḥasan 'Alī Ibn al-Furāt	...	423

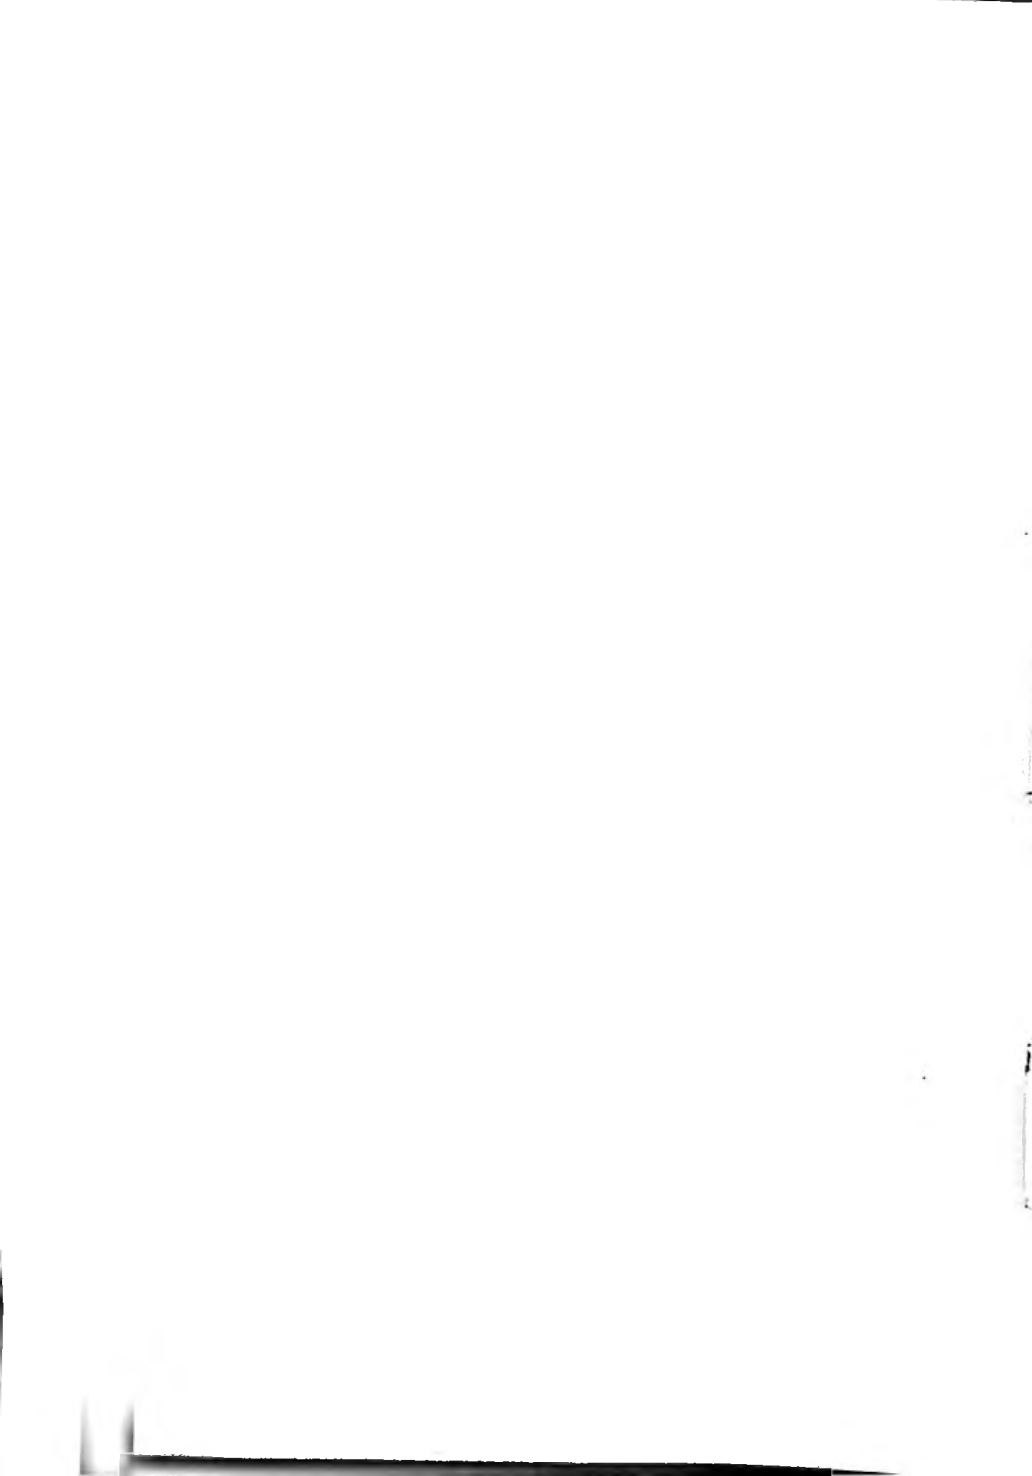

463	'Alī Ibn Yūnus the Astronomer ...	434
464	'Umārat al-Yamāni the Jurisconsult ...	437
465	'Umar Ibn Abī Rabi'ah ...	442
466	'Umar Ibn Shabbah ...	447
467	Al- Khiraqi ...	449
468	'Umar Ibn Dharr ...	450
469	Al- Thamānini ...	451
470	Ibn al-Bazrī ...	451
471	Shihāb al-Dīn al-Suhrawardī ...	454
472	The Ḥāfiẓ Ibn Dihyah ...	457
473	Abu 'Alī al- Shalawbīnī ...	459
474	Ibn Ṭabarzad ...	460
475	Al- Sharaf Ibn al-Fāriḍ ...	461
476	Taqī al-Dīn 'Umar, Prince of Ḥamāt ...	464
477	Abu Ishāq al-Sabī'i ...	466
478	'Amr Ibn 'Ubayd ...	466
479	Sībawah ...	470
480	Abū 'Amr Ibn al-'Alā ...	475
481	Al-Jāhiẓ ...	479
482	'Amr Ibn Mas'adah ...	482
483	Ibn Bānah ...	489
484	Ibn al-Mūṣalāyā ...	490
485	Ibn al-Sawādī ...	491
486	The Qāḍī 'Iyāḍ ...	493
487	'Isā Ibn 'Umar al- Thaqafi ...	495
488	Abū Mūsā 'Isā al-Juzūlī ...	499
489	Al-Fā'iz al-, Ubaydī ...	501
490	Al-Malik al-Mu'azzam Ibn al-'Ādil ...	505
491	'Isā al-Hakkāri the Jurisconsult ...	208
492	Fakhr al-Dīn 'Isā Ibn Mawdūd Lord of Tikrit ...	509
493	Al-Ḥājirī al-Irbilī ...	512
494	Ṭuways the Singer ...	517
495	Sayf al-Dīn Ghāzi Ibn Zinki ...	519
496	Ghāzi Ibn Mawdūd ...	520
497	Al-Malik al-Zāhir Sovereign of Aleppo ...	522
498	Dhu 'l-Rummah ...	528

NOTE ON transliteration

ا	=	a	س	=	s
آ	=	aw	ع	=	ʔ
ای	=	ay	ط	=	t
ب	=	b	ظ	=	z
ت	=	t	ع	=	ʔ
ث	=	th	غ	=	gh
ج	=	j	ف	=	f
ح	=	h	ق	=	q
خ	=	kh	ک	=	k
د	=	d	ل	=	l
ذ	=	dh	م	=	m
ر	=	r	ن	=	n
ز	=	z	و	=	u w; aw
س	=	s	ه	=	h
ش	=	sh	ی	=	i; y

Long vowels : ā, ī, ū

Short vowels : a, i, u

INTRODUCTION

"It is a curious circumstance that the majority of the learned amongst the Muslims belonged to a foreign race; very few persons of Arabian descent having obtained distinction in the sciences connected with the law or in those based upon human reason: and yet the promulgator of the law was an Arab, and the Qur'ān, that source of so many sciences, an Arabic book." The justness of this observation, made by Ibn Khaldūn in his Prolegomena, will be admitted by those who may have occasion to consult Ibn Khallikān's BIOGRAPHICAL DICTIONARY: they cannot have failed to remark that many of the individuals to whom the author has devoted an article are designated by him as mawlās, a term denoting their foreign origin and the precise meaning of which shall be given farther on. The reason assigned by Ibn Khaldūn for this peculiarity may not be completely satisfactory, but it is stated in a manner so highly characteristic of that writer that it cannot fail to interest the European reader.

"The (Muslim) religion," says he, "when first promulgated, did not include (the knowledge of) either science or art; such was the extreme simplicity of that nomadic civilisation (to which this doctrine was adapted). The articles of the law, or, in other terms, the commandments and prohibitions of God, were then borne (not in books but) in the hearts of men, who knew that these maxims drew their origin from the Book of God and from the practice (sunnah) of the Prophet himself. The people, at that time, consisted of Arabs wholly ignorant of the mode by which learning is taught, of the art of composing works and of the means by which knowledge is enregistered; for to these points they had not hitherto directed their attention. Under the Companions of Muḥammad and their immediate successors things continued in the same state; and, during that period, the designation of qurrā (readers) was applied to those who, being not totally devoid of learning, knew by heart and communicated information. Such were the persons who could repeat the Qur'ān, relate the sayings of the Prophet, and cite the example of his conduct in different circumstances. (This was a necessary duty)

inasmuch as the articles of the law could only be known from the Qur'an and from the Traditions which serve to explain it. The blessed Prophet himself said: I leave with you two things which, as long as you adhere thereto, will preserve you from error: these are, the Book of God and my practice (sunnah).

But, under the reign of al-Rashīd, this mode of oral transmission, now so long continued, rendered necessary that the (traditional) explanation of the Qur'an should be set down in writing, and that the text of the Traditions should be secured against alteration, lest they should be corrupted. To distinguish the authentic Traditions from those of less credibility, an exact knowledge of the isnads<sup>1</sup> was found necessary, and a close scrutiny was directed into the character of those persons through whom traditional knowledge had passed down.

Whilst the maxims of law deduced from the Qur'an and the sunnah rapidly augmented in number, the purity of the Arabic tongue underwent a gradual alteration; it therefore became necessary to fix the rules of grammar; and, as none of the sciences connected with the law could be mastered till the mind had acquired the faculties of elicitation, deduction, investigation, and comparison (the attainment of which depended on a prior acquaintance with the principles of the language, the rules of elicitation, those of comparison, and the arguments by which the dogmas of the faith could be defended), the acquisition of these sciences could not be effected without the previous development of certain mental faculties under the tuition of a master. Hence resulted that these sciences took their place among the (professional) arts; and, as arts do not flourish but among people settled in fixed abodes (a state of civilisation from which the Arabs were, of all mankind, the farthest removed), science became a product of domiciliation, and the Arabs were therefore averse to its acquisition. But the domiciled people consisted, at that time, of Persians, mawlas, and other persons who had adopted the Persian habits of settled life; for them, the arts and the sciences were a customary occupation, these habits having taken root among them at the origin of the Persian empire. Thus Sībawayh,<sup>2</sup> the master in the art of the grammar, al-Fārisi<sup>3</sup>, at a later period, and, after them, al-Zajjaj<sup>4</sup> were natives of Persia; the majority of those who (to the great advantage of Islamism) preserved the Traditions (by learning them by heart) were Persians or naturalised in Persia; all the learned in the fundamentals of jurisprudence were Persians, a fact of which the reader is well aware; so also were the dogmatic theologians and most of the commentators of the Qur'an.

<sup>1</sup> See Vol. I, Introduction : p. 22.    <sup>2</sup> See no. 479.    <sup>3</sup> See no. 155.

<sup>4</sup> See no. 12—Here Ibn Khaldūn has fallen into a mistake; al-Zajjaj was preceptor to al-Fārisi and died at least fifty years before him.

The Arabs who were contemporary with this state of civilisation preferred the customs of nomadic life: under the 'Abbasids, the exercise of military command and their occupations in the service of government diverted their attention from learning and study; attached to the state in the quality of protectors and (subordinate) rulers they, were withheld by pride from engaging in literary avocations, which, as we have just remarked, had assumed the rank of arts; and we know that persons accustomed to command others look upon the arts with scorn. They, in consequence, left such studies to the Persians and the mixed race (sprung from the intermarriage of the conquerors with the conquered) fully acknowledging their services in the cultivation of science."

The influence of the same principle by which Ibn Khaldun was guided throughout his Prolegomena is strongly marked in this passage; led away by his passion for generalizing, he examined every question in the abstract, and always assumed that, for one effect, a single cause was quite sufficient. This rule is by no means so certain as he imagined, and its weakness is manifest in the present case. That the Arabs, when once converted into a people of rulers and occupied in the exercise of power, neglected learning and left its culture to foreigners is a fact attested by history; that they were restrained by pride from such a pursuit is natural enough (not however because they considered it in the light of an art, but because it would have betrayed their own ignorance and incapacity), yet it still remains to be explained why foreigners were induced to devote their minds to the study of Muslim law and Arabic literature.

Though it should appear presumptuous to control the judgments of perhaps the ablest philosophical writer which Islamism ever produced, the attempt may be justified in some cases, and this is one of the number. The question which Ibn Khaldun overlooked admits of an easy solution: learning was the only path by which members of the conquered nations could hope to reach a position which might ensure them the respect of their masters; and by learning we are to understand such branches of knowledge as could serve to elucidate the doctrines of Islamism and develop the principles of the law: they saw the Arab government unable to apply to the new state of things by which it was surrounded those vague and incoherent maxims of jurisprudence which were furnished by the Qur'ān, the Traditions,* and the practice of the first Muslims; they felt that the faculties of mind which they had themselves derived from an advanced state of civilisation could be applied with advantage to the task of collecting and discussing the Traditions, clearing up the obscurities of the Qur'ān by the study of Arabic literature, and moulding into a regular system the ordinances of the law. This they undertook and accomplished; labouring to establish their own right to public respect, they gave consistence to Islamism; and the conquests of the Arabs received stability from the more peaceful occupations of the mawlās.

The word mawlā (مولى) is derived from the verb walā (ولى to be near); its grammatical form shows it to belong to that class of nouns which are called nouns of place (اسماء مكان), and serve to designate either the place in which the action indicated by the verb of the same root takes effect, or the subject in which the state of being expressed by that verb has its existence. The signification of the word mawlā is therefore the place in which, or the person in whom proximity exists, and, in its ordinary application, it serves to denote the ideas of master and slave, patron and client, companion, neighbour, confederate, relation (affinis), the grantor and the receiver of a favour, etc. It is easy to see that one general idea pervades these various significations, that of proximity, either in a physical or a moral sense. The primitive signification of the verb walā is also apparent in the derivative walt (ولى propinquus), which serves to express the idea of friend, and that of saint, because saints are near to God.

The relationship between patron and client is termed walā (ولاء) and it implies mutual assistance (tanāṣur). This mutual assistance embraces two conditions: 1. The obligation of the patron (al-Mawla 'l-Awlā) to pay the diyyah, or fine for blood<sup>1</sup> incurred by the client (al-Mawla 'l-Asfal); 2. The right of the patron to inherit of the client; or, in other terms, that the patron should become his client's 'aqilah (عاقلة ransomer) and wārith (وارث heir).

<sup>1</sup> The diyyah is the penalty imposed on the author of a homicide per infortunium. It consists of one hundred camels, or one thousand pieces of gold

(Continued on page 5.)

* Like most of the western orientalists, de Slane betrays his prejudice against Islam.—Ed.

Walā results from enfranchisement or from approximation; it is therefore of two kinds, relationship by enfranchisement (walā al-'atāqah), called also relationship by favour (walā al-ni'mah) and relationship by approximation (walā al-muwālāt); terms for which may be substituted in English, effective patronage and adoptive patronage.

Effective patronage is established by enfranchisement. The enfranchised slave becomes the client of him who enfranchises, and if he die without male heirs, his property is inherited by the enfranchiser or his heirs. Effective patronage is valid not only when the two parties are Muslims, but when they are both infidels, or when one is a Muslim and the other an infidel.

Adoptive patronage is established by a contract made with mutual consent, as when a person makes profession of Islamism to another person, and then says: "Thou art my mawla (patron), to inherit of me and when I die and to pay the fine for me when I am amerced;" and the other replies: "I accept," or: "I form proximity with thee".

The necessary conditions of this act are that the future client should be without heirs, that he should not be an Arab or a mawla to an Arab, that no other person had already engaged to pay the fine for blood in case of his being amerced, and that the right of inheriting and the obligation of paying the fine should be enounced when forming the contract. Islamism in one or both parties is not a necessary condition, according to the majority of the doctors: a dhimmi may contract walā with a dhimmi or with a Muslim, and a Muslim with a dhimmi; a man may also contract it with a woman, and a woman with a man; neither is it necessary that the act should pass in a Muslim country. The children of the client (born after the contract, for, before it, he was without heirs), are (dinārs), or twelve thousand pieces of silver (dirhams). The diyah incurred for the homicide of a woman, a Christian, a Jew, or a Magian, is half the ordinary diyah. The diyah is incurred for having occasioned the loss of the two hands, or of the two feet, or of the two eyes; the loss of a single hand, foot, or eye, requires the penalty of a half diyah. The whole diyah is incurred for having caused the loss of the nose, or of the hearing, or of the reason, or of the tongue, or of the sexual organs, etc.

(Continued from page 4.)

bound by that act and benefit by the advantages which it assures them. Adoptive patronage confers on the foreign neophyte all the civil rights possessed by a Muslim, and by it he has the advantage of choosing his 'aḳilah.

In the eyes of the Muslim law every individual must have an 'aḳilah, that is, a person or a body of men bound to pay the fine of blood if he be amerced. The 'aḳilah of a man are all those who are inscribed on the same roll (diwān) with him, if he be engaged in military service, or if he receives a pension from the public treasury; otherwise, it is his tribe or family; then his patron, then his clients; and if he have no 'aḳilah, the public treasury pays for him. If he inhabit a city or its suburb, all the enregistered inhabitants form his 'aḳilah, and if he exercise a profession there, all the members of the same trade are his 'aḳilah. Each class of dhimmis is the 'aḳilah of its individual members; the 'aḳilah of a mawlā by enfranchisement are the emancipator and kindred of the emancipator, and the 'aḳilah of a mawlā by approximation are his patron and patron's kindred.

MUSLIM EDUCATION

The course of study universally followed in Muhammedan countries has been briefly indicated in the first volume of this work,<sup>1</sup> but it is much to be regretted that the information we possess on this subject is very slight, and that the system of mental culture requisite to form a well-educated Muslim is a point on which great obscurity still prevails. And yet the importance of obtaining a clear insight into the causes which gave to the character of a great and polished nation its peculiar cast and form cannot but be deeply felt. Were it possible to dissipate the obscurity in which this question is involved, a more exact idea would then be formed of the Muslim mind and Muslim civilisation. In such an investigation the works of Arabic authors might be expected to afford the highest assistance, but unfortunately the documents which they have left on this subject do not enable us to view it in all its bearings. These indications are not, however, without their value; they aid us to understand some parts of the system, and from the parts we may judge of the whole. One of the most curious is that given by Ibn Khaldun in his Prolegomena, where he expresses himself thus:

"To teach children the Qur'ān is a sign of religion shown by the Muslims in all their cities, and a duty which they universally fulfil; for by this means the faith is firmly planted in the youthful heart, as also a knowledge of the dogmas which are enounced in the verses of that book. The Qur'ān is therefore the basis on which are reared the future faculties of the mind; for that which is learned at an early age remains deeply impressed on the memory and serves as a foundation for what follows, and we know that the form of the edifice is determined by the disposition of the foundations.

The different systems followed in teaching children the Qur'ān are distinguished by the peculiar faculties developed by each. In Maḡrib (Algiers and Morocco), that book is taught without any accompaniment; they begin by making the scholar read it over; then he learns it by heart from the edition of the text received in that country; and he is instructed, at the same time, in its peculiar orthography, the questions to which it gives rise, and the various readings remarked in the systems of those (ancient masters) by whom it was transmitted down. Till this first step be surmounted, every thing else, such as Traditions, jurisprudence, poetry, and the idiom of the desert Arabs, is excluded. It therefore happens that a failure in this early stage of the pupil's progress puts an entire stop to his career.

---

<sup>1</sup> See Vol. I, Introduction, page 31.

Such is the mode of instruction followed in the cities of Maghrib and in some Berber towns where the example has been adopted; it applies equally to the scholar who has not attained the age of puberty, and to persons more advanced in years who intend to recommence their studies; the result is, that the Maghribins are more intimately acquainted with the orthography of the Qur'an, and know it by heart much better than people of other countries.

In Spain they proceed otherwise; for, whilst they make it a rule to teach the reading of the Qur'an and its orthography as actually used (because they consider that book as the foundation of learning, the groundwork of education, and the basis of religion and the sciences), they instruct their children at the same time in poetry, epistolary writing, the principles of grammar, and the art of penmanship. The acquisition of this last accomplishment occupies scholars till the age of puberty, so that whilst youths obtain a knowledge of grammar and an acquaintance with the works of the poets, they become skilful penmen and persevere, nearly all, in the pursuit of learning. But learning subsists by transmission, and, as its transmission has been interrupted in the provinces of Spain, the students of that country can only acquire such portions of knowledge as are accessible from the first steps of their education. This is however sufficient for him whom God directs, and it gives him the means of reaching other branches of learning.

In Ifriqiyah (the province of Tunis), they generally instruct their children in the Traditions whilst teaching them the Qur'an to which they add the principles of the sciences and some of the questions which they involve; but, as their chief object is to communicate a correct knowledge of the text and various readings of that book, the art of penmanship is neglected.

In the East instruction is also of a mixed nature, but I do not know to what length it is carried; we have been told however that they pay more attention to the culture of penmanship and of the sciences than to the study of the Qur'an.

The people of Ifrīqiyah and Maghrib, by confining their application to the Qur'ān, can never attain the faculty of mastering the language. The reason of this we shall here explain: No peculiar faculty can be developed in the mind by the study of the Qur'ān, because the declaration that it is impossible to produce anything equal to it prevents it from being taken as a model for imitation; so that the student, though he may acquire an ample share of spiritual merit, can neither obtain a good command of Arabic nor a facility of diction. The people of Ifrīqiyah are perhaps more advanced in this last respect than those of Maghrib, because, in studying the Qur'ān they learn Traditions and scientific rules; they have therefore a certain command of language, but they do not attain elegance of expression.

The habit of teaching pupils, or repeating poems and epistles, and of studying the rules of grammar is so general in Spain, that the natives of that country have acquired a complete mastery of the Arabic tongue; but in other branches of knowledge their skill is inferior, because they have not paid sufficient attention to the Qur'ān and the Traditions, which are the source and basis of the sciences. In grammar, however, and polite literature they excel in a greater or less degree, accordingly as they have devoted more or less time to these occupations on terminating the studies which engaged their youth.

The qāḍī Abū Bakr Ibn al-'Arabī<sup>1</sup> has laid down, in his Riḥlah, a highly curious and original plan of study. He proposes that youths should be first instructed in grammar and the works of the poets, conformably to the Spanish custom, 'for,' says he, 'language is enregistered in its poetry, and the corruption of the language renders it necessary that you should commence by that and by grammar; you should then pass to arithmetic, and, having acquired an idea of its rules, you may proceed to the study of the Qur'ān, which, by means of the preparatory labours, will be found much easier than it generally is. You may then commence dogmatic theology (uṣūl al-dīn) and the fundamentals of jurisprudence (uṣūl al-fiqh), after which you may proceed to dialectics (jadāl), and from that to the Traditions and the sciences connected with them.' He disapproved of teaching two sciences simultaneously, unless the pupil be remarkably intelligent. Such are the counsels of the qāḍī, and I acknowledge that the plan laid down by him is excellent; but settled custom, that influential element in the human character, renders it inadmissible. In taking the Qur'ān for the basis of education, people are actuated by the desire of meriting the divine favour, as, by this means, they protect youth against its own follies and preserve it from that levity of mind which not only ruins the knowledge already obtained or interrupts its acquisition, but would also prevent the young Muslim from learning the Qur'ān. Indeed, whilst under the guardianship of his family, he may be retained in habitual submission, but, when the age of puberty delivers him from control, the storms of passion may soon cast him away on the coast of folly. They therefore take advantage of the time during which he is under command, to teach him the Qur'ān so that, at a later period, he may not be entirely ignorant of its contents. However, were it certain that the student would persevere in the pursuit of knowledge and submit to receive instruction, the system proposed by the qāḍī would be the best which the people of the East and the West could adopt; but God ordains what He pleaseth, and no change can be effected in His decisions."

---

<sup>1</sup> The Life of Abū Bakr Ibn al-'Arabī will be found in no. 600.

To proceed from this first step so well described by Ibn Khaldūn and follow the young Muslim in his path through the higher departments of study, we must have recourse to the biographical notices on their learned men. The life of Avicenna offers us a transitory glance at his early education and therefore merits attention, but much fuller information will be obtained from the autobiography of 'Abd al-Laṭīf. In this work, he gives us a perfect outline of his own studies under some of the most distinguished masters of the epoch. Were this treatise less known, I should have felt it indispensable to insert an extract from it here, but it has been rendered fully accessible by two editions, one in Arabic and Latin by Mousley, and the other in Arabic and French by de Sacy; the latter so admirably translated and commented that, were I to undertake a new version of it into English, I feel I should rest far—very far indeed—beneath that illustrious orientalist, my deeply venerated master.

Another contribution to the same stock of documents is furnished by Ibn Khaldūn in his autobiography. He informs us that, having learned to read the Qur'an and got it off by heart, he read it again according to each of the seven readings or editions, and then combined these various readings in a final repetition of the text. During this occupation he went over the Qur'an twenty-one times, and in a twenty-second repetition, he went over all the various readings. He finished by the lecture of the two editions, or systems of readings, taught by Ya'qūb.<sup>1</sup> At this period, two other works occupied his attention: the Lāmiyah, a poem of Ibn Fīrrah al-Shaṭībī, on the readings of the Qur'an, and the Rāiyah, another poem by the same author on the orthography of that book.<sup>2</sup> He next studied the Takasī, a treatise composed by Ibn 'Abd al-Barr<sup>3</sup> on the Traditions cited in the Muwatṭā'<sup>4</sup> and a great number of other works, such as the Tashīl<sup>5</sup> of Ibn Mālik and Ibn al-Hājib's<sup>6</sup> abridgment of jurisprudence, but these last he did not get off by heart. During the same period he cultivated the art of grammar under the tuition of his father and of the first masters. He perused also the Six Poets<sup>7</sup> the Ḥamāsah, the poems of Abū Tammām<sup>8</sup> part of al-Mutanabbī's<sup>9</sup> poetical works, and some of the pieces preserved in the Kitāb al-Aghānī.<sup>10</sup> Under Shams al-Dīn al-Kisā'i, chief traditionist of Tunis, he perused Muslim's collection of Traditions and received a general licence (ijāzah). In law he studied the abridgment of the Mudawwanah<sup>11</sup> composed by Abū Sa'īd al-Barada'i, and the exposition of the doctrines held by the sect of Mālik. He followed, besides, a general course of law and learned Mālik's Muwatṭā'; certificates were also obtained by him authorizing him to teach that book, the Sīrat al-Rasūl<sup>12</sup> the treatise of Ibn Ṣalāḥ on the Traditions, and many

<sup>1</sup> He means Ya'qūb Ibn Ishāq al-Ḥaḍramī, one of the great readers. His life is given by Ibn Khālikān.

<sup>2</sup> See No. 512. By the Lāmiyah Ibn Khaldūn means to designate Ibn Fīrrah's Hīr al-Amīn.

<sup>3</sup> In a subsequent volume will be found the life of Ibn 'Abd al-Barr.

<sup>4</sup> See No. 524.

<sup>5</sup> This is a treatise on grammar by Ibn Mālik, the author of the Alfiyah, who died A. H. 672 (A. C. 1273-4). M. de Sacy's Anthologie Grammaticale, pages 203, 215, and Fluegels' Hājji Khalifah, tom II. page 290.

<sup>6</sup> See No. 388.

<sup>7</sup> The six poets are 'Imrau al-Qays, Nābiḥah, 'Alqamah, Zuhayr, Tarafah, and 'Antarah. See page X of my preface to the Dīwān d' Amro 'l-Kais.

<sup>8</sup> See No. 143.

<sup>9</sup> See No. 49.

<sup>10</sup> See No. 415.

<sup>11</sup> See No. 335.

<sup>12</sup> See No. 355.

*M de Slane has made a mistake in pointing out this qaṣīdah. There are numerous lāmiyah qaṣīdahs but most noted of them is Shānī'arā's; the opening line of which runs thus:

—Ed. اقيموا بني امي مدور سطيكم * فاني الى قوم سواكم لاسيل other works. He obtained access to the library of 'Abd al-Muḥaymin al-Ḥaḍramī, chief traditionist and grammarian of Morocco, who had accompanied to the city of Tunis Abu 'l-Ḥasan, the sovereign of that empire, in the quality of secretary of state. This collection of books consisted of more than three thousand volumes on the Traditions, law, grammar, philology, the intellectual sciences, general literature, and poetry; these manuscripts were all of the highest correctness and their authenticity was guaranteed by certificates annexed to them. Under another master he studied logic, dogmatic theology, jurisprudence, and all the intellectual and philosophical sciences. Whilst pursuing his studies, he followed the public lectures at Tunis, and attended the assemblies held by the first doctors and professors of the place. He finally devoted three years to study under a shaykh called Abū 'Abd Allāh al-Abbālī (أبو) "and then," says he, "I felt that I knew something." Ibn Khaldūn terminated his studies in the twentieth or twenty-first year of his age.<sup>1</sup>

---

<sup>1</sup> This notice was just terminated, when a large manuscript, containing the biography of the doctor and historian Ahmad Ibn 'Alī Ibn Ḥajar al-'Asqalānī, by the Ḥāfiẓ Shams al-Dīn Muḥammad al-Sakhāwī, fell into the writer's hands. A chapter of this work is devoted to the history of Ibn Ḥajar's youth travels, studies, etc; but it is drawn up in such a manner that to make an analysis of it would be a very difficult task. We find however that he began by learning the Qur'ān by heart, and proceeded to the study of the Traditions and jurisprudence; following, in fact, the same system which has been already indicated in the introduction of our first volume.

IBN KHALLIKAN'S

BIOGRAPHICAL DICTIONARY

294. 'AṢIM IBN ABI 'L-NAJŪD

Abū Bakr 'Aṣim was the son of Abū 'l-Najūd Balīdalah, mawlā to the tribe of Jadhīmah Ibn Mālik Ibn Naṣr Ibn Qū'ayn Ibn Asad. His acquaintance with the Qur'anic readings drew upon him general notice and ranked him as one of the seven great masters of that science. He had learnt it from Abū 'Abd al-Raḥmān al-Sulamī<sup>1</sup> and Zirr Ibn Ḥubaysh<sup>2</sup>; he taught it to Abū Bakr Ibn Ayyās<sup>3</sup> (see No. 242) and Abū 'Umar al-Bazzāz<sup>3</sup> but these two varied very much in their manner of reading certain words. 'Aṣim died at Kūfah, A.H. 127 (A.C. 744-5). The word najūd signifies a female wild ass not pregnant; others say that she is thus designated when keeping watch on the top of a hill.—Some persons state that Bahdalah was his mother's name (not his father's).

295. ABŪ BURDAH IBN ABĪ MŪSĀ

Abū Burdah 'Āmir was the son of Abū Musā 'Abd Allāh Ibn Qays al-Ash'arī one of Muḥammad's Companions, who had come to him from Yaman with the Asharites when they became converts to Islamism<sup>4</sup>. Muḥammad Ibn Sa'd mentions in his Ṭabaqāt

<sup>1</sup> Abū 'Abd al-Raḥmān 'Abd Allāh Ibn Ḥabīb al-Sulamī al-Kūfī (a member of the tribe of Sulaym and a native of Kūfah) was born in the lifetime of Muḥammad. He learned to read the Qur'ān under the tuition of the Khalīfs 'Uthmān and 'Alī, and then taught the same science in the great mosque of Kūfah. He died A. H. 74 (A. C. 693-4).—(Al-Dhahabī's Ṭabaqāt al-Qurrā).

<sup>2</sup> Abū Maryam Zirr Ibn Ḥubaysh Ibn Ḥubāsah, a member of the tribe of Asad and a native of Kūfah, was one of the great masters in the art of reading the Qur'ān. He was celebrated also as a philologist, and died at a very advanced age, A. H. 82 (A. C. 701).—(Al-Dhahabī's Ṭabaqāt al-Qurrā, fol. 8.)

<sup>3</sup> Abū 'Umar Ḥafṣ Ibn Abi Dāwūd al-Bazzāz, the disciple of al-'Aṣim, was a native of Kūfah and a mawlā to the tribe of Asad. Born A. H. 90 (A. C. 708-9); died A. H. 180 (A. C. 796-7).—Ṭab. al-Qurrā.)

<sup>4</sup> The conversion of the Yemenites took place in the tenth year of the Hijrah.

that Abū Burdah succeeded to Shurayh (see No. 275) as qāḍī of Kūfah. By the nobleness of his conduct and by his virtues he attained a high reputation. * [Abū Mūsā, when governor of Baṣrah, married Ṭaniyah the daughter of Dammān, a native of Ṭā'if, and she bore him Abū Burdah; the child was put to nurse with the tribe of Fuqaym, which dwelt at al-Gharq<sup>1</sup>; when grown a boy, he was dressed in two mantles (burdah) by (his foster father) Abū Shaykh Ibn al-Gharīq and brought to his father, who then surnamed him Abī Burdah; from that time his real name ceased to be given him.] Abū Mūsā was qāḍī of Baṣrah under the khalīf 'Umar and afterwards in the reign of 'Uthmān, he acted as a qāḍī of Kūfah; his (grand) son Bilāl was also qāḍī of Baṣrah: this was the circumstance which gave rise to the saying, three qāḍīs in succession.—The poet Dhu 'l-Rummaḥ composed a number of splendid poems in praise of Bilāl, and in the following verse, addressed to his camel, he alludes to him also:

"When thou reachest Bilāl the (grand) son of Abū Mūsā (thy toils are at an end), and the butcher then may wield his axe to disjoint thy limbs."

He said also of him:

"On hearing that the tribe were roaming through the desert with their flocks in search of pasturage, I said to Ṣaydah: 'Seek abundance near Bilāl!'"

Ṣaydah was the name of the poet's camel.—Bilāl was one of the deputies in the service of Khalīd al-Qasrī (see his life, no. 204); when the latter was deprived of the government of Arabian and Persian 'Irāq, his successor Yūsuf Ibn 'Umar al-Thaqafī required from him and his agents an account of what had been done with the revenues of these provinces, and employed torture to make them refund; al-Qasrī and Bilāl expired under their sufferings. In a book containing a collection of anecdotes I found the following: At a public assembly Abū Burdah was extolling the virtues of his father, and mentioned that he had been one of Muḥammad's Companions; he vaunted also the glory which accrued to himself in being sprung from so illustrious a parent. He held a long discourse on this topic, till the poet, al-Farazdaq, who happened to be present and wished to humble his pride, made the remark that, had Abū Mūsā possessed no other merit than that of having cupped the Prophet, such an honour would have been quite sufficient for his reputation. On this, Abū Burdah got angry<sup>1</sup> and replied: "Your observation is true, but he never cupped any person either before or after". — "By Allāh!" exclaimed al-Farazdaq, "Abū Mūsā was too good a man to dare make his first essay in cupping on the person of the Prophet!" This retort silenced Abū Burdah and forced him to smother his anger. The following anecdote is related by Ghārs al-Ni'mah Ibn al-Ṣībī<sup>2</sup> in one of his works: 'Abū Ṣafwān Khalīd Ibn Ṣafwān, a member of the tribe of Tamīm, was celebrated as an eloquent speaker. He used to visit Bilāl Ibn Abī Burdah and converse with him, but his language was frequently ungrammatical. This grew at length so irksome to Bilāl, that he said to him: 'O Khalīd! you make me narrations fit for khalīfs to hear, but you commit as many faults against grammar as the women who carry water in the streets.' Stung with this reproach, Khalīd went to learn grammar at the mosque and some time after he lost his sight. From that period, whenever Bilāl rode by in state, he used to ask who it was, and on being answered that it was the amīr, he would say: 'There goes a summercloud, soon to be dispelled.' When this was told to Bilāl, he exclaimed: 'By Allāh! it shall not be dispelled till he get a full shower from it;' and he then ordered him a whipping of two hundred strokes. This Khalīd was extremely giddy and never paid the slightest attention to what he said. He drew his descent from 'Amr Ibn al-Ahtam<sup>3</sup> one of Muḥammad's Companions; his grandfather 'Abd Allāh being that person's son. Al-Ahtam was the son of Sumayy Ibn Sinān Ibn Khalīd Ibn Minqar, of the tribe of Tamīm; and for this reason he bore the surnames of al-Minqarī and al-Tamīmī.

<sup>1</sup> I am unable to fix with any certainty the situation of this place. The author of the Marāṣid merely says: "al-Gharq, a village in the dependencies of Marw—al-Gharq a village in Yamāmah, and a plantation of date trees belonging to the tribe of 'Adī Ibn Ḥanīfah".

* [ ] From 'Abū Mūsā' to 'given him' is not included in the autograph.—Ed.

<sup>1</sup> The profession of a cupper was considered by some jurisconsults as degrading. In one of the Traditions it is said: "The price of a dog is impure, and the wages of fornication are impure, and the pay of a cupper is impure." — Mathew's Mishkāt, vol. II, page 2. See also no. 212.

<sup>2</sup> Mention has been made of this historian in No. 125.

<sup>3</sup> 'Amr, the son of Sinān al-Ahtam, an eminent chief of the tribe of Tamīm, an able orator and a good poet, flourished before and after the promulgation of Islamism. He and 'Amr Ibn Zibriqān went together to Muḥammad and embraced his religion. He died A.H. 58 (A.C. 677-8). For further information see Rasmussen's Historia Anteislamica, p. 119 note; and his Additamenta ad Hist. Islam. p. 33.

His real name was Sinan, but when Qays Ibn 'Aṣim al-Minqarī<sup>1</sup> struck him across the mouth with his bow and broke his front teeth, he was called al-Ahtam (broken-tooth).<sup>2</sup> Others say that his teeth were broken on the battle day of al-Kulāb<sup>3</sup>. Shabīb Ibn Shabbah<sup>4</sup> was an uncle of this Khālīd. Abū Burdah died A.H. 103 (A.C. 721-2) but others place this event in the years 104, 106, and 107. (Muḥammād) Ibn Sa'd says that Abū Burdah and al-Sha'bī died in the year 103 and on the same day, which was a Friday. We shall explain the meaning of the surname al-Ash'arī in the life of Abū 'l-Ḥasan ('Alī) al-Aṣḥ'arī.

296. AL-SHA'BĪ

Abū-'Amr 'Āmir al-Sha'bī was the son of Shārahīl Ibn 'Abd 'lbn<sup>4</sup> Dhī Kibār:—Dhī Kibār was one of the princes of Yaman. Al-Sha'bī sprang from Ḥimyar and was counted as a member of the tribe of Hamdan, but Kufah was the place of his birth. He held a high rank among the Tābi'īs and was distinguished also by his profound learning. It is stated that Ibn 'Umar<sup>5</sup> walked past him one day whilst he was relating the history of a victorious campaign made by the first Muslims, and said, on hearing the narration which he made: "He knows what was done at the expedition better than I who was with it." Al-Zuhrī made the remark that the really learned men were four in number: Ibn al-Musayyab<sup>6</sup> at Madinah,

<sup>1</sup> See No. 74, note on Cain fills de Aasim 'Rasmussen's Additamenta, p. 67, and Hist. Antisl.—Al-Minqarī, the surname borne by Qays, is derived from Minqar, the name of one of his ancestors, descended from Tamīm.

<sup>2</sup> For the account of this battle or skirmish see Rasmussen's Hist. Antislam, p. 117.

<sup>3</sup> Shabīb Ibn Shabbah, a celebrated preacher (Fihrist, fol. 171), was a contemporary of the Khālīf al-Mahdī. That prince had a daughter named al-Yāqūṭah, of whom he was so fond that he could not bear to be separated from her a single instant. He therefore had her attired in the uniform of a page, so that she might accompany him when he rode out. She died before him, and he continued inconsolable for her loss till Shabīb Ibn Shabbah addressed to him a short but most effective exhortation.—(Ibn al-Aṭḥīr's Kāmil, year 169).

<sup>4</sup> In the printed text the word lbn بن has been left out by mistake.*

<sup>5</sup> See No. 249, note on 'Abd Allah.

<sup>6</sup> See his life, No. 250.

* The autograph gives Ibn while the word ابن is omitted in Cairo edition—Ed.

al-Sha'bī at Kūfah, al-Ḥasan al-Baṣrī<sup>1</sup> at Baṣrah, and Makḥūl<sup>2</sup> in Syria. It is said that he conversed with five hundred of the Prophet's Companions. The following anecdote is related by himself: 'Abd al-Malik Ibn Marwān sent me on an embassy to the king of the Greeks; and that prince addressed me a number of questions, to all of which I returned satisfactory answers. It was not customary for ambassadors to make a long stay at his court, but he detained me so many days that I desired impatiently to depart. When on the point of quitting him he said to me: "Are you of a royal family?" to which I replied: "No; I am one of the general class of Arabs." On this he muttered some words and a paper was put in my hand: "When you have given to your master an account of your mission," said he, "present this paper to him." Having returned to 'Abd al-Malik, I informed him of the results of my embassy, but I never thought of the paper, and it was only on passing through another part of the palace with the intention of withdrawing, that I recollected it. I immediately went back and presented it to him. When he had perused it he asked me if the Greek sovereign had said anything to me before he gave me the paper? "Yes", I replied, "he asked me if I was of a royal family, and I answered that I belonged to the general class of the Arabs." I then retired and had reached the door when I was brought back into the Khalīf's presence. "Do you know," said he, "what is in this paper?"—"No," said I; on which he told me to read it. It contained these words: I am astonished that a people who have among them a man like this could have chosen any other but him for their ruler. "By Allah!" I exclaimed, "had I known the contents, I should not have taken charge of it; had he ever seen you, he would not have said such a thing!" "Are you aware," said 'Abd al-Malik, "why he wrote it?" "I am not."—"It was because he envied me so able a servant as you, and hoped to incite me by this to put you to death." These words, continues al-Sha'bī, reached at length the ears of the Greek king, who acknowledged that such was really his design. Al-Sha'bī once spoke to 'Umar Ibn Hubayrah, the governor of the two 'Iraqs, in favour of some prisoners, and asked him to set them at liberty; but not being able to obtain his consent, he addressed him in these terms: "O amīr! if you have imprisoned them without cause, let your justice deliver them; and if they be guilty, let your clemency be ample enough to reach them." Ibn Hubayrah immediately set them free. It is stated by Qatādah that al-Shā'bī was born four years before the death of the khalīf 'Umar (which happened A.H. 23), but Khālīfah Ibn Khayyāt<sup>1</sup> mentions that al-Ḥasan al-Baṣrī and he were born in the year 21, and al-Aṣma'i says that he came into the world at Kūfah, A.H. 17.—Al-Shā'bī was a thin emaciated man, and he once said, on being asked the cause: "I was straitened for room in my mother's womb." The fact was that she had two sons at a birth and (Ibn Qutaybah), the author of the Kitāb al-Ma'ārīf pretends that she was pregnant with him for two years. It is related that al-Ḥajjāj Ibn Yūsuf al-Ṭḥaqafī said to him one day: "How much is your yearly salary?" (kam 'aṭā'ak, according to the vulgar pronunciation), to which al-Shā'bī replied (in the same jargon): "Two thousand dinārs" (alfayn).—"Tut!" exclaimed al-Ḥajjāj, "kam 'aṭā'ulka?" (repeating the question correctly), and al-Shā'bī then answered (grammatically): alfāni. "Why," said al-Ḥajjāj, "did you speak incorrectly at first?"—"The amīr spoke false grammar," replied he, "and I spoke false grammar; and when he spoke with right inflexions, I did the same; for I could not have allowed myself to speak grammatically when the amīr did not." Al-Ḥajjāj was highly pleased with this answer and made him a present. Al-Shā'bī was inclined to pleasantry; he was one day sitting in his house with a female when a person came in and asked: "Which of you two is al-Shā'bī?" To which he replied: "She is the man." He was born in the seventh year of the khalīfat of 'Uṭḥmān, (A.H. 30, A.C. 650-1); others say, however, in A.H. 20 or A.H. 31; but it is related that he himself mentioned that his birth took place the year in which the town of Jalūlā was taken, and this occurred A.H. 19 (A.C. 640)<sup>2</sup>: he died suddenly, A.H. 104 (A.C. 722-3); other

<sup>1</sup> See No. 148.

<sup>2</sup> The life of Makḥūl and that of al-Zuhri will be given by the author of this work.

---

<sup>1</sup> His life is given in No. 207 but by a strange mistake his father's name is written throughout that article Ḥayār.*

<sup>2</sup> The celebrated battle of Jalūlā was fought A.H. 16. See Abu 'l-Fida's Annals; Price's Retrospect, vol. I, page 124.

* The error has been corrected in this edition.—Ed.

accounts say 103, 106, 107 and 105. His mother was one of the captives made at Jalulā. Sha'bi means belonging to Sha'b, a branch of the tribe of Hamdān. Al-Jawharī says: "This relative adjective is derived from Dhū-Sha'bayn (the double-valleyed), which is a mountain in Yaman, where Ḥasan Ibn 'Amr the Ḥimyarite<sup>1</sup> and his children took up their residence, and where he was buried. The descendants of that family who inhabit Kafah are called the Sha'biyān; those in Egypt and Maḡrib are styled al-Ush'ab; in Syria the name of Sha'bāniyān is given to them, and in Yaman they are known as the people of Sha'bayn."—Jalulā is the name of a town in the province of Fārs, where a famous battle was fought in the time of Muḥammad's Companions.—Al-Sha'bi often cited this verse of Miskīn al-Dārimī<sup>2</sup> :

"To judge of a man's prudence, observe him when provoked, not when pleased."

297. AL-'ABBĀS IBN AL-AḤNAF

Abu 'l-Faḍl al-'Abbās Ibn al-Aḥnaf Ibn al-Aswad Ibn Ṭalḥah Ibn Jarādīn<sup>3</sup> Ibn Kaladah Ibn Khudaym<sup>4</sup> Ibn Shahāb Ibn Sālīm Ibn Ḥayyah† Ibn Kulayb Ibn 'Abd Allāh Ibn 'Adī Ibn Ḥanīfah Ibn Lujaym al-Ḥanafī al-Yamāmī, a celebrated poet, was gifted with a tender spirit and a subtle wit; all his poems are love pieces, and the diwān of his works does not contain any eulogium. The following verses from one of his qaṣīdahs may serve as an example of his pathetic style:

"Desist, self-tormentor! thus only can thy woes be healed. Thy eyes have exhausted their tears in weeping; try then to find others

<sup>1</sup> This is the prince who Ḥamzah al-Iṣpāhānī mentions as the immediate predecessor of Dhū Shan tir, the celebrated tyrant of Yaman, who was slain by Dhū Nuwās. (See Schulten's Historia Iocianidarum, p 37).

<sup>2</sup> M. de Sacy says, in his Anthologie Grammaticale, p. 399, that this ancient poet's real name was Rabi'ah Ibn 'Amir ibn 'Unayf; but al-Tabrīz says in his commentary on the Hamisah, p. 744, that according to Abu 'l-'Alā Miskīn's name was 'Amr.

<sup>3</sup> Jarādīn جرادن in the autograph MS.

<sup>4</sup> Khudaym خديم in the autograph.

* The Cairo edition gives Ḥardān حردان—Ed.

† The Cairo edition gives Ḥabbah حبه—Ed.

shedding copious drops, and with them recruit the last of thine ' But who would lend thee his eyes that thou mayest weep with them? Were eyes ever lent that their tear might be shed?"

The two next lines, extracted from a piece of verse, are also his, but some attribute them to Bashshar Ibn Burd<sup>2</sup> and Abu 'Alī al-Qālī<sup>3</sup> mentions in his Amālī that Bashshar said: "A boy of the tribe of Ḥanīfah<sup>4</sup> kept running in and out of where we were till he at length recited these lines:

"They who caused me to taste their love now make me weep; they awoke my heart to passion, but then their hearts yielded to slumber. They roused me, but when I stood up with the burden which they placed upon me, they sank into repose."

The following verses are also his:

"I prefer love-pains with hope to repose with despair. Did I not love you, I had spared you my reproaches; and you had then been for me as the rest of mortals."

"O Sa'd! thou hast spoken to me of my beloved and increased my folly; speak yet more to me, O Sa'd! My heart shall never know any love but that I bear her! it is a love without beginning and without end.<sup>5</sup>"

"Since thy rigours cannot be softened unless by the intercession of another, I renounce such love as requires a mediator. I swear that indifference or dislike are not the motives which withhold me from reproaching thee thy cruelty; it was the certainty that all complaints were useless. If I cannot bear my pains in patience, I must yet submit to them though unwilling."

All his poetry is good.—He was the maternal uncle of Ibrāhīm Ibn al-'Abbās al-Sulī, as we have already mentioned (No. 10). His death took place at Baḥdād in the year 192 (A.C. 807-8); but the following anecdote on the subject is given on good authority by

1 In place of لغورك, the autograph has يعينك; the sense is then: try and find other eyes to help you.

2 His life will be found in no. 110.

3 See his life, no. 92.

4 It must be remembered that al-'Abbās himself belonged to that tribe.

5 Literally: It has neither before nor after.

‘Umar Ibn Shabbah: “Ibrāhīm al-Mawṣilī, surnamed al-Nadīm, died in the year 188, on the same day as al-Kisā’ī the grammarian, al-‘Abbās Ibn al-Aḥnaf and Huṣḥaymah al-Khammarah; (the khalif) al-Raṣḥīd, who had been informed of the circumstance, ordered (his son) al-Mamūn to say the funeral prayers over them, and the corpses were therefore placed in a line before him. He asked whose body was that which was nearest to him, and on learning that it was Ibrāhīm al-Mawṣilī’s, he ordered it to be removed and that of al-‘Abbās Ibn al-Aḥnaf to be put in the first place. When he had finished the prayer and was returning home, Hāshim Ibn ‘Abd Allāh Ibn Mālik al-Khuzā’ī went up to him and said: ‘My lord; why did you honour al-‘Abbās Ibn al-Aḥnaf with the first place?’ to which he replied by repeating these verses:

“Some persons accused thee and said that it was thou who caused my pains and afflictions; but I denied the truth of their words, so that their suspicions might be turned away from thee to another: I like the lover who refuses (to reveal the name of his beloved).”

“Al-Mamūn then said: “Can you recollect them?” and Hāshim replied: ‘I can,’ and then repeated them. ‘Well,’ said the prince, ‘is not the author of such verses worthy of the first rank?’ ‘He is, my lord.’”—I must observe that this anecdote is in contradiction with what we shall say farther on, in the life of al-Kisā’ī, as we there mention that he died at Ray (not at Baghdād); besides which, much incertitude prevails respecting the year of his death, and moreover, the death of al-‘Abbās has been placed by some in the year 192. Abū Bakar al-Ṣulī says: ‘Awn Ibn Muḥammad informed me that his father said to him: ‘I saw al-‘Abbās Ibn al-Aḥnaf at Baghdād after the death of al-Raṣḥīd, and his dwelling was near the Syrian gate. He was a friend of mine, and he died before he reached his sixtieth year.’” Here al-Ṣulī remarks that he must have died later than the year 192, since al-Raṣḥīd’s death took place at Ṭus on the third of the latter Jumādā, 193 (24 March, A.C. 809).*—Al-Aḥnaf, the father of al-‘Abbās, died A.H. 150 (A.C. 757), and was buried at Baṣrah. Al-Mas‘ūdī, in his Murāj al-Dhahab, gives the following anecdote on the authority of some natives of Baṣrah:

---

*M. de Slane omits the name of the day which was Saturday.—Ed.

"We set out," said they, "to perform the pilgrimage, and on our way we saw a boy standing by the side of the road, who called out to us to know if any of us were natives of Baṣrah. On this we went over to him and asked what he wanted; to which he made answer: 'My master wishes to give you his dying injunctions.' We then turned off from the road and followed him till, at some distance, we found a man lying under a tree and unable to give us any answer. We seated ourselves around him, and being at length aware of our presence, he looked up at us, but his weakness was so great that he could hardly raise his eyes. He then recited these verses:

'Alas! a stranger, lonely and far from home, is here weeping in affliction! With each fresh burst of grief, illness draweth closer to his enfeebled body!'

He then swooned away, and we remained sitting about him for a long time, till he at length came to himself. At that moment a raven perched on the top of the tree and croaked aloud, on which he opened his eyes and listened to its cry. The boy then pronounced these lines:

'The heart receiveth yet a deeper wound from the cry of that bird which lamenteth on its branch. The same misfortune which has worn us down afflicteth him and he grieveth! each of us are grieving for the loss of a true friend!'

The sick man then heaved a deep sigh and breathed his last, and we did not leave his corpse till we had washed it and shrouded it and said over it the funeral prayer. When we had buried him, we asked the boy who it was, and he said: 'It is al-'Abbas Ibn al-Aḥnaf'. " God best knoweth if this relation be true. Ḥanafī means belonging to the tribe of Ḥanīfah who was the son of Lujaym Ibn Ṣa'b Ibn 'Alī Ibn Bakr Ibn Wa'il; it is a celebrated tribe. Ḥanīfah's real name was Uḥāl, but it was changed for this reason: he and al-Aḥzan Ibn 'Awf al-'Abdī were conversing together on a subject which it would take us too long to relate, when Ḥanīfah struck al-Aḥzan with his sword and cut off (jadham) his hand, and al-Aḥzan struck Ḥanīfah on the foot and shattered it (ḥanaf); so al-Aḥzan received the surname of Jadhīmah (the one-handed), and his adversary that of Ḥanīfah (the club-footed). This Ḥanīfah was the brother of 'Ijl (the progenitor of a famous tribe). Yamāmi means belonging to Yamāmah, a town in the desert which forms part of the province of Ḥijāz; the greater part of the inhabitants belong to the tribe of Ḥanīfah. It was there that the impostor Musyalamah set up for a prophet and lost his life. His history is well known.

298. AL-RIY ĀSHĪ

Abu 'l-Faḍl al-'Abbās Ibn Faraj al-Riyāshī, a grammarian, a philologist, and a native of Baṣrah, was a man of great learning and a trustworthy transmitter of oral literature; he knew besides the traditional accounts of the combats and adventures of the desert Arabs, and possessed great general knowledge. The information which he communicated to others was given by him on the authority of al-Aṣma'ī, Abū 'Ubaydah, and other great masters, and his own authority was cited by Ibrāhīm al-Ḥarbī <sup>1</sup> Ibn Abi 'l-Dunyā <sup>2</sup> and others. The following is one of the (curious philological) passages which, according to his statement, he had learned from al-Aṣma'ī: "An Arab of the desert," said he, "passed near us in search of his son, and we said to him; 'Describe him'; and he answered: 'He is like a (pretty) little piece of gold;' on which we replied that we had not seen him. Soon after, he returned with a swarthy little fellow, as black as a beetle, perched upon his shoulder; and we then said to him: 'Hadst thou asked us about that fellow, we could have directed thee, for he did not stir out of our sight all day.' <sup>3</sup> Al-Aṣma'ī then repeated these lines:

'Any bedfellow is good on the break of day, after a frosty night, when the chilled (sleeper) shivers with cold. God makes her as charming to the heart as the son is charming to the eyes of his father!'

Al-Riyāshī was slain at Baṣrah during the insurrection of al-'Alawī al-Baṣrī <sup>4</sup> the chief of the Zenj. He lost his life in the month of Ṣhawwāl, A.H. 257 (September A.C. 871). He had been asked

<sup>1</sup> See No. 19, note on dyeing hair.

<sup>2</sup> See No. 228.

<sup>3</sup> This passage contains some diminutive nouns of rare occurrence, and it was therefore precious for philologists and lexicographers.

<sup>4</sup> Al-'Alawī al-Baṣrī, i.e. the descendant of 'Alī and native of Baṣrah. His real name was 'Alī Ibn Muḥammad; he revolted A.H. 255, and after devastating the southern provinces of the Khilāfat for many years, he was made prisoner towards the end of Dh. 'l-Hijjah, A.H. 254, how old he was, and he replied: "seventy-seven years, I believe." Our shay'ih Ibn al-Athir mentions, in his historical work (the Kāmil), that al-Riyāshī was killed by the Zanj at Baṣrah, A.H. 265, but this is a mistake; for all persons who have studied history unanimously agree that the Zanj entered Baṣrah at the hour of Friday prayer, on the 16th Shaw-wāl, A.H. 257; that night and the following Saturday they ravaged the city with fire and sword, and on Monday they entered it again, after the flight of the garrison, and proclaimed a general amnesty; but when any of the people showed themselves, they massacred them. Very few of the inhabitants escaped, and the great mosque with all who were in it was destroyed by fire. Al-Riyāshī lost his life in one of the above-mentioned days, for he perished in the mosque. Riyāshī is derived from Riyāsh which was the name of the ancestor of a man who belonged to tribe of Judham; this man possessed as a slave the father of (al-'Abbās al-Riyāshī) him who was surnamed after him. The father had (first) received this suraname and it never quitted him.

Continued on page 24.)

*299. 'ABD ALLĀH IBN 'UMAR

Abū 'Abd al-Rahmān 'Abd Allāh Ibn 'Umar (may God be pleased with both of them) Ibn al-Khaṭṭāb al-Qurashī al-'Adawī embraced Islām along with his father when young, and had not attained puberty. He migrated to Madīnah with his father and was presented before the Prophet on the day of Uḥud (to be included among the combatants) but the Prophet did not accept him because of his tender age. Subsequently he was presented on the day of the Battle of the Ditch, when he was fifteen years old; and he was allowed (to

---

*This notice is not found in the autograph nor is it to be found in de Slane's edition. It is however included in subsequent editions. It has been pointed out by the editor of the Cairo edition of 1948 that the editor of the second edition (1299 A.H.) has stated that this notice might be an exception:

(Continued from page 23.)

and executed, A.H. 270—(See his history in Abulfeda's Annals; Price's Retrospect, vol. II, page 165; and al-Makin, p. 162. This last writer styles him الخبث صاحب الزنج (the wicked wretch chief of the Zanj), which words Erpenius has rendered Hubibus Rihcrum Dominus.

(Continued on page 25)

be enrolled). Ibn 'Umar was a man of piety and learning. He tried his best to follow and tread in the footsteps of the Prophet, he was very careful and cautious in pronouncing his fatwā and what he adopted for his own practice. During the life of the Prophet he never lagged behind from sariyyahs*. Then after the Prophet's death he became fond of pilgrimage (and undertook it several times) before and after the fiṭnah† till his death.

It had been stated that among the Companions‡ he had the best knowledge of the rites of pilgrimage. The Prophet (may peace be on him) said to Umm al-Mu'minīn Ḥaḥṣah Bint 'Umar; "Verily your brother 'Abd-Allāh will become a pious man if he offers tahajjud prayers‡ (which are offered before dawn)". After that Ibn 'Umar never missed this prayer.

Jabir Ibn 'Abd Allāh said; "There is none amidst us towards whom the world inclined and he did not reciprocate to it except 'Umar and his son 'Aḥd Allāh."

Maymūn Ibn Mahran said: "I have not seen any one more pious than Ibn 'Umar, nor a person more learned than Ibn 'Abbās". Sa'id Ibn al-Musayyab said: "If I had had to declare any one to be one of the people of paradise, I would have said so in case of 'Abd Allāh Ibn 'Umar."

Aṣma'ī narrates: "Abū 'Abd al-Raḥmān i.e. Abū 'l-Zinād, related on the authority of his father, who said, Muṣ'ab, 'Urwah and 'Abd Allāh, sons of Zubayr, along with 'Abd Allāh Ibn 'Umar assembled in Ḥijr (the sanctuary of the Ka'bah) and said: let us express our desires; so 'Abd Allāh Ibn al-Zubayr said: 'I desire to rule over 'Iraq and have 'Yishah Bint Ṭalḥah and Sukaynah Bint al-Ḥusayn as my wives.' Then 'Abd Allāh Ibn 'Umar said: 'I wish divine forgiveness'. Then he remarked: 'They obtained their wishes **Sariyyah*: a military expedition in which the Prophet did not participate.—Ed.

†Period of internecine strife that commenced in the later days of 'Uṭṭimān's Khālifat and came to an end when Mu'awiyah became the sole sovereign of the Islamic world.—Ed.

‡In the text قِيَامُ اللَّيْلِ literary meaning standing in the night.—Ed.

(Continued from page 24.)

because it gives the biography of a Companion of the Prophet, against the practice of the author who says that he had not included the biographical notices of the Companions of the Prophet (vide the author's preface).—Ed.

and I hope 'Abd Allāh Ibn 'Umar will be forgiven!'* Sufyān al-Thawrī narrates on the authority of Tāriq Ibn 'Abd al-'Azīz; he relates on the authority of al-Sha'bī; he said; "I have seen a strange event which was this: I was in the court yard of al-Ka'bah along with 'Abd Allāh Ibn 'Umar, 'Abd Allāh Ibn al-Zubayr, Muṣ'ab Ibn al-Zubayr and 'Abd al-Malik Ibn Marwān. After offering their prayers they said, "every one of us should go one by one to the Rukn Yamānī and pray to God to grant his requirements, since prayers at this moment are heard." (They said): 'O 'Abd Allāh Ibn al-Zubayr! get up, because you are the first male child born after Hijrah'. He stood up and touching the Rukn Yamānī said: 'O God! Thou art Great and every great thing is expected from Thee. I ask Thee by the sacredness of Thy Throne, sacredness of Thy Essence and sacredness of Thy Prophet, that Thou shouldst not let me die before I become sovereign of al-Ḥijāz, and before accession to the Khalīfat'. Then he came back and sat at his place. Subsequently they said to Muṣ'ab, 'Now you rise'. He got up and touched the Rukn Yamānī. Then he said: 'O my God! Thou art the Sustainer of every thing and every thing will return to Thee! I ask Thee by Thy authority over every thing, do not let me die prior to my becoming governor of 'Irāq and my marriage with Sukaynah Bint al-Ḥusayn.' He then retired and took his seat. Then they said 'O 'Abd al-Malik! get up. 'He stood up and said, touching the Rukn Yamānī. 'O God! the Sustainer of seven heavens and the Sustainer of desolate earth, I ask Thee by the Grace with which Thy obedient servants have asked, and I ask Thee by the honour of Thy Essence, and I ask Thee by the obligation that is due from all the creatures to Thee and by the honour of the persons circumambulating Thy house that I should not die before possessing the east of the earth and the west of it and if there be any to contest with me, his head should be presented to me.' Then he came back and took his seat. They asked 'Abd Allāh Ibn 'Umar who stood up and touching the Rukn Yamāni said: 'O God! Thou art the Compassionate, I ask Thee by Thy mercy which precedes Thy wrath and I ask Thee by Thy authority over all the creatures, that I should not die unless thou grantest me a place in paradise.' Al Shā'bī added: 'My eyes will not close to the world* before I have witnessed every one getting what he desired, and that the happy news about his getting an abode in the paradise was revealed to 'Abd Allāh Ibn 'Umar.' "

---

* The editor of the Cairo text remarks that the narration of the incident is incomplete because it does not contain the desires expressed by Muṣ'ab and 'Urwah. It appears that the copy before him was defective and a line was omitted. The Teherān edition has given the complete version which runs thus: 'Abd Allāh Ibn al-Zubayr expressed his desire to rule over the two sanctuaries (of Makkah and Madinah), and 'Urwah desired to learn the Traditions by heart, and Muṣ'ab wanted the governorship of 'Irāq and 'Ayishah Bint Tal'ah and Sukanyah Bint Husayn as his wives, (this desire has been ascribed to 'Abd Allāh Ibn al-Zubayr by mistake—Ed.)

Ḥamzah Ibn 'Abd Allāh Ibn 'Umar relates on the authority of 'Abd Allāh Ibn 'Umar; he said: "The verse لن تنالوا البر حتى تنفقوا (‘Ye will not attain unto piety until ye spend of that which ye love’) occurred to my mind and then I took stock of what God had bestowed on me; then I found that a slave girl Rumaynah was very dear to me and I set her free for the sake of Allāh; and fearing that I may change my mind I offered her for nikāḥ and Nafi' took her into marriage and she bore him children."

When Ibn 'Umar was much pleased with any of his possessions he used to give it in alms. Nafi' relates that his slaves had known this about him, so whenever any one wanted liberty he went and stayed in the mosque, and when Ibn 'Umar observed him in this pious state, he set him at liberty. His companions said to him: 'O Abū 'Abd al-Raḥmān, by God they deceive you': to which he replied: 'None deceives in the name of Allāh, but we accept this for His sake.' "

Nafi' says: "Ibn 'Umar did not die until he set one thousand persons or more at liberty. He used to offer prayers throughout the night and when it dawned he used to ask for forgiveness of God till morning."

He died at Makkah in A.H. 63† (A.C. 683), at the age of 84 years. He had left a will that he should be buried in the night but it could not be carried out because of al-Ḥajjāj.

He was buried in the cemetery of the Muhajirīn at Dhū Ṭuwā.

---

* It means 'before my death'.—Ed.

† This is a mistake and the Teherān edition has also given alternative date as 73 A. H. which is correct; because Ibn 'Umar died after the death of Ibn Zubayr, who was killed in 73 A. H.—Ed.

Al-Ḥajjāj had ordered a man who dipped his spear-head in poison and threw it on him when he was on the road and it pierced his foot. The cause of this was that once al-Ḥajjāj recited a (long) sermon and therefore offered prayers very late. Thereupon Ibn 'Umar said: "The sun does not wait for you." Al-Ḥajjāj said: "I am determined to strike to (the head in which) your eyes are placed": to which Ibn 'Umar remarked: "You will be a fool if you do this thing."

It is said that he spoke in a low tone only and did not make al-Ḥajjāj hear these words. But (Ḥajjāj) devised his death because Ibn 'Umar was well acquainted with the rites of 'Arafah and other things, where the Prophet performed the rites of the pilgrimage, and this was unbearable to al-Ḥajjāj (because he was liable to commit mistakes); and so he ordered a man (to wound him) with a weapon which was dipped in poison. When people returned from 'Arafah, this man came close to him and pierced it into his foot while he was on his breast. As a consequence to it he fell ill. The ailment prolonged for several days. One day al-Ḥajjāj came to visit him and said to him: "O Abū 'Abd al-Raḥmān who poisoned you?" He asked, "What will you do with him?" to which al-Ḥajjāj replied, "May God kill me if I do not kill him." Ibn 'Umar remarked; "I am sure you will not do it, because you are the person who ordered a hireling to prick me with a spear." Then al-Ḥajjāj said: "O Abū 'Abd Al-Raḥmān, do not do it."* It is also related that in reply to his question about the person who had poisoned him, he said; "You are responsible for it because of permitting the entry of arms within the limits of the Sanctuary." He lived for a few days (after this) and then passed away (may God be pleased with him and bless him.) Al-Ḥajjāj offered funeral prayers over him.

300. 'ABD ALLAH IBN AL-MUBARAK

Abū 'Abd al-Raḥmān 'Abd Allāh Ibn al-Mubarak Ibn Wāḍiḥ al-Marwazī (native of Marw), a mawlā to the tribe of Ḥanzalah, was a man possessing profound learning combined with great self-mortification. He studied jurisprudence under Sufyan al-Thawrī, and Malik Ibn Anas from whom he learned by heart the Muwatta, and then taught it to others. He loved retirement and solitude, and was extremely assiduous in the practice of ascetic devotion. It is related of his father, who, like him, was a man of great piety, that he served a master who employed him to work in his garden; he had passed a considerable time in this occupation, when his master came to him one day and told him to bring him a ripe* pomegranate, on which he went to a tree and gathered an unripe one. His master having broken it open and found it sour, got angry with him and ordered him to go for a ripe one; he then went and cut one off another tree, but it was also sour, and his master's anger became more violent: "I asked you for a ripe one," he exclaimed, "and you give me a sour one! bring me a ripe one!". He went then for the third time and did as before. on which his master said to him: "Do you not know the difference between a ripe and an unripe pomegranate?"—"No."—"And how does that happen?"—"Because I never tasted of them so as to know the difference."—"And why did you not?"—"Because I had not your permission." His master having found on examination that he had told the truth, conceived the highest respect for him and gave him his daughter in marriage. It is said that God blessed this union with a son, this 'Abd Allāh, to whom were transmitted the divine graces granted to his father. In some historical work I have found the same thing related of the pious and holy Ibrāhīm Ibn Adham† (and it is told of him also

*It means, "do not disclose the name of your assailant."—Ed.

---

! I have hitherto transcribed انسى by Ans, but the true pronunciation is Anas or Anes.†

2 Abū Isḥāq Ibrāhīm Ibn Adham Ibn Manṣūr al-Balkhī was celebrated for his holy life. His father Adham was a native of Balkh and belonged to one of the first families in the place. He made the pilgrimage to Makkah with his wife who was then pregnant, and she brought forth Ibrāhīm in that city. His father carried him round the Ka'bah and begged of the assembled multitude to implore God's blessings on the child, and the effect of their prayers was

[Continued on page 30.]

* Sweet is an appropriate word.—Ed.

† [ ] From ' and ' to ' Mulūk ' on page 30 not in the autograph.—Ed.

‡ The error has been corrected in this edition and the former pronunciation is retained since it is more appropriate.—Ed.

by al-Ṭurṭuṣhī<sup>1</sup> towards the commencement of his work the Sirāḡ al-Mulūk. Abū 'Alī al-Ḡhassānī<sup>2</sup> relates the following anecdote: 'Abd Allāh Ibn al-Mubārak was asked which was the more blessed man of the two, Mu'āwiyah Ibn Abi Sufyān or 'Umar Ibn 'Abd al-'Azīz, to which he made answer: "The very dust which entered into Mu'āwiyah's nostrils when accompanying God's blessed Prophet is a thousand times more holy than all 'Umar. Mu'āwiyah was praying behind the Prophet when the latter said: God hearkeneth to him who speaks his praise. On which Mu'āwiyah exclaimed: O Lord! to Thee be praise!" "Can there be any stronger proof of Mu'āwiyah's blessedness than that?" —Ibn al-Mubārak composed some poetry, from which we will quote the following verses:

"Other men open shops to sell their goods, but you have opened a shop that you may seil religion;—a shop between the columns (of the mosque) and without a lock, where you give religion in exchange for the money of the poor. You have made of religion a falcon wherewith to catch your prey, but falconers never acquire riches by their trade<sup>3</sup>"

One of his sayings was: "We sought learning that we might acquire wordly advantages, and it led us to renounce the world." He died at Hīt, on his return from an expedition against the infidels, in the month of Ramaḡān, A.H. 181 (November, A.C. 797).* He was

<sup>1</sup> The life of Abū Bakr Muḡammad al-Ṭurṭuṣhī will be found in this work.

<sup>2</sup> His life will be found in No. 191.

<sup>3</sup> This is manifestly directed against some teacher of theology who opened a course of lectures in the mosque and required payment from his scholars. Such a proceeding was highly scandalous at that early period, but in later times it was permitted as a necessary evil.—(See d' Ohsson's Tabi'at generale de l'empire othoman, tom. VI. page. 143).

The autograph adds 'or 182, the same has been followed by subsequent editions.—Ed.

(Continued from page 29)

manifested many years later. Adham was very rich and possessed numerous slaves, horses, hounds, and falcons; his son Ibrāhīm took the dogs and falcons one day, and rode out to hunt; he was galloping after the game when he heard a voice say: "O Ibrāhīm! what meaneth this sport? dost thou think that we created the in sport! Fear God and make provision for the day of need!" On hearing these words, he got off his horse and renounced the world. His death took place A.H. 160 (A.C. 776-7)—Abu'l-Mahāsīn's Nujūm. This author gives him the surnames of al-Tamīmī al-'Ijlī (belonging to the tribes of Tamim and 'Ijl), which does not seem to be exact, as those two tribes were quite distinct; that of Tamim drawing its origin from Nizār by Muḡar and Ṭabikḡah, and 'Ijl from Nizār by Rub'ah—Abu'l-Fida gives some account of Ibrāhīm Ibn Adham and places his death in 161; al-Yāfī, who vaunts the high perfection which Ibn Adham had attained by his spiritual exercises, mentions that he died in 162.

born at Marw in the year 118 (A.C. 736).—Hit is a town situated on the Euphrates, higher up than al-Anbar; it belongs to the government of 'Iraq, but it lies on the Syrian side of the river, whilst al-Anbār is on the Baḡdād side. The Tigris flows between these two last cities. Ibn al-Mubārak's tomb is still visible at Hit and continues to be a place of pilgrimage. The history of his life has been compiled in two volumes.

301. IBN 'ABD AL-ḤAKAM

Abū Muḥammad 'Abd Allāh Ibn 'Abd al-Ḥakam<sup>1</sup> Ibn A'yan Ibn Layth Ibn Rāfi' was a doctor of the sect of Mālik and a native of Egypt. He was the best acquainted of all Mālik's disciples with the various branches of his master's doctrine; and on the death of Aṣḥab<sup>2</sup>, the presidency of the Mālikite sect devolved to him. He transmitted orally to his scholars the contents of Mālik's work, the Muwatṭā', which he himself had learned by heart under that imām's dictation. His riches and the numerous hotels<sup>3</sup> which he possessed enabled him to live in great state, and (for his virtue) he was treated with profound respect. He filled the office of justifier and impugner of witnesses<sup>4</sup>; but neither he nor any of his sons would ever give evidence in a court of law, on account of a vow which he had previously made against doing so: this particularity is mentioned by al-Qudā'i in his Khīṭaṭ (or topographical history) of Old Cairo. It is said that on the arrival of al-Shāfi'ī in that city, he gave him one thousand dīnārs out of his own money, with two thousand more, one half of which he had obtained for him from a merchant named Ibn Usāmah, and the remainder from two other <sup>4</sup> The justification and impugning of witnesses (tazkiyah wa tajrīh) is a duty devolved secretly by the qādī on some person of acknowledged probity living in his jurisdiction. The censor examines into the moral character of the witnesses and informs the qādī whether their evidence is receivable or not. He is called also the muzakkī or purifier. Consult on this subject Hamilton's Hedayah, chap. on Evidence. Here, in the printed Arabic text of Ibn Kḥalikān, is a repetition of the same fault already noticed, No. 173, note.

<sup>1</sup> In the first volume of this translation, this name has been erroneously transcribed 'Abd al-Ḥukm.

<sup>2</sup> See no. 97.

<sup>3</sup> Hotel; in Arabic rab'a. See No. 142, note (2) on rib'a.

men. He was the father of Abū 'Abd Allāh Muḥammad (Ibn 'Abd al-Ḥakam), the disciple of al-Shāfi'ī, whose life we shall give in the letter M.—Biḥr Ibn Bakr<sup>1</sup> relates that some days after the death of Malik Ibn Anas, he had a dream in which that doctor appeared to him and said: "There is a man in your country called Ibn 'Abd al-Ḥakam; receive the knowledge he may impart to you, for he is a sure authority." —Abū Muḥammad had another son called 'Abd al-Raḥmān, who studied the Traditions and history, and wrote some works, one of which was on the conquests of the Muslims.—Abū Muḥammad was born A.H. 150 (A.C. 767-8); some say 155; he died at Old Cairo in the month of Ramaḍān, A.H. 214 (November, A.C. 829). He was buried close to the tomb of the imām al-Shāfi'ī, at the south side of it; his son 'Abd al-Raḥmān died A.H. 257 (A.C. 870-1), and was interred at the south side of his father's grave; so that, of the three tombs, Abū Muḥammad's is in the middle.

302. IBN WAHB

Abū Muḥammad 'Abd Allāh Ibn Wahb Ibn Muslim, a member, by adoption, of the tribe of Quraysh, a doctor of the sect of Malik and a native of Egypt, was a mawlā to Rayḥanāh * who was herself a mawlā to Abū 'Abd al-Raḥmān Yazīd Ibn Unays, of the tribe of Fihri (or Quraysh). He was one of the great imams of that age, and had been a disciple of the imām Malik Ibn Anas during twenty years: he put down in writing (his master's works) the greater Muwatṭa' and the less. Malik said of him: "'Abd Allāh Ibn Wahb is an imām." Abū Ja'far Ibn al-Jazzar<sup>2</sup> mentions that Ibn Wahb set

<sup>1</sup> Abū 'Abd Allāh Biḥr Ibn Bakr al-Tinnisi al-ḥāmī: (a native of Tinnīs and sprung from a family which inhabited Damascus) is known as a Traditionist. He studied under al-Awzā'i and died towards the end of A.H. 205 (A.C. 821). —(Tab. al-Muḥaddithin.)

<sup>2</sup> The physician and historian Abū Ja'far Ibrāhīm Ibn Abi Khālid, surnamed Ibn al-Jazzār, was a native of Qayrawān, where his father and his paternal uncle Abū Bakr practised also the art of medicine. He had studied in that city between A.H. 300 and 320, under Isḥāq Ibn Sulaimān al-Isr'ā'īlī, the physician to Ziyād Allāh Ibrāhīm the Aghlabite. As a teacher, a practitioner, and an author, he attained a high reputation, and disdained courting the favours of the great. The only man of rank whom he visited was an old out (from his native place) to see the imām Mālik in the year 148 (A.C. 765-6), and never left him till he, Mālik, died. He had commenced his studies under him more than ten years before 'Abd al-Rahmān Ibn al-Qāsim<sup>1</sup>. When Mālik wrote to consult him, he addressed his letters thus: To 'Abd Allāh Ibn Wahb the mufti, an honour which he never conferred on any other of his disciples. Ibn Wahb saw and conversed with upwards of twenty persons who had studied under Ibn Shihāb al-Zuhrī. His name and that of 'Ibn al-Qāsim were once mentioned in the presence of Mālik<sup>2</sup>, and that imām said: "Ibn Wahb is a learned man, and Ibn al-Qāsim a jurisconsult." Al-Quḍā'i says in his Khitāt: "Different opinions are entertained respecting the site of Ibn Wahb's tomb, but in the Majarr Bant Miskin<sup>3</sup> there is a small one, much dilapidated, which people call the tomb of 'Abd Allāh; it is a very ancient monument and is probably the tomb of Ibn Wahb". He was born at Old Cairo in the month of Dhū 'l-Qa'dah, A.H. 125 (September, A.C. 743), but some say 124; he died in the same city on Sunday the 24 of Sha'bān, A.H. 197 (April, A.C. 813).<sup>4</sup> He composed a number of well-known works on jurisprudence, and was also a Traditionist. Yūnus Ibn 'Abd al-A'la<sup>4</sup>, one of the imām al-Shāfi'i's disciples, relates as follows: The khalif wrote to Ibn

(Continued on page 33.)

* M. de Slane gives Riḥanah.—Ed.

<sup>1</sup> The life of this celebrated disciple of Mālik will be found in this work.

<sup>2</sup> Some mistakes disfigure this notice in the Printed Arabic text: here يزيد has been put for عند ملك and in the first line زيد for عند ملك. In the third line the word ابي must be suppressed. A too scrupulous adherence to his manuscript led the editor into these faults and some others, which shall be noticed when met with.

<sup>3</sup> I have not been able to discover any account of this place in al-Maqrizī's Khitāt.

<sup>4</sup> His life is given by Ibn Khallikān.

<sup>5</sup> 1 May.—Ed.

(Continued from page 32)

friend of his, Abū Tālib, uncle to the Faṭimite prince al-Mu'izz, and him he went to see every Friday. He passed the days of summer, every year, in one of the ribats or garrisons on the sea-coast. According to Ibn Abi Usaybiāh, he died, aged upwards of eighty. Hajji Khalifa, in his Bibliography, No. 3090, places his death in A.H. 400, but al-Dahabī conjectures that it took place before A.H. 350. He was a man of great information in various sciences. The list of his medical works is given by al-Dhahabī and Ibn Abi U'ayyān, and may be found in Wustenfeld's Arabische Aerzte, His Z d al-Musāfir (provisions for travellers) has been translated into Hebrew, Greek, and Latin. His historical works are the Ta'rif Tashih al-Tarikh the truth of historical statements, which is short treatise; and the Akhhār al-Dawlat (History of the present Empire), containing an account of the rise and progress of the empire founded by 'Ubayd Allāh al-Mahdī. He left a fortune of twenty-four thousand dinārs and twenty five hundred weight Qintār of books on medicine and other subjects. (Al-Dhahabī's Tarikh al-Islām; Ibn Abi Usaybiāh. This last author cites some verses from a poem composed by Kūsh jīm in praise of Ibn al-Jazz r.)

Wahb, desiring him to accept the place of qāḍī at Old Cairo, on which he concealed himself<sup>1</sup> and avoided stirring from home; but one of his neighbours, Asad<sup>2</sup> Ibn Sa'd, happening to look out, and seeing him making his ablutions in the court-yard of his house, called to him and said: "Why dost thou not go forth to the people and judge between them according to the book of God and the sunnah of the Prophet?" On this, Ibn Wahb looked up and replied: "Is that the utmost extent of thy wisdom? Dost thou not know that the learned shall be raised to life with the Prophets, and the qāḍīs with the princes?"<sup>3</sup>—Ibn Wahb was a man of learning and holiness, living in the fear of Almighty God. His death happened in the following manner: A student was reading to him out of his own Jamī' or collection of Traditions, an account of the terrible signs which are to precede the day of judgement, when something like a swoon came over him, and he was carried to his house, he remained in that state till he expired. Ibn Yunus al-Miṣrī says in his History (of Egypt) that Ibn Wahb was a mawlā to Yazīd Ibn Rummanah, who was himself a mawlā to Abū 'Abd al-Raḥmān Yazīd Ibn Unays; the statement first given is made by Ibn 'Abd al-Barr, and God best knoweth which is the truth.

* [The following anecdote is related by 'Abd Allāh Ibn Wahb: "When Ḥayyat Ibn Shurayh.<sup>4</sup> received his yearly salary of sixty dinars, he used to distribute it all in alms before he went home, but on entering into his house, he would find this money again under his mattress. Ḥayyat had a cousin who, on learning the circumstance, took his salary also and gave it in alms; he

<sup>1</sup> The printed text has فجنبا and the autograph فجنبن. The meaning of both words is the same.

<sup>2</sup> In place of Asad امد the autograph seems to have Shādīn شدین.

<sup>3</sup> See an observation on this subject, No. 102, note on qāḍī.

<sup>4</sup> There were two Traditionists of this name, both of whom drew their origin from Ḥādrāmūt. The first, who was probably the same person who is mentioned here, bore the surname of Abū Zar'ah زرعه and was a native of Egypt. He taught the Traditions on the authority of Ibn al-Mubārak, Ibn Wahb, and other doctors. He died A.H. 157 (A.C. 773-4), during the khālifāt of Abū Ja'far al-Manṣūr. The other Ḥayyāt Ibn Shurayh, was surnamed Abū'l-'Abbās and was a native of Emessa. His authority is cited by al-Bukhārī in that chapter of his work which treats of the prayer to be said in time of danger.—(Tab. al-Muḥad.)

* From 'The' to 'end' on page 35 is not included in the autograph.—Ed.

then sought it under his mattress, but found nothing; and Ḥayyāt, to whom he complained of his disappointment, said to him: 'I gave to the Lord with full confidence, but you gave to him merely to make a trial of His goodness.'"]

303. 'ABD ALLĀH IBN LAHĪ'AH

Abū 'Abd al-Rahmān 'Abd Allāh Ibn Lahī'ah Ibn 'Uqbah Ibn Lahī'ah al-Ḥaḍramī al-Ghāfiqī (member of the tribe of Ghāfiq)<sup>1</sup>, a native of Egypt, was a narrator of Traditions, historical relations, and pieces in prose and verse, a great quantity of which he transmitted down. Muḥammad Ibn Sa'd states that he was a man of weak memory, and that those who received from him oral information when he first began to give lessons, had most probably acquired more correct versions of the pieces which he taught them, than those who studied under him in the latter period of his life. It sometimes happened that his pupils read to him (out of their note-books) passages which he had never taught them<sup>2</sup> and he would make no observation on the subject; being afterwards told of the circumstance, he would reply: "It is not my fault; they come to me with a book and read it in my presence; they then go away. Had they asked me if that was what I taught them, I should have told them that it was not." In the beginning of the year A. H. 155 (A.C. 772), he was appointed qāḍī of Old Cairo by Abū Ja'far al-Manṣūr, and was the first person raised to the place of qāḍī in that city by direct nomination of the khalīf. He was removed from office in the month of the first Rabī', A.H. 164. He was also the first qāḍī who made it his duty to be present when watch was kept for the first appearance of the new moon in the month of Ramaḍan<sup>3</sup>, and this custom is still continued to the present time<sup>4</sup>. Ibn al-Farrā

<sup>1</sup> According to the author of the Ansāb. 'Ghāfiq was the son of al-Shāhid Ibn 'Alqamah Ibn 'Akk, a descendant from Kahlān.

<sup>2</sup> Students took notes of the master's lessons and read them to him the next day.

<sup>3</sup> In those countries where the Sunni doctrines are professed, the fast of Ramaḍan is not commenced till the appearance of the new moon has been regularly certified.

<sup>4</sup> Ibn Khallikān might have observed that it was discontinued under the Fatimite dynasty and had been re-established by Ṣalāḥ al-Dīn.

mentions him in his Annals under the year 152: "In this year," says he, "died the qādī Abū Khuzaymah Ibrāhīm Ibn Yazīd al-Ḥimyarī (descended from Ḥimyar)<sup>1</sup>; he was succeeded by 'Abd Allāh Ibn Lahī'ah al-Ḥaḍramī. Ibn Khudayj (Ḥudayj), who was in 'Iraq at that time, relates in the following terms the cause of his nomination: 'I went to see Abū Ja'far al-Manṣūr, who said to me: Ibn Khudayj! there is a man in your city who has just died and left the people in affliction for his loss—Commander of the faithful! I replied, it must be Ibn Khuzaymah!—It is, said he; 'and whom do you think we should put in his place?' I answered, Commander of the faithful! I suppose Ibn Ma'dan al-Yaḥṣubī—It is not fit that a qādī should be deaf, replied al-Manṣūr, and he is.—It is then Ibn Lahī'ah' said I. The very man answered the khalīf, although his memory be a little weak. He then gave orders for his appointment and settled on him thirty dinārs a month'. "H was the first qādī who received a salary, and the first also who was nominated directly by the khalīf; before that, the qādī was chosen by the governor of the city"<sup>2</sup>—Ibn Lahī'ah died at Old Cairo on Sunday, the 15th of the first Rabi', A.H. 174 (August, A.C. 790),*—or by another account in 170,—aged eighty-one years. Abū Mūsā al-'Anazī<sup>3</sup> says in his History, that al-Layth Ibn Sa'd was one or two years older than Ibn Lahī'ah.

†[Ibn Yūnus also mentions him in his History, in these terms: "Abd Allāh Ibn Lahī'ah, Ibn 'Uqbah Ibn Fur'an† Ibn Rabi'ah belonged to the family of U'dūl, one of the first in Ḥaḍramawt. His

<sup>1</sup> Abū Khuzaymah Ibrāhīm Ibn Yazīd, a native of Old Cairo, was appointed qādī of that city by Yazīd Ibn Ḥatīm, A.H. 144 (A.C. 761-2). He continued to fill this place till his death, which took place A.H. 154 (A.C. 770-1). He was a man of great piety and lived by making halters, of which he sold two every day; with the price of one he supported himself, and he gave the price of the other to his brethren in Alexandria.—(History of the qādīs of Cairo, by Sibṭ Ibn Hujr. Ms. No. 691).

<sup>2</sup> Sibṭ Ibn Hujr, in Lives of the Qādīs, mentions Ibn Lahī'ah and relates the anecdote given here. Ibn Khudayj, or, as he writes the name, 'Abd Allāh Ibn 'Abd al-Rahmān Ibn Ḥudayj, was the son of a qādī of Cairo who had been nominated A.H. 86 and died A. H. 94 (A. C. 712-3).

<sup>3</sup> In the Arabic text this is incorrectly printed العترى.

* 1 August.—Ed.

† [ ] From 'Ibn' to 'qādī' on page 37 is not included in the autograph.—Ed.

† The editor of Cairo edition observes the correct name is Qur'an and de Salne's reading of Fur'an is an error; but the Qāmūs supports de Salne's reading vide قرع.—Ed.

surname was Abū 'Abd al-Rahmān. Traditions were given on his authority by 'Amr Ibn al-Ḥarīth<sup>1</sup>, al-Layth Ibn Sa'd, 'Uthmān Ibn al-Ḥakam al-Judhamī, and Ibn al-Mubarak<sup>2</sup>. He then gives the date of his death and adds: "He was born A.H. 97 (A.C. 715-6);" after which, he mentions the following words, and traces them down, through an uninterrupted series of narrators, from Ibn Lahī'ah to himself: "On going to see Yazīd Ibn Abī Ḥabīb<sup>3</sup>, he said to me: 'I think I see you seated on the cushion, meaning the one on which the qaḍī sits.'" And so it came to pass, for Ibn Lahī'ah did not die before he filled the place of a qaḍī].—Ḥaḍramt means belonging to Ḥaḍramawt, which is a country in the most distant part of Yaman.

304. AL-QA'NABĪ

Abū 'Abd al-Rahmān 'Abd Allāh Ibn Muslamah Ibn Qa'nab al-Ḥarīthī, surnamed al-Qa'nabī, was a native of Madīnah. He received instructions in jurisprudence and the Traditions from the imām Mālik, and was one of his most talented, learned<sup>4</sup> and virtuous disciples. He knew by heart his master's work, the Muwatṭā, and taught it to his own pupils from memory; for such was the manner in which this work was transmitted down by a number of Mālik's disciples: Some diversity exists in the texts as thus related by each; but the most perfect copy of it is that given viva voce by Yaḥya Ibn Yaḥya's as shall be again remarked in his life. Al-Qa'nabī was

---

<sup>1</sup> Abū Umayyah 'Amr Ibn al-Ḥarīth Ibn Ya'qūb, a native of Egypt and surnamed al-Muwaddib (the preceptor), was allied by adoption to the Anṣār. He learned the Traditions from Qatādah and other great masters, and among his own pupils he had Ibn Wahb. His death took place between A.H. 147 (A.C. 764) and 149. He was then upwards of fifty.—(Tab. al-Muḥad).

<sup>2</sup> The life of Ibn al-Mubārak is given No. 300.

<sup>3</sup> Abū Rajā Yazīd Ibn Ḥabīb Suwayd, a member by adoption of the tribe of Quraysh and a native of Egypt, studied the Traditions under a number of eminent masters and had al-Layth Ibn Sa'd among his own pupils. He died A.H. 128 (A.C. 745), aged between seventy-five and eighty years.—(Tab. al-Muḥaddithīn).

<sup>4</sup> The word muḥaddith signifies esteemed as a sure authority for the exactness of the Traditions which he transmits. It is here rendered by learned.

surnamed al-Rahib (the monk) for his devotion and his virtue. 'Abd Allah Ibn Aḥmad Ibn al-Haytham related that his grandfather had said to him, in speaking of al-Qa'nabī: "When we went to see him he would come out to us with the face of one who had been looking down on (the terrors of) hell; may God preserve us from it!" He died at Baṣrah, the city where he resided, on Friday the 6th of Muḥarram, A.H. 221 (January, A.C. 836)*. Ibn Baṣḥkuwāl mentions, in his list of those who transmitted orally the Muwaṭṭā from Malik to their own pupils, that al-Qa'nabī died at Makkah. The surname of Qa'nabī is derived from the name of his grandfather.

305. IBN KATHĪR THE QUR'AN-READER

Abu Ma'bad<sup>1</sup> 'Abd Allah Ibn Kathīr, one of the seven great masters in the science of Qur'ān-reading, died at Makkah, A.H. 120 (A.C. 737-8). This is the only information I can find respecting him. I have since discovered that he is spoken of in the Kitāb al-Iqnā<sup>2</sup>, a work treating of the different readings of the Qur'ān. The author of that book says: "Ibn Kathīr al-Makkī (native of Makkah), al-Dārī (belonging to the tribe of al-Dār), which is a branch of that of Lakhm and produced Tamīm al-Dārī;<sup>3</sup>

<sup>1</sup> The autograph has Abū Sa'id, but the Nujūm writes the name Abū Ma'bad as here, and the author of the Ṭabaqāt al-Qurrā states expressly that such was his real surname.

<sup>2</sup> Abū Ja'far Aḥmad Ibn Abi 'l-Ḥasan 'Alī Ibn Aḥmad Ibn al-Bādhish الباذش a descendant from the Anṣārs and a celebrated teacher of the Qur'ānic readings, was a native of Granada, and held the office of public preacher in that city. His work, the Iqnā 'fi'l-Qira' (the sufficient help, treating of the Qur'ānic-readings) is esteemed one of the best treatises on the subject. He was likewise well acquainted with the Traditions. Died A.H. 542 (A.C. 1147-8).—(Ṭab. al-Qurrā, fol. 162 verso).

<sup>3</sup> Abū Ruqayyah Tamīm Ibn Aws al-Dārī was originally a Christian, but embraced Islamism in the ninth year of the Hijrah and became one of Muḥammad's Companions. He was so assiduous in the practice of devotion, that he obtained the appellation of Rahib al-Ummah (the monk of the people). He possessed a talent for relating stories or histories, and he continued that practice with the permission of the Prophet.—(Majma' al-Aḥbāb MS. fonds St. Germain, No. 131; Siyar al-Salaf, ibid., No. 133).—See d'Herbelot's Bib. Orient. TAMM.

*31 December, 835.—Ed.

some say however that he took this surname from Dārīn,<sup>1</sup> because he was a druggist and perfumer, and that is the place where perfumes are procured; this last derivation is the true one. They say that he was a inawlā to 'Amr Ibn 'Alqamah al-Kinānī, and that he drew his origin from one of those Persians whom Chosroes had sent by sea to Yaman, when he expelled the Abyssinians from that country<sup>2</sup>. He dyed his beard with hinnā<sup>3</sup> and was qādī of the community at Makkah<sup>4</sup>. In the classification of the Tab'is, he was placed in the second division<sup>5</sup>. He was advanced in years, his hair was white, his beard long, his body large, his complexion tawny, and his eyes dark blue; his grey hair was dyed with hinnā or with yellow dye (sufrah), and in his conduct he displayed a dignified gravity. He was born at Makkah, A.H. 45 (A.C. 665-6), and he died in that city, A.H. 120". This writer gives here the same date for his death as that mentioned above, and it seems a point on which all the readers agree; but, in my opinion, it cannot be exact, for 'Abd Allāh Ibn Idrīs al-Awdī, who learned the readings of the Qur'ān under Ibn Kathīr, was born A.H. 115; and how could he have done so, if his master had only lived till A.H. 120? This error originated with Abū Bakr Ibn Mujahid, who was deceived by the fact that 'Abd Allāh Ibn Kathīr of the tribe of Quraysh, but a different person from the Qur'ān-reader<sup>6</sup>, died in that year; but God knows best!<sup>7</sup> The system of reading followed by Ibn Kathīr was transmitted

1 According to al-Idrīsī, Dārīn is situated in the province of Fārs; and the author of the Marāṣid calls it a sea-port where musk was imported from India.

2 According to Abu 'l-Fidā, this occurred in the reign of Anūshīrwān; Sayf Ibn Dhī-Yazan then recovered the throne of his ancestors.

3 See No. 19, note on dyeing hair.

4 Qādī of the community قاضي الجماعة this was a title given to the chief qādī Qā'ilī Quḍātī, more particularly in Africa and Spain. See Notices of 'Extraits', tom. XII, page 578.

5 The Tābi'is were classed by the length of time which they had known and frequented the Companions of Muḥammad.

6 This Ibn Kathīr is cited in the Sahīḥ as an authority for one of the Traditions given in that work. His grandfather's name was al-Muṭṭalib. — (Tab. al-Qurrā).

7 On this subject, al-Dhahabī makes the following observations in his Tabaqāt al-Qurrā: "Abū Ja'far Ibn al-Bādhīh al-Andalusī is grossly mistaken in saying that 'Abd Allāh Ibn Idrīs al-Awdī studied Qur'ān-reading under Ibn Kathīr; a statement on which an opinion has been founded that Ibn Kathīr died later than A.H. 120, which is another mistake." — (MS. No. 742, fol. 17 verso.)

down orally by two persons, Qunbul and al-Bazzi; the former, whose real name was Muḥammad Ibn 'Abd al-Raḥmān Ibn Muḥammad Ibn Khalid Ibn Sa'id Ibn Jurjah al-Makkī al-Makḥzūmī died A.H. 291 (A.C. 903-4), aged ninety-six years; the latter, who bore the name of Abu 'l-Ḥusayn Aḥmad Ibn Muḥammad Ibn 'Abd Allāh Ibn al-Qāsim Ibn Nafi' Ibn Abī 'l-Bazzah-Baḥshar al-Fārī'ī, died A.H. 270 (A. C. 883-4), aged eighty.

306. IBN QUTAYBAH

Abū Muḥammad 'Abd Allāh Ibn Muslim Ibn Qutaybah al-Dinawarī (native of Dinawar).—some say al-Marwazī (native of Marw),—the author of the Kitāb al-Ma'ārif <sup>2</sup> and the Adab al-Kātib <sup>3</sup> was a grammarian and a philologist of eminent talent and noted for the correctness of his information. He resided at Baḡdād and taught the Traditions in that city on the authority of Ishāq Ibn Rāhwayh<sup>4</sup>, Abū Ishāq Ibrāhīm al-Ziyādī<sup>5</sup>, Abū Ḥatīm al-Sijistānī <sup>6</sup> and other masters of the same period; his own authority was cited for Traditions by his son Aḥmad and by Ibn Durustūyah<sup>7</sup>. Besides the works just mentioned, he composed a number of others equally instructive, such as his Explanation of the rare expressions occurring in the Qur'an, Explanation of the rare

<sup>1</sup> Al-Bazzī was a mawli to the tribe of Makḥzūm and a muwadhḥin in the great mosque of Makkah. Al-Dhahabī has a long article on him in the Tabaqat al-Qurrā.

<sup>2</sup> The Kitāb al-Ma'ārif, or, as it might be denominated the Book of Facts, is a most useful work. Eichhorn extracted from it the genealogies of the Arabs published in his Monumenta historiae Arabum. It contains besides a great number of short biographical notices on the early Muslims, etc.

<sup>3</sup> The Adab al-Kātib, or Writer's guide, is a short work on orthography, philology, synonyms, and grammar. The preface is remarkable for its length.

<sup>4</sup> See No. 81.

<sup>5</sup> Abū Ishāq al-Ziyādī descended from Ziyād Ibn Abih by the following line: His father Sufyān was son to Sulaymān Ibn Abi Bakr Ibn 'Abd al-Raḥmān Ibn Ziyād Ibn Abih.

<sup>6</sup> See No. 268.

<sup>7</sup> The life of Ibn Durustūyah comes immediately after this.

expressions occurring in the Traditions, the 'Uyūn al-Akhbār<sup>1</sup> the Mushkil al-Qur'ān (obscurities of the Qur'ān), the Mushkil al-Hadīth (obscurities of the Traditions), the Ṭabaqāt al-Shu'arā (notices on the poets), the Kitāb al-Ashribah (treatise on the different sorts of drinks), the Islāh al-Ghalaṭ (faults corrected)<sup>2</sup>, the Kitāb al-Taḥqīq<sup>3</sup> (the instructor)<sup>3</sup>, the Kitāb al-Khayl (treatise on horses), the seven Readings of the Qur'ān analysed grammatically, a work on the Anwā' the Kitāb al-Masā'il, etc. (book of questions and answers), the Kitāb al-Maysir wa'l-Qiddāh (on games of chance)<sup>5</sup>. These books he continued to explain to his pupils at Baghḍād till his death. His father was, it is said, a native of Marw, but he himself was born at Baghḍād, or, according to some, at Kūfah; having acted for some time in the capacity of a qāḍī at Dīnawar, he received the surname of Dinawarī. His birth took place A.H. 213 (A.C. 828-9), and his death occurred in the month of Dhu 'l-Qa'dah, A.H. 270 (May, A.C. 884); but this point is not well established, as some say that he died in A.H. 271, and others in A.H. 296, on the first of Rajab, or on the 15 of that month (April, A.C. 909) †; and this last opinion is nearest to the truth. His death happened quite suddenly; he uttered a cry loud enough to be heard at a great distance, and then, falling into a state of insensibility, he expired. Another account says: He had eaten some harisah (a sort of pottage so called) which brought on an inflammation<sup>6</sup>; he then uttered a loud cry and fell into a state of insensibility which lasted till the hour of noon; he was then agitated convulsively for some time, after which

1 The 'Uyūn al-Akhbār sources of information) forms a large volume in ten books, each of which treats of a different subjects. One is on the sultān, another on knowledge, a third on food, a fourth on women, etc.

2 In this work he points out the mistakes into which Abū 'Ubyadah had fallen.

3 The subject of this work is not specified by Ḥājjī Khalīfah.

4 The anwā' are the mansions of the moon in the Zodiac. The ancient Arabs imagined that they had great influence on the weather.

5 See Pocock's Specimen, p. 315.

6 This significance of the word حرارة is not given in the dictionaries, but it was known to M. de Sacy. See his edition of Abdallatif, page 16.

*The autograph reading is 'Taḥfiyah'—Ed.

†26 March or 9 April—Ed.

he remained quiet, and he continued to utter the profession of faith, till day-break the next morning, when he expired.—His son Abu Ja'far Aḥmad Ibn 'Abd Allah was a doctor of the law, and taught also all the works of his father, by whom he had himself been instructed in them. He filled the place of qaḍī in Old Cairo, which city he first entered on the 18th of the latter Jumādā, A.H. 321;* he died there in the exercise of his functions, A.H. 322, in the month of the first Rabi' (February-March, A.C. 934); he was born at Baghḍād.—It is said that most of the learned men (of that time) called the Adab al-Kātib a preface without a book, and the Iṣlāḥ al-Manṭiq (Ibn al-Sikkī's work) a book without a preface; but this observation betrays a certain degree of prejudice against Ibn Qutaybah, for his Adab al-Kātib contains an abundance of information disposed under regular heads; and I am convinced that their only motive for saying so was, because its preface is very long, whilst the Iṣlāḥ has none at all. It is reported that he composed this work for Abu 'l-Ḥasan 'Ubayd Allāh Ibn Yaḥya Ibn Khāqān<sup>1</sup>, the wazīr of the Abbaside khalif al-Mu'tamid, son of al-Mutawakkil. It has been commented by Abū Muḥammad ('Abd Allāh') Ibn al-Sid al-Baṭalyawṣī, whose life will be found farther on. This learned scholar has explained therein the difficulties of the Adab al-Kātib in the fullest manner, and pointed out the mistakes into which the author has fallen. His treatise bears the title of al-Iqtīḍāb fī sharḥ Adab al-Kutīb (Extemporizing, being a commentary on the Guide for Kātib), and is a proof of the extensive information possessed by its author.—Qutaybah is the diminutive of qitbah, the singular form of the word aqṭāb, which signifies entrails. It is a common noun, but came to be used as a proper name. From it is formed the relative adjective Qutabī.—Dinawari (or Daynawart, as it is pronounced by al-Sam'ānī, but incorrectly means belonging to Dinawar, a town in Persian 'Irāq near Qirmisīn, which has produced a great number of eminent men.

<sup>1</sup> 'Ubayd Allāh Ibn Khāqān was wazīr to al-Mutawakkil and al-Mu'tamid, in whose reign he died. He possessed great abilities as an administrator of public affairs, and by his generous character he gained the favour of the public and the military. He had refused to accept the wazīrat a second time, but the troops insisted so, strongly on his returning to office, that he was obliged to consent.—(See Fakḥr al-Dīn Ibn Ṭabāṭaba's al-Duwal al-Islāmiyah, MS. No. 895, fol. 221, 232.)

* 15 June, A.C. 933.—Ed.

307. IBN DURUSTŪYAH

Abū Muḥammad ‘Abd Allāh Ibn Ja‘far Ibn Durustūyah Ibn al-Murzubān al-Fārisī al-Fasawī (native of Fasā in the province of Fārs) was a grammarian of great learning and talent. He studied philology at Bagḥdād under al-Mubarrad, Ibn Qutaybah (him whose life has been just given) and other masters; and a number of eminent men, such as al-Daraqūṇī and others, received lessons from him on the same subject. He was born A.H. 258 (A.C. 871-2), and died at Bagḥdād on Monday, the 20 of Ṣafar,—some say the 23,—A.H. 347 (May, A.C. 958).* His father was an eminent Traditionist. According to al-Sam‘anī, the word درستویه is pronounced Durustūyah, but Ibn Maklā says in his Kitāb al-A‘māl that Darastawayh is the true pronunciation. As for the denominations Fārisi and Fasawi, we have already explained them in the life of al-Basāsīrī (No. 78).—Ibn Durustūyah’s works are the height of excellence and exactness; they consist in a commentary on al-Jarmī’s work (the Farḥ)<sup>1</sup> the Irshād (direction), a treatise on grammar; a treatise on the alphabet; a commentary on the philological work entitled al-Faṣiḥ<sup>2</sup> an answer to al-Mufaḍḍal al-Ḍubbi’s refutation of al-Khālil (Ibn Aḥmad); the Hidāyah (direction);<sup>3</sup> a treatise on the words which end in a long or a short alif; an explanation of the rare expressions occurring in the Traditions; a treatise on the ideas and allusions usually met with in poetry; the Kitāb al-Ḥayyī wa’l-Mayyit<sup>4</sup>, the Kitāb al-Tawassuṭ, or arbiter between al-Akhfaṣh and Tha‘lab relative to their explanations of the Qur’ān; the History of Quss Ibn Sa‘idah<sup>5</sup>; a treatise on those nouns which have

<sup>1</sup> See No. 280.

<sup>2</sup> The Faṣiḥ or correct speaker is, as its title implies, a philological work. It is not exactly known who was the author of it; some attribute it to Ibn al-Sikkī, and others to Abu ‘l-‘Abbās Tha‘lab. It has been elucidated by a great number of commentators.

<sup>3</sup> Ḥājji Khālīfah does not specify the subject of this work.

<sup>4</sup> The Ḥayyī wa’l-Mayyit (living and dead) is mentioned by Ḥājji Khālīfah but without any remark.

<sup>5</sup> Quss Ibn Sa‘idah Ibn ‘Amr al-‘Ibādī (the Nestorian Christian) was bishop of Najrān in Yaman and celebrated for his eloquence. Muḥammad met him at ‘Ukāz and heard him preach, some time previously to the promulgation of Islamism. Al-Mas‘ūdī speaks of him in the Murūj, see Dr. Sprenger’s translation of that work, vol. I, page. 137.

*14 or 17 May but Monday fell on the latter date, and the date should be rendered as 21 or 24 Ṣafar.—Ed.

each opposite significations; the History of the Grammarians; and a refutation of al-Farra's doctrines in rhetoric. He commenced also a number of other works, but did not finish them.

308. AL-KA'BI

Abu 'l-Qasim 'Abd Allah Ibn Ahmad Ibn Maḥmūd al-Ka'bi al-Balkhī, a man celebrated for his learning, was the author of that sect of the Mutazilites, the members of which are called Ka'bites. He taught some doctrines peculiar to himself; for instance, that Almighty God has not the faculty of intention, and that all his acts happen without his having any intention or will to produce them. He was one of the great masters in scholastic theology, and held some eclectic opinions in this science. His death took place on the first of Shā'ban, A.H. 317 (September, A.C. 929).*—Ka'bi means belonging to the tribe of Ka'b.—Balkhī signifies belonging to Balkh, one of the great cities of Khurasān.

309. AL-QAFFAL AL-MARWAZI

Abū Bakr 'Abd Allah Ibn Ahmad Ibn 'Abd Allah al-Qaffal al-Marwazī (native of Marw), a doctor of the sect of al-Shāfi'i was the paragon of his time for legal knowledge, traditional learning, piety, and self-mortification. The results of his application to the development of the imam al-Shāfi'i's system of doctrine far surpassed those of his contemporaries: all his deductions are sound and his arguments decisive. Great numbers studied with profit under his tuition, and among the number were Abū 'Alī al-Sinji, the qāḍī Ḥusayn (whose life has been already given)<sup>1</sup> and Abū Muḥammad al-Juwayni, the father of the Imam al-Ḥaramayn. All those persons became imams of great note; they composed most nstructive works, propagated al-Shāfi'i's doctrines in different countries of the Muslim empire and taught them to others, who, in their turn, became eminent as imams. Al-Qaffal was already advanced in years when he began to study the law; he had spent his youth in making locks (aqfāl), an art in which he attained great skill, and it was for this reason that he was surnamed al-Qaffāl the (locksmith). It is said by some that he was thirty years of age when he commenced learning jurisprudence. He composed a commentary on Ibn al-Ḥaddād al-Miṣrī's<sup>1</sup> treatise on the secondary principles of the law, a work which has been commented also by Abū 'Alī al-Sinjī and by Abū Ṭayyib al-Ṭabarī; it is a small volume and difficult to be understood; some of the questions treated in it are so obscure<sup>2</sup> and so strange, that none but jurisconsults of superior talent can resolve them and understand their purport: we shall speak of the author of this book when giving the lives of those whose name is Muḥammad. Al-Qaffal died in the year 417 (A.C. 1026-7), at the age of ninety, and was buried in Sijistan, where his tomb is still well known and continues to be visited as a place of sanctity.

<sup>1</sup> For al-Sinji's life, see No. 176. In No. 175 of the same volume will be found the life of Ḥusayn.

* 9 September.—Ed.

310. ABŪ MUḤAMMAD AL-JUWAYNĪ

Abū Muḥammad 'Abd Allāh Ibn Yūsuf Ibn Muḥammad Ibn Ḥayyūyah al-Juwaynī, a doctor of the sect of al-Shāfi'i and the father of the Imam al-Ḥaramayn (whose life shall be given later), was a great master in the interpretation of the Qur'an, and in law, dogmatic theology, grammar, and general literature. He cultivated this last science at Juwayn under his father Abū Ya'qūb Yūsuf and then proceeded to Naysapur, where he studied jurisprudence under Abū 'l-Ṭayyib Sahl al-Ṣu'ūkī (see No. 270). From thence he went to Marw and put himself under the tuition of al-Qaffal al-Marwazī, him whose life had just been given. He followed with great assiduity the lessons of that doctor and derived from them much profit and information; he acquired also under his tuition a solid knowledge of the Shāfite doctrines, great skill in controversy, and a perfect acquaintance with the peculiar system followed by him in developing the principles of the law. Having finished his studies under al-Qaṣṣāl, he returned to Naysapur in the year 407 (A.C. 1016-7), and obtained the place of professor and mufti. A great number of persons, and amongst them his own son the Imam al-Ḥaramayn, pursued their studies under him. The deepest respect was always shown to him, and no conversation but the most serious was ever held in his presence. He composed a great commentary on the Qur'an, containing much varied information, and also a number of works on jurisprudence, such as the Tabṣīrah (elucidator), the Tadhkirah (remembrancer), the Mukhtaṣar al-Mukhtaṣar (abridgment of the abridgment),<sup>1</sup> the Farq,<sup>2</sup> the Jam'u the Silsilah (chain)<sup>3</sup>, the Mawqif al-Imām wa 'l-Māmūn (station of the imām and those over whom he presides), etc. He drew also a number of Ta'liqahs,<sup>4</sup> and had besides learned a great quantity of the Traditions. His death took place in the month of Dhu 'l-Qa'dah, A.H. 438 (April-May, A.C. 1047), according to al-Sam'anī in his Dhayl; but in his Ansāb he says that it happened in the year 434 (A.C. 1042-3) at Naysapur; God best knoweth the truth! The same author mentions that he died at an advanced age, and he gives the following anecdote as it was related by the Shayḥ Abū Ṣaliḥ, the muwaḥḥidhīn: "The shayḥ Abū Muḥammad al-Juwaynī's illness lasted seventeen days, and he expressed a desire that the washing of his body should be done by me, and that I should preside at his interment. When he died, I washed him and on shrouding him I perceived that his right arm, from the shoulder downwards, was luminous although it bore no traces of injury; it shone with a lustre like that of the moon, at which I was filled with admiration, and I said to myself: 'This is a blessing which his fatwās (legal decisions) have drawn down upon him'.—Juwaynī means belonging to Juwayn, a large territory near Naysapur, crowded with villages.

<sup>1</sup> His life will be found in this work.

<sup>2</sup> In the printed Arabic text read عويصة . . .

1 This is an abridgment of al-Muzanī's compendium of the Shāfite doctrines.—(Tābaqāt al-Shāfi'in.)

2 This seems to be a mistake of Ibn Khalikān; the author of the Tabaqāt al-Shāfi'in calls it the Furūq, and Hajjī Khalīfah mentions it under this title in his bibliographical dictionary.

3 These works all treat of Shāfite jurisprudence.

4 See No. 311, Note on Ta'liqah.

311. ABŪ ZAYD AL-DABŪSĪ

Abn Zayd 'Abd Allāh Ibn 'Umar Ibn 'Īsā al-Dabūsī, one of the most eminent jurisconsults of the sect of Abū Ḥanīfah, and a doctor of proverbial reputation for his learning, was the first who invented the art of (Muslim) dialectics and brought that science into existence. A number of ta'liqahs<sup>1</sup> were composed by him; he wrote also other works, such as the Asrār (mysteries)<sup>2</sup> and the Taqwīm li'l-Adillah (system of demonstrations).<sup>3</sup> It is related that he once had a discussion with another doctor, who only smiled or laughed when pressed by his arguments, on which he pronounced these verses:

"Why does he answer me by a laugh or a grin when I bring forward a decisive proof? If grinning be the result of legal knowledge, how excellent a jurisconsult is the bear of the desert!"

He died in the city of Bukhara, A.H. 430 (A.C. 1038-9).—Dabūsī is derived from Dabūsiyah, the name of a town * between Bukhara and Samarqand, which has produced a number of learned men.

312. AL-MURTAḌĀ IBN AL-SHAHRUZŪRĪ.

Abū Muḥammad 'Abd Allāh Ibn al-Qasim Ibn al-Muẓaffar Ibn 'Alī Ibn al-Qasim al-Shahrūzūrī, surnamed al-Murtaḍā (him in whom God is pleased), and father of the qāḍī Kamāl al-Dīn, was celebrated for his great merit and his piety. (We shall give the life of his father and that of his son.) This fine preacher, who was equally remarkable for the elegance of his figure and the harmony of his style, was qāḍī of Moṣul and taught the Traditions in that city; he had passed some time at Baḡhdād in the study of the latter branch of <sup>1</sup> Ta'liqahs were of two kinds; the first consisted of notes taken by the student during the lessons of his professor; and the second, of notes composed to clear up obscure passages in an author and supply his omissions; a sort of commentary, in fact. Al-Dabūsī's were of the latter kind.

---

<sup>2</sup> This is a treatise on the dogmas and the secondary points of the law.

<sup>3</sup> This work treats of dogmatic theology.

* According to the autograph it should be rendered as a 'small town' or rather a 'village'.—Ed.

learning and the pursuit of legal knowledge. He composed some beautiful poetry, and amongst other pieces a qaṣidah of great merit, written in the mystical style peculiar to the Ṣūfis. We shall give it here :<sup>1</sup>

"The light of their fire glimmered (from afar), and already the night had darkened (around us); the weary camel-driver could no longer continue his song, and our guide stood perplexed and bewildered. I looked at that fire, but the glance of my eye was feeble; my mind also had been weakend by my separation (from the beloved); my heart was that afflicted heart (which you have known so long); and my passion, that inmost passion (which has so long been my torment). I then turned towards the flame and said to my companions: 'That is Laylā's fire; rein over to it.' They directed towards it firm glances from their eyes; glances which were repelled and turned aside. Then (my companions) began to reproach (me); "Was it not a flash of lightning which you saw, or else a phantom of your imagination?" On this I abandoned them and bent thither my way; desire was the camel which conveyed me, and passion the rider who sat behind me. With me was a companion (love) who followed my traces; for it is the nature of love to be importunate. The fire blazed up and we approached nearer, till some time-worn ruins intervened. We went on to them till our progress was stopped by sighs and sadness. 'Who dwell in these abodes?' I exclaimed, and voices answered: 'A wounded man, a captive in bondage, and a victim slain! what seekest thou here?'—'I am a guest,' was my reply: 'I seek hospitality, where is the stranger's meal of welcome?'—They pointed towards the court of the dwelling: 'Stop there,' said they, 'and kill thy camel for thy food; from us a guest never departeth more! He who comes to us must throw away his staff of travel.'—'But how,' said I, 'can I reach that fire? Where is the way?' We then halted at the habitation of some people whom the wine had prostrated even before they had tasted of it. Passion had effaced all traces of their former existence, and had itself become the mere traces of a ruin, in this ruin they had fixed their abode. Among them was one abstracted, in whom neither complaints nor tears found any longer place; his sighs alone denoted his existence, and even of these (his will) was guiltless; from these his consciousness was far apart. Among them also was one who made signs that we should observe his passion which, less intense (than that of the others), had allowed his consciousness to exist. I saw that each of them had reached stations the description of which would require a long epistle. 'People of desire,' said I, 'peace be upon you; I have a heart so preoccupied with you that it perceived you not! my eyes were required to furnish torrents of tears, so great was my wish to meet you. The impulse of desire hurried me towards you through the vicissitudes of events. I should be in fault were I to ask you pardon (for my boldness); may I then hope for a kind reception from him who knows what motive I have for not asking pardon? I have come to warm me at the fire; can I find a road to your fire, now that the morning draweth near?' To this they replied not, but their external state gave me answer sufficient, as every veil between my intelligence and it was now rent asunder; here was the reply: 'Let not the beautiful gardens deceive thee; between thee and them are hills and pitfalls. How many have tried to reach that fire by surprise! they strived to attain the object (of their wishes), but to approach it was difficult. They stopped to contemplate; but when they had every sign of succeeding, the banner of fulfilment appeared, borne in the hand of passion, and the chiefs gave the command to charge. 'Where,' exclaimed they, 'where are they who pretend to resist us in combat? This is the day wherein all false pretensions shall fade away!' They charged like heroes; and on the day when foes meet in arms, it is the heroes alone who fall. They lavished every effort, whilst the object of their desire avoided their approach and slighted all their endeavours. They plunged into the abyss and disappeared in its waves; the currents then cast them back among the ruins which they now stained with their blood<sup>1</sup> shed, alas! in vain. Such is our fire; it shineth for him who travelleth at night, but it cannot be reached. The share of it which falls to the sight is the utmost which can be obtained; but those able to conceive this are few in number. One whom you well know went towards it, hoping to take from it a brand; he approached with outstretched arms, with wishes and supplications, but it rose far beyond his reach; it was too exalted to abide his proximity, and yet he was a prophet. We therefore rest amazed as thou hast seen; all our efforts to reach it being vain; we pass away the time in the delusions of hope, but judge what is the state of that heart whose ailment consists in being tantalised! Each time it tastes the bitter cup of misfortune, another cup is brought to it, sweetened with hope. Each time fancy sets a project before us, we are turned away from it and told that patient resignation befits us best. Such is our state; such is all that our knowledge can attain; but every state must undergo a change."

---

1 All the ideas of the qaṣidah are borrowed from pastoral life: in the following piece they have a mystic import besides, as shall be here indicated. The light of their fire: the presence of the Divinity manifested to the saints. The night: moral darkness. The camel driver: the preacher. The guide: the divine. The beloved: God. Laylā: the name of the beloved, God. Desire: the love of God. Passion: The anxious wish to enjoy the divine Presence. The time-worn ruins: the world, the seat of desolation in the eyes of the devout, inasmuch as the presence of the Divinity is not always felt in it. The wounded, the captive, and the victim: the vanquished by the love of God. From us a guest never departeth more: till his soul is released by death. The people: the devout, the Ṣūfī brethren. Wine: the delight caused by the perception of God's presence. Stations: degrees of exaltation attained by the soul through means of spiritual exercises and contemplation. People of desire: another name for the lovers of the Divinity. The warmth of the fire: the beneficial influence of God's presence. The morning: the entrance of the novice into the Ṣūfī life after abandoning the world, which is the seat of darkness. The gardens: paradise. The banner of fulfilment: the sign that the novice has become an adept and fulfilled all the necessary duties of spiritual life. The chiefs, literally, the people of the truths: so called because they have obtained a clear insight into the spiritual world, which is the abode of truth as this earth is the abode of illusion. To charge: literally, to canter round and round the field of battle and challenge the enemy; it then signifies, to turn round as the dervishes do. The enemy: the world and its passions. The abyss: the Divine nature. Thrown back among the ruins: recovering from an ecstasy of Divine love and finding oneself in the world. One whom you well know: the prophet Moses. The brand: see Qur': n sūrat 27, verse 7; Exod. III.

I give this qaṣīdah on account of its rarity and because it is in high request. It is related by a (Ṣūfī) Shaykh that he had a dream in which he heard a voice say: "Nothing was ever uttered on Sūfism so good as the Mawṣiliyan qaṣīdah (the Mosul qaṣīdah);" and this is the one which was meant.—The following distich* was given by Majd al-'Arab (Glory of the Arabs)<sup>2</sup> al-'Amirī as having been composed by al-Murtaḍā:

<sup>1</sup> In the Arabic text, for دم read دمه.

<sup>2</sup> The autograph alone has مجد الدين, not مجد العرب, as the other MSS; the first is certainly the right reading. Imād al-Dīn has a notice on this person in the Khariḍah the sum of which is: The Amir Majd al-'Arab Muzaffar al-Dawlat Abū Farās 'Alī Ibn Muḥammad Ibn Ghālib al-'Amirī was the wonder of the age for his poetic talent, and his verses were proverbially said to be as fine as those of his namesake Abū Farās (see Ibn Khallikān's Biograph. Dict. No. 146). He was born in the province of 'Iraq and went to Ispahān, A.H. 537 (A.C. 1142-3), where he pronounced his eulogistic qaṣīdahs and acquired great reputation. The kātib saw him for the last time at Mosul, A.H. 570—(Khariḍah MS. No. 1447. fol 27, where some long extracts from his poetry are given.)

* Du bayt دو بیت is quatrain not distich.—Ed

"O my heart! how long will good advice prove useless? Quit thy sportive humour; how often has thy gaiety brought thee into danger! There is no part of thee without a wound<sup>1</sup>; but thou wilt not feel the bad effects of inebriation till thy reason returneth."

The kātib 'Imād al-Dīn gives the following verses as al-Murtaḍā's in the Kharidah:

"I sought my heart, that I might ask of patience the force to sustain, for a moment, the rigours of my beloved; but I neither found my heart nor patience. The sunshine of our fond intercourse was gone; darkness had overshadowed the paths of love, and I stopped amazed and confounded; but a single instant had scarce elapsed when I saw her again a sovereign mistress, and my heart her captive."

These verses also are by the same person:

"Those whom I love departed, and how copious were the tears of blood which they then let lose (from our eyes); and how many hearts did they bring back into bondage! Blame me not if grief for their absence make me reject the control of reason; what I have just said will suffice for my excuse."

* "For them my heart is in affliction; for them I shed tears of blood; for them I am consumed with flames; for them my heart is broken. At their door we are a crowd of suitors; our hearts melting away with apprehension; they have left us scarcely a breath of life; O that they saw our state. Kindness or aversion, sleep or waking, despair or hope, patience or restlessness, these exist for us no longer. O that they had remained even after they had broken the ties of friendship and treated me with cruelty! Were the love I bear them to deprive me of existence, the perfume of that love would yet remain! I am like the taper, useful to those around it, but consuming itself away."

I never went to meet thee, Laylā! without feeling as if the earth were folded up from under me (so rapid was my pace;) but when my resolution turned me from thy door, I stumbled over the skirts of my garment."

Most of his poetry is in the same style. He was born in the month of Shā'ban, A.H. 465 (April-May, A.C. 1073); he died at Mosul in the month of the first Rab'ī, A.H. 511 (July, A.C. 1117), and was interred in the sepulchral chapel of the Shahruzarī family. The kātib 'Imād al-Dīn says in his Kharidah, where he gives a notice on al-Murtaḍā: "Al-Sam'anī mentions having heard that the qādī Abū Muḥammad, "— meaning al-Murtaḍā,—"died some time later than the year 520."

<sup>1</sup> The autograph has منك عداها; but the sense certainly requires منك عداها.

* "From the same" is omitted by de Slane.—Ed.

313. SHARAF AL-DĪN IBN ABĪ 'UṢRŪN

Abū Sa'd 'Abd Allāh Ibn Abī 'l-Sarī Mu'ammad Ibn Hibat Allāh Ibn Muṭahhar Ibn 'Alī Ibn Abī 'Uṣrūn Ibn Abī 'l-Sarī al-Tamīmī, surnamed first al-Ḥad̥thī and then al-Mawḥilī (native of Mosul), entitled also Sharaf al-Dīn (nobleness of religion), was a doctor of the Shāfi'ite sect, and one of the first men of the age by his talents and his learning as a jurisconsult. His reputation spread to distant countries and his influence was most extensive. In his youth he studied the ten readings<sup>1</sup> of the Qur'an under Abū 'l-G̥ṭanā'im al-Sulamī al-Sarjī, al-Bāṣī' Abū 'Abd Allāh Ibn al-Dabbas (see No. 190) Abū Bakr al-Mazrafi<sup>2</sup> and other masters. He commenced learning jurisprudence under the qāḍī al-Murtaḍā Ibn al-Shahrūzārī (No. 312), and Abū 'Abd Allāh al-Ḥusayn, * Ibn Khamīs al-Mawṣilī (see No. 180); he had afterwards, when in Baḥdād, As'ad al-Mihanī (No. 86) for preceptor in that science. He studied dogmatic theology under Ibn Barḥan al-Uṣṭālī (No. 38), and learned there also dialectics. From Baḥdād he proceeded to Wasīṭ and read the Qur'an under the tuition of Abū 'Alī 'l-Farīqī (No. 38), the qāḍī of that city, by whom he was instructed also in the Fawā'id al-Muḥadḍ-ḥab. In the year 523 (A.C. 1129) he himself gave public lessons at Moṣul, after which he resided for some time at Sinjār whence he proceeded to Aleppo, A.H. 545: from that he removed to Damascus, when Nūr al-Dīn Maḥmūd Ibn Zinkī got possession of that city in the month of Ṣafar, A.H. 549 (April-May, A.C. 1154). He then opened a class in the western corner of the great mosque, and was appointed administrator of the endowments (waqf) possessed by the mosques. He then returned to Aleppo, where he settled. A great number of works were composed by him to elucidate the doctrines of the sect

<sup>1</sup> There are seven authorised readings of the Qur'an, named after seven great doctors who first taught them and whose lives are given by Ibn Khalikān; three more readings were afterwards admitted, and Yā'qub Ibn Ishāq al-Ḥadramī, the author of one of them, is considered as the eighth reader. I have not yet been able to discover the names of the two others.

<sup>2</sup> Abū Bakr Muḥammad Ibn al-Ḥusayn al-Mazrafi, a teacher of the Qur'ānic readings and a calculator of the division of inheritances (al-Farāḥ), inhabited Mazrafiyah, a village lying between Baḥdād and 'Ukbarah. He was born at Baḥdād, A.H. 439 (A.C. 1047-8), and died praying, A.H. 527 (A.C. 1132). —(Tub al-Qurr, fol. 145).

* The editor of Cairo edition gives 'al-Ḥasan.'—Ed.

to which he belonged; of these may be mentioned the Ṣafwat al-Madhhab (quintessence of the Shafite doctrines), extracted from the (Imām al-Ḥaramayn's) Nihāyat al-Maṭlab, in seven volumes; the kitāb al-Intiṣār (vindication of the Shafites) in four volumes; the Kitāb al-Murshid (the guide, a work on the secondary points of law), in two volumes; and the Kitāb al-Dī'arī'ah fī Ma'rafat al-Sharī'ah (means of acquiring a knowledge of the law). He composed also the Tafsir (explanation), a work forming four volumes treating of the points in which his sect differs from the others; the Mā'adḥ al-Nazar (point of view); a short treatise on the dividing of inherited property; and a work entitled al-Irshād al-Mughrib fī-Nuṣrati 'l-Madhhab (plain directions for the defence of the Shafite sect); this last however he did not complete, as it was stolen from him with other property at Aleppo. The number of students who followed his lessons and profited by his tuition was very great. His merit having at length rendered him conspicuous, he obtained the esteem and favour of Nūr al-Dīn lord of Syria, who erected colleges in Aleppo, Emessa, Ḥamāt, Ba'labek, and other cities, for the express purpose of having him to teach in these places. (At different periods) he filled the post of qādī at Sinjar, Niṣibīn, Ḥarran, and elsewhere in Diyār Bakr; he then returned to Damascus, A.H. 570 (A.C. 1174-5), and three years afterwards, he was appointed to fill the same functions in that city when the qādī Dīya al-Dīn al-Shahrūzūrī gave in his resignation; an act of which I shall state the motive in the life of Kamāl al-Dīn Muḥammad al-Shahrūzūrī. Ten years before his death he lost his sight, but continued to hold his office, the duties of which were discharged by his son and deputy Muḥī al-Dīn Muḥammad. At that time, he composed a short treatise to prove that the place of qādī could be lawfully held by a blind man; a point in opposition with the doctrine of al-Shāfi'ī on the subject: I have read, it is true, in the Kitāb al-Zawā'id, a work composed by Abu 'l-Ḥasan al-'Imrānī<sup>1</sup> the author of the Kitāb al-Bayān, that, in one point of view, it is lawful; this is, however, quite an extraordinary opinion, and I never found it advanced in any other work but his. (Speaking of this subject I must mention that) a letter fell into my hands, addressed to al-Qaḍī al-Faḍīl at Cairo from the sultān Ṣalāḥ al-Dīn at Damascus; it was wholly in that prince's handwriting and, among other passages, it contained one relative to Ṣharaf al-Dīn's blindness and his opinion that the post of qaḍī could be lawfully filled by a blind man, although all the other jurisconsults declared the contrary—"you will therefore," says the writer, "have an interview with the Shaykh Abu 'l-Ṭāhir Ibn 'Awf al-Iskandarānī, and ask him what are the traditions on this subject, and if they authorise it or not." But after all, there can be no doubt of his eminent merit. The ḥāfiẓ Ibn 'Asākir mentions him in the History of Damascus, and the kātib 'Imād al-Dīn makes his eulogium in the Kharidah and pronounces him the last of the muftis: he gives also some verses composed by him. The two which follow were recited to me by one of our shaykhs, with the remark that he had heard Ibn Abī 'Uṣṣūn repeat them very often, but that he did not know if they were his own or not; they are given, however, as that doctor's by the kātib in the Kharidah:

<sup>1</sup> Sa'd Ibn Yabyā Ibn Abi 'l-Khayr al-'Imrānī, a native of Yaman and the author of the Bayān, or elucidation of the secondary points of the law, was a doctor of the sect of al-Shāfi'ī, and held a high reputation for his knowledge of the law, dogmatic and scholastic theology, and the science of grammar. None possessed a better acquaintance than he with the work of Abū Ishāq al-Shīrāzī, and he was surpassed by none in piety and devotion. Students came

(Continued on page 54.)

"I hope for a lengthened life; and yet every hour the dead pass by me, as their biers are borne rapidly along. Am I not as they, except that I must pass a few more sad nights to complete the time of my existence?"

The following lines are also quoted as his in the same work:

"I always hope to meet my beloved, and yet I know full well that I must quit her shortly after. Mounted on the steeds of Mortality, we rush, as if with emulation, towards the goal of death. O that we both might expire together! neither of us then would taste the bitter loss of the other."

(Continued from page 52)

from all countries to study under him; but it is said that he sometimes combined with the Shafite doctrines certain principles borrowed from the school of 'Irāq, the great imām of which was Abū Ḥanīfah. He was born A.H. 489 (A.C. 1096), and died A.H. 558 (A.C. 1162-3). The following works were composed by him: the Bay'ān, in ten volumes; the Zawā'id, or additions to Abū Ishāq al-Shīrāzī's Muḥadḍḥab, in two volumes; the Kitāb al-Sawāl, questions on the obscure points of the Muḥadḍḥab, an abridged collection of fatwas, an abridgement of al-Ghazzālī's Iḥyā' 'Ulūm al-Dīn, the Intiṣār, or aid, a refutation of the Qadarites. He composed the Bay'ān in somewhat less than four years and the Zawā'id in about five.—(Tab. al-Shāf.)—In the autograph MS. of Ibn Khallikān, the surname is given as Abu 'l-Ḥusayn; in the Ṭabaqāt al-Shāfī'īn, as Abu 'l-Khayr; and in Ṭabaqāt al-Fuqahā, as Abu 'l-Ḥasan, which is also that found in the other manuscripts of Ibn Khallikān's work.

"O thou who askest me how I have been since thy departure? God preserve thee from what my heart has felt since our separation. Tears of grief swore never to cease flowing from my eyes, and sleep swore never to visit them till I met thee again."

"The time which has passed is gone for ever, and that which is to come exists not. Thy life is only the present moment; the days of man form two sums, one increasing, the other diminishing."*

Ibn Abī 'Uṣṣun was born at Moṣul on Monday, the 22 of the first Rabi', A.H. 492 (February, A.C. 1099)†; he died at Damascus on the eve of Tuesday, the 11 of Ramaḍan, A.H. 585 (October, A.C. 1189). He was buried in the madrasah which bears his name and which he himself had founded within that city: I have often visited his tomb.

§ [On his death (one of his female relatives) received a letter of condolence from al-Qaḍī al-Faḍīl, in reply to one wherein she announced to him this event: his participation in her grief was expressed in the following terms: "I have received the letter of the honourable lady for whose welfare may God provide! May He preserve her for the happiness of her family; may He smoothen for her the path leading to spiritual welfare, and make her words and action proceed from the wish to gain His favour." It contained also this passage: "I shall only add—and what I mention is diminution in the strength of Islamism, and a breach in the frame of human society, so great as nearly to cause its ruin!—I mean that which God decreed concerning the death of the imam Sharaf al-Dīn Ibn Abī 'Uṣṣun, may the divine mercy be upon him!—the loss sustained in him by the world at large; the affliction of the pious—and the joy of the foes to religion. For he was a land-mark set upon the tracts of science, and he counted among the last remnants of a holy race now passed away. And God knoweth my grief for his death, my desolation in the world now deprived of the blessing of his presence, and my sadness in losing the abundant merits of his charitable prayers".]

---

* These are three different pieces which do not form part of a single poem—Ed.

† 14 February.—Ed.

‡ 24 October.—Ed.

§ This whole paragraph is not included in the autograph.—Ed.

Ḥadīthi means belonging to the Ḥadīthah of Mosul, a village on the east bank of the Tigris near (the mouth of) the Upper Zab. It must not be confounded with another place of the same name, the Ḥadīthah of al-Nūrah, which is a fortress on an island in the Euphrates, at some parasangs' distance from al-Anbār. The former lies at the most eastern extremity of the territory called the Sawād, and is the one meant by the juriconsults when they say, in their books: "The land of Sawād extends in longitude from the Ḥadīthah of Mosul to 'Abbadān, and latitude from al-Qādisiyah to Hulwān."

314. IBN AS'AD AL-MAWṢILĪ

Abu 'l-Faraj 'Abd Allāh Ibn As'ad Ibn 'Alī Ibn 'ṣā, generally known by the appellation of Ibn al-Dahhān al-Mawṣilī (son of the Mosul oil-merchant), entitled also al-Ḥimṣī (native of Emessa) and surnamed al-Muḥadhdhab,<sup>1</sup> was a juriconsult of great abilities, a learned scholar and a fine poet. His verses are remarkable for the elegance of their turn and the beauty of their thoughts. Poetry became his ruling passion, and it was to it that he owed his reputation. His poetical works are all of great merit and form a small volume. Moṣul was his native place, but poverty forced him to take the resolution of going to Egypt, that he might pay his court to al-Ṣalīḥ Ibn Ruzzīk, the lord of that country (see his life, No. 290)*. Obligated by the insufficiency of his means, to leave his wife behind him, he addressed the following lines to the sharīf Ḍiyyā al-Dīn Abū 'Abd Allāh Zayd Ibn Muḥammad Ibn Muḥammad Ibn 'Ubayd Allāh al-Ḥusaynī, the naqīb or chief of the sharīfs at Moṣul:

"An afflicted female, bathed in tears for my departure, helped to detain me by declaring my project the result of folly. Her entreaties were urgent, and when she saw me deaf to her prayers, the tears which fell from her eyes wounded me to the heart. She perceived the camels already loaded,—and the moment of separation had united the lamenters and those for whom they were lamenting,—when she said: “Who will save me from starvation in thy absence?”—“God”, I replied, “and thy patron Ibn ‘Ubayd Allāh. Fear not for want of sustenance; there is one where beneficence is ample, like the showers of the Pleiades; him I have asked to shed abundance upon thy place of dwelling.”

<sup>1</sup> Al-Muḥadhdhab is probably the equivalent of Muḥadhdhab al-Dīn.

* He was only a minister.—Ed.

When the sharif read these verses, he immediately undertook to provide for the poet's wife, and he furnished her with every thing she required as long as her husband was absent. As for Ibn As'ad, he went to Egypt and recited to al-Ṣāliḥ Ibn Ruzzik the poem composed in his praise, and rhyming in K, of which some verses have been already given (No. 290). He afterwards underwent various vicissitudes of fortune and became at length a professor at Ḥimṣ (Emessa), where he fixed his residence. It was for this reason that he received the surname of al-Ḥimṣī. The kātib 'Imad al-Dīn speaks of him in the Kharidah: “When I was in ‘Iraq,” says he, “my constant desire was to meet him, for I had read his admired qaṣīdahs and was struck with the beauty of his ideas; his poem rhyming in K had already circulated throughout all the literary world, and was itself a written proof that none of his contemporaries had attained to such a degree of excellence as he.” After this eulogium he continues: “A slight lisp only served to display the perfection of his style, and the very impediment in his speech only showed off better his command of language.” Farther on he says: “When the sultan Ṣalāḥ al-Dīn arrived at Emessa and encamped outside the city, this Abu 'l-Faraj came out to us, and I presented him to the sultan, saying “This is the man who said in his poem on Ibn Ruzzik:

‘What! shall I praise the Turks in hopes of their bounty? Why! the Turks have always left poetry in neglect!’

On this the sultan made him a present, and observed at the same time that he did so in order to prevent him at least from saying that he was neglected.” The poet then celebrated the praises of the sultan in a qaṣīdah of which each verse ends in the letter ‘ayn’; it is this poem that we find the following passage:

“I shall say to her<sup>1</sup> whom religious scruples prevented from replying to my salutation: ‘Why then didst thou shed my heart’s

<sup>1</sup> Literally: Say to her, that is, bear this message from me to her.

blood without feeling compunction? Thy promise was to meet me in the coming year; but think not that I shall survive till thy return. Miracle of beauty! thou in whose face alone the Creator employed his utmost care! it could not have harmed thee hadst thou given me, on the day of our separation, a sign of recognition with thy eye or with thy hand. Be assured, however, that I love thee with devotion; so do with me as thou pleasest'."

The kātib mentions also that Ibn As'ad recited to him the following lines, and stated that the thought which they contained was perfectly original and had never before been expressed:

"His letters are the destruction of squadrons; and when they go forth, I know not which is most effectual,—their lines or an army. The sand adhering to the writing had not been appropriate, did earth not adhere to the soldier's legs when marching."

These two verses belong to a qaṣīdah and the author has displayed in them great originality. But a certain poet has said, in comparing the pen to an army<sup>1</sup>:

"A family who, when they seize their pens in anger and dip them in the ink of fate, inflict with them on their enemies greater harm than with their swords."

I may observe that the idea expressed in Ibn As'ad's first verse resembles that which is contained in the following lines, composed by Abu Tammam, in praise of Muḥammad Ibn 'Abd al-Malik al-Zayyat, al-Mu'tasim's Wazir:

"Prince of the faithful! you have roused Muḥammad, and in your hand he is a lance and a sword. You no sooner direct his thought towards a rebel, than you have directed an army against that foe."

I afterwards discovered an idea similar to that contained in Ibn As'ad's second verse; it is to be found in a qaṣīdah composed by al-Tugh̃rā'i (whose life has been given, No. 191), in honour of Niẓām al-Mulk:

"When the day is changed to night by the cloud of dust which shrouds the battle-field, those heroes never cease to wield their blood-stained weapons of Indian steel. Lines are traced on their armour by the strokes of the sword; those lines are pointed by the thrust of lances; thus is formed a page of writing for which the dust of the combat serves as sand."

---

<sup>1</sup> The observations which follow are evidently later additions. They are written in the margin of the autograph MS and it may be perceived from a close inspection that they were inserted successively and at three different periods. It may even be remarked that many of the author's later additions, such as these, are of very slight importance.

The following verses by Ibn As'ad are currently cited:

"All day she avoids me as she would an enemy; but from evening to morning she bears me company. When she passes by me, she fears discovery and her words are reproaches; but her wanton glance is a salutation."

By the same, on a girl whose lip was stung by a bee :

"How dear to me is that maiden stung by the bee. It gave pain to the noblest and most precious of beings. Its sting left a mark on that lip which God had only created to be kissed. It took her mouth for its hive, on finding that the moisture of her lips was like honey."

The apprehension of lengthening this notice too much prevents me from giving more curious passages from his poems. He died at Emessa in the month of Sha'ban, A.H. 581 (November A.C. 1185), but some say, A.H. 582: the latter date is that given in the work entitled al-Sayl wa'l Dhayl<sup>1</sup>. But the former is the true one. He was then nearly sixty years of age.—The sharif Ibn 'Ubyd Allāh, of whom we have spoken above, died at Mosul in the year 563 (A.C. 1167-8). He was a generous ra'is<sup>2</sup>, always ready to do good and possessed of every virtue. He is the author of some poetry, of which we may cite the following lines:

"My enemies said (to my beloved): 'He is resigned to his loss.' They spoke the truth; I am resigned to the loss of all consolation; not to the loss of her affection. They said: 'Why has he ceased to visit her?' I answered: 'Through fear of censorious spies.' They said: 'How can he live in such a state?' I replied: 'That is really the wonder'."

<sup>1</sup> This is a mistake, but it is found in all the manuscripts, the autograph included. Ibn Khallikān should have written al-Sayl 'ala 'l-Dhayl, which work is a continuation, by the kātib 'Imād al-Dīn, of al-Sam'ānī's supplement to the History of Baḥr al-Dād. See Fluegel's Hājjl Khaltfah No. 2179.

<sup>2</sup> The author gives Ibn 'Ubayd Allāh the title of ra'is, or chief, because he was naqīb of the sharḥ fs.

The kātib 'Imād al-Dīn mentions Ibn 'Ubayd Allāh in the Khartdah and, after praising him highly, he says: "When at Baghḍād I heard a piece of verse sung there which some Syrians attributed to the sharif Ḍiyā al-Dīn; in it was the following passage:

"O willow of the valley! thou whose glances have shed my heart's blood!—or shall I not rather call thee the slender reed of the plain?—It is mine to disclose to thee what I suffer from the pains of love, and it is thine not to hearken to me. By what means shall I obtain the object of my wishes My hands are unable to grasp it, and I feel like one deprived of them!'"

315. IBN SH S

Abū Muḥammad 'Abd Allāh Ibn Najm Ibn Shās Ibn Nizār Ibn 'Ashā'ir Ibn 'Abd Allāh Ibn Muḥammad Ibn Shās al-Judhāmī al-Sa'dī, surnamed al-Jalāl<sup>2</sup>, was an able jurisconsult of the sect of Mālik, in the principles of which he was profoundly versed: I met a great number of his former pupils at Cairo, and they all spoke of his merit in the highest terms. He composed on the system of doctrine founded by the imām Mālik a valuable work, displaying great originality and entitled al-Jawāhir al-Thāminah fi Madhḥih 'Ālimi 'l-Madīnah (precious gems, being a treatise on the doctrines taught by the learned man of Madīnah): it is drawn up on the plan of Abū Ḥamid al-Ghazzālī's Wajiz, and furnishes many proofs of the vast abilities possessed by its author; the Malikites of Cairo study it with great assiduity on account of its excellence and the rich store of information which they find in it. Ibn Shās was a professor in the college near the Great Mosque of Cairo, but when the fortress of Dimyāṭ (Damietta) was taken by the misguided enemy (the crusaders), he proceeded thither with the design of fighting in the cause of God, and he died there in the month of the latter Jumādā.

<sup>1</sup> This verse is rather enigmatical, but as the poet has just hinted that his mistress resembled a willow or a reed by the thinness of her waist: he most probably means here that her waist was too thin to be clasped; in short, an evanescent quantity.

<sup>2</sup> The autograph has الجلال —Ed.

• The Cairo edition has الغلال —Ed.

or in that of Rajab, A.H. 616 (Aug.-Sept. A.C. 1219). We have already explained the meaning of the words Judhāmī and Sa'dī (See No. 65).

316. 'ABD ALLĦ IBN AL-MU'TAZZ

Abu 'l-'Abbas 'Abd Allāh Ibn al-Mu'tazz Ibn al-Mutawakkil Ibn al-Mu'tasim Ibn Ḥarūn al-Raṣhīd Ibn al-Mahdī Ibn al-Manṣūr Ibn Muḥammad Ibn 'Alī Ibn 'Abd Allāh Ibn al-'Abbas Ibn 'Abd al-Muṭṭalib al-Ḥaṣhimī (a descendant from Ḥaṣhim Ibn 'Abd Manāf) acquired his knowledge of literature under the tuition of Abu 'l-'Abbās al-Mubarrad, Abu 'l-'Abbās Tha'lab, and other eminent masters. He was not only well acquainted with the pure Arabic language, but equally skilled in the arts of eloquence and poetry. In his verses he displayed a natural talent and superior abilities; they were clear in their meaning and easy in their style. These qualities joined to a fertile genius, and a mind prompt in conceiving original ideas of great beauty, inclined him to cultivate the society of learned scholars and literary men, and as such he was himself counted, till the fatal event which befel him in the khālīf-fate of al-Muqtadir. Having then entered into a conspiracy with the principal civil and military officers of the empire, they deposed al-Muqtadir on Sunday the 20, or by another account the 23, of the first Rabi' A.H. 296 (December, A.C. 908);* after which they proclaimed 'Abd Allāh khālīf, under the title of al-Murtaḍa Bi Allāh (him in whom God is pleased), or, as it is mentioned in other statements al-Munṣif Bi Allāh (the dispenser of justice in God's name), or al-Ḡhalib Bi Allāh (the victor with God's assistance), or al-Raḍī Bi Allāh (the pleasing by God's favour). He remained in authority during one day and one night, when his supporters were attacked and dispersed by the partisans of al-Muqtadir, who had united in considerable force; the deposed khālīf was restored to the throne, and Ibn al-Mu'tazz fled for concealment to the house of a person named Abu 'Abd Allāh al-Ḥusayn Ibn 'Abd Allāh Ibn al-Ḥusayn, but who was more generally known by the name of Ibn al-Jaṣṣāṣ al-Tajir al-Jawhari (the merchant jeweller, son of the gypsum seller). He was there discovered by al-Muqtadir and handed over to the eunuch Munis,<sup>1</sup> the lord treasurer, by whom he was put to death. His body was then delivered up to his family, enveloped in a cloak. Some persons have mentioned that he died a natural death, but this is not true; for he was certainly strangled by Munis on Thursday, the 2 of the latter Rabi', A.H. 296 (Dec. A.C. 908).* He was interred in a ruined building opposite his own house. His birth took place on the 22 of Sha'ban, A.H. 247 (October, A.C. 861),† or according to Sinān Ibn Thābit,<sup>2</sup> in the year 246. The fall of Ibn al-Mu'tazz is an event of which the history is well known; a full narration of it would lead us too far, but the main points of it are what we have just mentioned<sup>3</sup>. Ibn al-Jaṣṣāṣ was then arrested by al-Muqtadir's orders, and fined to the amount of two millions of dinars, but some time after, seven hundred thousand of them were restored to him. He was an inconsiderate and

---

* 18 December or 21 December: but Sunday fell on 18 December.—Ed.

<sup>1</sup> Munis was also lord Chamberlain to the khalif and possessed immense influence.

<sup>2</sup> Abū Sa'īd Sinān Ibn Thābit Ibn Qurrah al-Harrānī (a Sabeen by religion and a native of Harrān) was the chief physician of the khalif al-Muqtadir, and he afterwards served al-Qāhir in the same capacity. This prince always consulted him and placed the highest confidence in his talents. He invited him to become a Muslim, and after a long resistance, Sinān was forced to compliance by the threats of the khalif and the apprehension inspired by his violent character. Some time afterwards, perceiving in al-Qāhir's conduct a change which foreboded nothing good, he fled to Kūfurāsān, and after a residence in that country, he returned to Baḡhdād, where he died in the Muslim religion, A.H. 331 (A.C. 942-3). In the reign of al-Muqtadir, he had risen to be the rā'is, or chief of the physicians; and in the year 309, that prince gave orders that none should be allowed to practise without a certificate of capacity from Sinān. In consequence of this decree, upwards of eight hundred and sixty persons, from Baḡhdād alone, applied to him for certificates; but the other physicians attached to the court, and those whose reputation was already established by extensive practice, were dispensed from that obligation. In the year 306 (A.C. 918-9), al-Muqtadir founded an hospital, at Sinān's request, near the Damascus Gate (Bāb al-Shām), and granted to it a monthly sum of two hundred dinars. In the same year the hospital called Biṣṣāristān al-Sayyidah was founded also at his desire; six hundred dinars a month were allotted for its support, and the administration of the establishment was confided to the celebrated astronomer Yūsuf Ibn Yahyā. Sinān Ibn Thābit composed a treatise on the history of the old Syrian kings; an explanation of the principles of the Sabeen religion; some treatises on mathematics and astronomy; and a number of medical works besides. Fuller details respecting him will be found in the Tārīkh al-Ḥukamā and the work of Ibn Abi 'Uṣaybi'ah.

<sup>3</sup> The author furnishes more information on this head in the life of the wazīr 'Alī Ibn al-Furāt, and the event is noticed by all historians.

* 29 December.—Ed.

† 31 October.—Ed.

simple man. His death occurred on Sunday the 13 of Shawwal, A.H. 315 (December, A.C. 927)*.—Ibn al-Mu'tazz composed the following works: Kitāb al-Zahr wa 'l-Riyāḡ (flowers and gardens); Kitāb al-Badī' (treatise on the beauties of style); the Mukātabat al-Ikhwān bi 'l-Shi'r (poetical correspondence between the Brethren); the Jawāriḡ wa 'l-Ṣayd (a treatise on falcons and game); Kitāb al-Sariqāt on Plagiarisms; Kitāb Ash'ar al-Mulūk Poems by Royal authors; the Kitāb al-'Ādāb (on politeness and social duties); the Ḥalyul-Aḡḡbār (historical jewels); the Ṭabaqāt al-Shu'arā (a classified biography of the poets); the Jāmi' (a comprehensive treatise on vocal music), and a collection of rajaz verses in dispraise of early drinking. One of his sayings was: "Eloquence is the just expression of ideas in few words."<sup>1</sup> He observed also that if he was asked what was the finest passage of poetry which he knew of, he would say that it was the following, by al-'Abbās Ibn al-Aḡnaf:

"The public have cast suspicions on us<sup>2</sup> and spoken of our conduct in various manners. But some were mistaken and suspected a wrong person (to be my beloved), and others were right in their conjectures, but knew it not."

'Alī Ibn Muḡammad Ibn Bassām, a poet whose life shall be given in this work, lamented the death of Ibn al-Mu'tazz in these terms:

"How eloquent were thy words, thou whom destruction has placed among the dead. It was thou to whom belonged the pre-eminence of learning, of polished manners, and of worth. Never did an if or an unless diminish the value (of the favours conferred by thee); the only conjunction which ever occurred to thee was thy conjunction with sudden death<sup>3</sup>."

1 Literally: Eloquence is the attaining to the idea without a long journey of words.

2 Literally: Have swept over us the trains of their suspicions.

3 I have here rendered the Arabic pun by an English one nearly equivalent. If and unless are classed by the Arabian grammarians among what they call particles (ḡarf), a term by which they designate all the parts of speech which are neither nouns nor verbs. "The only particle which occurred to thee," says Ibn Bassām, "was the particle of correction حرفة الإِدَب." Al-Ṭha' libī employs this expression in his Yatīmah when speaking of the poet Abū Farīs Ibn Ḥamdān, "who" says he, "received the lesson of adversity (literally the misfortune of correction) and "was taken prisoner by the Greeks." In this case, the first word should be pronounced ḡirḡah: but Ibn Bassām pronounced it ḡarfah to effect a verbal quibble. This expression sometimes, as in the verse quoted by Ibn Kḡhallikān, signifies an untimely death, which is always a moral lesson for others.

* 9 December. -Ed.

As a specimen of the charming verses composed by Ibn al-Mu'tazz, and of his novel comparisons, we may quote the following:

"May an abundant shower water the shady groves of al-Maṭ'rah and the convent of 'Abdūn. How often, at the dawn of day before the lark took wing, I was awoke to take my morning-draught of wine by the voices of convent-monks at their prayers. Clothed in black robes, they chaunted matins; around their waists were belts, and on their heads, crowns of hair.<sup>1</sup>* The light of the new moon had nearly betrayed us, when she appeared, thin as a paring of the nail. I shall not say what passed; question me not, but think the best."

Here is another pretty piece not to be found in his collected poetical works, but which all those who first transmitted his poems by oral tradition agree in considering as his:

"A nymph arrayed in a short tunic hastened towards the carousers, bearing a cornelian (red wine) in a white pearl (a porcelain cup). The bright moon in the heavens seemed like a coin of gold thrown on a carpet of azure velvet. How often did this maiden cheer me with her society, in nights untroubled by the dread of jealous spies. Another too was there with a slender waist, and tongue-tied by the effects of wine, she could only converse by nods and signs. I pushed her with my hand and said: 'Awake, thou who art the joy of our friendly and convivial band.' And she answered with a voice enfeebled by inebriation, and interrupted like that of one who stammers: 'I understand thy words, but the juice of the purple (fruit) has overcome me. *[Leave me till morning that I may recover, and then, master, treat thy slave as thou wilt]<sup>2</sup>"

By the same on boiled wine,<sup>3</sup>—a piece which proves that its author was a Hanefite:

<sup>1</sup> Here, in the Arabic, follow four lines, which, for reasons already given, I have not translated.

<sup>2</sup> This last verse is not to be found in some of the MSS., the autograph among the number.

<sup>3</sup> It appears from the treatises on the Hanefite system of jurisprudence, that must, or the unfermented juice of the grape, may be lawfully drunk provided that it be reduced by boiling to less than two-thirds of its original volume.

* [ ] Translation of these verses omitted by de Slane.

Many a person of elegant face having applied collyrium of magic closes his eyelids on basil. I looked at him with fondness till (my heart) became obedient to him with pleasure and he anticipated my term with seeing.

He came to me hidden in the garment of night, hurrying in his steps out of fear and caution. I got up to place my cheeks humbly in his way and to drawing my skirts on the footsteps (to efface them).

† [ ] This verse is not included in the autograph.

"My friends! the purple liquor is now fit for drinking; for it I have renounced my piety, and (grave divines have said) 'It is praiseworthy to renounce former habits.' Give here the wine in its robe of glass, like a ruby set around with brilliants; the water forms on its surface bubbles of silver rising in circlets which break and form again. It has the quality of preserving me from the flames of hell,<sup>1</sup> and that is a great merit; deny it who can!"

Ibn al-Mu'tazz was of a deep tawny complexion and long-faced, with a beard dyed black. I read in a compilation of anecdotes that he used to say: "There were four poets whose works bore a character opposite to that of their authors: the poems of Abu 'l-Atahiyah were noted for their spirit of piety, yet he himself was an atheist; those of Abu Nuwās were on an infamous subject, yet he was more passionate for females than a baboon; Ab. Ḥukaymah the kātib's poetry was considered as a proof of his impotence, yet he was really more salacious than a goat; and the verses of Muḥammad Ibn Ḥāzim were in praise of contentment, yet he was greedier than a dog". But I was told an anecdote of Ibn Ḥāzim which proves the contrary of what Ibn al-Mu'tazz said respecting him and shows that his character accorded with his writings: He was living, it seems, in the neighbourhood of Sa'īd Ibn Ḥumayd al-Ṭī sī, the kātib, and made a satire on him in consequence of some affair that passed between them: Sa'īd, on learning the contents of this poem, overlooked the affront, though sufficiently powerful to punish the author of it. Some time after, Ibn Ḥāzim was reduced to poverty and removed from that neighbourhood; this came to the ears of Sa'īd, who immediately sent to him a present of ten thousand dirhams, some trunks of clothes, a horse with his harness, a male and a female slave, accompanied with a letter worded in these terms: "A man of instruction can be led by a whim of his imagination to describe a subject under a false aspect, and his talent may induce him to depict it in other colours than its own; of such a nature must certainly be that satire which, it is reported, you have composed on me. I have now just heard of the state to which you are reduced and of the poverty from which you suffer; a misfortune which is by no means a disgrace to one who, like you, is gifted with a noble spirit and a lofty soul. Let us be now partners in what we both possess and share equally what we have. So I here offer you something which, though small, may serve as an opening to greater favours which are to follow." However, Ibn Ḥazim sent the whole back with these lines:

---

<sup>1</sup> Had this sort of wine not existed, the poet would have drunk wine prepared by fermentation, and have thus committed a mortal sin.

"You have treated me as al-Muhallab treated al-Farazdaq when he overwhelmed him with his unbounded generosity. You sent riches<sup>1</sup> to tempt me, but you shall not effect your project; I swear by the Lord of that which is double and that which is single!<sup>2</sup> I will never accept the favours of a man whom I have covered with everlasting ignominy."

This is a proof that Ibn Ḥazim was really contented with his lot, and that he could support poverty with patience and resignation.<sup>3</sup>—Abn 'Uthman Sa'id Ibn Ḥumayd was a kātib, a poet, and a writer of epistles; gifted with a sweet style and possessing superior abilities in his profession. He was also a skilful plagiarist; so much so; that a wit said: "If Sa'id's prose and verse were ordered to return to their real authors, he would be left without a line of his own." He claimed to be descended from the kings of Persia, and composed a work called the Taswiyah (equalization), in which he vindicated the Persians from the depreciation in which they were held by the Arabs. His epistles form also a volume, and his poetical works another of small size.—Maṭīrah is a village near Sarra-manra'ā. —The 'Abdān, after whom the convent is so called, was brother to the wazīr Sa'id Ibn Maḥlād;<sup>4</sup> he frequently visited that establishment, to pass some time there, and it was by his means that it had been erected; for this reason it was called the Convent of 'Abdān (Dayr 'Abdān). It is heard by al-Maṭīrah. Another Dayr 'Abdān is situated near Jazīrat Ibn 'Umar,<sup>5</sup> from which it is only separated by the Tigris; it is now in ruins, but was formerly much visited by the inhabitants of that city in their country-parties.—The verse of Ibn al-Mu'tazz, The light of the moon had nearly betrayed

<sup>1</sup> In the printed Arabic text, read بالاموال.

<sup>2</sup> That is: Of all created things. See Qur'ān, sūrat 89, verse 2, with Sale's note.

<sup>3</sup> It is rather a proof of his pride, insolence, and heartlessness.

<sup>4</sup> It is probable that the author meant to say al-Ḥasan Ibn Maḥlād, who was one of the khalīf al-Mu'tamid's Wazīrs.—(M.S. No. 895, fol. 232 v.)

<sup>5</sup> Jazīrat Ibn 'Umar, or Djezireh, is situated on the West bank of the Tigris, and lies to the north of Mosul, in the province of Nişibin.

us, etc.<sup>1</sup>, contains an idea borrowed from 'Amr Ibn Umayyah, who thus described the new moon:

"The daughter of the clouds of night descends towards the horizon, (in shape) like the nail-cutting pared off a little finger."

317. ABŪ MUḤAMMAD IBN ṬABĀṬABĀ

Abū Muḥammad 'Abd Allāh Ibn Aḥmad Ibn 'Alī Ibn al-Ḥasan Ibn Ibrāhīm Ṭabāṭaba Ibn Isma'īl Ibn Ibrāhīm Ibn al-Ḥasan Ibn al-Ḥasan Ibn 'Alī Ibn Abī Ṭalīb, a native of Ḥijāz but an inhabitant of Egypt, in which country he died, was a sharīf noted for the purity of his life, the nobleness of his character, his vast possessions in lands and tenements, the brilliant style in which he lived, the number of his slaves, the greatness of his retinue, the ease which he enjoyed, and the comforts with which he was surrounded. There was always a man in the hall of his house occupied from morning till night in pounding almonds for sweetmeats; these his master sent as presents to different persons in the city, such as al-Kaḥr al-Khshīdī and others of inferior rank; the man himself received two pieces of gold every month for his pains. Those presents were taken to some daily, to others every Friday or every month; but to Kaḥr were brought every second day two vases filled with sweetmeats and a cake besides, all folded up in a handkerchief and carefully sealed. This raised the envy of a great man at court, who observed to Kaḥr that the sweetmeats were certainly good, but that the cake did not appear to him to be an offering suited to a person of his rank. On this, Kaḥr wrote to the sharīf, requesting him to forward the sweetmeats as usual, but to dispense him from accepting the cake. Ibn Ṭabāṭaba, perceiving from this that some envious person wished his ruin, immediately mounted his horse and rode off to Kaḥr; when they were together, he told him that he had not sent the cake through a feeling of pride or haughtiness, but that it was kneaded and baked by a young maiden of the family of Ḥasan<sup>2</sup>

<sup>1</sup> See above: "The light of the new moon had nearly betrayed us, when she appeared, thin as a paring of the nail."

<sup>2</sup> The autograph has حسنية. The girl was apparently the daughter of Ibn Ṭabāṭaba, who, as his genealogy shows, was descended from Ḥasan, grandson of Muḥammad.

and that it was she who offered it to him out of purely religious motives; however, if he wished, it should be discontinued. "By no means," replied Kafūr; "let it be brought to me as usual, and for the future I shall eat of no other." From that time, the cake and the sweetmeats continued to be sent regularly as before. After the death of Kafūr, Egypt was reduced under the domination of al-Mu'izz Abū Tamīm Ma'add al-'Ubaydī by his general Jawhar, him of whom we have spoken (in No. 141); and at a later period, al-Mu'izz came there himself from the province of Ifrīqiyah. His pretensions to be a descendant of 'Alī had been already contested, and on his approach to Old Cairo, the people of the city went forth to meet him, accompanied by a band of sharifs; and Ibn Ṭabaṭaba, who was one of the number, asked him from whom he drew his descent. To this question al-Mu'izz replied: "We shall hold a sitting to which all of you shall be convened, and there we shall expose to you the entire chain of our genealogy." Being at length established in the castle of Cairo, he gave a public audience as he had promised, and having taken his seat, he asked if any of their chiefs were still alive? "No," replied they, "not one of any consequence survives." He then drew his sword half way out of the scabbard and exclaimed: "This is my genealogy! and here," said he, scattering a great quantity of gold among them, "here are the proofs of my nobility!".

On this they all acknowledged him for their lord and master <sup>1</sup>, —Ibn Ṭabaṭaba treated the intendants of his domains with great attention and kindness; he went on horseback to visit them and his friends, giving them every mark of politeness and sitting with them for a considerable time before retiring. Great numbers owed their wealth to his generosity; indeed the whole tenour of his conduct was most praiseworthy. He was born A.H. 286 (A.C. 899), and he died at Cairo on the 4 of Rajab, A.H. 348 (September, A.C. 959)*. Funeral prayers were said over his body in the Muṣallā of the Festival<sup>2</sup> and an innumerable multitude were present at his interment. He was buried in the Qarafaḥ.

<sup>1</sup> See Ibn Khalikān's observation on this anecdote, towards the end of the article.

<sup>2</sup> See No. 269.

* 10 September.--Ed

and his tomb is in high repute for the fulfilment of prayers offered up at it: it is stated that a man made the pilgrimage to Makkah, but had forgot to visit the tomb of the blessed Prophet at Madīnah an omission for which he continued to feel the deepest regret: but he at length saw the Prophet in a dream, and was told by him that when he forgot to visit the tomb at Madīnah, he should visit that of 'Abd Allāh Ibn Aḥmad Ibn Ṭabaṭaba. Of all the holy men, it was he principally who appeared to the inhabitants of Cairo in their dreams.<sup>1</sup> It is also related that a person indebted to his kindness recited these verses at his tomb :

"Since thy death, the existence of mankind is troubled with care; but during thy life, they were secure from misfortune."

He then had a dream in which Ibn Ṭabaṭaba appeared to him and said: "I heard thy words, but my answer with the accomplishment of thy desires was intercepted before it reached thee; go, however, to a mosque<sup>2</sup> and make a prayer of two rak'ats; then ask, thy request shall be granted."—We have already explained the meaning of the word Ṭabāṭabā (in No. 52). The anecdote which we have just related, of Ibn Ṭabaṭaba's interview with al-Mu'izz on that prince's arrival in Egypt, is taken from the work called al-Duwal al-Munqaṭi'ah<sup>3</sup>, but it is in contradiction with dates; for al-Mu'izz entered Cairo in the month of Ramaḍān, A.H. 362 (June, A.C. 973), as we shall again mention in his life, and Ibn Ṭabaṭaba died A.H. 348, as has been already said; how then can we admit that a meeting took place between them? I learned the date of his death from our shaykh Zakī al-Dīn 'Abd al-'Azīm al-Mundhirī, whom I consulted also on this anachronism: he replied that the date of Ibn Ṭabaṭaba's death was perfectly certain, and that it was perhaps his son to whom this circumstance happened with al-Mu'izz; God knoweth best if this conjecture be right or not!<sup>4</sup> I have

<sup>1</sup> The opinion of the Muslims on the subject of dreams is stated in the first volume.

<sup>2</sup> The autograph has مسجد.

<sup>3</sup> See No. 68 note of Duwal al-Munqaṭi'ah

<sup>4</sup> I am convinced that this anecdote is totally false. Al-Mu'izz was too prudent to make any declaration of the kind, as it would not only have destroyed his own title and that of his descendants to the *Kh*alīfate, but have shaken the fidelity of his Barbar troops, who only served him from their conviction that he was really descended from the Prophet and the true heir to since found that the amīr al-Mukhtar al-Musabbihī gives, in his History of Egypt, the same date for Ibn Ṭabaṭaba's death as that which I received from Zakī al-Dīn. He adds also: "He died, after long sufferings, of (an excrescence like) a mulberry which obstructed his throat, and for which every remedy that they tried was useless. It was a strange and unheard of malady."—Since writing the foregoing observations, I read in Ibn Z laq's History of Egypt that the sharīfs who went to meet al-Mu'izz were Abū Ja'far Muslim Ibn 'Ubayd Allāh al-Ḥusaynī<sup>1</sup> and Abū Isma'il Ibrāhīm Ibn Aḥmad al-Ḥusaynī al-Rassī; it was perhaps one of them to whom the circumstance happened (with al-Mu'izz).

(Continued on next page.)

318. 'ABD ALLĀH IBN ṬĀHIR

Abū 'l-'Abbas 'Abd Allāh Ibn Ṭāhir Ibn al-Ḥusayn Ibn Muṣ'ab Ibn Ruzayq Ibn Mahan al-Khuza'i, a prince whose father's life we have given (No. 288), was gifted with superior abilities, a lofty soul, and great discernment. Al-Ma'mūn placed in him the highest confidence, and treated him with the utmost consideration, on account of his personal merit and the faithful services which his father and his ancestors had rendered to the 'Abbaside family. He was governor of Dinawar when Bābak al-Khurramī invaded Khurasan with his followers and entered al-Ḥamra, a town in the province of Naysāpur, where they committed great ravages. Al-Ma'mūn, on receiving intelligence of this event, wrote to 'Abd Allāh, ordering him to proceed to Khurasan; he set out on the 15 of the first Rabi', A.H. 213 (June, A.C. 828),* and waged war with the rebels. In the month of Rajab, A.H. 215 (Aug.-Sept. A.C. 830), he arrived at Naysāpur, which had suffered much that year from the total want of rain. His entry into the city was accompanied by a heavy shower, on which a cloth-merchant went out to him from his shop and recited these verses:

<sup>1</sup> See No. 130, note on Muslim.

* 3 June—Ed.

(Continued from page. 69)

his authority. I must also observe that, notwithstanding Hajjī Khalīfah's favourable opinion of the work, the Duwal al-Munqati'ah does not seem to be always a sure guide; some of the anecdotes extracted from it by Ibn Khallikan are totally unworthy of belief.

"We were afflicted with drought till thy arrival; but with thee abundance drew near. Two showers came at the same time; so let us welcome the amīr<sup>1</sup> and the rain."

Such is the statement set forth in al-Salām's History of Khurasan, but al-Ṭabarī says in his Annals: "'Abd Allāh the son of Ṭāhīr was at Dīnawar in the year 213, at the time of his brother Ṭalḥah's death." —We have spoken of Ṭalḥah in the life of his father Ṭāhīr (No 288).—"The qādī Yahyā Ibn Akṭham was then sent to him by al-Māmān with a message of condolence and with directions to felicitate him on his elevation to the government of Khurasan." —Farther on, however, when giving an account of Ṭalḥah's administration, he makes a different statement: "At the time of Ṭāhīr's death," says he, "'Abd Allāh was at Raqqah, combatting Naṣr Ibn Shabath<sup>2</sup> and al-Māmān conferred upon him the government of all the provinces held by his father, and granted him that of Syria besides. 'Abd Allāh then sent his brother Ṭalḥah to Khurasan." The same author says again, under the year 213: "Al-Māmān now appointed his brother al-Mu'tasim to the government of Syria and Egypt, and he nominated his own son al-'Abbas as ruler over Mesopotamia, the northern frontiers of that province and those of Syria (al-Thughūr wa'l-'Awāsim). He gave to each of them five hundred thousand dīnars, and to 'Abd Allāh Ibn Ṭāhir a similar sum. It is said that he never gave away as much money in a single day as he had done, in that <sup>1</sup>." —The poet Abū Tammām al-Ṭā'ī set out from 'Irāq with the design of paying his court to 'Abd Allāh, and, on reaching Qamīs after a long and fatiguing journey, he pronounced these verses:

<sup>1</sup> The comparison of a generous man to a shower is very common. Like the drops of rain which water a parched soil, his gifts spread abundance around.

<sup>2</sup> The revolt of Naṣr Ibn Shabath<sup>h</sup> is not noticed by Abu 'l-Fidā, although mentioned by Ibn al-Atṭīr in his Kāmil. This historian relates that in the year 198 (A.C. 813-4), Naṣr Ibn Shabath<sup>h</sup> al-'Aqīlī, who was then inhabiting Kaysūm كيسوم a place to the north of Aleppo, revolted against al-Māmūn. He was devotedly attached to al-Amīn and had taken the oath of allegiance to him wherefore, on that prince's death, his anger was excited, and declaring himself the vindicator of the Arabic race, whose rights the 'Abbasides had contemned by introducing foreigners into the service of the empire, he seized on all the neighbouring towns, and Sumays<sup>t</sup> among the rest. Being then joined by a great number of the desert Arabs and needy adventurers, he crossed the Euphrates with the intention of subduing Mesopotamia. In the year 199, he laid siege to Harrān and Ṭāhīr, who was sent against him, did not gain over him any signal advantage. He persevered in his revolt till A.H. 209, when he was besieged in Kaysūm by 'Abd Allāh Ibn Ṭāhīr, and forced to surrender. The conqueror levelled that place to the ground, and sent his prisoner to al-Māmān, who, it would appear, pardoned him. The author of the Khulṣat al-Akhbār and Ibn Khallikān place the defeat of Naṣr Ibn Shabath<sup>h</sup> at Raqqah, which however was the head-quarter of 'Abd Allāh. I must observe that in the Arabic edition of this work, I have printed the word Shabath<sup>h</sup> as here transcribed, although written otherwise in my MSS. My correction has been confirmed by the reading of the autograph and by the text of Ibn al-Atṭīr where the orthography of the name is given letter by letter.

"We arrived at Qamīs, worn away by our journey and the fatiguing pace of our camels, now no longer restive. My companions then said: 'Dost thou mean to lead us (to earth's farthest limits), to the place of sunrise?'—'No,' I replied; 'but to the point where the sun of generosity riseth over the world.'"

I may here observe, before going farther, that Abū Tammām has stolen the idea and the very words of these verses from a piece by Muslim Ibn al-Walīd al-Anṣārī <sup>2</sup> in which he says:

"My companions hastened forward on their journey and the horses lent heavily on the bit: 'Dost thou intend,' said they, 'to lead us to the place of sunset?'—'No,' I replied, 'but to the spot where liberality riseth over the world.'"

When Abū Tammām arrived at his journey's end, he waited on 'Abd Allāh and recited to him his splendid qaṣīdah rhyming in B, wherein he says:

"These riders, worn away with fatigue and thin as the points of spears, toiled through the darkness which invaded the earth; and the beasts that bore them were emaciated like them. They came on a business which it was theirs to commence, and another's to finish. <sup>3</sup>"

The following verse also is contained in the same magnificent qaṣīdah:

"But 'Abd Allāh struck <sup>4</sup> terror into the night, and, through dread of his vengeance, it ceased to assail us; the very scorpions <sup>5</sup> which crawl forth at night did not dare to stir."

<sup>1</sup> The avarice of al-Mānūn was proverbial.

<sup>2</sup> See No. 10, note on Muslim Ibn al-Walīd who died A.H. 208 (A.C. 823-4).

<sup>3</sup> They set out in hopes of obtaining money, and that depended on the will of the patron to whom they intended to apply.

<sup>4</sup> In the printed Arabic text read بث.

<sup>5</sup> In Arabic the word عقارب means both scorpions and secret foes.

It was in this journey that Abū Ṭammam composed the Ḥamāsah; for, on arriving at Hamadān, the winter had set in, and, as the cold is excessively severe in that country, the snow blocked up the road, and obliged him to stop and await the thaw. During his stay, he resided with one of the most eminent men of the place, who possessed a library in which were some collections of poems composed by the Arabs of the desert and other authors. Having then sufficient leisure, he perused those works and selected from them the passages out of which he formed his Ḥamāsah.—‘Abd Allāh was versed in the belles-lettres and possessed an elegant taste; he was also a good musician and composed the airs of a great number of songs, inserted as his in the Kitāb al-Aghāni; they are very beautiful and have been transmitted down unaltered by the persons who make music their profession. Some fine verses and charming letters of his are still preserved. One of his pieces is as follows:

“We are a people who yield to the force of large and brilliant eyes, and yet (armour of) iron yields to our (blows in war). Submissive to these gazelles, we are vanquished by their glances; we who with our spears vanquish lions. We subdue the beasts of chase, but are ourselves subdued by fair maidens with modest eyes and cheeks unprofaned by public gaze. The lions dread our anger, but we dread the anger of a fawn (like nymph), when she seems displeased. Behold us freemen in the day of battle, but in peace slaves to the fair.”

These verses have been attributed to Aṣṣam Ibn Ḥumayd, a person in whose honour al-Mutanabbī composed some of his poems but God best knows who was their author.—One of ‘Abd Allāh’s most remarkable pieces is the following:

“Forgive my fault and merit my deepest gratitude; the recompense of my thanks shall not be withheld from thee. Oblige me not to find an excuse for my conduct; I may perhaps be unsuccessful.”

One of his sayings was, that a well-filled purse and a glorious reputation are never found together <sup>1</sup>. A paper was one day put into his hands, in which it was represented to him that a number of persons went out of the city on a party of pleasure, and that they had taken with them a young boy. On reading the complaint, he wrote above it these words: "What mode of legal proceedings can be taken against young men who go out to amuse themselves, and satisfy their inclinations as far as lies in their power? And the boy may be a son to one of them or a relation of some of them!" 'Abd Allāh held for some time, but at different periods, the governments of Syria and of Egypt. When in the latter country, he was spoken of in these terms by a poet:

<sup>1</sup> The reason is clear: generous men never hoard up money.

"People say that Egypt is a distant land, but for me it is not distant since the son of Ṭāhir is there. Farther from us than Egypt are some men that you see here present, but whose favours you never see. They are dead to every virtue, and a visit to them in hopes of a generous gift is as a visit made to those whose dwelling is the tomb."

These verses are also attributed, but I do not know on what grounds, to 'Awf Ibn Muḥallim al-Shaybānī?<sup>2</sup> 'Abd Allāh entered Old Cairo A.H. 211 (A.C. 826), but left it towards the end of the same year, and in the month of Dhū'l-Qa'dah he arrived at Baghdad. During his absence, he confided the government of the province to his lieutenants. In A.H. 213, he was replaced by Abū Ishāq the son of Ḥarūn al-Rashīd, who was afterwards khalīf under <sup>1</sup> I suspect that in the original Arabic, this note bears throughout a double meaning. The more obvious is that given here; the other is of such a nature as cannot be even alluded to.

<sup>2</sup> The autograph has the word 'Awf Ibn inserted before al-Muḥallim. This is probably the same poet whose death Ibn Shākir places in the year 220, and of whom he gives rather a long notice. According to him, Abū'l-Manḥāl 'Awf Ibn Muḥallim (I read محلّم not مكلم), al-Khuzā'i was one of the learned men of that age, and equally remarkable for his convivial talents and his wit. He became the inseparable companion of Ṭāhir Ibn al-Uṣayn and enjoyed his favour to such a degree, that even in travelling, he rode behind him on the same camel or was borne in the same litter عريال. His first acquaintance with that amir was formed by accident: He saw him in a pleasure-barge on the Tigris and addressed him in the lines already mentioned by Ibn Khallikān, No. 286 and which begin thus: I wonder how the bark, etc. It may be observed that the latter writer attributes them to another poet.* Ṭāhir then made him get into the boat, and from that moment the patron and the poet were inseparable. 'Awf frequently asked the leave of absence, from Ṭāhir that he might go and see his own family, but his master was so much attached to him, that the permission was constantly refused. When Ṭāhir died, 'Awf naturally hoped that he might then visit the relations whom he had not seen for so long a time, but 'Abd Allāh the son of Ṭāhir conceived for him the same fondness as his father had done, and would not allow him to depart. He thenceforward treated the poet with great kindness and raised him to opulence by the abundance of his gifts. 'Awf having at length obtained the long-desired permission, set out to see his family, but died on the way.—(Uṣūn al-Tawārikh, vol. VIII, fol. 10. (Other anecdotes respecting him are to be found in the next pages of that work.)

* Ibn allikān K1 attributes these lines to Muqaddis Ibn Ṣayfī al-Khalīlī.—Ed.

the title of al-M'utaṣim. Al-Farǧhānī says in his History that 'Abd Allāh Ibn Ṭāhir succeeded in the government of Egypt to 'Ubayd Allāh Ibn al-Sarī Ibn al-Ḥakam.<sup>1</sup> the latter left the country in the month of Ṣafar, A.H. 211,* and 'Abd Allāh on the 25th of Rajab, 212, † when he proceeded to 'Iraq, after leaving the government of the country to his lieutenants; they remained in authority till the appointment of al-Mu'taṣim. The wazīr Abu 'I-Qasim al-Maghribī<sup>3</sup> says in his Adab al-Khawāṣṣ that the 'Abdalawī (or Abdallian) melon which grows in Egypt was so called after 'Abd Allāh Ibn Ṭāhir. This species of melon is not found in any other country, and it was perhaps named after him because he was fond of it or was the first who cultivated it there. 'Abd Allāh and his family belonged to the tribe of Khuza'ah by right of adoption; their grandfather Ruzayq having been a mawlā to Abū Muḥammad Ṭalḥah Ibn 'Abd Allāh<sup>4</sup> Ibn Khalaf al-Khuza'i, who is generally known by the name of Ṭalḥat al-Ṭalḥat. Ṭalḥah acted as governor of Sijistān, under the orders of Abū Ḥarbū Muslim Ibn Ziyad Ibn Abīh, the

---

<sup>1</sup> In the month of Shā'bān, A.H. 206 (A.C. 822), 'Ubayd Allāh Ibn-Sarī was proclaimed governor of Egypt by the troops, on the death of his brother Muḥammad. By the double right then conferred upon him of presiding at public prayers and on administering the revenues of the state, he possessed the greatest privileges which provincial governor could obtain. But his ambition was not satisfied, and some time afterwards he revolted against his sovereign al-Māmūn. 'Abd Allāh Ibn Ṭāhir was immediately recalled from Khurāsān and sent with an army against the rebel. After an obstinate conflict outside the walls of Cairo, 'Ubayd Allāh was forced to take refuge in the citadel and propose terms of surrender. He sent also to Ibn Ṭāhir a present of one thousand male and one thousand female slaves; each of the latter bearing a silken purse in which was contained one thousand pieces of gold. The argument was irresistible, and 'Ubayd Allāh obtained an honourable capitulation. He had been in the exercise of power four years seven months and eight days.—(Abu 'I-Maḥāsīn's Nuḡm.)

<sup>2</sup> His life is given in No. 187.

<sup>3</sup> In no. 213 of the preceding volume I have written this name 'Ubayd Allāh, although it is printed 'Abd Allāh in the text. The same manuscript which induced me to think that the reading of the text was erroneous, lead me to write 'Ubayd Allāh in the Arabic text corresponding to the present passage: but 'Abd Allāh is the true reading in both places, not 'Ubayd Allāh.

* May - June, A.C. 826—Ed.

† 20 October, A.C. 827 —Ed.

governor of Khurasan. He died there whilst 'Abd Allāh Ibn al-Zubayr was in revolt against the khaliḥ. The poet 'Ubayd Allāh Ibn Qays al-Ruqyyat<sup>1</sup> said on this subject:

"May the mercy of God be shown to the bones which were interred in Sijistān—to Ṭalḥat al-Ṭalḥat."

Ṭalḥat al-Ṭalḥat was so called because his mother's name was Ṭalḥah daughter of Abū Ṭalḥah; This observation is furnished by Abū 'l-Ḥusayn 'Alī Ibn Aḥmad al-Salāmi in his history of the governors of Khurasan<sup>2</sup> —Qumas or Qumis, the country of which Abū Tammām speaks in the verses given above, is situated in Persian 'Iraq; its limit on the Khurasan side extends to Baṣām, and on the 'Iraq side to Simnān, and includes both of these cities.*—'Abd Allāh died at Marw in the month of first Rabi', A.H. 228 or 230 (Nov-Dec. A.C. 844), which is more exact. (Al-Ṭabarī says that he died at Naysāpur on Monday, the 11th of the first Rabi', 230,† seven days after the death of Aḥnas al-Turkī.) He lived to the same age as his father, namely forty-eight years. We shall give the life of his son 'Ubayd Allāh.

319. ABU 'L-'AMAYTHAL

The kātib Abū 'l-'Amaythal 'Abd Allāh Ibn Khulayd was a mawla to Ja'far Ibn Sulaymān Ibn 'Alī Ibn 'Abd Allāh

<sup>1</sup> 'Ubayd Allāh Ibn Qays Ibn Shurayḥ Ibn Malik Ibn Rabi'ah al-Āmirī, a native of Hijāz and a celebrated poet, composed verses in honour of Muṣ'ab Ibn al-Zubayr and 'Abd al-Malik Ibn Marwan. He was surnamed al-Ruqyyat, because he sung in some of his pieces the charm of three females, each of whom bore the name of Ruqyyah—(See Suyūṭī's Sharḥ Shawāhid al-Mughni, MSS No. 1238, fol. 33.).

<sup>2</sup> We read however as follows in Ibn Shākir's Uṣūl al-Tawārikh, vol. III, fol. 4: "A.H. 80 (A.C. 699-700). In this year died Ṭalḥah Ibn 'Abd Allāh Ibn Khālaf, one of the persons renowned for their generosity, and the most liberal man of all the inhabitants of Baṣrah. Al-Aḡma'i says: "Those noted for their beneficence were Ṭalḥah Ibn 'Ubayd Allāh al-Famīmī, surnamed al-Kharī (the good); Ṭalḥah Ibn 'Awar Ibn 'Abd Allāh, Ibn Māmūr, surnamed al-Jad (liberality); Ṭalḥah Ibn 'Abd Allāh Ibn 'Awā Ibn Akḥī 'Abd al-Rahmān Ibn 'Awf, surnamed al-Nid (abundant gifts), Ṭalḥah Ibn al-Ḥasan Ibn 'Alī, surnamed al-Fayyāḥ (overflowing with generosity), and Ṭalḥah Ibn 'Abd Allāh Ibn Khālaf, surnamed Ṭalḥat al-Ṭalḥat (the T ḥah of the Ṭalḥas), who in generosity, surpassed them all."

* The autograph adds "And the capital of Qumis is Damighān.

† 24 November 844; but according to Mahler's calculation it was 9 Rabi', however, in the year 228. Monday fell on 11 Rabi' al-Awwal which corresponded to 18 December, A.C. 842.—Ed.

Ibn al-'Abbās Ibn 'Abd al-Muṭṭalib, and came, it is said, of a family which inhabited Ray (in Persian 'Irāq). In his style he affected pompous expressions and the use of uncommon terms.<sup>1</sup> He was employed as a secretary by Ṭahir (Ibn al-Ḥusayn al-Khuzā'i), and was afterwards attached in the same capacity, and in that of a poet, to the service of 'Abd Allāh, Ṭahir's son. The pure Arabic language was well known to him and he made frequent use of the idioms peculiar to it. In the art of poetry he displayed considerable abilities, and the following lines on 'Abd Allāh Ibn Ṭahir are of his composing:

"O you who desire to possess qualities such as those of 'Abd Allāh, be silent and listen ! I swear by Him to whose temple the pilgrims resort, that I shall give you a sincere advice; hearken then, or renounce your project: Be true, be modest, be charitable; endure with patience and indulgence; pardon, oblige; be mild, be gentle and be brave; act with kindness and lenity, with longanimity, courtesy, and forbearance; be firm and resolute; protect the feeble, maintain the right and repel injustice. Such is my counsel, if you choose to accept it, and are disposed to follow a straight and open way."

This is really a piece of extraordinary beauty, and he composed some others, equally fine. It is related that he one day went to the palace of 'Abd Allāh Ibn Ṭahir, but was refused admittance, on which he said:

"Never shall I return to this door whilst admittance is so difficult as I find it now; I shall wait till access be more easy. And on the day in which I did not find a means to enter, I at least found means of not favouring the master with my presence."

These verses were repeated to 'Abd Allāh, who blamed the door-keeper's conduct, and gave orders that the poet should be admitted. Abū 'l-'Amaythāl observed that the word nu'mān was one of the terms used to designate blood, and that the flowers called shaqā'iq al-Nu'mān, or Nu'mān poppies<sup>2</sup>, had received this name on account of their red colour, the opinion that they were so called after al-Nu'mān Ibn al-Mundhīr being totally unfounded. "I made this observation," continued he, "to al-Aṣmā'i, who repeated it, adding: 'Such are the words of Abū 'l-'Amaythāl'." This opinion however is in contradiction with that held by all eminent philologists; thus Ibn Qutaybah says, in his Kitāb al-Ma'ārif: "Al-Nu'mān Ibn al-Mundhīr"—the last Lakhmīde king of Hīrah—"went out of Kūfah into the open country at a time in which it was all yellow, red, and green, from the quantity of herbage and flowers, among which were poppies in great abundance. On seeing, he declared that their beauty pleased him and that he forbade them to be gathered. This prohibition none dared to transgress, and they were therefore called al-Nu'mān's poppies." Al-Jawharī also mentions in his Ṣaḥāḥ that they were so denominated after this al-Nu'mān, and other writers have made a similar statement: which opinion may be right, God best knows! It is related that when Abū Tammām recited to 'Abd Allāh Ibn Ṭāhir his poem rhyming in B, of which we have spoken in his life <sup>1</sup>, Abū 'l-'Amaythāl, who was present, said to him: "Abū Tammām! why do you not say something which may be understood?" To this the other retorted: "Abū 'l-'Amaythāl! why do you not understand what people say?"—Abū 'l-'Amaythāl one day kissed the hand of 'Abd Allāh Ibn Ṭāhir, and as the prince complained of the roughness of his moustachioes, he immediately observed that the spines of the hedgehog could not hurt the wrist of the lion. 'Abd Allāh was so highly pleased with this compliment, that he ordered a valuable present to be given to the poet.—The following works, amongst others, were composed by Abū 'l-'Amaythāl: a treatise on the terms which bear different meanings; a work entitled Kitāb al-Tashābuh <sup>2</sup> (mutual resemblance); a notice on those from which it would appear that its petals were red or vermillion-coloured, and its stamens black or brown. According to the author of the Qāmūs, these flowers were called shaq'i'iq, because their colour was red, like that of the lightning-flash: he gives also the same reason as Ibn Qutaybah for the origin of the name shaq'i'iq al-Nu'mān. It cannot, however, escape observation that a great resemblance subsists between the word al-Nu'mān and the old Greek name of anemone, from which it may be inferred that the former is a mere alteration from the latter.

<sup>1</sup> In the Arabic text, read عجبه.

<sup>2</sup> The Shaq'iq al-Nu'mān, here translated al-Numan's poppies, is considered by Ibn Bayṭhār as the same plant which Dioscorides describes under the name of the anemone. This writer notices two species of it, the wild and the cultivated, and a genus called by him argemone, resembling the wild poppy. The flower of this plant has furnished the Arabian poets with a great number of comparisons.
(Continued on page 76).

<sup>1</sup> See No. 143, the lines which begin thus: "At the sight of dwellings," etc.

<sup>2</sup> Such is the orthography of Hājjī Khalifah and of Ibn Khalikān himself; all the latter manuscripts of his work are wrong here.

(Continued from page 77)

verses which are current and well known, and a treatise on the ideas usually expressed in poetry. He died A.H. 240 (A.C. 854-5)—The word 'Amaythal' serves to designate a number of things, and, amongst the rest, the lion: that such is its meaning in the present case is perfectly evident.

320. ABU 'L-'ABBĀS AL-NĀSHĪ IBN SHIRSHĪR

Abā 'l-'Abbāss 'Abd Allāh Ibn Muḥammad al-Nāshī al-Anbārī generally known by the name of Ibn Shirshīr, was a poet of great talent and a contemporary of Ibn al-Rāmī and al-Buḥturī. It is he who is denominated al-Nāshī 'l-Akbar (the elder Nāshī), to distinguish him from al-Nāshī al-Aṣghar, or the younger, whose life is to be found in this work. He was also a grammarian, a prosodist, and a scholastic theologian. The city of Anbār was the native place of his family, but he himself resided during a long period at Harḥadā, and then proceeded to Old Cairo where he passed the remainder of his life. He was deeply versed in a number of sciences, and his skill as a logician was so great, that he could overturn any proofs alleged by grammarians in favour of their doctrines. His penetration and sagacity enabled him also to bring into doubt the established principles of prosody, and to lay down forms of versification entirely different from those admitted by al-Khalīl Ibn Aḥmad. He wrote a qaṣīdah of four thousand verses, all terminating in the same rhyme, and in this poem he treated of various sciences. A number of line works were written by him, and he composed a great quantity of verses on the animals used for hunting, on the different sorts of game, on the implements and every other subject connected with the chase. In these poems he displayed knowledge worthy of a professional sportsman, and many passages are quoted from them by Kuṣḥājīm, in his work called al-Maṣā'id wa 'l-Maṭārid. Some of his poems are qaṣīdahs and some, ṭardiyās or hunting-pieces, in the style of those made by Abū Nuwās; the rest are detached passages, but in all of them his talent is equally conspicuous. One of his ṭardiyās, containing the description of a falcon, run as follows:

"When the veil of darkness was rent off the face of the heavens, and the light of the morning rejoiced in shedding its brightness, I went forth on the track of the game, with a cream-coloured (bird), from its birth, of singular beauty. It was clothed by the Creator in raiment of the softest issue, and when it darted forward or circled around, the eye could not follow its motions. From its cheeks to its eyes extends an ornament which serves it as diadem.<sup>1</sup> Its active spirit is denoted by its beak, and by its claws is shown the art wherein lies its skill. Were a traveller journeying in darkness, the eye of that animal might serve him as a taper to light him on his way."

In describing a singing girl of great beauty, he expresses himself in the following terms :

"O thou for whose welfare I should sacrifice my life! (The spies who surround me) do not appreciate thy charms, or else they had not allowed me to fix my eyes on thine. They forbid me to look on any other females: did they think it possible that the eyes of men could be turned towards any but thee? They placed thee to watch my conduct; whom then have they placed as a watch over thine? Fools that they were! did they read in thy cheeks the written revelation of thy beauty?"

His poetical works are very numerous, but we shall confine ourselves to the foregoing extracts. He died at Old Cairo, A.H. 293 (A.C. 905-6). Nāshī was a surname given to him.<sup>2</sup>—Anbārī means belonging to al-Anbār, which is a town on the Euphrates, ten parasangs (to the west) of Baḡhdād; it has produced a number of learned men. Anbār is the plural of nibr, and signifies magazines of provisions; this place was so called because the ancient kings of Persia used to keep provisions stored in it (for the use of their troops.)

321. IBN ṢĀRAH AL-SHANTARĪNĪ

Abū Muḥammad 'Abd Allāh Ibn Muḥammad Ibn Ṣārah al-Shantarīnī, a native of Spain and a member of the tribe of Bakr, <sup>1</sup> He must mean the dusky bars which mark the plumage of the gyrfalcon, or else its hood.

<sup>2</sup> The word Nāshī has a number of meanings; it is therefore not easy to determine what is the signification it bears here.

was celebrated as a poet, but he possessed also superior abilities as a prose-writer. Notwithstanding his talents, his lot through life was little else than adversity and disappointment; he lived without finding a place of abode to suit him or a prince to protect him. He is noticed by (Ibn Khāqān) the author of the Qalā'id al-Iqyān, and is praised by Ibn Bassām in the Dha'irah. This writer says: "After endeavouring to obtain<sup>1</sup> even the meanest employments and undergoing great sufferings, he rose at length to fill the place of secretary to a provincial governor but at the period in which (Yūsuf Ibn Tāshfin) dispossessed the Spanish sovereigns of their dominions, he retired to Seville in a state more dismal than night itself and more solitary than the star Canopus.<sup>2</sup> He then supported his existence by binding books, an art with which he was well acquainted and in which he displayed great skill. This profession he followed, although it had then greatly fallen off and was almost totally neglected. To this he alludes in the following lines:

"The trade of a book binder is the worst of all: its leaves and its fruits are nought but disappointment. I may compare him that follows it to a needle, which clothes others, but is naked itself."<sup>3</sup>

These verses also are by the same poet:

"That maid with the flowing ringlets is encircled by a host of tender charms, and for her a tender passion fills our hearts. It is not dark curls which shade her cheeks, but rather a tint cast upon them by the black pupils of her eyes."

He said also of a girl with blue eyes:

"I see, within the circle of necklaces which adorn that slender-waisted nymph, a moon (handsome face) which receives its lustre from the gems of beauty. She is formed like a lance that she may pierce us to the heart, and on this lance gleams a point of blue (steel).

A similar thought is thus expressed by al-Salamī:

"In embracing her waist, I have clasped a plain spear; and you will recognise its deadly point in the glances of her eyes."

<sup>1</sup> The true reading is عزى.

<sup>2</sup> The Arabs consider Canopus as the brightest of the fixed stars; it has consequently no fellow or companion. Ibn Bassām is here led away, as usual, by the temptation of a mere quibble.

<sup>3</sup> These verses fix the meaning in which the word wirṭqah إبريق must be taken here. It signifies also the profession of a stationer and that of a copyist of books.

It was from this verse that Ibn al-Nabīh al-Miṣrī<sup>1</sup> borrowed the idea which he has thus expressed.

"The complexion of this brunette is like the colour of the lance<sup>2</sup>, and her eyes might be taken for its point, were they not painted with antimony."

The following verses of Ibn Ṣarah's inculcate the renunciation of the world and its pleasures:

"O thou who hearkenest to the call of the cupbearer though warned of thy approaching end by gray hairs and age! If thou wilt not listen to my admonitions, why hast thou hearing to receive men's words, and memory to retain them? He alone is blind and deaf who followeth not the lessons offered by the present and the past. Time shall not endure for ever, nor the world, nor the lofty spheres, nor the two great lights, the sun and the moon. The inhabitants of the world, both those who dwell in tents and those who live in towns, must leave it, though unwilling."

It was he who composed these verses:

"I have for a companion one who, like an inward disorder, cannot be shaken off, and who loves me as the wolf does the shepherd. He extols me—may God requite him for his good intentions!—with praise such as Hind bestowed upon Rawḥ Ibn Zinbā'."

This Hind was daughter to al-Nu'mān Ibn Baṣḥir al-Anṣārī, and wife to Rawḥ Ibn Zinbā' al-Judhāmī<sup>3</sup> the favourite officer of the khalif 'Abd al-Malik Ibn Marwān. She detested her husband and made on him these lines:

"Hind, a filly of pure Arabian breed and sprung from noble steeds, has she not been covered by an ass? If she bear a foal of

---

<sup>1</sup> 'Alī Ibn Muḥammad Ibn al-Nabīh, one of the most eminent poets of his time in Egypt, died A.H. 621 (A.C. 1224).—(Al-Suyūṭī's Ḥusn al-Muḥaddirah, MS. No. 652, fol. 150 verse).

<sup>2</sup> Lances were generally made of a species of bamboo.

<sup>3</sup> Abū Zara'ah Rawḥ (or Rūḥ) Ibn Zinbā', the head of the tribe of Judhām, was possessed of such great influence, that the khalif Mu'awiyah resolved on putting him to death, but was induced at length to change his mind. When 'Abd al-Malik Ibn Marwān came to the throne, Rawḥ received the government of Palestine and became the intimate and inseparable companion of his master. In the service of 'Abd al-Malik he filled all the duties of a Wazīr and proved himself not only prudent and intelligent, but also learned and religious. He died A.H. 84 (A.C. 703).—(Nujūm, Al-Yāfi'i).

good points, she had a right to do so; but if it be only a half-blood (Iqrāf), wonder not: it had a worthless sire".*

These verses are attributed also to her sister Ḥumaydah, the daughter of al-Nu'mān. The word iqrāf indicates that the dam was of Arabian breed and that the sire was not; another word, hujnat, is employed to mark that the sire was of Arabian blood and that the dam was not.—Ibn Ṣarah composed a great number of poetical pieces, most of them very good, and they have been collected into a volume. He died A.H. 517 (A.C. 1123) at Almeria in Spain, a city already mentioned (no. 18 and 67).—Ṣarāh, his grandfather's name, is written either with sin or a ṣād (a hard or a soft s). Ṣhantarīnī means belonging to Ṣhantar n (Santarem), a town in the Spanish peninsula.

322. IBN AL-SĪD AL-BAṬALYAWSĪ

Abū Muḥammad 'Abd Al'ah Ibn Muḥammad Ibn al-Sīd al-Baṭalyawsī was an able grammarian, eminent also in philology and general literature, of which sciences he possessed a profound and exact knowledge. He inhabited the city of Valencia, where his lessons drew crowds of pupils, anxious to study under his tuition and to profit by his learned observations. His mode of instructing and the talent with which he rendered the most difficult points intelligible to his auditors were very superior, and the passages which he cited from memory illustrative of the pure Arabic language were not only copious, but correct. He composed a number of instructive works, such as al-Muḥallath<sup>1</sup> in two volumes, containing many novel observations and denoting vast erudition in the author. This can be better appreciated when we mention that the (celebrated) treatise of Quṭrub, which bears the same title, fills only one quire (or about twenty pages), and yet it gives as current certain examples which were only poetical licenses, and contains besides some words which do not exist, and others to which a wrong signification is attributed. He wrote also the Iqtīḍāb (extemporizing), a work designed as a commentary on the Adab al-Kātib, and of which we have already spoken in the life of Ibn Qutaybah (No. 306). He drew up also a commentary on Abu 'l-Alā's work, the Siqṭ al-Zand in which he fully develops the thoughts and allusions contained in the text of that poet; it is even superior to the treatise on the same subject composed by Abu 'l-Alā himself and entitled Ḍaw al-Siqṭ. In a treatise on (the right use of) the letters ط, ض, ص, and د; (in the orthography of words), he has assembled a great quantity of curious observations. He composed also the Ḥulul (elucidations)<sup>1</sup>, which is a commentary on the verses cited as examples in (al-Zajjāji's grammatical compendium) the Jumal; the mistakes committed in the same work were pointed out by him in a treatise entitled al-Khalal (the faults)<sup>2</sup>. His Tanbīh, or indication, is a treatise on the causes of the dissensions which have prevailed among the (Muslim) people. He composed also a commentary on the (imām Mālik's) Muwattā, and another, as I have been informed, on the Diwān of al-Mutanabbī's poems. This last work I have never seen, and it is even said that no copies of it ever reached the East. We may conclude this list by observing that every subject which he undertook was treated in the most masterly manner. He composed also some good poetry, from which we may quote the following passages:

<sup>1</sup> The works called by the generic title of Muḥallath, or Ternary, treat of those words which bear three different significations accordingly as the first syllable is pronounced with an a, an i, or an u.

* M. de Slane has omitted to translate. [And it is related فمن قبل النحل so it is from the side of the male and thus it will be iqwā اقواء [i.e. the final vowel will be changed which is a defect.]—Ed.

"The man of learning lives after his death, though his bones be buried and crumbling into dust. But the ignorant man is dead, though he yet walks upon the earth; he is thought to be of the living, but he is not."

On the length of a night (passed in suffering):

"Behold! the dark locks of our nights are turned hoary with age. She has become gray like myself; or rather, a meadow, white with flowers, is spread over the heavens. The seven nights of the week seem to have come together in the sky without a day's interval between them."

<sup>1</sup> The word حلل is the plural of حال and signifies travellers who halt after their journey and untie the cords which hold their baggage on the camels. It must therefore mean here: Observations which untie or unravel knotty difficulties.

<sup>2</sup> In the Arabic text, this title is incorrectly printed الحلل.

From the beginning of a qaṣīdah in praise of al-Musta'in Ibn Hūd<sup>1</sup>:

"My patience under affliction was borne away from me by the people of that tribe, when they set out with moons encircled with necklaces and which rose from over a willow branch<sup>2</sup>. They have left me here, in the valley amongst the sands of the desert, but wherever they go, my heart journeys with their caravan. May the spot where I last saw them on the border of the valley be watered with grateful showers, copious, but yet nearly equalled by the torrent of my tears. O my friends! will those days ever return? Till the end of time can I ever receive consolation for your absence? My eyes are bathed in tears; and in my bosom is a heart always yearning to meet you. Fortune was cruel to me after your departure, and misfortunes of every kind have alighted at my dwelling."

In the eulogistic part of the poem he says:

"We saddled the camels of eulogium and abandoned that spot; its fountain was not like that of Ṣuddā, neither did it produce the sa'dān<sup>3</sup>. And we went to a prince on whom Joseph had bestowed his beauty, and whose lofty palace had been reared by Solomon<sup>4</sup>; one of those high-minded men whose hands are torrents (of generosity) and whose minds are all fire."

This qaṣīdah is of great length, but we shall confine our citations to those just given. Ibn al-S. was born at Baṭalyaws (Badajoz), A.H. 444 (A.C. 1052-3); he died at Valencia on the 15 of Rajab, in the year 521 (July. A.C. 1127).*—Sīd is one of the names by

<sup>1</sup> Abū Ayūb Sulaymān Ibn Muhammad Ibn Hūd, surnamed al-Musta'in. bi Allāh came to the throne of Saragossa A.H. 431 (A.C. 1039). He died A.H. 438 (A.C. 1046-7), after a reign of seven or eight years.

<sup>2</sup> The moons are the faces of fair maidens, and the willow branch is the pliant waist over which the poet supposes each of these moons to culminate.

<sup>3</sup> Ṣuddā is the name of a well, the water of which was celebrated for its purity. Sa'dān is the name of a plant which furnishes excellent food for camels. —See Freytag's Maydānī, tom. II., pp. 617, 620, and De Sacy's Hariri, p. 39.

<sup>4</sup> The poet means Ibn Hūd himself, whose name was Sulaymān (Solomon) but he plays upon the word and makes an allusion to the edifices raised by the ruler of the Jews.

* 27 July—Ed.

which the wolf is known, but it is also used as the proper name of a man.—Baṭalyawsi means belonging to Batalyaws (or Badajos); this city and Valencia are situated in the Spanish peninsula and have produced a number of learned men.

323. IBN NĀQIYĀ

Abu 'l-Qasim 'Abd Allāh (some say 'Abd al-Baqī) Ibn Muḥammad Ibn al-Ḥusayn Ibn Dawūd Ibn Naqiya, was a native of al-Ḥarīm al-Zahiri, a quarter in the city of Baghdad. His talents as a poet and philologist, his acquaintance with the belles-lettres, and his abilities as a writer of epistles obtained for him a high reputation. He composed some works remarkable not only for their beauty, but for the instruction which they conveyed; such were his Mulaḥ al-Mumāl:ḥah (elegancies of polished intercourse), and the Kitāb al-Jumān (book of pearls), in which he treats of the similes employed in the Qur'an. He is also the author of a well-known collection of maqāmahs, in which he displays a great command of pure Arabic. Besides these works, he made an abridgement in one volume of the Kitāb al-Aghāni, and a commentary on the Faṣiḥ<sup>1</sup>. His poetry forms a large book, and his epistles have also been collected into a separate volume. The kātib 'Imād al-Dīn al-Iṣpahanī mentions him with commendation in the Kharidah and after giving a sketch of his life, he cites the two following verses addressed by him to a certain amīr who had got himself bled:

"May He who possesses all perfections grant to you, from thy blood-letting, recovery and health. Say now to thy right hand: 'May thy bounties never cease! Pour forth thy showers, for thou art a cloud (of beneficence) overshadowing the world' "

These verses are certainly very well turned.—In another of his pieces he says:

"Since your departure, my dearest friends! I have never been familiar with the sweets of life, and sorrowful remembrance has never forsaken my bosom. The taste of sleep I have not enjoyed, neither have my eyes perceived an object grateful to their sight. My fingers have never since wantoned with the wine-cup when the bearer passed it round, neither have they touched the strings of the dulcimer."

<sup>1</sup> This work is attributed to the philologist Abu 'l-Abbās Tha'lab; see No. 42.

Ibn Nāqiya bore the reputation of an atheist and a follower of the doctrines held by the ancient (Greek philosophers); he even composed a treatise on the subject, and he was noted also for his disorderly life. It is related on good authority that, when he died, the person who washed his body previously to its interment perceived that his left hand was closely shut, and having opened it with some difficulty, he found in it a writing, the words of which were intricately combined one with another. After some time he succeeded in reading the contents, which were these :

"I am gone to seek hospitality from one who never disappoints the expectations of His guest; and I hope for salvation from the pains of hell. Though in dread of God, I confide in His bounty; for God is generous and bountiful."

This poet was born on the 15 of Dhu 'l-Qa'dah A.H. 410 (March. A.C. 1020)*, and he died on the eve of Sunday, the 4 of Mularram, A.H. 485 A.C. 1092† (Feb.) at Baghdad. He was interred at the Damascus Gate (Bāb al-Shām).—We have already given, in the life of Abū Isḥāq al-Shīrāzī (No. 5) a fragment of an elegy composed by Ibn Nāqiya.

324. ABU 'L-BAQA AL-'UKBARĪ

Abu 'l-Baqa 'Abd Allāh Ibn Abi 'Abd Allah al-Ḥusayn Ibn Abi 'l-Baqa 'Abd Allāh Ibn al-Ḥusayn al-'Ukbarī, surnamed Muḥabb al-Dīn (beloved for his religion), was a jurisconsult of the Ḥanbalite sect, a skilful arithmetician, a calculator of inheritance shares and a grammarian. Baghdad was the place of his birth and residence, but his family belonged to 'Ukbarah. This doctor was totally deprived of sight. He learned grammar at Baghdad from Abū Muḥammad Ibn al-Khashshab (see the next article) and other teachers of that time and was instructed in the Traditions by Abu 'l-Faḥ Muḥammad * [Ibn 'Abd al-Bāqī Ibn Aḥmad surnamed] Ibn al-Baṭṭī<sup>1</sup>, Abū Zur'ah Ṭahir Ibn Muḥammad Ibn Ṭahir al-Maqdisī, and some others. In the last period of his life he was without a rival in the various sciences which he professed; but his attention was chiefly engrossed by grammar, and on that subject he composed some instructive works. He made a commentary on Abū Alī al-Fārisī's treatise, the 'Idāh, and another on the poems of al-Mutanabbī; to which must be added a grammatical analysis of the text of the Qur'ān in two volumes, a small volume containing a grammatical analysis of the Traditions, a commentary on Ibn Jinnī's work the Lum'a, the Kitāb al-Lubāb (essence), treating of the examples given in proof of the rules of grammar, a grammatical analysis of the verses contained in the Ḥamasah, a full commentary on al-Zamakhsharī's Mufaṣṣal, a commentary on the Khuṭbahs of Ibn Nubatah<sup>2</sup>, and another on al-Ḥarīrī's Maqāmahs. He composed also some original treatises on grammar and arithmetic. Numerous pupils studied under him with great profit to themselves, and his reputation extended, even in his life-time, to distant countries. His birth took place A.H. 538 (A.C. 1143-4); he died at Baghḍād on the eve of Sunday, the 8 of the latter Rabi', A.H. 616 (June, A.C. 1219)† and was interred in the cemetery outside the Gate of Ḥarb.—'Ukbari means belonging to 'Ukbarā, which is a village on the Tigris, ten parasangs higher up than Baghḍād. This spot has produced a number of men remarkable for learning or for other acquirements.

* 13 March—Ed.

† 15 February—Ed.

‡ [The said Abu 'l-Baqā has narrated in the commentary of the al-Maqāmah where he mentions al-'anqa (a fabulous bird) that there is a mountain known as Damkh دَمَخ in the land of the

<sup>1</sup> Abū Faḥ Muḥammad Ibn 'Abd al-Bāqī Ibn al-Baṭṭī, the hijab, was the chief traditionist of 'Irāq in that age. He died A.H. 564 (A.C. 1169), aged eighty-seven years.—(Nujūm).

<sup>2</sup> I have given the text and translations of one of these Khuṭbahs in the Journal Asiatique for January, 1840.

* [ ] Omitted by de Slane—Ed.

† 23 June.—Ed.

‡ [ ] M. de Slane has omitted this portion. It is included in the autograph and has been included in later edition—Ed.

al-Rass*, which is about a mile high. In it there were numerous birds one of which was a-l'anqā, large in body, having a long neck, and a human face. It has some resemblance with every living being. It is a very beautiful bird and visits once a year this mountain and picks up a bird. In certain years it becomes very hungry and it wants to prey, so it swoops down on a child and carries it away. It was named 'anqā muḡhrib (strange 'anqā) because of its coming from distant land. Once it carried away a maid. Thereupon the Russ complained before their Prophet, Ḥanẓalah Ibn Ṣafwān who cursed it and a flash of lightning burnt it.

I add that this Ḥanẓalah Ibn Ṣafwān was the Prophet of the Russ and lived in the period between Jesus and the Prophet Muḥammad. Then I noticed in the history of Aḥmad Ibn 'Abd Allāh Ibn Aḥmad al-Farghānī, who had sojourned in Egypt, that al-'Azīz Nizār Ibn al-Mu'izz, the ruler of Egypt, had collected a large number of strange animals which none else had collected; and among them there was al-'anqā which was a bird brought to him from upper Egypt and it was equal to heron in length but larger in body. It had a wattle and beard and on its head there was a crown and there were several shades of colour in it; and it resembled many birds. God knows best.

I found at the end of the book Rabī' al-Abrār, by the eminent scholar, Abu 'l-Qāsim al-Zamakhsharī in the chapter on birds (relating) on the authority of Ibn 'Abbās that God had created in the time of Moses a bird named ai-'anqā having four wings on either sides and a face like that of a man and blessed it with a share from all things and made its male like its female. He, then, revealed to Moses, "we have created two strange birds and made their provision from the birds around Jerusalem and tamed them for you and thus added to the superiority of the Israelites." Then they multiplied and their number increased. When Moses passed away they migrated to Najd and Ḥijaz. They did not cease eating wild animals and carrying away children till Khālīd Ibn Sinān al-'Absī was raised to prophethood in the period between Jesus and the advent of Muḥammad, may God bless both of them. People complained to him (Khālīd,) and he cursed them and they became extinct.]

* al-Rass: a vally in Adḥarḥabaij n.

325. IBN AL-KHASHAB

Abū Muḥammad 'Abd Allāh Ibn Aḥmad Ibn Aḥmad Ibn Aḥmad*, surnamed Ibn al-Khashshab, was a native of Baghdad celebrated for his abilities in philology, grammar, the Qur'anic exegesis. Traditions, genealogy, the calculation of inheritance shares, and arithmetic; he knew also the Qur'ān by heart, so as to repeat it according to most of the readings<sup>1</sup>. His mind was filled with every species of knowledge, and in each branch of science he displayed abilities of the highest order. His penmanship<sup>2</sup> was also extremely beautiful. The kātib 'Imād al-Dīn mentions him in the Kharidah with the enumeration of his various talents and his excellencies; he then adds: "He composed but little poetry; this, however, was made by him on a wax-light:

'It is pale, but not from sickness; how could it be sick when its mother is the restorer of health?'<sup>3</sup> It is naked, but its interior (the wick) is clothed; how strange that it should be at once both clothed and naked!'

The kātib quotes also an enigma by Ibn al-Khashshab of which the word is book; it runs as follows:

"It has many faces, yet it does not betray your secrets as a double-faced man would do. The lines (asrār) on its face reveal secrets (asrār) to you and make them audible to the eye whilst you look upon them."

This thought is taken from al-Mutanabbī's poem on the wazīr Ibn al-'Amīd, where he says:

"Thy enemies called thee the ra'is<sup>4</sup> without any addition, but thy Creator entitled thee al-Ra'is al-Akbar (the greatest of the chiefs). Thy qualities have rendered these words of His as a writing for our eyes, so that they fill the ears of him who uses his sight."

<sup>1</sup> For the readings of the Qur'ān, see No. 68.

<sup>2</sup> The autograph has أظا not أظيا.

<sup>3</sup> In the Traditions it is mentioned that Muḥammad praised the great medical virtues of honey, saying that in it was a cure for man. See Mathew's Mishkāt, vol. II, p. 374.

<sup>4</sup> Ra'is or Chief was a title given to Wazīrs and Chief Officers in the administration.

* The name Aḥmad is repeated only twice in Egyptian edition. — E. I.

He composed a commentary entitled al-Murtajal (extempore dissertation) on 'Abd al-Qāhir al-Jurjānī's (grammatical treatise the) Jumal, but he left some chapters towards the middle of the book without any elucidation; he wrote also a commentary on Ibn Jinnī's work the Luma', but did not finish it. He was dirty in his person and paid hardly the slightest attention to what he ate or wore. The kātib 'Imād al-Dīn mentions that Ibn al-Khashshāb was an acquaintance of his, and that he had kept up a written correspondence with him. "When he died," says the same writer, "I was in Syria, and I saw him one night in a dream, and said to him: 'How has God treated thee?' 'Well' he replied. 'Does God show mercy to literary men?' 'Yes'.—'And if they have been remiss?'—'A severe reprimand will be given and then will come eternal happiness.'" Ibn al-Khashshāb was born A.H. 492 (A.C. 1098-9); * [I say: "I found his date of birth as given here but I have got a pamphlet containing notes and references which he had put down in his own handwriting. He wrote something on the back of it, a summary of which is as follows; 'I asked Abu 'l-Faḡl Muḥammad Ibn Nāṣir about the birth of our Shaykh Abu 'l-Karm Mubārak Ibn Fākhīr surnamed Ibn al-Dubās the grammarian to which he replied: A.H. 430/A.C. 1038-39. I feel he had only guessed it, because he (Abu 'l-Karm) died in A.H. 505/A.C. 1111-12, and I think the actual date was a bit earlier. Then I asked Abu 'l-Maḥāsīn Ibn Abī Naṣr Ibn al-Dubās, the copyist, about the birth of his uncle, the said Abu 'l-Karm; to which he replied that he, Abu 'l-Karm, had informed him (Abu 'l-Maḥāsīn) one year before his death that he had passed his seventieth year. I fear because I am now 77 years old. It means however that he was born in about A.H. 26. (i.e. 426 A.H.)

From this story it is inferred that Ibn al-Dubās died in A.H. 505 and he was one of the shaykhs of Ibn al-Khashshāb on whose authority he related numerous narrations, and it is impossible that he would have benefited from him before his puberty. In case the date of Ibn al-Khashshāb's birth and the date of his Shaykh's death be correct then his age must have been about 13 years and at such an age it is difficult to pursue knowledge correctly; undoubtedly what Ibn al-Khashshāb has written should be accepted as correct and so his birth must have taken place some time earlier. It is also possible that the date may be correct, and his narration must have been only based on his authority and he might not have studied and profited from him. There are many instances like this, and God knows best.)

---

* [ ] This passage is not to be found in the autograph, nor in De-Slane's edition, however, it is included in later editions.—Ed.

† 28 April.—Ed.

He died on the Friday evening, the 3rd of Ramaḍān, A.H. 567 (May, A.C. 1172), in the house of Abu 'l-Qasim al-Frrā, situated near the gate of al-Azaj, at Baḡhdād. He was buried in the cemetery of Almad, at the gate of al-Ḥarb, on the Saturday which followed his death. The funeral prayers were said over him in the Jām Jamī' al-Sulṭān (the sulṭān's great mosque).

326. IBN AL-FARAḌĪ

Abu' l-Walīd 'Abd Allah Ibn Muḥammad Ibn Yūsuf Ibn Naḡr al-Azdī, surnamed Ibn al-Faraḍī, a native of Cordova in Spain, was a jurisconsult deeply versed in the sciences connected with the Traditions, and well acquainted with the history and character of the persons by whom the Traditions were handed down; he possessed also immense information in general literature and other branches of knowledge. Amongst the number of his compositions, we must notice his History of the Learned Men of Spain; this is the work in continuation of which Ibn Baḡkuwāl wrote his Ṣilat. Another good production of Ibn al-Faraḍī is a treatise on homonymous terms (al-Muḥṭalif wa 'l-Mu'talif), and on those relative adjectives the derivation of which might be mistaken (Mush-tabih al-Nisbah); he composed also a history of the Spanish poets. In the year A.H. 382 (A.C. 992-3), he travelled from his native country to the East; in this visit he made the pilgrimage and frequented the company of the learned, communicating to them information, listening to their instructions, and writing down their observations (amālī). He composed a great deal of poetry, specimens of which we here give:

"A prisoner enslaved by his sins stands at Thy door, his heart filled with dread for reasons which Thou knowest well. He trembles for crimes the horridness of which cannot be concealed from Thee, and Thou alone art the sole object of his hopes and fears. In whom should hopes be placed,—whom should man fear but Thee? Nought can prevent the fulfilment of Thy judgements. Lord! let not the book in which my actions are written bring me to shame, on the great day of reckoning, when the registers of men's deeds shall be opened to view. Be my consoler in the darkness of the tomb when my family abandon me and my friends know me no longer. In Thy abundant mercies I hope to find pardon for my transgressions; if Thy mercies fail me, I am lost for ever!"

By the same "

"If she who leads me a willing captive be not equal to the full moon in beauty, she is yet hardly surpassed by it. My submission at a lover proceeds from the power of her charms, and my languishing sickness is caused by the langour of her eyes."

He was born in the month of Dhu'l-Qa'dah, A.H. 361 (December, A.C. 962). During some time he officiated as a qādī in the city of Valencia, and on Monday the 7 of Shawwāl, A.H. 403 (April, A.C. 1013),* he was slain in Cordova at the storming of that city by the Barbarians.<sup>1</sup> His body lay in his house during three days, and was at length buried in a state of putrefaction, without being washed, or shrouded, or prayed over. Speaking of this subject we may cite here a circumstance which was related by himself: "When performing the pilgrimage, I clung to the veil of the Ka'bah and asked of Almighty God the grace of dying a martyr; but on withdrawing, I reflected on the terrors of a violent death and repented of my wish, I even thought of returning and praying God to consider it as null, but shame withheld me." It is related also that a person saw him lying amongst the slain, and on going over to him, heard him utter these words with a feeble voice: "No one shall be wounded in the cause of God. (and God well knoweth him who is wounded in that cause!) but will come at the day of resurrection with his wound dropping blood: its colour will be that of blood, but its smell that of musk<sup>1</sup>, thus repeating to himself the Tradition relative to those who die martyrs. The same person said that he expired immediately after. This Tradition was first given by Muslim in his Ḥadīth, or collection of the Prophet's sayings.

<sup>1</sup> This occurred in the reign of Hiṣhām al-Muwayyad, who disappeared in the catastrophe and was never heard of after. Sulayman ibn al-Hakam, surnamed al-Musta'in bi-Allāh, then ascended the throne for the second time. On taking the city, his African troops passed three days in the perpetration of every excess.

*20 April—Ed.

327. AL-RUSHĀṬĪ

Abū Muḥammad 'Abd Allāh Ibn 'Alī Ibn 'Abd Allāh Ibn Khallaf Ibn Aḥmad Ibn 'Umar al-Rushāṭī, a member of the tribe of Lakhm and a native of Almeria in Spain, was assiduously devoted to the study of the Traditions, the Traditionists, the transmitters of oral information and the historians. He is the author of a good work on the genealogy of Muḥammad's Companions and of the persons by whom the history of (his) deeds was handed down; it is entitled Iqtibās al-Anwār w'alimās al-Azhār (acquisition of lights and search for flowers). This compilation, which is drawn up with no inferior talent, was explained by al-Rushāṭī himself to his pupils; it is arranged on the same plan as the Ansāb, a genealogical treatise composed by Abū Sa'd al-Sam'anī. Al-Rushāṭī was born at 'Ūriuwālah (Orihuela), a town in the dependencies of Murcia, on Saturday morning, the 8th of latter Jumādā, A.H. 466 (February, A.C. 1074)*: he died a martyr at Almeria when that city was taken by the enemy on Friday morning, the 20 of the first Jumādā, A.H. 542 (17 October, A.C. 1147),†—Rushāṭī; this relative adjective is derived neither from the name of a tribe nor from that of a place, but originated, as he himself states in his work, from the following circumstance: One of his ancestors had a mole on his body, and when a child he was nursed by a Persian (or a foreign)

<sup>1</sup> This is one of the sayings pronounced by Muḥammad.—See Mathew's Mishkāt al-Maṣābiḥ, vol. II., page 237.

<sup>2</sup> Almeria was then of the most important sea-ports of the Spanish Muslims and the centre of a vast system of piracy which desolated the shores of the Mediterranean. It was taken by the Christians after a long siege, during which Alfonso Raimond, king of Arragon and Catalonia, aided by his Muslim ally Ibn Ghāniand by the king of Arragon, blockaded it by land, whilst the count of Barcelona, with the combined fleet of the Genoese and Pisans, attacked it by sea. We find here, for the first time, the precise date of that event.

* 8 February—Ed.

† 17 October—Ed.

slave, who when playing with him used to call him Rushṭālāh, whence he became known by the name of Rushṭāṭī.

328. IBN BARRĪ

Abū Muḥammad 'Abd Allāh Ibn Abi 'l-Waḥsh Barrī* Ibn 'Abd al-Jabbār Ibn Barrī was a native of Egypt, but his family belonged to Jerusalem. His talents as a grammarian and philologist, the abundance and exactness of the oral information which he transmitted and his general instruction obtained for him the reputation of the most learned man of the time, the greatest ḥāfiẓ of the age, and the phenix of the epoch. He studied grammar under Abū Bakr Muḥammad Ibn 'Abd al-Malik al-Ṣḥantarī<sup>2</sup>, Abū Ṭalīb 'Abd al-Jabbār Ibn Muḥammad Ibn 'Alī al-Ma'āfirī al-Qurṭubī<sup>3</sup>, and other masters in that art; he was taught Traditions by Abū Ṣādiq al-Madīnī, Abū 'Abd Allāh al-Razī, and others. The greater part of the language spoken by the Arabs of the Desert was familiar to him, and he composed a book of excellent notes on al-Jawharī's lexicon, the Ṣaḥāḥ, in which he brought forward many curious examples and pointed out numerous mistakes committed by that author;

1 I here follow the reading of the autograph MS., but Rushṭāṭah as given in the printed text, seems preferable, as the relative adjective Rushṭāṭī is regularly derived from it, which is not the case, with Rushṭī lah where the relative adjective would take the form of Rushṭālī. The meaning of this word is unknown to me, but the Portuguese roxo (red) or the French rousse appears to form a part of it.

2 Abū Bakr Muḥammad Ibn 'Abd al-Malik, surnamed Ibn al-Sarrāj, was born at Santarem, but he fixed his residence at Seville. He studied grammar under Ibn Abi 'l-ʿAfiyah and Ibn al-ʿAḥḍar and received traditions from Abū 'l-Qāsim al-Naṣṭī النطی from whom also he learned (the imām Mā'ik's work) the Muwattā, which he then transmitted orally to his own disciples. In the year 515 (A. C. 1121-2) he travelled to Egypt, where he taught the reading of the Qur'an and the Traditions. He then made a visit to Yaman. His works are the Tanḥī al-Albāb (a hint to the wise), treating of the Desert Arabs and their excellencies; a treatise on prosody; an abridgement of Ibn Raṣṭīq's work the ʿUmdah (see No. 157, in which he points out the mistakes committed by that writer. He died at Old Cairo, A. H. 545 (A. C. 1150-1). Ibn al-Abbar's Takmilah.

3 Abū Ṭalīb 'Abd al-Jabbār Ibn Muḥammad Ibn 'Alī al-Ma'āfirī was born at Cordova, but he fixed his residence in Egypt. He learned the *Maqīmāh*s from Abū Muḥammad 'Abd Allāh, the son of the celebrated al-Harrī, and he taught them on his authority. In the year 552 (A. C. 1157) Abū Muḥammad Ibn Abi Bakr al-Juḥāmī al-Sibṭī learned them from Abū Ṭalīb in Egypt.—(Takmilah).

*M. de Slane gives Bari.—Ed.

this work is a proof of his extensive information, his great abilities, and his profound learning. Amongst the crowd of pupils who studied under him and profited by his tuition, one of the most conspicuous was Abū Mūsā ('Isā) al-Jazūlī, the author of the Muqaddamah, or introduction to the science of grammar, of whom further notice shall be taken (No. 488). Al-Juzūlī speaks of his master in the Muqaddamah and towards the end of it he gives some traditional information which he had learned from him. Ibn Barrī was well acquainted with Sībawayh's Kitāb and with the examples adduced by that grammarian in support of his doctrines<sup>1</sup>. He was supervisor of the Chancery Office (of Egypt), and every letter addressed by the government to foreign princes had to pass through his hands before it could be sent off; his duty being to peruse it and correct the faults which might have escaped notice. Such also was the post held by Ibn Babs<sup>h</sup>adh, as we have already stated (No. 288). I met in Egypt a number of persons who had studied under him, and they communicated to me some of the traditional information which they had obtained from him; in testimony of this, I procured from them certificates of license. It is related that Ibn Barrī spoke his language very carelessly and that he paid little attention to the final vowels, using whichever came uppermost. This he carried to such an extent, that he said one day to a pupil who was studying grammar under him: "Buy me a small quantity of spinage with the roots on (hindabā bi 'urūqū)." The other replied (in correcting him): "Yes hindabah bi 'uruqih." Provoked with the observations, he exclaimed: "Do not take it without the roots (bi 'urūqū);"—(repeating the fault)—"if it be without roots, I will not have it." He used many other expressions of a similar kind, being quite indifferent to the manner in which he spoke, and paying no attention to the final vowels. I have seen a collection of notes made by him on al-Ḥarīrī's Durrat al-Ḡi'awāṣṣ; there is also a little book by him in which he points out the mistakes into which jurists have fallen. Besides these works he composed an able defence of al-Ḥarīrī against Ibn al-Kha<sup>h</sup>sh<sup>h</sup>ab, who had written a work in order to expose the blunders committed in the Maqāmahs. Ibn Barri was born at Cairo on the 5 of Rajab, A. H 499 (March, A.C. 1106);* he died in the same city on the eve of Sunday, the 27 of Shawwāl, A.H. 582 (January, A.C. 1187).†—Barri is a proper name, though by its form it resembles a relative adjective.

---

<sup>1</sup> Those examples are generally single verses quoted from ancient poems, and to understand them well it is necessary to study the pieces to which they belong.

329. AL-‘ĀḌID

Abū Muḥammad ‘Abd Allāh was the son of Yūsuf Ibn al-Ḥafīz Ibn Muḥammad Ibn al-Mustansir Ibn al-Zāhir Ibn al-Ḥakīm Ibn al-‘Azīz Ibn al-Mu‘izz Ibn al-Manṣūr Ibn al-Qa‘im Ibn al-Mahdī. He bore the surname of al-‘Āḍid and was the last ‘Ubayyidite (Fāṭimite) sovereigns of Egypt. We have already given notices on some members of his family and shall speak of the others in the ensuing portion of this work. Al-‘Āḍid was raised to the throne on the death of his cousin al-Fa‘īz (in the month of Rajab, A.H. 555). His father Yūsuf was one of the two brothers who were assassinated by ‘Abbas on the death of al-Zāfir, an event already noticed (No. 96). Al-‘Āḍid held merely a nominal authority, all the real power being in the hands of al-Ṣālīḥ Ibn Ruzzīk. This prince was a violent shī‘ite, most bitter in his execrations on the companions of Muḥammad (who were not partisans of ‘Alī), and whenever he met a Sunnite he ordered him to be put to death. During his reign the Wazīr al-Ṣālīḥ Ibn Ruzzīk pursued a line of conduct highly reprehensible, forestalling all the provisions in order to raise their price, assassinating the great officers of the empire lest they should turn against him, and weakening all the resources of Egypt. He put the bravest of its officers to death, and left not a man of prudence or resolution in the country, whilst he displayed great ardour in seizing on the property of others and inflicting heavy fines on persons who never had the slightest business with him. In the reign of al-‘Āḍid, his relation (Abū ‘Abd Allāh)‡ al-Ḥusayn Ibn Nizar Ibn al-Mustansir

---

* 13 March—Ed.

† 11 January—Ed.

‡ The autograph has given this name—Ed.

advanced from Western Africa with a large body of troops, but, on approaching the Egyptian territory, he was betrayed by his followers and delivered up to al-'Āḍid by whose orders he was put to death. This event occurred in the month of Ramaḍān, A.H. 557; but according to another statement, it happened in the reign of al-Ḥafiz 'Abd al-Majid<sup>1</sup>. Al-Ḥusayn had assumed the title of al-Muntaṣir bi-Allāh,—In the life of Shawar and in that of Shayrkah we have noticed the causes which contributed to the fall of the Fāṭimite dynasty and placed the Ghuzz* family on the throne of Egypt; further observations on the same subject shall be presented to the reader in the life of Ṣalāḥ al-Dīn: it is therefore unnecessary for us to enter into a long exposition of them here.—I have heard a number of Egyptians relate that when these people (the Fāṭimites) commenced their reign, they told one of the learned to write on a leaf of paper a series of surnames fitted to be borne by khalifs, so that they might select one of them for each of their princes when he came to the throne. This person wrote down a great many surnames, and the last on the list was al-'Āḍid; a singular coincidence with the fact, the last of their sovereigns bore that very title; it was observed also that, as a word employed in the language, al-'Āḍid means the cutter, and in fact it might be said that this al-'Āḍid cut short their dynasty. I was also informed by a learned Egyptian that, towards the end of his reign, al-'Āḍid dreamt, when in Old Cairo, that a scorpion came out of a well-known mosque there and stung him. When he awoke, he reflected with dread on what he had seen and caused an interpreter of dreams to be brought in, to whom he related the vision. The answer he received was, that he should receive harm from a person sojourning in that mosque. Al-'Āḍid immediately sent for the governor of Old Cairo and ordered him to make a perquisition in a certain mosque which he named, and if he found any person sojourning in it, to bring him into his presence. The governor went thither and found a ṣūfī, whom he brought before al-‘Āḍid. On seeing him, the prince asked where he was from, how long he had been in that country, and what motive had induced him to come there; to these questions he received satisfactory answers. Struck with the (apparent) veracity of the ṣūfī, and believing that a person so miserable as he could not possibly do him any harm, he said to him. “O shaykh! pray for us”: and then dismissed him with a present. The ṣūfī returned again to his mosque, but when the sultan Ṣalāḥ al-Dīn became master of the country and formed the intention of seizing on al-‘Āḍid and his partisans, he consulted the doctors of the law on the legality of the measure; they declared it lawful, inasmuch as al-‘Āḍid followed heterodox opinions; to the perversion of the true belief, and frequently insulted the memory of the Prophet’s Companions in the most public manner. Now the strongest fatwā of any was that given by the ṣūfī who lived in the mosque just mentioned, and he was no less than the shaykh Najm al-Dīn al-Khuba-shānī, the jurisconsult whose life will be found in No. 571. In his declaration, he summed up at great length the misdeeds of those people (the Fāṭimites) and declared them infidels. Al-‘Āḍid’s dream was thus fulfilled. This prince was born on Tuesday, the 20th of Muḥarram, A.H. 546 (May, A.C. 1151);* he died on the eve of Monday, the 12 of Muḥarram, A.H. 567 (September, A.C. 1171).† It is reported that, in a paroxysm of rage against Shams al-Dawlat Turān Shāh, † he ended his days by poison. According to some accounts, he expired on the night of ‘shūrā, (the night preceding the tenth day of Muḥarram).

<sup>1</sup> This event is not noticed by any of the historians whom I have consulted; in the Nuḡm, Abu 'l-Mah sin merely cites Ibn Khallikan's words, when giving the sketch of the life of al-'Āḍid: but under the year 557, he takes no notice of such an occurrence. The revolt of Nizār against al-Musta'li in A.H. 487 (see No. 73), may have been confounded with the death of al-Ḥasan the son of al-Ḥafiz, in 529, and given rise to the discordant statements here brought by Ibn Khallikan.

*The Editor of Egyptian edition and Teheran edition give ج. others instead of Ghuzz which is the reading of the autograph—Ed.

330. ABU ‘L-RADDĀD

Abu ‘l-Raddād ‘Abd Allāh Ibn ‘Abd al-Salām Ibn ‘Abd Allāh al-Raddād, the muwadhḥin and guardian of the Nilometer. was a native of Baṣrah and a man of holy life. In the year 246 of the

* 8 May.—Ed.

† 13 September.—Ed.

1 (ibn Ayyūb brother of Ṣalāḥ al-Dīn) omitted by de Slane. Ed.

Hijrah (A.C. 860-1) he was appointed keeper of the new Nilometer erected in the island of (Rawḡah, near) Cairo, with the inspection and direction of everything connected with it. This office continues to be exercised by his descendants to the present time. He died A.H. 279 (A.C. 892-3), or 266 (879-80). * [This Nilometer was erected by Aḥmad Ibn Muḥammad al-Ḥāsib al-Qurṣānī under the instructions of al-Mutawakkil 'alā-Allāh. Prior to it 'Uṣamah Ibn Zayd al-Tanūkhī had ordered the erection of a Nilometer in the Jazīrah in A.H. 76/A.C. 695-6. He is reported to have said, "When I wanted to scribe (some thing) on the Nilometer I consulted Yaz'd Ibn 'Abd Allāh, Sulaymān Ibn Wahb and al-Ḥasan, the attendant, as to what should be written. I informed them that the best inscription would be the verses of the Qur'ān, the name of the Amīr al-Mu'minīn al-Mutawakkil 'alā-Allāh and the name of the governor al-Muntaḥir. When the work commenced there was a difference of opinion and Sulaymān Ibn Wahb wrote the inscription without consultation. In the meantime the letter of the Amīr al-Mu'minīn reached, with instructions to write down the verses of the Qur'ān appropriate to the Nilometer and the name of the Amīr al-Mu'minīn. Then I selected the verses of the Qur'ān, more appropriate than which for the Nilometer could not be found, and had all of them written in the marble which was used in the building, at places where writing was possible in a straight hand of the thickness of a finger, chiselled in the marble with waxed lapis lazuli, this could be read from a distance. I caused four verses of equal length to be inscribed in four lines in quadruplication of the building of the Nilometer at the height of 17 cubits of the pillar. I got the following verse written on the eastern side facing the entrance of the Nilometer. In the name of Allah, the Compassionate, the Merciful. And we send down from the sky blessed water whereby we give growth unto gardens and the grain of crops †. (I got the following verse inscribed) on the northern side, 'And thou (Muḥammad) seest the earth barren but when we send down water thereon, it doth thrill and swell and put forth every lovely kind (of growth) ‡. (I got the following

---

* [ ] This piece is not to be found in the autograph nor in de Slane's edition; it is however included in subsequent editions—Ed.

† Al-Qur'ān, Sūrah 50, verse 9

‡ Al-Qur'ān, Sūrah 22, verse 5.

verse inscribed): on the western side, 'Seest thou not how Allāh sendeth down water from the sky and then the earth becometh green upon the morrow? Lo! Allāh is subtile, Aware'.* (I got the following verse inscribed): to the southern side, 'And He it is who sendeth down the saving rain after they have despaired, and spreadeth out His mercy. He is the Protecting Friend, the Praiseworthy.' †

These verses were inscribed above the maximum water level which was 17 cubits. Then I marked a belt in quadrifilatum on the 18th cubit as I had done on the 16 and got the following verse inscribed there, 'In the name of Allāh, the Compassionate, the Merciful.' Allāh is He who created the Heavens and the earth, and causeth water to descend from the sky, thereby producing fruits as food for you, and maketh the ships to be of service unto you that they may run upon the sea at His command, and hath made of service unto you the rivers.

And maketh the sun and the moon, constant in their course, to be of service unto you, and hath made of service unto you the night and the day.

And He giveth you of all ye ask of Him, and if ye would count the bounty of Allāh you cannot reckon it. Lo! man is verily a wrong doer, an ingrate.‡

'In the name of Allāh, the Compassionate, the Merciful.' This is a meter of luck, prosperity, blessing and safety which has been created under the command of 'Abd Allāh Ja'far al-Imām al-Mutawakkil 'alā Allāh Amir al-Mūminīn, may God grant him long life and perpetuate his honour and support by Aḥmad Ibn Muḥammad al-Ḥāsib in A.H. 247/A.C. 861-2. I (Aḥmad) got the walls above the water level mark engraved, and chiselled by waxed lapis lazuli, and created a pillar 19 cubits high and summit made on it and a girder of acacia attached to it, and the whole of it is engraved with gold and lapis lazuli. I got 'Āyat al-Kursī' (Surah 2, verse 255) inscribed and on the wall of the alley facing Nile above the entrance of the Nilometer so that the visitor could read the line engraved in the marble from the beginning to the end which runs thus — 'In the name of Allāh, the Compassionate, the Merciful.' Praise be to Allāh, Lord of the worlds and may Allāh bless our Leader, Muḥammad, the chief of the Prophets. 'Abd Allāh Ja'far the Imām al-Mutawakkil 'Alā Allāh Amīr al-Mūminīn ordered this Ḥaṣhmī Nilometer to be erected so that the flow of the Nile in its discharge may be known. May God prolong the life of Amīr al-Mūminīn and may He perpetuate his honour, authority and triumph over his enemies and grant him benevolence and blessings. May He enhance his desire for doing good deeds and clemency to his people. Aḥmad Ibn Muḥammad al-Ḥasib wrote it in the month of Rajab in A.H. 247."

* Al-Qur'ān, Surah 22, verse 62.

† Al-Qur'ān, Surah 42, verse 28.

‡ Al-Qur'ān, Surah 14, verses 32-4.

I got two lines written in the marble by the two sides of the door. One of them contained: 'In the name of Allāh, what Allāh likes! There is no strength and might except that of Allāh. And say: truth hath come and falsehood hath vanished away. Lo! falsehood is ever bound to vanish.* The other contained: 'In the name of Allāh: The water-level reached 17 cubits and 18 digits of this blessed al-Mutawakkil Nilometer, in the year it was erected.'

And I prepared the image of a beast out of the marble and fixed it in the wall overlooking the Nile just above its bridge in a position at 16 cubits. When the water level reached that mark, water entered its mouth. A little above this mark I got it written on the wall: 'Have they not seen how we lead the water to the barren land and therewith bring forth crops whereof their cattle eat, and they themselves? Will they not then see?*

Aḥmad Ibn Muḥammad al-Ḥasib got it written in the latter Jumādā A.H. 247/August, A.C. 861. May God bless our Leader Muḥammad the Prophet and his progeny.

The cubit in the Nilometer is equal to 28 digits upto 12th cubit after that it is equal to 24 digits.]

Al-Qudā'i speaks of him in his topographical description of Cairo, and also of the young girl whom they used formerly to throw into the Nile<sup>1</sup>. These passages are to be found in the chapter on the Nilometer.

<sup>1</sup> See Lane's Modern Egyptians, vol. II, p. 263.

* Al-Qur'an Sūrah 32, verse 27.

331. 'UBAYD ALLĀH IBN 'ABD ALLĀH

Abū 'Abd Allāh 'Ubayd Allāh Ibn 'Abd Allāh Ibn 'Utbah Ibn Mas'ūd Ibn 'Āqil Ibn Ḥabīb Ibn Shamakh Ibn Makḥzum Ibn Ṣubḥ Ibn Kahil Ibn al-Ḥārith Ibn Tamīm Ibn Sa'd Ibn Hudḥayl Ibn Mudrikah Ibn al-Yas Ibn Muḥar Ibn Nizar Ibn Ma'add Ibn 'Adnan al-Hudḥali was one of the seven great jurisconsults of Madinah. (Of these doctors four have been already noticed.) This 'Ubayd Allāh was grandson to the brother of 'Abd Allāh Ibn Mas'ūd, one of Muhammad's partisans. He held a high rank amongst the Tābi'is, having met and conversed with a great number of the Prophet's companions; besides which he received traditions from Ibn 'Abbās, Abū Hurayrah, and 'Āyishah. Traditions were given on his authority by Abū 'l-Zinād, al-Zuhri, and others. The last named ḥāfiz said that he had seen four oceans (of knowledge), and that one of them was this 'Ubayd Allāh. He said again: "I received a great deal of traditional knowledge on the Science (of the law), and I thought that I had acquired a sufficiency; but on meeting 'Ubayd Allāh, I felt as if I possessed not the slightest particle of it". (The khalif) 'Umar Ibn 'Abd al-'Azīz was heard to say that for him a conversation with 'Ubayd Allāh was more precious than the world and all it contained. He said another time: "By Allāh! for the advantage of passing of an evening with 'Ubayd Allāh I would give one thousand pieces of gold out of the public treasury<sup>1</sup>. On hearing this, the persons present said: "How can you say so, Commander of the faithful! You who are so strict and scrupulous in such matters?" To this he replied: "Whither do your imaginations lead you? By Allāh! to obtain his advice and counsel and guidance, I should have recourse to the public treasury for a thousand, nay for thousands of dīnars: conversation like his gives fecundity to the intelligence and repose to the heart; it dissipates care and improves social manners." 'Ubayd Allāh was as pious as learned; he died at Madinah, A.H. 102 (A.C. 720-1), but other statements say 99 or 98. He composed some pieces of poetry. One of which is given in the Ḥamāsah<sup>2</sup>; it runs as follows:

<sup>1</sup> It is necessary to observe here that the public money could only be employed for the public welfare, and that 'Umar Ibn 'Abd al-'Azīz was extremely scrupulous on this point.

<sup>2</sup> See Ḥamāsah, page 594.

"You rent my heart and shed ~~in~~ love for you; it was then blamed for its weakness and the wound closed up. Love for 'Athmah has entered deeply into my heart, and what my bosom manifests accords with what it conceals. Love for her has penetrated it to a depth which food, or sorrow, or joy, have never reached."

When he first pronounced these verses, he was asked how he (who was a grave man) could express himself in such a manner, to which he replied: "The man whose heart is wounded finds solace in complaining." He was the author of the expression: "The man whose lungs are diseased cannot help spitting."—Hudhali means belonging to Hudhayl;* this is a large tribe, and the majority of those who inhabit Wādī Nakhlah near Makkah, belong to it. 'Abd 'Allāh 'Ubayd 'Allāh's father died A.H. 86 (A.C. 705). At a time previous to the introduction of Islamism, the chieftainship of this tribe was exercised by his ancestor Ṣubh Ibn Kāhil.

332. 'UBAYD ALLĀH THE MAHDĪ

The genealogy of Abū Muḥammad 'Ubayd Allāh, surnamed al-Mahdī (the directed by God), is a subject on which I have met with statements of the most discordant kind; the author of the History of Qayrawān<sup>1</sup> says that he was the son of al-Ḥasan Ibn 'Alī Ibn Muḥammad Ibn 'Alī Ibn Mūsā Ibn Ja'far Ibn Muḥammad Ibn 'Alī Ibn al-Ḥusayn Ibn 'Alī Ibn Abī Ṭālib; another historian calls him 'Ubayd Allāh the son of Muḥammad Ibn Isma'īl Ibn Ja'far (Ibn Muḥammad Ibn 'Alī, etc.) as before; a third states that his grandfather Isma'īl was the son of 'Alī Ibn al-Ḥusayn Ibn Aḥmad Ibn 'Abd Allāh Ibn al-Ḥasan Ibn Muḥammad Ibn 'Alī Ibn al-Ḥusayn Ibn 'Alī Ibn Abī Ṭālib; others again call him the son of al-Taḳī (the fearer of God), who was the son of al-Wafī (the perfect) who was the son of al-Raḍī* (him with whom God is well pleased), which three persons are designated as the concealed in the essence of God; Raḍī was the son of Muḥammad Ibn Ismā'il Ibn Ja'far (this Ja'far is the same person as he mentioned above); the real name of al-Taḳī was Ḥusayn, that of al-Wafī was Aḥmad, and that of al-Raḍī was 'Abd Allāh; they were called the concealed because they lay hid through dread of being apprehended by the 'Abbasides who had been informed that one of them aspired to the khālīfate, as others of 'Alī's descendants whose adventures and enterprises are well known, had done before; the Maḥdī was called 'Ubayd Allāh to conceal him more effectually.—Such are the statements made by those who consider him to be really descended from al-Ḥusayn the son of 'Alī, and it may be observed how much their accounts are at variance: moreover, among the persons learned in genealogies, the most exact investigators reject 'Ubayd Allāh's pretensions to such an origin, and we have already related in the life of 'Abd Allāh Ibn Ṭabaṭaba (see No. 317) what passed between that sharīf and al-Mu'izz on the arrival of the latter in Egypt, with the answer which al-Mu'izz made to him when questioned on the subject: the words of that prince are in themselves a proof that he did not spring from al-Ḥusayn, otherwise he would have set forth his genealogy without having had recourse to the meeting of which we have there spoken<sup>2</sup>. They say also that his true name was Sa'īd, and 'Ubayd Allāh his surname; according to them, his mother was the wife of al-Ḥusayn Ibn Aḥmad Ibn Muḥammad Ibn 'Abd Allāh Ibn Maymān; this Maymān was surnamed al-Qaddāḥ, (the piercer), because he was an oculist and lanced eyes in which humours had settled. It is said also that when al-Maḥdī arrived at Sijilmasah, al-Yasa', the sovereign of that city and the last prince of the Midrār dynasty<sup>1</sup>, was informed that the stranger was the person whose rights Abū 'Abd Allāh the

<sup>1</sup> Hājji Khalifah notices five authors who have composed works on the history of Qayrawān.—(See Flügel's edition of the Bibliographical Dictionary, tom. II, page 142).

* Ibn Mudrikah Ibn al-Yās Ibn Muḍar Ibn Nizār Ibn Ma'add Ibn 'Adnān) omitted by de Slane.—Ed.

---

1 This last argument is not well founded; Ibn Khallikān himself admits that the sharīf Ibn Ṭabaṭaba was dead many years before the arrival of al-Mu'izz in Egypt. The opinion expressed by our author and the genealogists who like him lived under the authority of the Abbaside khālīfs, cannot be of any weight, as they could not have dared to enounce any other. M. de Sacy's Exposé des doctrines des Druzes gives the best information on the history of the Maḥdī and the origin of the Fāṭimites.

<sup>2</sup> He was not the last prince of the Midrār dynasty; the last of them was al-Mu'tazz Ibn al-Shākir, who was slain A.H. 366, seventy years after the death of al-Yasa'.

*M. de Slane reads it al-Riḍā

Shī'ite was then proclaiming in the province of Africa; (of these proceedings we have already spoken. No. 193). In consequence of this, al-Yasā' imprisoned 'Ubayd Allāh; but the Shī'ite, on learning the circumstance, collected a large body of troops from different tribes, and especially from that of Kutamāh* and marched against Sijilmasah with the intention of delivering the captive. Al-Yasā', being informed of his design, put al-Mahdī to death in the prison, and then fled the city on the approach of the hostile army. Abū 'Abd Allāh immediately entered the place in which al-Mahdī was confined, and found a servant of his, a devoted follower, staying by the corpse of his murdered master. Apprehending that all his plans, hitherto so successful, would come to ruin if the troops learned what had happened, he brought the servant out to them and said: "This is the Mahdī"<sup>2</sup>. The rest of his history is so well known that it is needless to repeat it<sup>3</sup>. He was the first of that family who established his authority in Maghrib and maintained with success his pretensions to the khalīfate. When he got the power into his own hands, he put his missionary<sup>4</sup> Abū 'Abd Allāh the Shī'ite and that person's brother to death, as we have already mentioned. In the month of Dhu 'l-Qa'dah A.H. 303 (May, A.C. 916), he laid the foundations of the city of al-Mahdiyyah in the province of Africa, and he finished its construction in the month of Shawwal, A.H. 308 (Feb.-March, A.C. 921). He also fortified Tunis with a wall of great strength and repaired a number of its buildings. Al-Mahdiyyah was so called after him. He was succeeded by his son al-Qa'im, on whose death al-Manṣūr, the son of al-Qa'im, ascended the throne. Of al-Manṣūr we have already spoken (No. 95). After him came his son al-Mu'izz, he who sent his general Jawhar to the conquest of Egypt, where he founded Cairo. Their dynasty continued to reign in that country till overturned by Ṣalāḥ al-Dīn. We have already given the lives of some of the princes descended from 'Ubayd Allāh, and shall notice the remainder in the sequel of this work : they were 1 It must be observed that Ibn Khallikān gives this story as mere report, as the word يقال or it is said always implies.

---

2 See it in M. de Sacy's Druzes.

3 That is, his precursor and agent.

* M. de Slane reads it Kitanah—Ed.

denominated Obaidites on account of their descent from him. His birth took place in the town of Salmiyah, A.H. 259 (A.C. 872-3), or by other accounts in the year 260 or 266, but some say that he was born at Kūfah. Prayers were first offered up for him as khalif from the pulpits of al-Raqqādah and Qayrawān, on Friday the 20 of the later Rabi', A.H. 297 (January A.C. 910)*, this was subsequently to his return from Sijilmāsah and after his adventure there. He made his appearance at Sijilmāsah on Sunday the 7 Dhu 'l Hijjah, A.H. 296 (August A.C. 909).† —The province of Maghrib was thus withdrawn from the domination of the 'Abbasides. 'Ubayd Allāh died on the eve of Tuesday, the 15 of the first Rabi', A.H. 322 (March A.C. 934),‡ at al-Mahdiyyah.—Salamiyah is a town of Syria, situated in the government of Emessa.—Raqqādah is a town in the province of Africa.

333. 'UBAYD ALLĀH IBN 'ABD ALLĀH IBN ṬĀHIR

Abū Aḥmad 'Ubayd Allāh al-Khuzā'i was the son of 'Abd Allāh Ibn Ṭāhir Ibn al-Ḥusayn Ibn Muṣ'ab Ibn Ruzayq Ibn Māhān. We have already spoken of his father and grandfather, and mentioned the high favour and esteem in which they were held by al-Māmūn, we have also related how he appointed them to the government of Khurasān and other provinces. 'Ubayd Allāh held a military command under the khalif, and acted for some time as lieutenant for his brother Muḥammad Ibn 'Abd Allāh, who was chief of the police-guards (Shurṭah) at Baḡdād, on the death of his brother.

---

* 5 January—Ed.

† 27 August—Ed.

‡ 4 March—Ed.

he was promoted to the vacant place. He ranked amongst the most eminent of the tribe of K̲h̲uzā'ah and succeeded to the chieftainship over them; he was the last of the family who died in possession of that post. A number of works were composed by him, such as the Ishārah (indication), containing a history of the poets; an epistolary treatise on government; a collection of letters addressed by him to 'Abd Allāh Ibn al-Mu'tazz; the Kitāb al-Barā'at wa 'l-Faṣāḥat (on the excellence of style and perspicuity), etc. He transmitted also some oral information on the authority of al-Zubayr Ibn Bakkār and others. As an epistolary writer and a poet, he displayed an elegant imagination, a delicate taste, and a talent for conceiving and expressing with propriety the finest thoughts. In one of his pieces he says:

"Does pride make you fly a youth who has disclosed your name (as hers whom he adores)?<sup>1</sup> The supplications of a lover are entitled to an answer! From a distant land he sends you his salutation; return one yet kinder, or else return it simply.—They bridled their camels on the morn of separation and departed with their loaded caravan, leaving me behind to weep over their abandoned dwellings. But I followed in their steps, and, to remove the suspicions (of the jealous guardians who surrounded my beloved), I said that I had been sent to drive the camels and cheer them with my song. 'And what means,' said they, 'that sigh so deeply drawn? Wherefore droop those eyelids?'—"That sigh," said I, 'comes from this long and weary journey, and those tears are caused by some grains of dust which have fallen into my eyes.' But when they entered the land of Najd and night had spread its deepest shades around, I raised my voice in the darkness to call on my beloved: 'O thou who hast disordered my reasons and enslaved my heart! shall I hope for the happiness of a fortunate meeting?' "

---

<sup>1</sup> The autograph has أتهجرون أفتى أعري بكم تيهي do you proudly avoid a youth impelled to love you? This reading is given in the autograph and in one of the manuscripts which I made use of, but the measure of the verse does not permit it. The reading adopted in the printed text is authorised by other manuscripts.

Since writing these verses, I find them attributed to Abu 'l-Tārīf, the favourite poet of al-Mu'tamid, the 'Abbaside Khalīf.—Another of his pieces is as follows:

"O what deadly pangs were ours on the loss of those friends who were lights to guide, and forts to protect us! (In battle they were) lions, (in beneficence) gushing showers, (in danger) firm as mountains, (and for us) a safeguard and (sources of) ease and tranquillity. Fortune was never unkind to us till death removed them to another world. But now each burning fire is (an emblem of) our hearts, and each spring of water (the likeness of) our eyes."

By the same:

"The true prince is he who, though deprived of authority, is still a prince (at heart). Wordly power he may lose, but the power which his virtues gave him can never cease."

By the same:

"Render service as much as thou art able, and be ever ready to dispel the affliction of thy brother. The best days of a man's life are those in which he renders service."

'Ubayd Allāh having fallen sick, was visited by the Wazīr to whom, when he withdrew, he addressed a note containing these words: 'I know of none but myself who ever felt gratitude to sickness; I feel obliged and grateful to it for its kindness since it procured me the pleasure of seeing you. It is with me as with the Arab of the Desert, who blessed the day on which his beloved and her tribe departed for a distant land; 'Blessings' said he:

'Blessings be on the day of separation despite the pains it causes! it was such a day which gave me a sight of (my beloved) Umm Thābit. It allowed me to see maidens brought up in the inmost recesses of the tents, and whom I could never have seen but in the descriptions of those kind females who spoke to me of their beauty.<sup>1</sup>

A note similar to this was written by al-Buḥturī to Abū Ghānim<sup>2</sup> who had fallen sick and was visited by the wazīr:

<sup>1</sup> Here the printed text and all the manuscripts, except the autograph, give a reading which is rhythmically wrong. The true reading is باتتعات النوااعت.

<sup>2</sup> Abū Ghānim al-Shāh Ibn Mikāl was governor of Fārs; his praises were celebrated not only by al-Buḥturī, but by Ibn Durayd.

"You have been a gainer, O Abū Ghānim! and may genial showers never cease to shed abundance on your land! I should willingly consent to suffer as you have done, were I to receive the visit of him who went to you. The honour which the wazīr thus conferred upon you has caused joy to your friends and vexation to your enemies."

The poetical works of 'Ubayd Allāh have been collected and form a diwān. He was born A.H. 223 (A.C. 837-8); he died at Baghḍad on the eve of Saturday the 12 of the month of Shawwāl, A.H. 300 (May, A.C. 913)* and was interred in the Cemetery of the Quraysh tribe. He once visited the grave of his brother Sulaymān Ibn 'Abd Allāh, who died A.H. 265, and there, leaning on his bow, he contemplated the family-tomb, and gave utterance to his feelings, in the following lines:

"Sighs of sadness mount from my bosom, and tears flow from the orbits of my eyes, on beholding a spot so small inhabited by those for whom my affection was so great!"

334. ABU 'L-ḤAKAM AL-MAGHRIBĪ

Abu 'l-Ḥakam 'Ubayd Allāh Ibn al-Muẓaffar Ibn 'Abd Allāh Ibn Muḥammad al-Bāhilī, surnamed al-Maghribī, a physician and an elegant scholar, was born in Yaman, but he drew his descent from a family which inhabited Almeria in Spain. In an historical work compiled by Abū Shuja' Muḥammad Ibn al-Dahḥān al-Farādī (see his life in this work), it is stated that Abu 'l-Ḥakam went to Baghḍad, where he kept a boy's school for some time, and that he had a knowledge of the belles-lettres, medicine, and geometry; then follow the dates of his birth and death. Another writer says of him: "He was a man of the highest accomplishments, and cultivated with equal success the belles-lettres and philosophy. There exists an edition of his poetical works, which are very good, but their tone is in general licentious." The kātib 'Imād al-Dīn mentions in the Kharidah that this Abu 'l-Ḥakam was attached as a physician to the camp hospital which always followed the army of the Saljuq sultan Maḥmūd, and for the transporting of which forty camels were allotted. He says also that al-Sadīd Abu 'l-Wafā Yahyā Ibn Sa'īd Ibn Yahyā Ibn al-Muẓaffar, who was afterwards chief qādī of Baghḍad in the reign of the khalīf al-Muktafī (li amr Allāh), and is better known by the surname of Ibn al-Murakḥḥim, was a phlebotomist and a physician in the same hospital. The kātib then mentions Abu 'l-Ḥakam's talents and conduct with high approbation and notices a work composed by him under the title of Nahj al-Waḍā'ah;<sup>1</sup> li Uli 'l-Khalā'ah (path of humility marked out for the dissolute). He proceeds to state that Abu 'l-Ḥakam removed to Syria and settled at Damascus, where he had many amusing adventures indicative of his light-hearted disposition. I read the following anecdote respecting him in his Diwān: "Abu 'l-Ḥusayn Ibn Munīr al-Ṭarabulusī"—the same of whom we have spoken (in No. 63)—"was stopping at the castle of Shayzar with the amīrs of the Munqidh family, by whom he was treated with great attention, when a poet of Damascus, named Abu 'l-Waḥsh, whose facetious disposition rendered him the intimate friend and companion of Abu 'l-Ḥakam, resolved on visiting Shayzar, that he might recite laudatory poems to the Munqidh princes and obtain gifts in return. He therefore asked Abu 'l-Ḥakam for a letter of recommendation to Ibn Munīr, and obtained one written in these terms:

---

* 22 May—Ed.

'Hearken, Abu 'l-Ḥusayn! to the words of a man who, obliged to speak unprepared, utters his thoughts off-hand. Here is Abu 'l-Waḥsh, who goes to praise the family (with whom you are residing); vaunt then his merit when he arrives, and repeat to them in your own excellent language, what I now relate to you respecting him. Tell them that he is a man the like of whom was never seen before: the qualities which they will find in him render unnecessary any description of mine; any other information than this no sensible man need require.—Notwithstanding his continual levity (of con- duct) he acknowledges that he is a heavy fellow<sup>1</sup>. He is allied to silliness, stupidity, and folly; for other connexions, he has none. If you essay to open him with the intention of discovering what he contains, you will open a vacuity. If he sojourn with you, treat him with indignity and contempt, but when he intends to set off, be officious in helping him. Give him poison to drink if you find the opportunity, and mix it for him with the honey of your tongue (flattering language)'. ”

---

<sup>1</sup> This is the reading of the autograph, but all the other manuscripts which I have consulted and the Bibliographical Dictionary of Ḥājjī Khalīfah have al-Raḥā'ah.

One of his most admired pieces is a humorous maqārāh (poem rhyming in a short a), written in imitation of Ibn Durayd's and which contains this verse:

“Things joined in close union must one day separate even were they stuck together with glue.”

He composed also an elegy on the death of 'Imād al-Dīn Zinkī, the son of 'Āq Sunqur (see No. 233); in this piece he has combined the opposite extreme of gravity and humour. The greater part of his poetry is characterised by the natural simplicity of its ideas and style. He was born in Yaman, A.H. 486 (A.C. 1093-4), according to Ibn al-Dubaythī, in his supplement (to the History of Baghdād); he died at Damascus on the eve of Wednesday, the 4th of Dhu 'l-Qa'dah, A.H. 549 (January, A.C. 1155);* but Ibn al-Dubaythī says that his death took place after the second hour of the night which preceded the sixth day of Dhu 'l-Qa'dah, which day was a Wednesday. He was interred at the gate of al-Farādīs.—The qaṣī Ibn al-Murakhkhim, mentioned in this article, is the same person on whom the following lines were made by Hibat Allāh Ibn al-Qaṭṭān, a poet of whom we shall give an account in this work:

“Ibn al-Murakhkhim, you have now become a qaṣī amongst us! say if it be fortune which has gone mad (to bring about so absurd an event), or is it a prank of the stars? Were your judicial practice confined to judicial astrology, your decisions might be sometimes right, but how did you come to know the laws of Muḥammad?”

---

<sup>1</sup> The Autograph has التكلى but no such word exists in Arabic; the true reading is التكلى as I have printed it.

*12 January; 6 Dhu 'l-Qa'dah appears to be correct date—Ed.

335 'ABD AL-RAḤMĀN IBN ABĪ LAYLĀ

Abū 'Īsā 'Abd al-Raḥmān Ibn Abī Laylā Yasār Ibn Bilāl Ibn 'Uḥayyah Ibn al-Jullāḥ al-Anṣārī was one of the principal Ṭabī'īs who settled at Kufah. Different opinions are held respecting the true name of his father Ab. Laylā, who was one of the Anṣārs; some say it was Yasār, others Dāwūd, etc. Ibn Abī Laylā learned Traditions from 'Alī Ibn Abī Ṭalīb, 'Uthmān Ibn 'Affan, Abū Ayyūb al-Anṣārī<sup>1</sup>, and others; it is mentioned also that he received some Traditions from 'Umar, but this is a fact which no ḥāfiẓ considers as well established. His father Abū Laylā handed down a saying which he had heard of uttered by the Prophet himself, and it was he who bore the standard of 'Alī at the battle of the Camel. Ibn Abī Laylā received also Traditions from 'Abd al-Raḥmān al-Shā'bī, Mujahid<sup>2</sup>, 'Abd al-Malik Ibn 'Umayr, and a great number of others. He was born A.H. 21 (A.C. 642) two years before the death of 'Umar, and was slain at the river Dujayl, or drowned in the river of Baṣrah; some say however that he was one of the missing after the battle with Ibn al-Ash<sup>3</sup>ath at Dayr al-Jamajim in A.H. 83 (A.C. 702). Other accounts place his death in the year 81 and 82 of the Hijrah.

336. AL-AWZĀ'Ī

Abū 'Amr 'Abd al-Raḥmān Ibn 'Amr Ibn Yuḥmid al-Awzā'ī, the chief imām or doctor of the law, among the Muslims of Syria, was the most learned man of that country in the science of Jurisprudence. It is said that he gave the solution of seventy thousand legal questions. He dwelt at Bayrūt. It is related that when Sufyān al-Thawrī heard that al-Awzā'ī was coming (to town), he went out to meet him, as far as Dhū Ṭāwa'<sup>1</sup> and taking the halter off al-Awzā'i's camel, he placed it about his own neck, and as he went on, he called out to the different bands of people whom he met: "Make way for the master!" Al-Awzā'i learned the Traditions from (Ibn Shihab) al-Zuhri and 'Aṭā (Ibn Abi Rabāḥ): he taught them to al-Ṭhawrī, who gave some on his authority, and he had besides a great number of other pupils, amongst whom was 'Abd Allah Ibn al-Mubārak. He was born at Ba'labek, A.H. 88 (A.C. 707) or 93; his childhood was passed at al-Biqā'<sup>1</sup>, whence his mother removed him to Bayrūt. In stature he was above the middle size; his beard was thin, his complexion tawny, and his hair was usually dyed with ḥinnā. His death took place on Sunday, the 27 of Ṣafar (some say in the first Rabi') A.H. 157 (January, A.C. 774)* at the town of Bayrūt. His tomb is in a village called Ḥiantūs, situated outside the gate of Bayrūt and inhabited solely by Muslims. He lies buried in the qiblah of the mosque, but the people of the place do not know who is interred there: they merely say: "Here reposes a man upon whom the Divine light descends." It is only persons of education who are aware of the real fact. A poet deplored his death in these lines: -

<sup>1</sup> Abū Ayyūb Khālid Ibn Zayd al-Anṣārī, a member of the tribe of Khazraj, was the person at whose house Muḥammad stopped on his arrival at Madinah, when forced to abandon Makkah. He fought under Muḥammad at Badr and Uhud, and under 'Alī at the battle of the Camel, at Siffin and at Nahrawān. He died A.H. 52 (A.C. 672), under the walls of Constantinople, during the siege of that city by the troops of the Khalīf Mu'āwiyah; a highly venerated mosque still marks the place of his interment.

<sup>2</sup> See No. 249.

<sup>3</sup> This place seems to have been in the neighbourhood of Baṣrah.

"May genial rains descend each evening on the tomb in Syria whose cavity contains al-Awzā'i! A tomb which contains a mountain of legal knowledge! blessings on that tomb from Him Who knoweth, and Who worketh good! The world offered itself to him but he turned away in pious abnegation; Oh, with what resolution!"

†[It is stated by the ḥāfiẓ Ibn 'Asākir in his History of Damascus, that al-Awzā'i went into a bath at Bayrūt, and the master of the establishment happening to be called away on some business, locked the door. When he returned, he went in and found al-Awzā'i dead, with his left hand placed under his cheek and his face turned towards Makkah. Others relate that it was his wife who locked the door, undesignedly, and that Sa'id Ibn Abd al-'Aziz ordered her to set free a slave in expiation of her fault.]

<sup>1</sup> Biqā' or Biqā' al-Kalb, an extensive canton situated between Ba'labek, Emessa and Damascus, is well watered and contains a great number of villages. —(Marāṣid.) See also Abu 'l-Fidā's Geography, Arabic text, page, 40, note, and the translation by M. Reinaud, page 49.

*16 January—Ed.

†[] From 'It' to 'fault' is not included in the autograph—Ed.

Awzā'i means belonging to Awzā'ah, which is a branch of a tribe in Yaman called Dhu 'l-Kalā'. Others state that his ancestor Awzā'ah belonged to the tribe of Hamdan, and that his real name was Marḥad Ibn Zayd. Some again say that al-Awzā'ah is a village near Damascus on the road proceeding from the gate of al-Farādīs, and that he drew his surname from thence; it is true, say they, that he was not a native of the place, but he resided there for some time having been one of the captives made by the Muslims when they first subdued Yaman. —Bayrūt is a village on the coast of Syria; the Franks took it from the Muslims on Friday the 10 Dhu 'l-Hijjah A.H. 593 (A.C. 1193).*

337. IBN AL-QĀSIM AL-M`LIKĪ

Abū 'Abd Allāh 'Abd al-Raḥman Ibn al-Qasim Ibn Khalid Ibn Junadah, surnamed al-'Utaqī, by right of adoption, was a doctor of the sect of Mālik and not less distinguished for his knowledge of the law than for his severe self-mortification. He studied Jurisprudence under Mālik and other teachers of the same epoch, and he continued, during the space of twenty years, to follow Mālik as a pupil. On the death of that imām, his disciples studied with great profit under Ibn al-Qasim. He is the author of the Mudawwanah (written collection), containing the doctrines peculiar to the Mālikites, and esteemed by them as one of their very best works on the subject. He gave lessons to Suḥrābī in Jurisprudence. His birth is placed diversely, in the years 132, 133 and 128 (A.C. 745); he died at Old Cairo on the eve of Friday, the 7 of Ṣafar, A.H. 191 (December, A.C. 806)†; and was interred in the cemetery outside the gate of the Lesser Qarāfah opposite to the tomb of Aṣḥḥab, the Mālikite doctor. I have visited those two monuments, which are situated near the city wall.—'Utaqī means belonging to the 'Utaqā (the liberated); these people were not all of the same tribe; some being descended from Ḥajar of (the tribe of) Ḥimyar; others from Sa'd al-'Aṣḥīrah, others again from the Muḍarite tribe of Kinānah, etc. The great majority of them resided at Old Cairo.

* 24 October, A.C. 1197.

† 25 December.—Ed.

and the 'Abd al-Rahman of whom we are now speaking was a mawla to Zubayd Ibn al-Ḥarith al-'Utaqī, who himself drew his descent from Ḥajar of Ḥimyar. Abū 'Abd Allāh al-Qudā'i says:

"The tribes which settled in the ẓāhir (back grounds) of Cairo were the 'Utaqā; this body of people consisted of bands belonging to various tribes, which waylaid the persons who went to visit the Prophet. In consequence of this conduct, he sent an expedition against them and had them all brought to him prisoners; he then gave them their liberty, and for this reason they were called the 'Utaqā.<sup>1</sup> "When 'Amr Ibn al-'Āṣī conquered Miṣr, an event which took place on Friday, the first of Muḥarram, A.H. 20 (December, A.C. 640), * the 'Utaqā were with him and formed a portion of the People of the Standard. These were so denominated for the following reason: The Arabs of each tribe had taken a distinctive standard, but some of the tribes were in such small numbers that a standard could not be granted to them; on which 'Amr Ibn al-'Āṣī said: 'I shall establish a standard bearing the name of no particular tribe, and it shall be your rallying point.' They consented to his proposal, and the title of the People of the Standard became a general denomination for them all, and such was the name by which they were designated on the muster-roll. When Alexandria was taken, 'Amr returned to Fuṣṭāṭ, and the different tribes marked out the grounds where they intended to build their dwellings. The 'Utaqā arrived afterwards, but not finding building-room where the People of the Standard had laid out their settlement, they made a complaint to 'Amr on the subject, and Mu'āwiyah Ibn Ḥudayj<sup>2</sup> who was director of the works, advised them to settle outside the other tribes and call the spot where they fixed their residence al-Zāhir (the outside). They adopted his counsel, and they then became known by the name of the People of the Zāhir." All this is taken from a Khiṭaṭ, or topographical description of Cairo, by Abū 'Amr Muḥammad Ibn Yūsuf Ibn Ya'qūb al-Tujībī<sup>1</sup>; it is a useful piece of information and necessary to be known, for which reason I am induced to give it.

<sup>1</sup> The citation which follows is taken from another work.

<sup>2</sup> This name is generally found written Khudayj (خديج) but its true orthography is given by Abū 'l-Mahāsīn in the Baḥr al-Z. khīr under the year 52.—Abū Nu'aym Mu'āwiyah Ibn Ḥudayj Ibn Juṇnah, a member of the tribe of Tujib, a branch of that of Kindah, joined the standard of Mu'ammad and was present at the taking of Makkah. When 'Amr Ibn al-'Āṣī got possession of Alexandria, it was Ibn Ḥudayj whom he dispatched with the news to the K̄alif 'Umar. He lost an eye in an expedition against the Nubians, undertaken by Ibn Abi 'l-Sarḥ, A.H. 31. He commanded three expeditions into Western Africa in A.H. 31, 34 and 40. He was one of the chief partisans of 'Uthmān, and, on the death of that k̄halif, he fought against the troops of 'Alī and slew Mu'ammad the son of Abū Bakr. In A.H. 45, the k̄halif Mu'āwiyah named him governor of Maṣhrig. Towards the end of 49, he returned to the East and held other important posts under the same prince. He died A.H. 52 (A.C. 672).—(Al-Baḥr al-Zākhīr, al-Nujūm al-zāhirah, Journal Asiatique for February, 1841.)

* 22 December.—Ed.

338. ABŪ SULAYMĀN AL-DĀRĀNĪ

Abū Sulaymān 'Abd al-Raḥmān Ibn Aḥmad Ibn 'Aḥyah al-'Ansī al-Dārānī, a person celebrated for his mortified life and one of the men of the path<sup>2</sup>; held an eminent rank among the holy ascetics, and was one of those who were the most successful in their efforts to attain the communion with the Divinity. A saying of his was: "He who doeth good works by day is protected (by Providence) during the night, and he who doeth good works by night is protected during the day." He said also: "When a man seriously renounces his lusts, Almighty God removes them from his heart; and He would be too just to punish a heart for the lusts left in it (by Himself)." He said again: "The best of works is to resist the passions of one's mind." He related also as follows: "I was saying my daily task of prayer, when sleep overcame me and behold! a maiden of paradise stood before me, and said: 'Thou sleepest, and yet I have been brought up for thee under the shelter of curtains during <sup>1</sup> This is the same historian noticed in No. 159. I should have there observed that the date of his death as given by Hājjī Khalīfah is false. Instead of 246, he must have intended to write 346, and the fact is that Abū 'l-Mahāsīn notices the death of a hāfiẓ named Muḥammad Ibn Ya'qūb Ibn Yūsuf, who died in that year. But this person was a native of Naysāpūr, a client to the Omayyides, and he bore the surname of Abū 'l-'Abbās; here is therefore a double error committed by Hājjī Khalīfah. Al-Dhahabī in his Annals is more satisfactory; he says under the year 350: "In the month of Shawwāl of this year died Abū 'Umar Muḥammad Ibn Yūsuf Ibn Ya'qūb Ibn Ḥafṣ Ibn Yūsuf Ibn Nuṣayr al-Kindī, the author of the history of Egypt; at the age of 67 years. Ibn Kullik in this place gives him the surname of Tujībī, not of Kindī; but this difficulty is easily got over; the tribe of Tujīb being descended from that of Kindah by the following line: Kindah, Aslḥras, Al-Sukūn, Sabīb, Aḥras, Tujīb. —I must observe that in the revised edition of Hājjī Khalīfah's text, MS. of the Bib. du Roi, fonds Schulz, Abū 'Umar's death is placed in A.H. 350, the foregoing observations are therefore completely borne out.

<sup>2</sup> See No. 111, note on Man of Path.

five hundred years!" He pronounced a great number of fine maxims. His death happened in A.H. 205 (A.C. 820-1), or A.H. 215*—"Ansi means belonging to the tribe of 'Ans, who was the son of Malik Ibn Udad; it is a branch of the tribe of Madhij.—Dārānī means belonging to Dārāyyā; Dārāyyā is a village in the Ghūṭah or cultivated country around Damascus: this relative adjective is formed irregularly.

339. AL-FURĀNĪ

Abu 'l-Qasim 'Abd al-Rahman Ibn Muhammad Ibn Ahmad Ibn Furān al-Furānī was a native of Marw and chief doctor of the *Shāfi*tes in that city. He was profoundly learned in the dogmas of religion and the developments of the law. His master in Jurisprudence was Abū Bakr al-Qaffal al-Shāshī. He composed works on the dogmas of the faith, on the doctrines of his sect, on the points of controversy subsisting between his sect and the others, on dialectics, and on the different religions and sects. Being then appointed the chief of the *Shāfi*te community, he filled the land with disciples. In explaining the doctrines of al-Shāfi'i, he treated some portions of them in a manner peculiar to himself and denoting great soundness of judgment. On these doctrines he drew up an instructive treatise, entitled al-Ibānah (the elucidation); and I heard one of the learned say that when the Imam al-Ḥaramayn was a boy, he went to al-Furānī's lessons; but, on account of his youth, his remarks and observations did not receive from his master the attention which they deserved: from that time he always preserved a feeling of rancour against al-Furānī, and it was he whom he had in view each time he says in his Nihāyat al-Maṭlab: A certain author says so and so, but is mistaken, which words he always follows up by an attack. Al-Furānī died at Marw, in the month of Ramaḍān, A.H. 461 (June-July, A.C. 1069) at the age of 73 years. The ḥāfiẓ 'Abd al-Ghāfir al-Fārisī mentions him in Siyāq, or continuation of

---

*The editor of Cairo edition on the authority of Yāqūt places his death in A.H. 235 (A.C. 849-50).—Ed.

(al-Hākim Ibn al-Bayyī's) History of Naysapūr.—“Fūrānī is a relative adjective formed from Fūrān, the name of his great-grandfather.” Such is the observation made by al-Samʿanī.

340. ABŪ SAʿD AL-MUTAWALLĪ

Ab Saʿd ʿAbd al-Raḥmān the son of Muḥammad (whose real name was Māmān), the son of ʿAlī (or of Ibrāhīm it is said), and surnamed al-Mutawallī, was a doctor of the sect of al-Shāfiʿī and a native of Naysapūr. To his great learning he united a profound spirit of piety; the rectitude of his conduct was not more admired than the scrupulous care with which he investigated legal questions; and in dogmatic theology, jurisprudence and controversy he displayed abilities of the highest order. On the death of the shaykh Abū Ishāq al-Shīrāzī, he was appointed professor in the Nizāmiyyeh College at Baghḍād; but towards the close of the year 476 (A.C. 1084), he was superseded by Abū Naṣr Ibn al-Ṣabbāḥ, the author of the Shāmil, who thus filled that post a second time<sup>1</sup> but was again removed from it in the following year, when Abū Saʿd al-Mutawallī was reinstated and continued to hold it till his death.

* [In the supplement to Abū Ishāq al-Shīrāzī's Ṭabaqāt, or Classification of the Jurisconsults, which was written by Abū ʿAbd Allāh Muḥammad Ibn ʿAbd al-Malik al-Hamadānī, this author says: “Ahmad Ibn Salāmah the muḥtasib<sup>2</sup> related to me as follows: when Abū Saʿd al-Mutawallī took his seat as professor, on the death of our shaykh, (meaning Abū Ishāq al-Shīrāzī), the jurisconsults disapproved of his sitting in the place which had been occupied by their former doctor, and wished that he had given a mark of deference to his predecessor by sitting lower. Their feelings on the subject did not escape the penetration of Abū Saʿd, and he said to them: ‘Know that, during the course of my life, two events only gave me pleasure; the first, that I came from beyond the Oxus and entered Sarakhs in garments much used and not such as are worn by persons of learning: I then went to the conference held by Abu 'l-Ḥarith Ibn Abi 'l-Faḍl al-Sarakhsī and sat down behind his pupils: they then discussed a question, and I spoke upon it and made objections; when it came to my turn to speak again, Abu 'l-Ḥarith bid me to come forward and I obeyed; I again spoke in my turn, and he told me to draw nearer, till at last he called me to him and seated me by his side; he then stood up with me and admitted me into the number of his disciples. On this occasion I was overpowered with joy. The second circumstance which gave me pleasure was, 'to be judged worthy of succeeding our shaykh Aba Isḥāq, which is the greatest delight and favour I could ever hope to enjoy.'"]

<sup>1</sup> See No. 5 and the life of Ibn al-Ṣabbāḥ.

<sup>2</sup> See No. 150, note on Muḥtasib.

* [I From ‘In’ to ‘enjoy’ on p. 120 is not included in the autograph.—Ed.

A number of eminent jurisconsults finished their studies under him; he himself had studied the law at Marw under Abu 'l-Qasim 'Abd al-Raḥmān al-Furānī (No. 339), at Marw al-Rūd under the Qaḍī Ḥusayn, and at Bukhārā under Abū Sahl Aḥmad Ibn 'Alī 'l-Abīwardī<sup>1</sup>. He learned also the Traditions, and composed a work on jurisprudence, entitled Tatimmat al-Ibānah, intended to form the completion of his master al-Furānī's treatise, the Ibānah, but he did not live to finish it. It only went as far as the chapter on punishments, but was terminated afterwards by the joint labours of some doctors, one of whom, Abu 'l-Futūḥ As'ad al-'Ijlī has been already noticed (No. 87). They did not, however, follow the plan nor attain the object of the original author, who had collected into that treatise legal questions of the rarest occurrence, and extraordinary cases, scarcely ever to be found in any other book. Al-Mutawallī composed also a short but very instructive treatise on the division of inheritances, and he drew up a system of controversy containing the indication of the different manners in which questions may be discussed. Another of his works is a short treatise on the dogmas of Muslim faith. All his writings are highly instructive. He was born at Naysapūr, A.H. 426 (A.C. 1034-5), some say A.H. 427; he died at Bagdad on the eve of Friday, the 18 of Shawwāl, A.H. 478 (February, A.C. 1086)<sup>2</sup> and was interred in the cemetery at the Abrez Gate.—I do not know for what reason he received the surname of al-Mutawallī, neither does al-Sam'ānī mention it.

<sup>1</sup> Abū Sahl Aḥmad Ibn 'Alī al-Abīwardī was a doctor of the Shāfi'ite sect, but little else is known of him than what is here indicated by Ibn Khallikān. The author of the Tabaqāt al-Shāfi'īn places his death by conjecture, between A.H. 460 and 480.

<sup>2</sup> 6 February—Ed.

341. FAKHR AL-DĪN IBN 'ASĀKIR THE JURISCONSULT

Abū Manṣūr 'Abd al-Raḥmān Ibn Muḥammad Ibn al-Ḥasan Ibn Hibat Allāh Ibn 'Abd Allāh Ibn al-Ḥusayn al-Dimishqī (native of Damascus), surnamed Fakhr al-Dīn (glory of the faith), and generally known by the appellation of Ibn 'Asakir al-Faqīh (the jurisconsult), was a doctor of the sect of al-Shāfi'i and the most eminent person of that age for his learning and piety. He studied jurisprudence under Quṭb al-Dīn Abū 'l-Ma'alī Mas'ūd al-Naysapūrī (a shaykh whose life will be found in this work), and derived great profit from his tuition during the period in which he lived with him as a pupil. He then married the daughter of his master, and, confiding in his own abilities, he professed for some time at Jerusalem and Damascus. Many of those who attended his lessons and completed their studies under him rose to distinction as imāms of great talent. The legal opinions which he gave as a mufti were held in high esteem for their correctness. He was brother's son to the ḥafīẓ Abū 'l-Qasim 'Alī Ibn 'Asakir, author of the history of Damascus. This family produced a number of men eminent for their learning and for the exalted posts which they filled. Fakhr al-Dīn was born, to the best of my opinion, A.H. 550 (A.C. 1155-6), and a note in his own handwriting states that his birth took place in that year<sup>1</sup>. He died at Damascus on Wednesday, the 10th of Rajab, A.H. 620 (August, A.C. 1123)*. I have visited his tomb, which is situated in the Cemetery of the Sufīs, outside Damascus.

342. ABU 'L-QASIM AL-ZAJJĀJĪ

Abū 'l-Qasim 'Abd al-Raḥmān Ibn Ishāq al-Zajjājī was an inhabitant of Baghḍad from his early youth, but by his birth he belonged to Nahāwand, which was also the native place of his family. He was a master of the highest authority in the science of grammar, <sup>1</sup> It may be perceived that this last passage was added subsequently. In the autograph, it is written in the margin.

*9 August—Ed.

on which subject he wrote his Kitāb al-Jumal al-Kubrā (the greater collection), which is an instructive work, but extended to too great length by the number of examples. He learned grammar from Muḥammad Ibn al-'Abbas al-Yazīdī, Abū Bakr Ibn Durayd, and Abū Bakr Ibn al-Anbarī; he had been also the private pupil of Abū Ishāq Ibrāhīm Ibn al-Sarī al-Zajjāj (see his life, No. 12) and from this circumstance he obtained the surname of al-Zajjāī. Great numbers profited by his tuition and finished their studies under him at Damascus, where he had fixed his residence. His death took place in that city, in the month of Rajab, A.H. 337 (January, A.C. 949); some say, but erroneously, in A.H. 339, or in Ramaḍān, A.H. 340. It has been stated also that he died at Tiberias. (I have since discovered that) he left Damascus in company with Ibn al-Ḥarīth, the administrator of the estates belonging to the Ikhshide family<sup>1</sup>, and (that) he died at Tiberias. His work, the Jumal, is most instructive, and none ever studied it without deriving great profit from the information it conveys. It is said that he composed it at Makkah, and that on finishing each chapter, he went seven times round the Ka'bah, praying the Almighty to pardon his sins and render his book useful to those who read it.

343. IBN YŪNUS THE HISTORIAN

Abū Sa'īd 'Abd al-Raḥmān Ibn Abī 'l-Ḥasan* Aḥmad Ibn Abī Mūsā Yūnus Ibn 'Abd al-A'la Ibn Mūsā Ibn Maysarah Ibn Ḥafṣ Ibn Ḥayyan† al-Ṣadafī was a native of Egypt, a traditionist and an historian. The information which he had acquired respecting eminent men, his acquaintance with the works in which their history was set forth, and the correctness of the facts which he adduces from personal knowledge, entitle him to the highest confidence. He composed two Egyptians histories,—the greater, containing the lives of natives of that country: and the less, giving an account of the most remarkable foreigners by whom it was visited. These works display no inferior talent, and have been continued, on the same plan, by Abu 'l-Qāsim Yahya Ibn 'Alī al-Ḥaḍramī.<sup>1</sup> Abū Sa'īd was a grandson of Yūnus Ibn 'Abd al-A'la, one of al-Shāfi'i's most distinguished disciples and a transmitter of that imām's modern sayings;<sup>2</sup> we shall give his life in this work. Ibn Yūnus died on Sunday, the 26 of the latter Jumādā, A.H. 347 (September, A.C. 958);* the funeral prayers were said over him the next day by Abū 'l-Qāsim Ibn Ḥajjāj and the following elegy was composed on his death by the grammarian and prosodist Abū 'Īsa 'Abd al-Raḥmān Ibn Isma'il Ibn 'Abd Allāh Ibn Sulaymān al-Khawlanī al-Khashshab, who was a native of Egypt:

<sup>1</sup> The Ikhshide prince Anūjūr was then reigning in Egypt under the tutorship of the celebrated Kāfūr. He held his authority over that country and Syria by right of an act of confirmation issued by the Khalif of Baḡdhād, al-R. dī.—(See the life of Kāfūr).

* The editor of Cairo edition gives Abī 'l-Ḥusayn.—Ed.

† The editor of Cairo edition gives Ḥabbān.—Ed.

"By thy books and thy lessons thou hast spread learning throughout the world<sup>3</sup>, and after a happy life thou art become one of the lamented. And we, Abū Sa'īd! shall not relax our dutiful efforts, till thy works, confirming and correcting (the statements of historians), have obtained a wide renown. In writing history, thy ardour did not cease, till thy name appeared to us, enregistered in its annals. I have inscribed this fatal date on my mind and written it in my pages, that he may know it who records my death, if it happen that I leave a friend to regret me<sup>4</sup>. Thou hast displayed a standard to make known the fame of those who dwell in Egypt, and

<sup>1</sup> According to Hājji Khalīfah. Fluegel's edition, Vol. II, page 143, Abū 'l-Qāsim Yahyā Ibn 'Alī al-Ḥaḍramī, surnamed al-Ṭahhān, died A.H. 416 (A.C. 1025-6). In the same page, line 7, is a double error, as instead of Ibn Yūnus 'Abd al-Raḥmān Ibn Ahmad Sūfi we must read Ibn Yūnus 'Abd al-Raḥmān Ibn Ahmad Sadifi; it being, in fact, the same person whose life is here given by Ibn Khallikān.

<sup>2</sup> See No. 149, note on uncient sayings.

<sup>3</sup> In the autograph manuscript, two different readings are given of this first hemistich; that of the text runs thus: بشكى علمى تشرىفا و تغرىبا. "Thou hast spread thy learning abroad, east and west," the other inserted in the margin, runs as follows: بينت علمى ثمنيا و تغرىبا. "Thou hast made thy knowledge clear to others by thy written works and rendered it accessible by thy explanations." The reading which I followed is given by al-Yāfi'i in his Annals.

<sup>4</sup> For محبوبا the autograph has محسوبا; if the latter reading be adopted, the translation of the verse should run thus: "That he may know it who records my death, if indeed I be deemed, worthy of notice."

* 12 September—Ed.

hast set it upon the basis of their merit<sup>1</sup>. Thou hast revealed their glory, (to subsist) among mankind as long as the voice of the turtle-dove is heard<sup>2</sup> resounding in the groves. Thou hast pointed out their brilliant genius; thou hast selected the eminent<sup>3</sup> men whose talents attract investigation. Thou hast spread the fame of the illustrious dead, and they still live in the notices wherein thou tracest their descent; mentioned thus, they seem not to have died. Noble qualities oblige to noble deeds; and in thee, O 'Abd al-Raḥman! these qualities were firmly implanted. Thou art now hidden from our eyes; and let the world produce the greatest man it may, he too must disappear. Such are death's doings; he never spares him who is cherished by his friends."

Ṣadafī means belonging to the tribe of al-Ṣadif, the son of Sahl, a great branch of the tribe of Ḥimyar, which settled in Egypt. This relative adjective is pronounced with an a in the second syllable, although the word from which it is derived has that syllable with an i; it is thus also with Namari, derived from Namirah and such is indeed the general rule (when the primitive has an i in the second-syllable). [It must however be remarked that al-Ṣadif is sometimes pronounced al-Ṣadafī.]—Abū 'Īsā 'Abd al-Raḥmān, author of the verses just given, died in the month of Ṣafar, A.H. 366 (October, A.C. 976).

344. IBN AL-ANBĀRĪ THE GRAMMARIAN

Abu 'l-Barakat 'Abd al-Raḥman Ibn Abi 'l-Wafā Muḥammad Ibn 'Ubayd Allāh Ibn Abi Sa'īd al-Anbārī the grammarian, surnamed Kamāl al-Dīn (perfection of religion), was one of the most distinguished masters in the science he professed. From his early youth till the time of his death he resided at Baghḍad, where he studied, at the Niẓāmiyah college. The system of Jurisprudence peculiar to the Shāfite sect, and gave lessons in grammar. He learned philology from Abū Maṣṣūr (Mawḥibh) Ibn al-Jawālīqī and had lived as a private pupil with the sharīf Abū 'l-Sa'ādat Hibat Allāh Ibn al-Shajārī,<sup>1</sup> under whose tuition he made great progress and attained a profound knowledge of philology. His own lessons were attended by great numbers who afterwards became conspicuous for their learning and with some of whom I was acquainted. He is the author of a grammatical work, easy to be understood and highly instructive, entitled Asrār al-'Arabiyyah (secrets of the Arabic language); he composed also another treatise on the same subject, bearing the title of al-Mīzān (the balance). In a third work, which though short, is comprehensive, he gives a chronological list (Ṭabaqāt) of the literary men, both ancient and modern. All his productions are replete with information, and his personal instructions were, by Divine favour, so highly successful that none ever received them without rising to distinction. Towards the close of his life, he renounced the world and worldly society, and shut himself up in his chamber that he might pass his time in study and prayer; thus holding to the last a most praiseworthy conduct. His birth took place in the month of the latter Rabī' A.H. 513 (July-August, A.C. 1119), and his death on the eve of Friday, the 9th of Sha'ban, A.H. 577 (December, A.C. 1181),* at Baghḍad. He was interred at the Abrez Gate, in the mausoleum erected over the grave of Abū Ishāq al-Shīrāzī.—Anbārī means belonging to al-Anbār, which is a town of great antiquity situated on the Euphrates, at the distance of ten parasangs from Baghḍad. It was so called because the Kisrā (or Persian king) had established granaries (anābir) there. Anābir is the plural of anbār, which is itself the plural of Nibr.

<sup>1</sup> In this verse Ibn Khallikān writes لجمال : the verse then signifies : "Thou hast displayed a standard to honour the merit of those who dwell in Egypt, (a standard) firmly set up"

<sup>2</sup> For سعت the autograph has سجت . The meaning is then : "As long as the cooing of the turtle-dove resounds in the groves".

<sup>3</sup> Here the autograph has نجب for نجب the sense is the same.

345. ABU 'L-FARAJ IBN AL-JAWZĪ

The ḥāfiẓ Abū 'l-Faraj Ibn al-Jawzī, surnamed Jamāl al-Dīn (the beauty of religion) a celebrated preacher, a doctor of the sect of

<sup>1</sup> The life of Ibn al-Jawālīqī and Ibn al-Shajārī are given in this work.

* 18 December—Ed.

Ibn Ḥanbal and a native of Baḡdād, was a member of the tribe of Taym, a branch of that of Quraysh, and a descendant of the khalif Abū Bakr; he therefore bore the appellations of al-Qurashī, al-Taymī, and al-Bakrī. His genealogy is traced up as follows: Abū 'l-Faraj 'Abd al-Rahmān Ibn Abī 'l-Ḥasan 'Alī Ibn Muḥammad Ibn 'Alī Ibn 'Ubayd Allāh Ibn 'Abd Allāh Ibn Ḥummad Ibn Aḥmad Ibn Muḥammad Ibn Ja'far al-Jawzī Ibn 'Abd Allāh Ibn al-Qasim Ibn al-Naḍr Ibn al-Qasim Ibn Muḥammad Ibn 'Abd Allāh Ibn 'Abd al-Rahmān Ibn al-Qasim Ibn Muḥammad Ibn Abī Bakr al-Ṣiddīq; the rest of the ancestry is well known<sup>1</sup>. Ibn al-Jawzī was the most learned man of his time, the ablest traditionist and the first preacher of that epoch. He composed works on a variety of subjects, and one of them, the Zād al-Masīr fi-'Ilm al-Tafsīr (provisions for the journey, being a treatise on the science of Qur'ānic interpretation), forms four volumes and contains many novel facts and observations. He wrote also numerous treatises on the Traditions, and a great historical work, entitled al-Muntazim (the regularly arranged). Another of his productions the Mawḥiāt (forgeries), in four volumes, contains all the false traditions relative to Muḥammad. He composed also the Talqīḥ Fuhām (Ahl) al-Aṭhar (fructification of the intellect, for the use of those who are engaged in historical researches<sup>2</sup>), which is drawn up on the plan of Ibn Qutaybah's kitāb al-Ma'ārif.* We shall close this list by merely stating that his works are too numerous to be counted. The quantity of sheets which he wrote with his own hand was very great, but people exaggerate when they say that on summing up the number of kurrāsahs<sup>3</sup> written by him and taking into account the length of his life, if the former be divided by the latter, it will give nine kurrāsahs a-day; but this is a result so extraordinary, that it can hardly

<sup>1</sup> The khalif Abū Bakr 'Abd Allāh was the son of Abū Quḥṣafah 'Uṭaymīn Ibn 'Amīr Ibn 'Amr Ibn Ka'b Ibn Sa'd Ibn Taym Ibn Muṭrah Ibn Ka'b Ibn Luwayyī Ibn Ḥalīb Ibn Fihri Qurayshī.—(See Kosegarten's Tabari, tom. II, page 145).

<sup>2</sup> Copies of the first volume of this work are not rare. It contains a short account of Muḥammad and his principal Companions, lists of the other companions, of the Ṭābi'is, and of the early Traditionists, etc.

<sup>3</sup> The kurrāsah generally contains twenty pages. Arabic, Persian, and Turkish books are composed of kurrāsahs in the same manner as European books are composed of sheets.

* The editor of Cairo edition adds Iuḡaṭ al-Manāfi لقط المنافع to the list—Ed.

be admitted by any reasonable man. It is related also that the parings of the reed-pens with which he wrote the Traditions were gathered up and formed a large heap; these, in pursuance to his last orders, were employed to heat the water for washing his corpse, and there was even more than enough for the purpose. He composed some pretty verses, and the following, in which he addresses the people of Baghdād, were repeated to me by a person of talent:

"There are people in 'Irāq for whom I feel no friendship, but my excuse is this: their hearts are formed of churlishness: They listen with admiration to the words of a stranger, but those of their own townsmen attract no attention. If a neighbour profited by the water which flows from the roofs of their houses, they would turn the spout in another direction. And when reproached, their excuse is: That the voice of the songstress has no charms for the tribe to which she belongs<sup>1</sup>."

The quantity of verses which he composed is very great. At the assemblies which met to hear him preach, he had occasionally to answer questions addressed to him, and this he did with great readiness of wit. It is related that on a dispute between the Sunnites and Shi'ites of Baghdād about the relative merits of Abū Bakr and 'Alī, both parties agreed to abide by the opinion of the shaykh Abu 'l-Faraj: they in consequence deputed a person who questioned him on the subject when he was seated in the preacher's chair. The reply which he made bears in Arabic two different meanings; the first, that the best of them was he whose daughter was married to the other man; and the second that the best of them was he who had married the daughter of the other man<sup>2</sup>. He then withdrew promptly lest he should be questioned farther, and the Sunnites said: "He means Abū Bakr, because his daughter 'A'ishah was married to the Prophet."—"Nay," said the Shi'ites, "he means 'Alī, because Faṭimah the Prophet's daughter, was married to him." The answer was certainly very clever, had it even been the result of long reflexion and deep consideration, it would have been admirable, but coming as it did, without any previous preparation, it was still more so. It would be too long to enumerate the particular circumstances in which his character and talents appeared to great advantage. His birth is placed by approximation in A.H. 508 (A.C. 1114-5); but some accounts refer it to the year 510; he died at Baghdād on the eve of Friday, the 12 of Ramaḍān, A.H. 597 (A.C. June, 1201),* and was interred at the gate of Ḥarb. His father's death took place in 514 (A.C. 1120-1).—Jawzi means belonging to the port of al-Jawz, which is a well-known place.<sup>1</sup>

---

<sup>1</sup> Consequently a stranger would amuse them better. In the printed text are two typographical faults, ميازيهم for ميازيهم and الغريب for الغريب.

<sup>2</sup> It is impossible to turn an English phrase so as to convey the double meaning which the original Arabic here involves.

346. AL-SUHAYLĪ

Abu 'l-Qāsim, surnamed also Abū Zayd, 'Abd al-Raḥmān al-Klath'amī al-Suhaylī was the son of the khaṭīb, or preacher, Abū Muḥammad 'Abd Allāh, the son of the khaṭīb Abū 'Umar Aḥmad, the son of Abū 'l-Ḥasan Aṣḥagh, the son of Ḥusayn, the son of Sa'dūn, the son of Riḍwān, the son of Fuṭūḥ, who was the first of the family who came into Spain: "Such," says Ibn Dihyah, "is his genealogy as I took it down from his own lips." This is the celebrated imām who composed the commentary on (Ibn Hishām's Sirat al-Rasūl, or Life of the Prophet, entitled al-Rawḍ al-Unuf (the gardens of delight)<sup>1</sup>. In another work, the Kitāb al-Ta'rif wa'l-I'lām (book of information and indications), he has elucidated the proper names of doubtful pronunciation (or derivation), contained in the Qur'ān. He wrote also the Natā'ij al-Fikr (offspring of reflexion)<sup>2</sup>; a treatise on the appearance of the Divinity or of the Prophet in dreams; another, entitled al-Sirr (the mystery), in which he examines why al-Dajjāl (or Antichrist) is to be blind of one eye, with many other instructive disquisitions. The following piece of نفي على النحو.

<sup>1</sup> The author of the Marāsid notices a region called the river of al-Jawz, situated between Aleppo and al-Birah and containing a great number of villages and gardens; but the port of al-Jawz was probably the name of a wharf on the banks of the Tigris, in or near Baḡhdād.

<sup>2</sup> Literally: The unblemished gardens; that is; garden which have never been profaned by the visit of any mortal.

<sup>3</sup> It appears from Ḥājjī Khalifah that this is a treatise on grammar

* 15 June—Ed.

verse is given by Ibn Dihyah, to whom al-Suhaylī recited it with this remark: "I and every person who repeated it, when asking a favour from Almighty God, obtained the fulfilment of their desire":

"O Thou who knowest the secret thoughts of man! Thou art his ready support when misfortune befalls him. O Thou in whom the afflicted place their hopes of deliverance! Thou to whom they address their complaints and fly for refuge! Thou, the treasures of whose bounty are produced by a sole word of thine—Be! grant my prayer, for with Thee is all good. My only mediator with Thee is my poverty, and that is yet more oppressive. joined as it is to the need in which I stand of Thy assistance. My only resource is now to knock at Thy door; and if I am repulsed, at what door shall I knock? O Thou whom I implore and whose name I invoke, if Thy bounty be withheld from me, Thy needy creature, yet let not Thy glory plunge a sinner into despair; for Thy grace is abundant and Thy bounties are immense."

He composed a great deal of poetry, and as for his other works, they are replete with information. He continued in his native place, leading a life of purity and subsisting on very slender means, till the sovereign of Morocco (Ya'qūb al-Manṣūr) heard of his merit and invited him to that city. On his arrival, he met with a most favourable reception from the prince and was treated with the greatest kindness till his death, which occurred about three years afterwards. He was born at Mālaqah, A.H. 508 (A.C. 1114-5), and he died at the city of Morocco on Thursday, the 26 of Sha'bān, A.H. 581 (November, A.C. 1185)*; he was interred the same day at the hour of the afternoon prayer. Al-Suhaylī was deprived of the use of his sight.—Khath'amī means belonging to Khath'am Ibn Anmār, a great tribe so called, but other derivations are given of this adjective,—Suhaylī means belonging to Suhayl, a village near Mālaqah which received this name, because the only spot in all Spain from which the star Suhayl (Canopus) could be seen was on the summit of a mountain at the foot of which this place was situated.—Mālaqah is a great city in Spain; al-Sam'ānī pronounces it Māliqah, but erroneously.

---

* 21 November.—Ed.

347. ABŪ MUSLIM AL-KHURĀSĀNĪ

Aba Muslim 'Abd al-Raḥmān the son of Muslim, some say of 'Uthman, al-Khurasānī, was the champion and assertor of the rights of the Abbasides to the Khālifate. According to some accounts, his name was Ibrāhīm the son of 'Uthman Ibn Yasar Ibn Shadūs<sup>1</sup> Ibn Jādern, a descendant of Buzurjīn hr Ibn Bakhtigan the Persian<sup>2</sup> but he changed it to 'Abd al-Raḥmān at the desire of Ibrāhīm the imām Ibn Muḥammad Ibn 'Alī Ibn 'Abd Allah Ibn al-'Abbās Ibn 'Abd al-Muṭṭalib, who said to him: "Change thy name or else our enterprise will not succeed."—God knows if this be true.—His father belonged to a village called Sanjird situated in the canton (rustāq) of Farīd'n<sup>3</sup>; but some say that he was a native of Makḥwān, a village three parasangs from Marv. This village and some other were his own property, and from time to time he exported cattle to Kūfah. He then contracted to farm the revenue of Farīdīn, but at one period, in consequence of his inability to keep his engagements, the government agent sent a person to bring him before the court of administration. He possessed at that time a slave girl called Washīqah, whom he had purchased at Kūfah and confided to the care of Adḥīn Ibn Bundād Ibn Wastijān;<sup>4</sup> her, then pregnant, he took with him, and, to avoid meeting the officers empowered to make him pay in the amount of his yearly rent, he proceeded towards Adḥarbījan. On his way, he passed through the canton of Fātiq, when he met 'Isā Ibn Ma'qil Ibn 'Umayr, the brother of Idrīs Ibn Ma'qil who was grandfather to Aba Dulaf al-'Ijlī. He stopped with 'Isā for some days, and had there a dream in which it seemed to him that a fire proceeded from his loins and then mounted to the sky, whence it illuminated the earth as far as the horizon, after which it fell in an eastern direction. He told his dreams to 'Isā Ibn Ma'qil who replied: "I have no doubt but that she will bear a boy." On quitting his host he went to Adḥarbījan where he died, and his slave brought forth Aba Muslim who passed his first years at the house of 'Isā.

<sup>1</sup> The autograph has شذوس

<sup>2</sup> This was the celebrated Wazīr of Anushīrwān. See D'Herbelot's Bib orient. Buzurge Mihir.

<sup>3</sup> This word is written in the autograph with a point on the;

<sup>4</sup> The autograph has وستجان

*The editor of Cairu edition gives وسجان Washḥān.—Ed

When grown a boy Abū Muslim went to the same school with 'Isa's son, and on finishing his studies there, he attracted general attention by the learning and intelligence which he displayed at so early an age. Soon after, 'Isa Ibn Ma'qil and his brother Idrīs* (grandfather of Abū Dulaf) allowed their arrears with the state to run up so high that they avoided going to the receivers of the revenue at Ispahan, and the 'āmil<sup>1</sup> of that place made the circumstance known to Khalid Ibn 'Abd Allah al-Qasrī, the governor of Arabian and Persian 'Iraq. Khalid, who was then at Kufah, had them arrested and brought before him after which he cast them into prison, where they found (a relation of theirs) 'Āṣim Ibn Yunus al-'Ijlī, confined for some misdeed. Previously to this, 'Isa had sent Abū Muslim to bring him the crops from the territory of a certain village in the canton of Fatiq. On his way back, Abū Muslim received the information of his patron's imprisonment, on which he sold all the corn he was bringing with him and took the price thereof to 'Isā who immediately sent him to lodge in his own palace, in the quarter of the city inhabited by the people of the 'Ijlite tribe. He then made frequent visits to 'Isa and his brother Idrīs in their prison, and it happened that a number of naqibs (lieutenants) in the service of Muḥammad Ibn 'Alī Ibn 'Abd Allah Ibn al-'Abbas Ibn al-Muṭṭalib, who had just arrived at Kufah in company with some natives of Khurasan, devoted partisans of the Abbasides, and who went to the prison with the intention of paying their respects to the 'Ijlite prisoners, found Abū Muslim with them. His intelligence and knowledge, his elegant language and his learning struck them with admiration, nor were his own feelings less biassed in their favour. Their intentions then became known to him, and he learned that they were missionaries in the service of the Abbaside family. Towards the same time, 'Isa and Idrīs effected their escape from prison, and Abū Muslim left the quarter where the 'Ijlites resided, and joined these naqibs, with whom he some time afterwards proceeded to Makkah. On arriving there, they went to Ibrāhīm the son of Muḥammad the Abbaside, who had succeeded to the imāmate on the death of his father; and they presented him with twenty thousand pieces of gold and two hundred thousand pieces of silver. (Of this Ibrāhīm we shall speak again in the life of his father.) They then introduced Abū Muslim, and Ibrāhīm, struck with his language, intelligence, and instruction, said to them: "This youth will be a calamity to crush the foe.<sup>1</sup>" From that moment, Abū Muslim remained in Ibrāhīm's service, accompanying him in his travels, and staying with him wherever he took up his residence. After some time the naqibs called openly on the people to espouse the cause of the imām, and they asked Ibrāhīm for a man capable of directing the proceedings of their party in Khurasan. His reply was: "I have put this Iṣpāhānīte to the test, and know his interior as well as his exterior; he is the whole rock of the earth (and will crush all before him)."<sup>2</sup> He then called him in, and having appointed him to the direction of affairs, he dispatched him to Khurasan. Such was the commencement of Abū Muslim's public career. Previously to this, Ibrāhīm had commissioned Sulaymān Ibn Kathīr al-Ḥarrānī to proceed to Khurasan and make an appeal in favour of the People of the House.<sup>3</sup> On sending Abū Muslim thither, he directed his partisans in that province to obey him as their chief, and at the same time he ordered Abū Muslim to obey Sulaymān bn Kathīr; Abū Muslim then became the envoy who kept up the communications between Sulaymān and the imām Ibrāhīm. —The khalīf al-Mamūn once said, on hearing Abū Muslim's name mentioned: "The greatest princes of the earth were three in number, and each of them caused an empire to pass from one dynasty to another; I mean Alexander, Ardāshīr<sup>4</sup> and, Abū Muslim the Khurasānite." [During a number of years, Abū Muslim continued his appeals to the people in favour of a person belonging to

<sup>1</sup> See no. 184, note on 'āmil.

*'Grandfather of Abū Dulaf', omitted by de Slane.—Ed.

<sup>1</sup> Literally: "This is a calamity of the calamities;" a common expression used in speaking of mighty men and heroes.

<sup>2</sup> The People of the House, that is, the members of the family of Mu'ammad. The partisans of 'Alī naturally supposed that it was his descendants who were meant, and they joined in the conspiracy. But as al-'Abbas was an uncle of Mu'ammad, the 'Abbasides pretended that they also were People of the House, and they thus usurped the throne. It was precisely the equivocalness of the term which induced the 'Abbasides to employ it.

<sup>3</sup> Ardāshīr overthrew the Aṣhkānian dynasty and founded that of the Sāsānides.

<sup>4</sup> The following long passage is translated from the text of the autograph MS., in which it is written on the margin of the page. It exists also in one of the MSS. of the Bih. du Roi, but as I had some doubts of its authenticity, I suppressed it. The original text shall be given with the supplementary notes and corrections which are to accompany the Arabic edition.

the family of Hāshim<sup>1</sup>, and performed in Khurasan and the neighbouring places those deeds which are too well known to require relation here<sup>2</sup>. Marwān Ibn Muḥammad (the last of the Umayyides) employed every artifice to discover the true nature of these proceedings and the real person for whom Abū Muslim was making such exertions; and he found at length that this person was Ibrāhīm, the imām, who was then residing with his brothers and relatives at al-Ḥumaymah, a place of which we shall speak again in the life of 'Alī Ibn 'Abd Allah Ibn al-'Abbās. He immediately sent to have him arrested and brought to Ḥarran; on which Ibrāhīm delegated his rights and authority to his own brother 'Abd Allah al-Saffāḥ. When he arrived at Ḥarran he was kept in confinement by Marwān, but after some time the latter had him thrust head foremost into a leather sack containing a quantity of quicklime; the mouth of the sack was then tied up and kept closed till the victim perished. This event took place in the month of Ṣafar, A.H. 132 (September-October 749). It is said by some, that he was put to death in a different manner, but that which we have mentioned is borne out by the general opinion. Ibrāhīm was then fifty-one years of age; he was buried somewhere within the wall of Ḥarran, and Abū Muslim immediately called on the people to support the rights of Abū 'l-'Abbās 'Abd Allah Ibn Muḥammad, surnamed al-Saffāḥ. It had been a rule with the Umayyides to prevent the descendants of the Hāshim from marrying any woman belonging to the tribe of Ḥārith, on account of a prediction which declared that this business (of the 'Abbaside conspiracy) would terminate successfully by the accession of a Ḥārithite female's son (Ibn al-Ḥārithiyah) to the supreme power. When 'Umar Ibn 'Abd al-'Azīz was raised to the khālifate, Muḥammad Ibn 'Alī went to him and said: "I wish to marry the daughter of my maternal uncle, who is of the tribe of Ḥārith Ibn Ka'b; will you give me your permission?"—"Marry whom you like," replied 'Umar, on which he took to wife Rayṭah the daughter of 'Ubayd Allah, who was the son of 'Abd Allah al-Midān, the son of al-Rakkāb, the son of Qaṭan, the son of Ziyād, the son of al-Ḥarith Ibn Ka'b. This woman bore him a son who was the al-Saffāḥ above mentioned.] * Al-Madā'ini<sup>1</sup> gives the following description of Abū Muslim's person: "He was low in stature, of a tawny complexion, with handsome features and engaging manners; his skin was clear, his eyes large, his forehead lofty, his beard ample and bushy, his hair long and his back also, his legs and thighs short, and his voice soft; he spoke Arabic and Persian with elegance and discoursed agreeably; he could recite many poems and had great skill in conducting public affairs. He was never observed to laugh and he never condescended to jest except at proper times. The gravest events could hardly disturb the serenity of his countenance; he received news of the most important victories without expressing the least symptom of joy; under the greatest reverses of fortune he never betrayed the slightest uneasiness; and when angered he never lost his self-command. He abstained from intercourse with females, except once in each year. 'Such an act,' said he, 'is a sort of folly, and it is quite enough for a man to be mad once a year.' With all this, he was the most jealous of mortals<sup>2</sup>." Abū Muslim had some brothers, one of whom was Yaṣar, the grandfather of 'Alī Ibn Ḥamzah Ibn 'Umarah Ibn Ḥamzah Ibn Yaṣar al-Iṣpahanī. The birth of Abū Muslim took place A.H. 100 (A.C. 718-9) in the khalifate of 'Umar Ibn 'Abd al-'Azīz, at a village called Nāwanah<sup>3</sup> in the canton of Fatīq. The natives of Jay, the quarter of Iṣpahan so called, pretend that he was born in their city. He made his first public appearance in Kūrasān at the city of Marw, on Friday, the 21, or according to al-Khaṭīb (al-Baghḍādī), on the 25 of Ramaḍān, A.H. 129 (June, A.C. 747).† Naṣr Ibn Sayyār

---

<sup>1</sup> He thus deceived the Shi'ites and drew them over to his party. They imagined that he intended to place a descendant of Muḥammad on the throne, whilst his real design was to establish on it a descendant of al-'Abbās, Muḥammad's uncle. 'Abbās and Muḥammad were both descended from Hāshim, who was grandfather of the one and great-grandfather of the other.

<sup>2</sup> The history of Abū Muslim's proceedings will be found in Abū 'l-Fedī, Price, al-Makin, etc.

<sup>1</sup> See No. 183, note on al-Madā'ini.

<sup>2</sup> Here in the autograph MS. are inserted these words: وَقِيلَ لَهُ لِمَ بَلَغْتَ مَا بَلَغْتَ. قَالَ مَا خَرْتُ، أَمْرِي يَوْمِي الْيَوْمَ. "He was once asked how he attained to such an authority as he then possessed, to which he replied: 'I never put off till to-morrow the business of to-day.'" Then follow two passages containing some insignificant anecdotes from al-Zamaḥsharī's Rabī' al-Abrār, they are not in Ibn Khallikān's hand, but in that of the person who inserted in the life of Sayf al-Islām Tuḡhtikīn, a passage from a supposed author, 'Izz al-Dīn Ibn 'Asākir. This person's additions do not seem to merit great confidence.

<sup>3</sup> The autograph has نَوَانَه and the Marāṣid مَوَانَه as in the printed text. [This passage is omitted by the editor of Cairo edition but it is included in Tehran edition.—Ed.

†9 June, the latter date appears to be correct because Friday fell on that date.—Ed.

al-Laythī, who was then governor of Kiurāsān for Marwān Ibn Muḥammad, the last of the Umayyides (and who discovered what was passing), then wrote the following line to the khalīf:

"I see here a young horse who will never be broken in, if once he casts his first teeth; hasten then, before he gets his second teeth."

To this, Marwān made no reply, being then engaged in quelling some insurrections which had broken out in Mesopotamia and other provinces [one of which was headed by al-Ḥajjāk Ibn Qays al-Ḥarārī]<sup>1</sup> Abū Muslim had at that time only fifty followers. The governor then wrote to Marwān a second letter, containing the following verses [extracted from a long poem composed by a poet whom he had in his service, and who kept a school in Kiurāsān. This poet, whose name was Abū Maryam 'Abd Allāh Ibn Ismā'il, was a member of the tribe of Bujlāh and a native of Kūfah]:

"I see fire glimmer under the ashes, and it will soon burst out in flames. Fire is produced by the friction of wood, and war has its beginning in discourses. If men of prudence do not extinguish it, human heads and bodies will be its fuel. O that I knew whether the sons of Umayyah be awake or sunk in sleep! If they are sleeping in such times as these, say to them: 'Arise, the hour is come'."<sup>2</sup>

The answer to this did not arrive, and Abū Muslim's power became so great that Naṣr had to abandon Khurāsān, and was retreating to 'Irāq when he died on the way, near Sawah, a place not

<sup>1</sup> See No. 47, note on battle of Marj Rāḥit.

<sup>2</sup> Here the author has another passage added in the margin, and which is found also in some of the other copies. As it is in contradiction with what precedes and what follows, I suppressed it in the Arabic text, but shall give it here in English: "This has some similarity with what is related of one of the 'Alides, Muhammad Ibn 'Abd Allāh Ibn al-Ḥasan Ibn 'Alī Ibn Abī Ṭālib (or his brother Ibrāhīm Ibn 'Abd Allāh), who, when revolted against Abū Ja'far al-Manṣūr, recited these lines:

"I see a fire blazing on the heights and lighting up the country round. The sons of al-'Abbā's mind it not but pass their night in (false) security and enjoyment. They slumber as Umayyah did, and like him they will awaken to avert the danger, when it is too late."

"Let us return to our subject: Ibn Sayyār awaited Marwān's answer, which at length arrived; it contained these words: 'We were sleeping when we gave you the government of Khurāsān; he that is present sees what the absent does not. Cut off the wart which is before you.' On reading these words, Naṣr said: 'I told you that he could be of no assistance'. He then wrote to him second (third) time".

far from Hamadān. His death took place in the month of the first Rab', A.H. 131 (November, A.C. 748). [He had governed Khurāsān ten years.] On Tuesday the 28 of Mu'arram, A.H. 132 (September, A.C. 749) 'Abū Muslim attacked and imprisoned 'Alī Ibn Juday' Ibn 'Alī al-Kirman' at Naysapūr; he then put him to death, and having seated himself in the chair of state, he was saluted governor, after which he officiated at the public prayer and pronounced the khutbah, imploring the blessing of God on al-Saffāh. Abu 'l-'Abbās 'Abd Allāh Ibn Mu'ammad, the first khalif of the family of al-'Abbās. Khurāsān then submitted to him without resistance, and the authority of the Umayyides having ceased throughout the province, he despatched an army against Marwān Ibn Muḥammad. The same year, on the eve of Friday the 13 of the latter Rabi' (25 November, A.C. 749), al-Saffāh, was proclaimed khalif at K'fah where he suddenly made his appearance<sup>2</sup>. Other dates are assigned, however, to this event. The Khurāsānites and the other troops were then placed under the orders of 'Abd Allāh Ibn 'Alī, the uncle of al-Saffāh, and they marched against Marwān who had advanced as far as the Zāb [the river between Moṣul and Arbela], and in an engagement which took place at Kuṣḥāf [a village in that neighbourhood], Marwān's army was defeated. He then retreated to Syria, but being closely pursued by 'Abd Allāh, who followed with all his forces, he retreated to Egypt. ['Abd Allāh halted at Damascus, but sent a body of troops under the orders of al-Asfar (who is named also Musfar or 'Amir) Ibn Ismā'il al-Jurjānī, in pursuit of the prince.] Marwān then arrived at Buṣīr, a village near al-Fayyūm (in Egypt) and was slain on the eve of Sunday, the 26 of Dhu 'l-Hijjah, A.H. 132 (5 August, A.C. 750); [or, it is said, in the month of Dhu 'l-Qa'dah. He fell by the hand of the 'Amir abovementioned, who then cut off his head and sent it to al-Saffāh, by whose orders it was carried to Abū Muslim, that it might be exposed to public view in the towns of Khurāsān. (When Marwān was at his last moments) some person asked him what had reduced him to such a state, and he replied: "The little attention which I paid to Naṣr Ibn Sayyār's letters when

1 The autograph has in the margin: بن جديع بن علي .

2 He had remained in concealment for some time, lest the Umayyides should put him to death. See Abu'l-Fida.

*16 September—Ed.

he wrote to me from Khurasān for assistance.”] The fall of Marwān is an event well known, and the consequence of it was that al-Saffāḥ took possession of the khalifate without meeting any further resistance. He afterwards treated Abū Muslim with the highest honour for his services and for the talent he displayed in directing this important enterprise. From that period the following lines were very often repeated aloud by Abū Muslim:

“By resolution and secrecy I succeeded in an undertaking which the sons of Marwān had vainly combined their forces to resist. I never ceased my efforts to work their ruin, whilst they slumbered in Syria, heedless of danger. I then struck them with the swords, and roused them from a deeper sleep than any had ever slept before. When a shepherd feeds his flock in a land haunted by beasts of prey, if he yields to sloth and neglects his duty, the lion will undertake the tending of the sheep.”

Al-Saffāḥ died at al-Anbār of the small-pox, in the month of Dhu 'l-Hijjah, A.H. 136 (May-June, A.C. 754), and his brother Abū Ja'far al-Manṣūr, who was then at Makkah succeeded to the khalifate on Sunday, the 13 of the same month. From that moment the conduct of Abū Muslim was marked by a number of particularities which produced a total change in the khalif's feelings towards him and made him resolve his death. During some time he hesitated whether to take the advice of his counsellors on this matter or follow his own determination, and in this state of mind he said one day to Muslim Ibn Qutaybah<sup>1</sup>: “What do you think of the manner in which Abū Muslim is getting on?” To this Muslim made answer: “Were any other god but God in the world, heaven and earth would be destroyed (by such a man).”—“It suffices; O Ibn Qutaybah!” replied the khalif, “you have confided your thought to safe ears.”

*[Abū Muslim made a pilgrimage. When he returned he broke journey at Hīrah near Kūfah. There was a Christian about

<sup>1</sup> Abū 'Abd Allāh Muslim Ibn Qutaybah Ibn Muslim Ibn 'Amr Ibn al-Ḥuṣayn (الحصين) a member of the tribe of Bāhilah a native of Khurasān, and the father of Sa'id Ibn Muslim was governor of Baṣrah under Yazid Ibn 'Umar Ibn Hubayrah, in the reign of Marwān al-Ḥimār (the last of the Umayyide dynasty in the East). He held again the same post in the reign of Abū Ja'far al-Manṣūr. His conduct as an amir was marked by great prudence and justice. His death took place A.H. 149 (A.C. 766).—(Nujūm)

* This passage from 'Abu' to 'word place' on p. 138 is in the autograph; it has been omitted by de Slane. The Teheran edition, however, has incorporated it.—Ed.

200 years old; he was known for his predictions. Abū Muslim admitted him to his presence and heard his words. The Christian predicted that he would be killed, but he would remain safe if he stayed in Khurasān. So Abū Muslim made up his mind to return to that place.]

All the efforts of al-Manṣūr being then directed to inspire Abū Muslim with a false security, he at length succeeded in drawing him to the palace. (Another circumstance contributed to allay Abū Muslim's apprehensions:) He used to consult books of predictions,<sup>1</sup> and he found therein his own history; that he was to destroy a dynasty, create a dynasty, and be slain in the land of Rūm (Asia Minor). Al-Manṣūr was then at Rūmiyat al-Madā'in<sup>2</sup>, a place founded by one of the Persian kings,* and Abū Muslim never suspected that he should meet with his death there, as he fancied that it was the land of the Greeks which was meant by the oracle. On entering into al-Manṣūr's presence, he met with a most favourable reception, and was then told to retire to his tent; but the khālif only awaited a favourable opportunity in order to take him unawares. Abū Muslim then rode a number of times to visit al-Manṣūr, who commenced reproaching him with some pretended misdeeds. At last he went to the palace one day, and being informed that the khālif was making a general ablution previously to prayers, he sat down in the antechamber; but in the mean time, al-Manṣūr posted some persons behind the sofa on which Abū Muslim was to sit, and ordered them not to appear till he, the khālif, clapped his hands; on this signal, they were to strike off Abū Muslim's head. Al-Manṣūr then took his seat on the throne, and Abū Muslim being introduced, he made his salutation, which the khālif returned. Al-Manṣūr then permitted him to sit down, and having commenced the conversation, he proceeded to reproaches: "Thou hast done this," said he, "and thou hast done that!"—"Why say you so to me," replied Abū Muslim, "after all my efforts and my services?"—"Son of a prostitute!" exclaimed al-Manṣūr, "thou owest thy success to our own good fortune; had a segrèss slave been in thy place, she had done as much as thee! Was it not thou who in writing to me, didst place thy name before mine? Was it not thou who wrotest to obtain in marriage my aunt 'Āsiyah, pretending indeed, that thou wast a descendant from Salīṭ, the son of 'Abd Allāh Ibn 'Abbās? Thou hast under-taken, infamous wretch! to mount where thou canst not reach!" On this Abū Muslim seized him by the hand, which he kissed and pressed, offering excuses for his conduct; but al-Manṣūr's last words to him were: "May God not spare me, if I spare thee!" He then clapped his hands, on which the assassins rushed out upon Abū Muslim and struck him with their swords; al-Manṣūr exclaiming all the time: "God cut your hands off, rascals! strike!" On receiving the first blow, Abū Muslim said: "Commander of the faithful! spare me, that I may be useful against thy enemies." But the khalīf replied: "May God never spare me if I do! where have I a greater enemy than thee?" The murder of Abū Muslim was perpetrated on Thursday, the 24 of Sha'bān, A. H. 137 (February, A. C. 755),* or by other statements on the 27 of the month; or on Wednesday the 22; others again say that he was put to death in the year 136 or 140. This occurred at Rāmiyat al-Madā'in, a village on the east bank of the Tigris and in the neighbourhood of al-Anbār; it is counted as one of the Madā'ins, or cities built by the Persian king. When Abū Muslim was slain, his body was rolled up in a carpet, and soon after, Ja'far Ibn Ḥanṣalah entered<sup>1</sup> "What think you of Abū Muslim?" said the khalīf to him "Commander of the faithful," answered the other, "if you have ever the misfortune to pull a single hair out of his head, there is no resource for you but to kill him, and to kill him and to kill him again."—"God has given thee understanding;" replied al-Manṣūr, "here he is in the carpet." On seeing him dead, Ja'far said: "Commander of the faithful! count this as the first day of your reign." Al-Manṣūr then recited this verse:

1 Kutub al-Malāhim. See M. de Sacys Chrestomathie, tom. II, p. 298.

2 See at the end of this article.

* Although Kisrā is a common appellation yet when it is not qualified it refers to Kisrā Anūshirwān.—Ed.

"She threw away her staff (of travel) and found repose after a long journey; she fell as the traveller on his return, when his eyes are delighted (by the sight of home)<sup>2</sup>."

<sup>1</sup> Ja'far Ibn Ḥanṣalah, one of al-Manṣūr's generals, was a native of Nahravān. In A.H. 139 (A.C. 756-7) he commanded an expedition to Malāṭiyah—(Nujūm).

<sup>2</sup> See the observations on this verse in No. 95.

*13 February,—Ed.

After this he turned towards the persons present, and recited these lines over the prostrate body:

"Thou didst pretend that our debt towards thee could never be paid! receive now thy account in full, O Abū Mujrim!<sup>1</sup> Drink of that draught which thou didst so often serve to others; a draught more bitter to the throat than gall."

Different opinions were held respecting Abū Muslim's origin: some stated that he was of Arabian descent, others of Persian, and others again of Kurdish. It is in allusion to the last opinion that Abn Dulāmah (see No. 230) said:

"O Abū Mujrim! God never replaces by affliction the favours which He grants to His creatures, unless His creatures misapply them. Ah! thou wouldst meditate treason against the empire of al-Manṣūr! Is it not true that thy own progenitors, the Kurds, were always a race of traitors? Thou didst menace me with death, Abū Mujrim! but that lion with which thou didst threaten me, has turned upon thyself!"

Rāmiyah was built by Alexander Dhu 'l-Qarnayn when he was stopping at al-Mada'in, after having traversed the earth from west to east, as the Creator informs us in the Qur'ān<sup>2</sup>. He chose no other place of residence in the earth than al-Mada'in, where he then built Rāmiyah: but this God knows best!<sup>3</sup>.

348. IBN NUBĀTAH THE KHAṬĪB

The khaṭīb or preacher Abū Yaḥyā 'Abd al-Raḥīm Ibn Muḥammad Ibn Ismā'il Ibn Nubātah al-Ḥudhāqī al-Fāriqī, the author of the celebrated khutbahs, or sermons, was a perfect master of all the sciences connected with general literature. The Divine grace bestowed upon him is conspicuous in his khutbahs, which are unanimously considered as unrivalled and which remained a proof not only of his extensive learning, but of his fine genius. He was a native of Mayyāfāriqīn and he held the post of khāṭib at Aleppo. In that city he met Abu 'l Ṭayyib al-Mutanabbī at the court of Sayf al-Dawlah, and learned from him, it is said, a number of his poems. As Sayf al-Dawlah was frequently warring against the enemies of the faith, a large portion of the khāṭib's sermons are on the duty of holy warfare, and were intended by him to stimulate the people and encourage them to support that prince. Ibn Nubātah was a man of great holiness, and he once dreamt that he was standing in the cemetery, when the Prophet appeared to him and said, pointing to the tombs: "O khāṭib! what sayest thou?" "And I replied," said Ibn Nubātah: "They tell not of the state to which they are come; and were they able to speak, they would do so: they have drunk the bitter cup of death, and are now as if they had never rejoiced the eyes of their friends—as if they had never been counted among the living. He Who gave them speech has brought them to silence: He Who created them has caused them to perish; but as He wore them out, so will He renew them, as He scattered their frame, so will He reunite it!". "The Prophet then spat in his mouth, and the khāṭib awoke with a brightness on his face which had not been there before: he then related his dream and mentioned that the Prophet had honoured him with the title of khāṭib. For eighteen days after, he lived without eating or drinking, by the grace of that spittle. The khutbah from which the foregoing passage is taken continues to be known by the title of al-khutbah al-manāmiyah the sermon of the vision). The only historian in whose works I have been able to discover the date of the khāṭib's birth and death, is Ibn al-Azraq al-Fāriqī, who says in his History of Mayyāfāriqīn: "Ibn Nubātah was born A.H. 335 (A.C. 946-7), and he died A.H. 374 (A.C. 984-5) at Mayyāfāriqīn, in which city he was interred." I read the following passage in a collection of anecdotes: "The wazīr Abu 'l-Qāsim

<sup>1</sup> Abū Mujrim means father of a villain, it is a sort of pun on the name of Abū Muslim.

<sup>2</sup> Qur'ān, XVIII, 82.

<sup>3</sup> Ibn Khallikān seems to have had a vague knowledge of the founding of Seleucia by Seleucus Nicator, one of Alexander the Great's generals. It is well known that the conquest of Babylon by Seleucus gave rise to the era of the Seleucidae, called also by the Arabs the era of Dhu 'l-Qarnayn.—Mir Khāund attributes the foundation of Rāmiyah to Anāshirwān, who built it on the precise model of Antioch. See De Sacy's Memoire sur les antiquites de la Perse, p. 336. In a note to the French translation of Abu 'l-Fidā's Geography, M. Reinaud indicates the seven cities of which al-Mada'in was composed.

---

! I have given the text and translation of this sermon in the Journal Asiatique for January, 1840.

Ibn al-Maghribī said: 'I saw the khāṭib Ibn Nubātah in a dream, after his death, and I asked him how God had treated him; to which he replied: 'A leaf was handed to me on which these two lines were written in red letters:

'Before this, thou wert in safety, but to-day thou art doubly safe. Pardon is not for the worker of good; it is only for the transgressor!'

"I then awoke, repeating these verses,"—Hudhāqī means belonging to Hudhāqah, a branch of the tribe of Qudā'ah; but Ibn Qutaybah says, in his History of the Poets, that Hudhāq is a branch of the tribe of Iyād; God knows best!

349. AL-QĀDĪ 'L-FĀDIL

Abū 'Alī 'Abd al-Raḥīm al-Lakḥmī al-'Asqalānī (a member of the tribe of Lakḥm and a native of Ascalon), generally known by the title of al-Qāḍī 'l-Fāḍil (the talented qāḍī) and surnamed Mujir al-Dīn (the protector of religion), was the son of al-Qāḍī 'l-Ashraf (the most noble qāḍī) Bahā al-Dīn Abū 'l-Majd 'Alī, who was the son of al-Qāḍī 'l-Sa'īd (the fortunate qāḍī) Abū Muḥammad Muḥammad Ibn al-Ḥasan Ibn al-Ḥasan<sup>1</sup> Ibn Aḥmad Ibn al-Faraj<sup>2</sup> Ibn Aḥmad.—Al-Qāḍī 'l-Fāḍil, surnamed also al-Miṣrī because he resided in Miṣr, or Egypt, was Wazīr to the sultān al-Malik al-Nāṣir Ṣalāḥ al-Dīn, by whom he was always treated with the very highest favour. As a writer of epistles he reached pre-eminence and surpassed every predecessor; and in his productions, numerous as they were, he constantly displayed novel beauties of style and thought. I have been informed by a man of talent and veracity, who was well acquainted with every thing respecting the Qāḍī, that the books containing the rough draughts of his epistles, and the loose sheets on which his ta'ltqaḥs (memoranda) were written, would certainly form a collection of one hundred volumes, and that the greater part of these documents are masterpieces. The kātib 'Imād al-Dīn al-Iṣṣpāhānī speaks of him in the Kharīdah in these terms: "He was the master of the pen and of lucid expression<sup>1</sup>, of eloquence, and of language; his genius was brilliant, his sagacity penetrating, and his style marked by originality and beauty. His abilities were so great that we know not of any ancient writers who could have entered into competition with him or even approached him, had they lived in the same time. He was like the law of Muḥammad, which annulled every preceding law and became itself the basis of all science; to him belonged novelty of thought, originality of ideas, display of brilliancy, and production of the fairest flowers; it was he who conducted the empire by his counsels, and fastened the pearls (of style) on the thread (of discourse): When he pleased, he could compose in a day, nay in a single hour, documents which, were they preserved, would be considered by masters of the epistolary art as the most precious materials they could possess. How far was Quss<sup>2</sup> beneath him in eloquence, and Qays<sup>3</sup> in prudence! Compared with him in generosity, what was Ḥatīm<sup>4</sup>? and in bravery, what was 'Amr<sup>5</sup>? ." He then continues his eulogium in the highest terms. We shall give here a letter by al-Qāḍī 'l-Fāḍil, addressed to Ṣalāḥ al-Dīn and presented to him by the khaṭīb (preacher) of 'Aydḥāb<sup>6</sup>; in it he recommends the bearer as a proper person to fill the place of preacher at al-Karak<sup>7</sup>: "May God preserve the sulṭān al-Malik al-Nāṣir and fortify him; may He grant favourable acceptance to his acts and make them fructify; may He crush his enemies unawares, when they slumber by day or sleep by night! and may He quell their insolence by <sup>1</sup> We have here in the original a good specimen of 'Imād al-Dīn's style with its beauties and its faults; but the former vanish in translation, and the latter become still more glaring. One or two passages in this extract are so highly figurative that it is impossible to render them literally into any European language.

<sup>1</sup> The autograph has الحسن.

<sup>2</sup> المرجع in the autograph.

<sup>2</sup> See No. 62. note on Quss.

<sup>3</sup> Qays Ibn Zuhayr al-'Absī is the person meant in the proverbial expression: shrewder than Qays. He took an active part in the war of Dāhis and Ḡhabrā; See Rasmussen's Additamenta; Abu 'l-Fidā's Hist. Antislam, p. 141.

<sup>4</sup> This is the celebrated Ḥatīm al-Tā'i.

<sup>5</sup> 'Amr the son of Mālik of the tribe of Sa'sa'ah, a contemporary of Muḥammad, was surnamed for his bravery Mulā'ib al-Asinnah (he that plays with the spear points)—(See Rasmussen's Additamenta ad hist.—Ar.)

<sup>6</sup> The town of 'Aydḥāb is situated on the western coast of the Red Sea, in lat. 22° 8'. Berghaus has omitted it in his map of Egypt and Arabia.

<sup>7</sup> Karak or Kerek lies to the east of the southern extremity of the Dead Sea.

means of His servant's sword and cast them prostrate! This letter, bearing the humble service of thy slave, will be presented by the khātib of 'Aydḥāb, forced to quit that place which was for him an unpleasant and inconvenient residence. Having heard of those victories, the fame of which has filled the earth, and which entitle thee to the gratitude of its inhabitants, he abandoned the burning atmosphere and the salt soil of 'Aydḥāb, and travelled forth in a night of hope, brilliant as day; judge then what the morning itself must be! He is anxious to obtain the preachership of al-Karak, for he is a preacher; and he employs the mediation of thy humble servant to address this request, which can be easily granted. He removes from Egypt to Syria, from 'Aydḥāb to al-Karak; a change singular enough: but poverty impels with violence; his family being large and his means small. The bounty of God to mankind in preserving our sovereign master is most gracious Adieu."—In one of his epistles he describes, in the following original strain, a castle situated on a lofty hill: "This castle* is an eagle among precipices; a star in the clouds; a head turbaned with vapours; a finger which, when dyed by the rays of the evening, has for its nail the new moon."?

† [The idea in the expression 'a finger has for its nail the new moon' is borrowed from 'Abd Allāh Ibn al-Mu'tazz as related on his notice and has been stated in the following verse:

'The light of the new moon had nearly betrayed us, when she appeared, this as a paring of the nail.'

It contains an idea borrowed from 'Amr Ibn Umayyah, who thus described the new moon.

'The daughter of the clouds of night descends towards the horizon, (in shape) like the cutting of the nail, pared off from a little finger.')

* Probably Qal'at Kawkab (Star Castle), a fortress situated on a lofty hill overlooking the Jordan. Berghaus places it in lat. 32°37'.

* "And it is said; This castle was called Kawkab", omitted by de Slane but it is found in the autograph.—Ed.

† {} This information is omitted by de Slane but it is in the autograph and subsequent editions, c.f. no 316.—Ed.

*[When he had grown old, he had written in the course of a letter these words: "A slave whose knees have become feeble and his buttocks have become weak and his legs become crooked while standing and there remained nothing of his sight except name and from his speech except nonsense."]

His compositions abound in originality and beauty; he wrote also some good poetry, such, for instance, as the piece he recited on arriving at the Euphrates, in the retinue of the sultān Ṣalāḥ al-Dīn, and in which he expresses his desire of again seeing the Nile of Egypt:

"Bear from me a message to the Nile; tell it I never could quench my thirst with water from the Euphrates. Ask my heart if I say the truth; it will be a sufficient witness for me, even did my eyes withhold their tears. O my heart! how many Buthaynahs hast thou left there after thee, but God forbid that thou support thy sorrows with patient resignation (jamil)<sup>1</sup>."

He often recited the following verses:

"When the eyes of Fortune guard you, sleep without fear, for places of danger are then places of safety. Pursue the phoenix, fortune will serve you as a net; take the constellation of Orion for a steed, fortune will be your bridle."

The following lines were composed by him :

"We passed the night in the gratification of our desires; but there are pleasures which it is not possible to describe. The guardian of our door was the night, and we said to her: "Leave us not, or the morning will break in."

I have expressed this idea in a distich† which runs as follows:

"What a night of pleasure we passed at the mountain-foot! to describe it would far exceed my power. I said to the night: 'Thou art the guardian of our door; leave us not, for we dread the breaking in of the dawn.'"

*(Al-Malik al-'Aziz Ibn Ṣalāḥ al-Dīn was very fond of al-Qaḍi 'l Faḍil during the life of his father. It so happened that al-Malik al-'Aziz had a fancy for a singing girl; this interrupted his performance of duties. The circumstance was reported to his father who ordered him to leave her and prohibited his association with her. This was unbearable for him; but he could no dare meet her. When a long time passed she sent a ball of ambergris through one of her servants to him. When he broke it he found a golden stud in it. He pondered over it but could not understand its purpose. By chance the Qaḍī came there and he informed him about it. The Qaḍī 'l-Faḍīl composed two verses which he sent to him :

<sup>1</sup> For the loves of Jamil and Buthaynah, see no. 138. It may be perceived that the qāḍi has attempted a pun in this verse.

* {} This information is added from the Egyptian edition.—Ed.

† Quatrain is a proper word.—Ed.

"She presented you ambergris in the middle of which there was a golden stud finely welded. The meaning of the stud in ambergris is this : visit in this way under the cover of darkness."

The Malik knew her sense of visiting in the night ]

Al-Qaḍī 'l-Faḍīl composed a great quantity of poetry. He was born at 'Asqalān on the 15 of the latter Jumādā, A.H. 529 (April, A.C. 1135)*; his father held for some time the post of qāḍī at the city of Baysān<sup>1</sup> ; and for this reason, all the family received the surname of al-Baysānī. In the life of al-Muwaffaq Yūsuf Ibn al-Khallāl, we shall relate how al-Qaḍī 'l-Faḍīl began the world, and how he went to Egypt, where he was employed to draw up documents in the chancery-office by al-Khallāl; it is not therefore necessary for us to repeat the same account here. He was then attached to the service of the sultan at Alexandria, where he remained for some time. The jurisconsult 'Umārah al-Yamanī speaks of him in his work on the history of the Egyptian waz'irs, entitled al-Nukat al-'Aşriyah, where he gives the life of al-'Adil Ibn al-Şāliḥ Ibn Ruzzik: "Among the actions," says he, "which redound to his (al-'Adil's) honour, and merit to be enregistered in the history of his life—or rather, I should say, incomparably the best deed he ever performed and a favour (to the world) not to be repaid—was his despatching an order to the governor of Alexandria, with directions to send al-Qaḍī 'l-Faḍīl to court; after which he took him in his service and employed him as his secretary in the army office. He thus planted a tree from which not only the state, but religion drew profit; a blessed tree of rapid growth and firmly rooted, bearing its branches to the sky, and furnishing good fruit at all seasons, by the permission of the Lord." We have already mentioned that (subsequently to this) he was appointed wazīr by Ṣalāḥ al-Dīn, and gradullay mounted in favour till that sulṭān's death. During the reign of al-Malik al-'Aziz, the son and successor of that prince, al-Qāḍī 'l-Fāḍil maintained his rank and influence; al-Malik al-'Aziz's son, al-Malik al-Manṣūr, then succeeded to the throne in consequence of the measures taken by his uncle al-Malik al-Aḥḍal Nūr al-Dīn; and al-Qāḍī 'l-Fāḍil continued to hold his rank, and honours to the last moment of his life. He expired suddenly at Cairo on the eve of Wednesday, the 7th of the latter Rabī', A.H. 596 (January, A.C. 1200)* at the time of al-Malik al-'Ādil's entry into that city, when taking possession of Egypt. He was buried the next morning in the mausoleum bearing his name, and situated in the lesser Qarāfah Cemetery, at the foot of Mount Muqāṭṭam. I visited his tomb more than once, and I saw the date of his death, as it is here given, engraved on the marble enclosure which surrounds the monument. He was one of the ornaments of the age, and the time will not readily produce another fit to replace him. He founded a madrasah at Cairo in the street called Darb al-Malūḳīyah, and I perused a note in his own handwriting, wherein it was stated that on Saturday, the first of Muḥarram, A.H. 580 (April, A.C. 1184),† this establishment was first opened for the instruction of pupils—As for his surname, his family say that it was Muḥī al-Dīn (reviver of religion), but in a document addressed to him by Ibn Abī 'Uṣrān (No. 313), I find him styled Mujir al-Dīn. —His son Abu 'l-'Abbās Aḥmad, surnamed al-Qāḍī al-Aṣḥraf Bahā al-Dīn (the most noble qāḍī, the lustre of the faith) lived in a high favour with the princes (of the family of Ṣalāḥ al-Dīn); he was most assiduous in learning Traditions and indefatigable in collecting books. His birth took place at Cairo in the month of Muḥarram, A.H. 573 (July, A.C. 1177), and he died at the same city on the ! Literally : On the necks. In Arabic they say, he hung a favour on his neck نعمة قلده an expression equivalent to اولاه نعمة he conferred a favour on him.

---

<sup>1</sup> Baysān lies about nine miles south of Lake Tiberias, near the right bank of the Jordan.

*21 April. The name of the day i.e. Monday mentioned in the autograph omitted by de Slane.—Ed.

---

* 26 January.—Ed.

† 14 April.—Ed.

eve of Monday, the 7 of the latter Jumādā, A.H. 643 (October, A.C. 1245)*. He was buried at the side of his father's tomb. Al-Qāḍī al-Aṣḥraf, having been commissioned by the prince al-Malik al-Kāmil Ibn al-Malik al-ʿĀdil Ibn Ayyūb to proceed from Cairo on a mission to Baḥdād, he addressed to the Wazīr these lines of his own composing:

"O my lord Wazīr! you whose favours dissolve the pact which bound me to adverse fortune! How can I thank you for your kindness, feeling that I can hardly sustain the honour conferred upon me. Those favours are light in your hands, but their burden is weighty on the shoulders<sup>1</sup> of those who receive them.

350. IBN JURAYJ.

Abū Khalīd ʿAbd al-Malik, surnamed also Abu 'l-Walīd, the son of ʿAbd al-ʿAzīz Ibn Jurayj, was a native of Makkah, and a member, by adoption, of the tribe of Quraysh; Umayyah Ibn Khalīd Ibn Usayd† being his patron. According to another statement, (his grandfather) Jurayj was a slave to Umm Ḥabīb, the daughter of Jubayr and the wife of ʿAbd al-ʿAzīz Ibn ʿAbd Allāh Ibn Khalīd Ibn Usayd Ibn Abi 'l-ʿEis Ibn Umayyah; and for this reason he was considered as the maw'lā of the latter. ʿAbd al-Malik was one of the most celebrated men (of that age) for his learning; it is said that he was the first who, after the promulgation of Islāmism, composed books. He frequently related the following anecdote: "I was in Yaman with Ma'an Ibn Zā'idah<sup>2</sup>, and the period of the pilgrimage came round without my having any intention of making it, till the following verses of ʿUmar Ibn Abi Rabi'ah's<sup>3</sup> came suddenly to my recollection:

---

<sup>1</sup> Literally: On the necks. In Arabic they say, he hung a favour on his neck, قلده نعمته, an expression equivalent to اولاه نعمته he conferred a favour on him.

<sup>2</sup> His life will be found in this work.

<sup>3</sup> The life of ʿUmar Ibn Abi Rabi'ah is given in this work.

* 30 October—Ed.

† M. de Slane gives Asid.—Ed.

'Say to him, I pray you, but not reproachfully; Why do you make so long a stay in Yaman? If you be in search of fortune† or if you have obtained her favours, what sum have you received for neglecting the pilgrimage?'

I immediately went to Ma'an and told him that it was my intention to make the pilgrimage, on which he asked me what could have induced me to form such a design, as I never before had spoken to him on the subject. I then related to him the circumstance and repeated Ibn Abī Rabi'ah's verses, on which he provided me with the expenses of my journey and sent me off." Ibn Jurayj was born A.H. 80 (A.C. 699-700); he went to Baghḍād to see Abū Ja'far al-Manṣūr, and died A.H. 149 (A.C. 766); some say, 150 or 151.

351. 'ABD AL-MALIK IBN 'UMAYR.

Abū 'Umar, and Abū 'Amr, 'Abd al-Malik Ibn 'Umayr Ibn Suwayd, surnamed al-Qibḍī al-Farasī, was a member of the tribe of Laḥm and one of the principal inhabitants of Kūfah, where he filled the place of qāḍī on the death of al-Sha'bī. He ranked among the most distinguished of the Tābi'īs and was also one of the most trustworthy as a transmitter of Traditions.* He saw 'Alī Ibn Abī Ṭālib and gave Traditions on the authority of Jābir Ibn 'Abd Allāh<sup>2</sup>. The following circumstance of his life is related by himself: "I was with 'Abd al-Malik Ibn Marwān at the castle of Kūfah when the head of Muṣ'ab Ibn al-Zubayr was brought in and presented to him. On seeing me shudder, he asked me what was the matter, and I replied: 'May God preserve the Commander of the faithful! I was in this castle, and in this very room, with

<sup>1</sup> Read قيد in the Arabic Text.

<sup>2</sup> Abū 'Abd Allāh Jābir Ibn 'Abd Allāh Ibn 'Amr al-Sulamī al-Anṣārī was a native of Madinah and a Traditionist of great authority, having conversed with the Prophet. He died at his native place, A. H. 78 (A.C. 697-8) aged sixty-four* years—(Tab. al-Muḥaddithīn.)

* This appears to be a misprint for ninety four, vide Tahdhīb al-Tahdhīb, Vol. II, p. 42.

'Ubayd Allāh Ibn Ziyād when the head of al-Ḥusayn the son of 'Alī Ibn Abī Ṭālib was placed before him; I was then here with al-Mukḥtar Ibn Abī 'Ubayd al-Thaqafī, when 'Ubayd Allāh Ibn Ziyād's head was brought to him; I was here again when al-Mukhtar's head was presented to Muṣ'ab Ibn al-Zubayr, and behold now the head of Muṣ'ab! On hearing these words, 'Abd al-Malik rose from his place and ordered the pavilion in which we were, to be levelled to the ground." Ibn 'Umayr was at one time taken ill, and a person sent his excuses for not going to visit him, on which he answered: "I cannot reproach a person for not visiting me, whom I myself should not go to visit were he sick." He died on or about A.H. 136 (A.C. 753-4) aged 103 years.—The relative adjective Qibṭī is formed from Qibṭ; he possessed an excellent race-horse so called, and from this circumstance he derived his surname.—Farasī is derived from Fars (horse), and was applied to him for the same reason.

352. IBN AL-MĀJISHŪN.

Abū Marwān 'Abd al-Malik Ibn 'Abd al-'Azīz Ibn 'Abd Allāh Ibn Abī Salamah al-Mājisḥūn, the Mālikite doctor, was a native of Madīnah and a client to the Munkadirs, a family which drew its origin from Taym, a descendant of Quraysh: he was therefore surnamed al-Qurashī, al-Taymī, al-Munkadirī; he bore also the appellation of al-A'mā* (the blind), because he did not possess the sense of sight, or because he lost it towards the close of his life. His ancestor Abū Salamah was surnamed al-Mājisḥūn, but his real name is uncertain; some say that he was called Mayman, and others, Dīnār. Ibn al-Majisḥūn studied Jurisprudence under his father 'Abd al-'Azīz, the imām Mālik, and others. He took great pleasure in hearing vocal music, and to this, Aḥmad Ibn Ḥanbal bears testimony: "He came to visit us," said he, "and was accompanied by a person whose business it was to sing to him".

---

* M. de Slane gives it A'mī.—Ed.

He was also noted for his talent as a narrator of anecdotes and for the purity of his style: relative to this it is related that, when the imām al-Shāfiʿī conversed with him (on literature), the persons present understood very little of what they said; the reason was that al-Shāfiʿī had acquired his knowledge of pure Arabic by living for some time in the desert with the tribe of Hudhayl, and Ibn al-Mājiṣhūn had learned it in the same manner from the tribe of Kalb, who were his relations by the mother's side. It was said by Yaḥyā Ibn Aḥmad Ibn al-Muʿaddal; "When I reflect that 'Abd al-Malik's tongue must sooner or later moulder into dust, the world loses its value in my sight." The same person being asked how great was the difference between his own talent as a correct speaker and that of his master 'Abd al-Malik, he made this reply: "The tongue of 'Abd al-Malik, when embarrassed, was more lively than mine when animated<sup>1</sup>." Ibn al-Mājiṣhūn died A.H. 213 (A.C. 828-9), but it is mentioned by Abū 'Umar Ibn 'Abd al-Barr<sup>2</sup> that his death took place in 212; others again place this event in 214.—Mājiṣhūn signifies tinged with a rose colour, or, according to some, tinged with white and red; it was the surname of Abū Yūsuf Ya'qub the son of Abū Salamah 'Abd al-Malik's great-grand-father, and the uncle of 'Abd al-Malik's father. This surname was given him by Sukaynah the daughter of al-Ḥusayn Ibn 'Alī * Ibn Abī Ṭālib<sup>3</sup>, and it passed to all his children and to those of his brother. But the origin of this appellation has been explained in another manner: as they were originally from Iṣpahān, they used to salute one another, when they met, with the words shūni shūni; and they were called Mājiṣhūn for that reason<sup>4</sup>; this we give on the authority of the ḥāfiẓ Abū Bakr Aḥmad Ibn Ibrāhīm al-Jurjānī. It was said by

<sup>1</sup> In this passage all the MSS. except the autograph are wrong: for نغابى we must read نغابى , and for تحابى , تحابى

<sup>2</sup> This person's life is given by Ibn Khallikān.

<sup>3</sup> Her life will be found in no. 256.

<sup>4</sup> I have not been able to discover what the words shūni and Mājiṣhūn may mean in this case, had Ibn Khallikān known it, he would most probably have explained it.

* This name is erroneously omitted by de Slane. It is probably a printing mistake.—Ed.

Abū Dāwūd<sup>1</sup> that Ibn al-Mājjishūn did not understand the Traditions, and Ibn al-Barqī<sup>2</sup> relates that a man having requested him to go and see 'Abd al-Malik, he went and found that he had no conception of what a Tradition was. Muḥammad Ibn Sa'd mentions him in his greater Ṭabaqāt, and says: "He had a knowledge of Jurisprudence and handed down orally traditional information"—Munkadiri means descended from al-Munkadir the son of 'Abd Allāh Ibn Huḍayr, a member of the family of Taym, which is a branch of the tribe of Quraysh. He was the father of Muḥammad, Abū Bakr, and 'Umar, whose history is given in full by Ibn Quṭaybah, in the Kitāb al-Ma'ārif, under the head of Muḥammad Ibn al-Munkadir<sup>3</sup>.

353. THE IMĀM AL-ḤARAMAYN.

The Shāfiite doctor, Abū 'l-Ma'ālī 'Abd al-Malik, surnamed Ḍiyā al-Ḍīn (splendour of religion) and generally known by the title of the imām al-Ḥaramayn, was son to the shaykh Abū Muḥammad 'Abd Allāh Ibn Abī Ya'qub Yūsuf Ibn 'Abd Allāh Ibn Yūsuf Ibn Muḥammad Ibn Ḥayyūyah al-Juwaynī. He was, without exception, the most learned doctor of the Shāfiite sect in later times, and is universally considered as a (mujtahid) imām; it is also agreed on by all that he stood pre-eminent by the extent of his information and his skill in many different branches of science, such as dogmatic theology, jurisprudence, philology, etc. (We have spoken of his father in no. 310.) By a favour of the divine grace, he was enabled to carry the practices of devotion to an unexampled pitch of fervour; he repeated also from memory, and without the least hesitation, lesson to his pupils, each of which would have filled a number of leaves. When a youth, he was instructed in jurisprudence by his father Abū Muḥammad, who was struck with his capacity, acquirements, excellent disposition, and other prognostics of future eminence. 'Abd al-Malik having thus gone through all his parent's works and mastered their contents, surpassed him in accuracy of knowledge and subtilness. On his father's death, he replaced him as a teacher, and having accomplished that duty, he went to the Madrasah of al-Bayhaqī<sup>1</sup> and mastered the science of dogmatic theology under the tuition of the ustād Abū 'l-Qāsim al-Iskāf, a native of Isfarā'in<sup>2</sup>. From thence he travelled to Baḡdād, where he met a number of the learned; he then proceeded to Ḥijāz, where he made a residence of four years, partly at Makkah and partly at Madīnah. During this period he filled the duties of a professor and a mufti, whilst the rest of his time was devoted to the task of collecting the Shāfite doctrines from all the various channels through which they had passed down. It was on account of his residence in these two holy cities that he received the surname of the Imām al-Ḥaramayn (imām of the two sanctuaries). Towards the commencement of Alp Arslān's reign, he returned to Naysāpur, and Nizām al-Mulk, that sultān's wazīr, founded there a Nizāmiyah College for the express purpose of establishing the Imām in it as a professor. This doctor filled besides the place of khaṭīb, or chief preacher of the city, and held assemblies in which he gave exhortations and presided at discussions on points of doctrine. The works which he had written became then generally known, and his lectures were attended by doctors of the highest eminence; the presidency of the Shāfiʿite sect devolved on him; and the administration of the waqfs, or religious endowments, was confided to his care. During a space of nearly thirty years he continued in undisputed possession of these places, and held with general consent the posts of officiating imām at public prayers, of preacher in the principal mosque, of professor, and of president at the assemblies which met every Friday to hear pious exhortations. He composed works on very many subjects, and Islāmism has never produced one equal to his treatise, the Nihāyat al-Maṭlab fī Dirāyat al-Madhhab (satisfactory results to inquiry, being a guide to the knowledge of the Shāfiʿite doctrines.) The ḥafīẓ Abū Jaʿfar<sup>1</sup> relates that he heard Abū Ishāq al-Shīrāzī say to the Imām al-Ḥaramayn: "O instructor of the people of the East and of the West! thou art to-day the imām (chief) of the imāms." —The imām al-Ḥaramayn was taught Traditions by a great number of the learned in that branch of knowledge, and he possessed a licence from Abū Nuʿaym al-Ispahānī, the author of the Hilyat al-Awliyā (see no. 32), authorising him to teach those which he had communicated to him. His other works are the Shāmil (comprehensive), on the dogmas of religion; the Burhān (proof) on the fundamentals of jurisprudence, the Talkhīṣ al-Taqrīb, an abridgment of (al-Qāsim Ibn Muḥammad al-Shāshī's treatise on jurisprudence), the Taqrīb: the Irshād (direction, on the fundamentals of jurisprudence); al-'Aqidah al-Nāẓimiyyah<sup>2</sup>; the Madārik al-'Uqūl (results of the utmost efforts of human reason), which work was left unfinished; an unfinished abridgment of the Nihāyat al-Maṭlab:

<sup>1</sup> Probably Abū Dāwūd the imām; see no. 260.

<sup>2</sup> Abū Ishāq Ibrāhīm Ibn 'Abd al-Raḥmān Ibn Abī 'l-Qāḍī al-Barqī al-Miṣrī (a native of Egypt, but sprung from a family inhabiting Barqah in North Africa) was a doctor of the sect of Mālik, and esteemed as one of the ablest jurisconsults of Egypt. He studied the law under Al-shhāb and Ibn Wahb. His death is placed by al-Suyūṭhī, in A.H. 245 (A.C. 859-60).—(Ḥusn al-Muḥaḍirah, MS, No. 652, fol. 116 verso).

<sup>3</sup> Abū Bakr Muḥammad Ibn al-Munkadir Ibn 'Abd Allāh Ibn al-Huḍayr al-Taymī, a member of the tribe of Quraysh, was an eminent Qur'ān-reader and Traditionist. His masters were Jābir Ibn 'Abd Allāh, Anas. Ibn Mālik, 'Urwah Ibn al-Zubayr, etc. He had for pupils the imām Mālik, Shubah, al-Thawri, Ibn 'Uyaynah, Ibn Jurayj etc. He died A.H. 131 (A.C. 748-9).—(Ṭab. al-Muḥad.)

---

<sup>1</sup> This madrasah was called after the doctor Abū Bakr al-Bayhaqī. See his life, No. 27 and Introduction.

<sup>2</sup> Abū 'l-Qāsim 'Abd al-Jabbar Ibn 'Alī Ibn Muḥammad, surnamed al-Ustād (the master) and generally known by the denomination of al-Iskāf (the cobbler), was a native of Isfara' in and a disciple of the shaykh Abū Ishāq al-Isfarā'aini. He composed a number of works on the dogmas of faith, on the fundamentals of jurisprudence, and on dialectics. As a jurisconsult and scholastic theologian he held a high rank; as a controversialist and a professor he displayed great powers of language, and as a mufti, he was esteemed one of the most capable. If we take into consideration besides that he was a strict imitator of the original Muslims in devotion and self-denial, we must allow that he had no equal among his contemporaries. He lived in the knowledge of his duties towards God and in the performance of them. His death occurred in the month of Ṣafar, A.H. 454 (A.C. 1062).—(Tab. al-Shāfi'īn) Ibn Khallikān writes his surname Iskāfi, not Iskāf, but I prefer the authority of the Qāmūs and the Ṭabaqāt al-Shāfi'īn.

<sup>1</sup> The author of the Tabaqāt al-Shāfiʿiyyin mentions an Abū Jaʿfar Muḥammad Ibn Abī 'Alī al-Hamādānī in the life of the Imām al-Ḥaramayn: this was perhaps the same person as the ḥafīẓ.

<sup>2</sup> To judge from the title, this should be a profession of faith for the use of the students at the Nizāmiyyah College.

the Ghayāth al-'Umam (help for the nations), in which he treats of the imāmat or presidency over the whole Muslim community; the Mughīth al-Khalq (assister of God's creatures), leading to the choice of the true way; the Ghunyat al-Mustarshidin<sup>1</sup> (sufficient help for those who desire guidance), being a treatise on controversy. He composed also some other works. Whenever he entered into an explanation of the sciences peculiar to the Ṣufīs and of the state of extatic exaltation<sup>2</sup> to which they sometimes reached, he would draw tears from all present. During the entire course of his life he never swerved from a line of conduct most praiseworthy and agreeable to God. I was told by a shaykh that he had read a full account of the Imām al-Ḥaramayn's life in a certain treatise, and that his father Abū Muḥammad began the world as a professional book copyist: having amassed some money by his labours, he bought a slave-girl bearing a high character for piety and virtue, and her he supported with the lawful gains furnished him by his trade. She bore him a son, afterwards known as the Imām al-Ḥaramayn, and he told her not to allow any person but herself to suckle the child; but it happened one day, that on going into her apartment, he found her indisposed, and as the child was crying, a woman who was one of the neighbours, gave it the breast for a short time to quiet it. When the father saw this, he felt much vexed, and taking the child, he held it with its head downwards, stroked its belly, and put his finger into its mouth, till he succeeded in making it throw up what it had swallowed: "I would rather see him die," said he, "than have his natural disposition spoiled by the milk of one who was not his mother." It is related also of the Imām himself that a languor of mind sometimes came over him during the conferences at which he presided and that he attributed it to the effects of that milk a portion of which remained in his stomach.—He was born on the 18th of Muḥarram, A.H. 419 (February, A.C. 1028);* in his last illness he was borne to Baṣṭaniqān, a village situated in the province of Naysāpur and noted for the salubrity of its air and water; he died at that place on Wednesday, the 25th of the latter Rabi', A.H. 478 (August, A.C. 1085)*, just as the evening had closed in. His body was taken to Naysāpur that night, and was buried the next morning in (the court of) his house, but, some years later, it was removed to the al-Ḥusayn Cemetery and interred beside the grave of his father. The funeral prayers were said over him by his son Abu 'l-Qāsim, and on the day of his death, all the shops were shut, the pulpit in the great mosque from which he preached was broken to pieces, and the whole population mourned for him as for a relation. A great number of elegies were composed on his death, and one of them we shall give here: it is as follows:

1 Read المسترشدين in the Arabic text.

2 Read الأحوال.

* 17 February.—Ed.

"The hearts of mankind were in torture<sup>1</sup> and the days of mortals became dark as nights! Can the tree of science ever again bear fruit, now that the imām Abu 'l-Ma'alī is no more?"

At the moment of his death, his scholars, who were four hundred and one in number, broke their pens and inkhorns and let a full year pass over before they resumed their studies.

354. AL-AṢMA'Ī.

The celebrated philologist Abū Sa'id 'Abd al-Malik Ibn Qurayb al-Aṣma'ī drew his descent from 'Adnān, his father Qurayb being the son of 'Abd al-Malik Ibn 'Alī Ibn Aṣma, Ibn Muṭahhir 'Ibn Riyāḥ Ibn 'Amr Ibn 'Abd Shams Ibn A'ya Ibn Sa'd Ibn 'Abd Ibn Ghānam<sup>1</sup> Ibn Qutaybah Ibn Ma'an Ibn Mālik Ibn A'ṣar Ibn Sa'd Ibn Qays 'Aylān<sup>2</sup> Ibn Muḍar Ibn Nizār Ibn Ma'ad

<sup>1</sup> Literally: On frying pans!

<sup>2</sup> The autograph has 'Alam علم, which, by the addition of a point on each of the first two letters, has been changed into غنم.

<sup>3</sup> I follow the autograph in reading Qays 'Aylān, but some of the Arabian genealogists make 'Aylān or Ghaylān the father of Qays, not the same person.

* 20 August—Ed.

† The Egyptian edition gives Muzahhar—Ed.

‡ The Egyptian edition gives Ritab —Ed.

Ibn 'Adnān.—Al-Aṣma'ī bore also the surname of Bāhili (descended from Bāhilah), and yet no such name appears in his genealogy; he was so entitled, however, because his ancestor Mālik Ibn A'ṣar was the husband of the female named Bāhilah; others say that Bāhilah was the name of a son of A'ṣar<sup>1</sup>.—Al-Aṣma'ī was a complete master of the Arabic language, an able grammarian, and the most eminent of all those persons who transmitted orally historical narrations, singular anecdotes, amusing stories, and rare expressions of the language. He received his information from Shu'bah Ibn al-Ḥajjāj (see no. 207 note), the two Ḥammāds<sup>2</sup>, Mis'ar Ibn Kidām (no. 255 note), and others; his own authority was cited by his brother's son 'Abd al-Raḥmān Ibn 'Abd Allāh, Abū 'Ubayd al-Qāsim Ibn Sallām<sup>3</sup>, Abū Ḥatim al-Sijistānī (no. 268), Abū 'l-Faḍl al-Riyāshī (no. 298), and others. He was a native of Baṣrah, but he removed to Baghdād in the reign of Hārūn al-Raṣhīd. Some person then said to Abū Nuwās (no. 162) that Abū 'Ubaydah<sup>4</sup> and al-Aṣma'ī had been just presented to al-Raṣhīd, on which he replied: "As for Abū 'Ubaydah, he will recite to them, if allowed, the history of the ancients and the moderns; but as for al-Aṣma'ī he is a nightingale to charm them with his melodies." It is related by 'Umar Ibn Shabbah<sup>5</sup>, that he heard

<sup>1</sup> The author makes some farther observations on the surname of Bāhilah in the life of Qutaybah Ibn Muslim.

<sup>2</sup> My researches have led me to the conclusion that the persons designated as the two Ḥammāds (al-Ḥammādānī) were Abū Salamah Ḥammād Ibn Salama Ibn Dīn'r and Abū Ism'il Ḥammād Ibn Zayd Ibn Dirham. The former was a native of Baṣrah, a mawla to the tribe of Tamim, and a sister's son to Humayd al-Tawil, from whom and other eminent teachers he received his traditional knowledge. He bore a high character for exactness as a traditionist and a ḥāfiẓ he spoke with great purity, and was considered as an excellent authority in Arabic grammar and philology ('arabīyah). He was noted for his learning, piety, and self-mortification. He died A.H. 167 (A.C. 783-4).—(Nujūm. Al-Yāfi'is Mir'ā'i).

Abū Ism'il Ḥammād Ibn Zayd Ibn Dirhim, surnamed al-Azraq (the blue-eyed), was a native of Baṣrah and a mawla to the tribe of Tamim. He received his knowledge from the first doctors of that age, some of whom were the same as those under whom his namesake Ḥammād Ibn Salamah studied. He held a high reputation as a jurisconsult, a Traditionist, and a ḥāfiẓ. He died in A.H. 179 (A.C. 795-6).—(Tab. al-Fuqahā—Tab. al-Muḥaddithīn—Al-Yāfi'i).

<sup>3</sup> The life of Ibn Sallām will be found in this work.

<sup>4</sup> His life is given by Ibn Khallikān.

<sup>5</sup> His life will be found in this work.

al-Aṣma'i say that he knew by heart sixteen thousand pieces of verse composed in the measure called rajaz<sup>1</sup>; and it was observed by Isḥāq al-Mawṣilī (no. 84) that he never heard al-Aṣma'i profess to know a branch of science without discovering that none knew it better than he. Al-Rabī' Ibn Sulaymān (no. 221) relates that he heard al-Shāfi'i pronounce these words: "None ever explained better than al-Aṣma'i the idiom of the desert Arabs." And it was mentioned by Abū Aḥmad al-'Askarī (no. 156) that when al-Aṣma'i was at Baṣrah, he received most pressing invitations from al-Māmūn to go and see him but refused on the pretext of his feebleness and advanced age; al-Māmūn then used to draw up collections of questions on doubtful points (of literature) and send them to him that he might resolve them. The following anecdote was related by al-Aṣma'i: "I and Abū 'Ubaydah went to see al-Faḍl Ibn Rabī'<sup>2</sup>, who asked me in how many volumes was my work on horses, and I replied: 'One only!' He then made the same question to Abū 'Ubaydah respecting his work on the same subject, and he answered: 'Fifty volumes'. Faḍl then said to him: 'Go over to that horse and place your hand successively on all the parts of his body, naming them at the same time.—'I am not a farrier,' replied Abū 'Ubaydah, 'but all I have compiled on this subject was procured by me from the Arabs of the desert.' Al-Faḍl then told me to do it, on which I went over to the horse, and, taking hold of his mane, I commenced naming the different parts of his body as I placed my hand successively upon them; repeating at the same time the verses in which the Arabs of the desert mentioned them. When I had finished, he bid me keep the animal, and whenever I wished to annoy Abū 'Ubaydah, I rode on that horse to pay him a visit." Al-Aṣma'i carefully abstained from explaining any of the obscure expressions occurring in the Qur'ān and the Sunnah, and when questioned on a point of this kind, he would answer: "The Arabs of the desert say that such and such an expression means so and so, but I do not know what may be its signification in the Qur'ān and the Sunnah." His adventures and the anecdotes related of him are very numerous. His grandfather 'Alī Ibn Aṣma' committed a theft at Safawān<sup>1</sup>, for which he was arrested and taken before 'Alī Ibn Abī Ṭālib. "Bring me witnesses," said 'Alī, "to prove that he purloined the object out of the saddle-bag<sup>2</sup>." The person who tells this story proceeds to say that evidence to that effect was given before 'Alī, who immediately ordered the fingers of his hand to be cut off. On this some person said to him: "Commander of the faithful! why not cut it off by the wrist<sup>3</sup>?"—"God forbid!" exclaimed the khalīf; how could he then lean on his staff? How could he pray<sup>4</sup>? How could he eat<sup>5</sup>?" When al-Ḥajjāj Ibn Yūsuf<sup>6</sup> arrived at Baṣrah 'Alī Ibn Aṣma' went to him and said: "O amīr! my parents treated me most foully in naming me 'Alī; give me another name."—"You come," replied al-Ḥajjāj, with an excellent pretext to excite my interest; I appoint you director of the fisheries at al-Bārājah with a daily salary of two dānaqs<sup>6</sup> in copper-money; but, by Allāh! if you go beyond that sum I shall cut off the portion of your hand which 'Alī left on<sup>7</sup>."—Al-Aṣma'ī was born A.H. 122 (A.C. 740) or 123, and he died at Baṣrah in the month of Ṣafar, A.H. 216 (March-April, A.C. 831); some say, 214 or 217; and others mention that his death took place at Marw. The khatīb Abū Bakr (no. 33) says: "I have been informed al-Aṣma'ī lived to the age of eighty-eight." Qurayb, al-Aṣma'ī's father, was born A.H. 83 (A.C. 702), but I have not been able to discover in what year he died. Qurayb was only a byname, but he was not generally known by any other appellation; according to al-Marzubānī<sup>8</sup> and Abū Sa'īd

---

<sup>1</sup> See Introd. note.

<sup>2</sup> His life is given in this work.

1 According to the Marāṣid, Safawān is the name of a place at a day's journey from the Mirbād, or halting place at Baṣrah, where there is a large pool of water.

2 The autograph has الرحل.

3 Such was the usual punishment for theft.

4 Before praying, an ablution was necessary, and this could not well be performed with one hand.

5 To make use of the left hand in eating is a gross impropriety.

6 About four pence; there are six dānaqs to a dirhim.

7 This anecdote is related also by al-Tabrizī in his commentary on the Ḥanāsah, p. 240.

8 The life of Marzubānī will be found among those of the Muḥammads.

al-Sirafī, (no. 154) his real name was Aṣim and his surname Abū Bakr.—Aṣma'ī is a patronymic derived from the name of his grandfather.—Safawān is the name of a place near Baṣrah; (the road from Baṣrah to Baḥrayn passes successively through Safawān and Kāẓimah to Hajar, the capital of Baḥrayn.—Al-Barājah is the name of a place at Baṣrah)<sup>1</sup>.—The following anecdote is related by Abū 'l-'Aynā<sup>2</sup>: "I was at al-Aṣma'ī's funeral, and the poet Abū Qilābah Ḥubaysh Ibn 'Abd al-Raḥmān al-Jarmī<sup>3</sup>, with whom I was conversing, recited to me these lines of his own composing:

'God curse the bones which they are now bearing on the bier towards the abode of corruption! bones hateful to the Prophet, to the Prophet's family, and to all the saints.'

'I was then accosted by Abū 'l-'Ālyah al-Ḥasan Ibn Malik al-Shāmī, who recited to me the following lines:

'Let (the rivulets) the daughters of the earth cease to flow; afflicted as they now are by the death of al-Aṣma'ī! They (still flow on, yet) do not wash away our grief. Live in the world as long as you may, you will never meet a man like him, or with learning such as his.'

'I was much struck with the difference of these two persons' feelings towards the deceased."—Al-Aṣma'ī composed treatises on the following subjects: the human frame, the different species of animals, on the anwā, or influence of the stars on the weather, on the letter hamzah, on the long and the short alif, on the difference between the names given to the members of the human body and those given to the same members in animals,<sup>4</sup> on epithets.<sup>4</sup>

<sup>1</sup> This passage is one of the author's later additions. It exists in the autograph and in one of the Paris manuscripts.

<sup>2</sup> The life of Abū 'Abd Allāh Muḥammad Abū 'l-'Ayn is given by Ibn Khalikān.

<sup>3</sup> Abū Qilābah Ḥubaysh Ibn 'Abd al-Raḥmān al-Jarmī, a rāwī, or transmitter of oral information, was a bigoted Shi'ite, and for that reason he detested al-Aṣma'ī. The author of the 'Uyūn al-Tawārīkh' places his death under the year 220 (A.H. 835-6).

<sup>4</sup> Such is the meaning of the word الفرق as appears by M. de Hammer's manuscript of a portion of al-Aṣma'ī's works.

on the doors of tents<sup>1</sup>, on games of chance played with arrows, on the frame of the horse, on horses, on camels, on sheep, on tents, on wild beasts, on the first and fourth form of certain verbs, on proverbs, on words bearing each two opposite significations, a vocabulary, on weapons, on dialects, on the springs of water frequented by the nomadic Arabs, a collection of anecdotes, on the principles of discourse, on the heart, on synonymous terms, on the Arabian peninsula, on the formation of derivative words, on the ideas which usually occur in poetry, on nouns of action, on rajaz verses, on the palm-tree, on plants, on homonymous terms, on the obscure expressions met with in the Traditions, on the witticisms of the desert Arabs, etc.

355. IBN HISHĀM, THE AUTHOR OF THE SĪRAH.

Abū Muḥammad ‘Abd al-Malik Ibn Hishām Ibn Ayyūb al-Ḥimyarī al-Ma‘āfirī, the author of the Sirat al-Rasūl, or History of the Prophet, is spoken of in these terms by Abū ‘l-Qāsim al-Suhaylī (see no. 346), in his work entitled al-Rawḍ al-‘Unuf, which is a commentary on the Sīrah: “He was celebrated for his learning and possessed superior information in genealogy and grammar; his native place was Old Cairo, but his family were of Baṣrah. He composed a genealogical work on the tribe of Ḥimyar and its princes; and I have been told that he wrote another work in which he explained the obscure passages of the poetry cited in (Ibn Iṣḥāq’s) Siyar.—His death occurred at Old Cairo A.H. 213 (A.C. 828-9).”—This Ibn Hishām is the person who extracted and drew up the History of the Prophet from Ibn Iṣḥāq’s<sup>2</sup> work entitled al-Maghāzī wa ‘l-Siyar; al-Suhaylī explained its difficulties in a commentary, and it is now found in the hands of the public under the title of Sīrah Ibn Hishām (Ibn Hishām’s Sīrah, or History). Abū Saīd

<sup>1</sup> In the autograph I read الإواب ; but the punctuation is very indistinct.

<sup>2</sup> The life of Muḥammad Ibn Iṣḥāq al-Muṭṭalibī is given by Ibn Khallikān.

'Abd al-Raḥmān Ibn Yūnus (see no. 343), the Egyptian historian, says, in his work on the eminent men who came to Egypt from foreign parts, that this 'Abd al-Malik died on the 13 of the latter Rabi', A.H. 218 (May, A.C. 833);* God knoweth best which is the true date of his death! Ibn Yūnus says also that he belonged to the tribe of Dhuhl<sup>1</sup>.—Ma'āfirī means descended from Ma'āfir Ibn Ya'fur, the progenitor of a great tribe<sup>2</sup> to which a great number of persons, principally inhabitants of Egypt, trace their origin.

356. AL-THA'ĀLIBĪ AL-NAYSAPŪRĪ.

Abū Mansūr 'Abd al-Malik Ibn Muḥammad Ibn Ismā'il al-Tha'ālibī al-Naysāpūrī (a native of Naysāpur) is spoken of in these terms by Ibn Bassām, the author of the Dhakhīrah: "In that age, he was the man who pastured his genius on the loftiest summits of knowledge; the great compiler of prose and verse; the chief author of his time, and the ablest also in the opinion of that epoch; his reputation spread abroad like a proverb which circulates far and wide; the camels (which bore travellers to see him were constantly) arriving, their breasts panting from the rapidity of their speed; his compilations rose over the horizon not only in the East but in the West, and they ascended (to the zenith of fame) as the stars ascend through the darkness; his works hold a place of high eminence, shining with refulgence even from their first appearance; the number of persons who learned them by heart or who collected them can neither be defined nor described, and it would be vain to essay, even in the finest and most harmonious style, to do full justice to the merits of his writings." Ibn Bassām then quotes some passages of al-Tha'ālibī's composition in prose and verse; one of the latter is the following piece addressed to the amir Abu 'l- Faḍl al-Mikālī (governor of the province of Fārs):

"Your talents are admirable and so numerous that no other mortal ever possessed as many. Two of them are oceans; one, an ocean of eloquence composed of al-Walid's (Buḥturi's) poetic spirit and the charming style of al-Aṣma'ī; the other, a skill in epistolary writing equal to that of al-Ṣābī and embellished in its superiority by a penmanship which, like Ibn Muqlah's merits the first rank<sup>2</sup>. Let us give thee thanks! how many admirable passages have come from you (to us), as wealth comes abundantly on the noble-minded man who, but a moment before, was borne down by poverty. When the buds of the poetry unfold and blossom, their beauty is displayed in an ornamented phrase, forming two hemistiches. You have dismounted the horsemen of eloquence, and broken in the horses of original invention; for you are yourself an illustrious and original genius. You have engraved charming devices on the seal of time; devices which surpass in beauty the meadows of spring".

<sup>1</sup> The tribe of Dhuhl sprung from that of Bakr Ibn Wā'il, which last drew its descent from Rabi'ah Ibn Nizār.

<sup>2</sup> Read قبيل كبير in the Arabic text.

* 8 May—Ed.

By the same:

"When I sent (a message to my beloved)—and, alas! my representations were fruitless—the fire of passion raged fiercer (in my bosom) and, to preserve my life, I kissed those eyes with which my messenger had seen her."

One of his longest, finest, and most comprehensive works is that entitled Yatīmat al-Dahr fī Maḥāsin Ahli 'l-'Aṣar (the pearl of the age, treating of the merits of our contemporaries)<sup>3</sup>. The following lines were composed on this book by the celebrated Alexandrian poet Abu'l-Futūḥ Naṣr Allāh Ibn Qalāqīs whose life will be given later:

1 See no. 14.

2 In place of this verse, which is given in the MSS. of the Yatīmah, Ibn Khallikān has inserted the following: كالنور أو كالسحر أو كالبدر، أو كالوشى في برد عليه موشع. "Like flowers, or like magic, or like the full moon, or like the colours of a flowered garment, ornamented also with a border." Were this reading to be admitted, we should not know what the two seas were, of which al-Tha'alibī speaks. The reading adopted in the printed text is taken from the copy of the poem which the author has inserted in the Yatīmah.

3 This work contains notices on poets and other literary men, with extracts from their writings. It forms one large volume, two copies of which are in the Bib. du Roi. For a list of the articles contained in the Yatīmah, see Catal. MSS. or Bibl. Bod. tom. II, p. 313 et seq.

"The verses of the poems in the Yatimah are virgin daughters of the spirits who lived of old. They are now dead, but their daughters survive, whence the work bears the name of Yatimah"<sup>1</sup>.

Al-Tha'alibī composed also the Fiqh al-Lughah (laws of language), the Sihr al-Balaghah (magic of eloquence), the Sirr al-Barā'ah (secret of excellence), Kitāb man ghāb 'anhū 'l-Muṭrib (book for him who has no one to amuse him<sup>2</sup>), the Mānis al-Wāḥid (companion for the solitary), and many other works besides, containing anecdotes of eminent men, notices on their lives, and extracts from their poetry and epistles; all these productions are indicative of vast information in the author. He himself composed a great deal of poetry. His birth took place A.H. 350 (A.C. 961), and his death in the year 429 (A.C. 1037-8).—Tha'alibī means one who sews together and dresses foxes' skins: he was so denominated because he had been a furrier.

357. SAḤNŪN

Abu Sa'id 'Abd al-Salām Ibn Sa'id* al-Tanūkhī (a member of the tribe of Tanūkh), and surnamed Saḥnūn† was a doctor of the sect of Mālik. He studied under Ibn al-Qāsim (see no. 337), Ibn Wahb (no. 302), and Aṣḥhab (no. 97), after which he became the head of the science, or chief imām, in Maḡrib. He used to say: "God's curse on poverty! I was a contemporary of Mālik, but (having no means of going to see him), I was obliged to take lessons from

<sup>1</sup> Yatimah signifies both orphan and precious pearl.

<sup>2</sup> This is a collection of elegant extracts in prose and verse, classed under different heads. It is drawn up with great taste. Another of al-Tha'alibī's works, but which is not noticed by Ibn Khallikān, bears the title of Kitāb al-I'jāz fī 'l-Ījāz; it is a collection of laconic sayings and maxims. An edition of it has been lately published at Leyden under the direction of M. Weyers.

* M. de Slane has omitted the following names: Ibn Ḥabīb, Ibn Ḥassān, Ibn Hilāl, Ibn Bakkār, Ibn Rabi'ah.—Ed.

† M. de Slane gives Sukānūn.—Ed.

Ibn al-Qāsim.”<sup>1</sup> He held the post of qāḍī at Qayrawān, and on points of doctrine his opinions are of standard authority in Maḡrib. He is the author of the Mudawwanah (digest) containing the doctrines of the imām Mālik; this work, the contents of which he had received (by oral transmission) from Ibn al-Qāsim, is the main authority relied on by the people of Qayrawān. The first who undertook to draw up a Mudawwanah was the Mālikite doctor Asad Ibn al-Furāt<sup>2</sup>, when he returned from ‘Irāq. It originally <sup>1</sup> The author of the Tārīkh al-Qayrawān MS. No. 752, gives a long notice on Sahnūn, in which I remark the following passage: “He was originally from Emessa in Syria, but he was taken thither (to Maḡrib most probably) when his father accompanied the militia (jund) of Emessa.” This must have been during the government of Yazīd Ibn H-tim al-Muhallabī; see Journal Asiatique for November, 1841, p. 481. The jund were the troops furnished by the Arabian tribes which had settled in the different military divisions (junds) of Syria on the first conquest of that country by the Muslims. They received a fixed pay from the khalīf, and a certain number of them were always in actual service. Fuller information on this subject will be found in M. de Reinaud’s translation of Abu ‘l-Fid’-s Geography, chap. on Syria, and in the account of the first Muslim governors of Maḡrib, translated from the universal history of al-Nuwayrī and inserted by me in the Journal Asiatique.

<sup>2</sup> Abū ‘Abd Allāh Asad Ibn Furāt Ibn Sinān was a mawlā to the tribe of Sulaym. Speaking of his own names, he used to say: “I am Asad (lion), and the lion is the noblest of animals; my father was called Furāt, and the Furāt (Euphrates) is the purest of waters; and my grandfather’s name was Sinān (spear), which is the best of weapons”. His family belonged to Khurāsān, and he was born at Harrān, A.H. 142 (A.C. 759). According to his own account, he came into the province of Africa with the troops which had been sent thither, A.H. 144, by the khalīf al-M mūn, under the orders of Muḥammad Ibn al-Ash‘ath al-Khuzā‘ī (see Journal Asiatique for Nov. 1841, page 464). After passing five years at Qayrawān, he accompanied his father to Tūnis, where he resided nine years. At the age of eighteen he had learned the text of the Qur’ān by heart and the desire of completing his studies then led him to the East. He met the imām Mālik at Madīnah and followed his lessons, in the course of which he heard him teach the Muwattā. From thence he went to ‘Irāq and met some of Abū Ḥanīfah’s principal disciples, such as Abū Yūsuf, Asad Ibn ‘Amr and Muḥammad Ibn al-Ḥasan. When in that province he wrote down the Traditions which he had learned, and pursued his studies in jurisprudence. After the death of Mālik, he proceeded to Egypt and became the assiduous disciple of Ibn al-Qāsim, under whose instruction he gathered the materials of the Asadiyah, which he brought to Qayrawān. In A.H. 181 (A.C. 797) he returned to that city and gave lessons to numerous pupils in the Asadiyah, the Muwattā, and in other branches of knowledge. From that time his authority as an imām was fully established. In the year 202, Ziyādat Allāh Ibn Ibrāhīm Ibn al-Aghlab nominated him qāḍī of Qayrawān, and he held that post till the year 212, when the same prince gave him the command of the troops which were about to be sent on an expedition against Sicily. In the month of the first Rabi’, A.H. 212 (June, A.H. 827), he sailed for that island with nine thousand one hundred foot and nine hundred horse; and after achieving there a number of important conquests, he died of his wounds, A.H. 213 (A.C. 828-9), whilst besieging Syracuse.—(Tārīkh al-Qayrawān, MS. No. 752, fol. 26.—Al-Hillat al-Siyārah, MS. fol. 148 v.)

* This passage is given in the autograph —Ed.

consisted in questions proposed by him to Ibn al-Qasim with their solutions by the latter; he then took them with him to Qayrawan, and Saḥnūn wrote them out under his dictation; it was called the Asadiyah (or Asadian after Asad Ibn al-Furāt), but as the questions were put down without any order in this first sketch, Saḥnūn drew them up under separate heads and augmented their number; besides which, he resolved some by means of the Traditions with which his memory was furnished when he learned by heart Ibn Wahb's edition of the Muwattaʿ. Some points remained, however, which Saḥnūn left incomplete.* Saḥnūn had a greater number of pupils than any other of Mālik's disciples, and it was by his means that the doctrines of that imam were propagated throughout Maghrib. He was born in A.H. 160 (A.C. 776-7), and he died in the month of Rajab, A.H. 240 (Nov.-Dec. A.C. 854).—Saḥnūn or Suḥnūn is the name of a bird found in Maghrib and remarkable for its sagacity; it was for this reason that Abū Saʿīd was so surnamed. The pronunciation of this word with an a or with an u involves a question of grammatical forms peculiar to the Arabic language, but it would be too long to expose it here, neither is this the proper place for such a disquisition; it has besides been fully and properly treated by Ibn al-Sīd al-Baṭalyawsī, who has always executed in the best manner whatever task he undertook.

358. ABŪ ḤĀSHIM AL-JUBBĀʾĪ

Abū Ḥāshim 'Abd al-Salām was the son of Abū 'Alī Muḥammad [al-Jubbaʾī]* Ibn 'Abd al-Wahhāb Ibn Salām Ibn K̲h̲alīd<sup>1</sup> Ibn Ḥumārān Ibn Aban; this last was a mawlā to the k̲h̲alīf 'Uthmān Ibn 'Affan. Abū Ḥāshim al-Jubbaʾī a celebrated scholastic theologian, a learned doctor and the son of a man of learning, was, like his father, one of the principal heads of the Motazilites: both of them taught doctrines peculiar to that sect, and all the works on the scholastic theology are filled with their opinions and systematic views—Abū Ḥāshim had a son called Abū 'Alī, who was quite a simpleton and knew nothing; he went one day into the presence of the Ṣāhib Ibn 'Abbad (see no. 93), who imagining that he should be a person of some learning, received him politely and seated him in the place of honour: he then proposed to him a question, and obtained this reply: "I do not know even the half of all the science."* —"True, my son!" replied the Sāhib, "and your father went away with the other half." The birth of Abū Ḥaṣḥim took place A.H. 247 (A.C. 861-2); he died at Baḡhdād on Wednesday, the 17 of Shā'bān, A.H. 321 (August, A.C. 933),† and was interred in the cemetery called the Bustān, or garden which lies on the east bank of the river. The celebrated philologist Abū Bakr Muḥammad Ibn Durayd died on the same day. We shall give the life of Muḥammad Abū Ḥaṣḥim's father.—Jubbā'i means native of Jubbā, a village in the dependencies of Baṣrah which has given birth to a number of learned men<sup>1</sup>.

<sup>1</sup> Here and in other places this name is written خالد in the autograph.

* [ ] Not in autog. aph.—Ed.

359. DĪK AL-JINN.

The celebrated poet Abū Muḥammad 'Abd al-Salām Ibn Raḡhbān Ibn 'Abd al-Salām Ibn Ḥabīb Ibn 'Abd Allāh Ibn Raḡhbān Ibn Zayd Ibn Tamīm, a member of the tribe of Kalb and surnamed Dik al-Jinn<sup>2</sup>, was born at Emessa, but his family belonged to Salamiyah. Tamīm was the first of his ancestors who embraced Islamism; he made his profession of faith to Ḥabīb Ibn Maslamah al-Fihri<sup>3</sup>, when taken prisoner of war; and he then contested the pre-eminence of the Arabs, saying: "They have no advantage over us; we have turned Muslims as they did."—Dik al-Jinn was one

<sup>1</sup> The author of the Muḥṣṭarik notices four places bearing the name of Jubbā; one of them, a canton in Khūzistān, was according to him and to the author of the Marāṣid, the native place of Abū Ḥaṣḥim al-Jubbā'i and of his father.

<sup>2</sup> Dik al-Jinn means the cock of the genii; he was so called according to Abū 'l-Faraj al-Ishahānī, because he was very ugly and had green eyes.—(Mira'āt al-Zamān, No. 640, fol. 222).

<sup>3</sup> Ḥabīb Ibn Maslimah was appointed to the government of Qinnisrīn (near Aleppo) by Abū 'Ubaydah the Muslim conqueror of Syria. This was in A.H. 15 (A.C. 636-7).—See Freytag's Hist. Halebi, and Price's Retrospect, vol. I, page 84.

* 'even' should be substituted by 'which is'.

† 14 August, de Slane erroneously gives 17.—Eu.

of the poets who flourished under the Abbaside dynasty ; he always remained in Syria, and was never induced to derive profit from his poetical talents by travelling to 'Irāq or other countries for the purpose of celebrating the praises of the great. In his religious opinions he was a moderate Shi'ite, and some elegies composed by him on the death of al-Ḥusayn are still extant. His conduct was disorderly and licentious, being so strongly addicted to pleasure and amusements, that he wasted all his patrimony. His poetry is the acme of perfection.<sup>1</sup> The following anecdote is related by 'Abd Allāh Ibn Muḥammad Ibn 'Abd al-Malik al-Zubaydī: "We were sitting with Dīk al-Jinn when a youth came in and recited to him some verses of his composition, on which Dīk al-Jinn drew from under his praying carpet a large roll of papers containing pieces of his own poetry, and gave to the young man, saying: 'Make use of this, my boy! and take it as a help when you compose verses.' The youth then withdrew, and we asked who he was, to which Dīk al-Jinn replied: 'That boy is a native of Jāsim<sup>2</sup> and he says that he belongs to the tribe of Ṭayy; he is surnamed Abū Tammām, and his name is Ḥabīb Ibn Aws; he possesses instruction, intelligence, and great natural abilities.'" Al-Zubaydī says also that Dīk al-Jinn outlived Abū Tammām and composed an elegy on his death. The birth of Dīk al-Jinn took place A.H. 161 (A.C. 777-8) and his death in the reign of al-Mutawakkil, A.H. 235 (A.C. 849-50) or 236; he was then aged upwards of seventy years.—When Abū Nuwās passed through Emessa on his way to Egypt, where he intended reciting to al-Khaṣīb<sup>3</sup> some poems which he had composed in his honour, Dīk al-Jinn heard of his arrival and concealed himself through the apprehension of betraying to him his own relative inferiority as a poet. He was at home when Abū Nuwās knocked at the door and asked admission, but the maid answered that her master was not within. Abū Nuwās immediately perceived the motive which prevented him from appearing, and said to her: "Tell him to come forth, for he has thrown the people of 'Irāq into ecstasy with this verse of his:

---

<sup>1</sup> From the extracts given farther on, it would appear that Ibn Khallikān was not hard to be pleased.

<sup>2</sup> See no. 143.

<sup>3</sup> See no. 162.

"A rosy liquor, received from the hand of a gazelle-like nymph, who seemed to have extracted it from her cheeks and then passed it round."

When Dik al-Jinn heard the message, he went forth to meet Abū Nuwās and received him as his guest.—This verse is taken from the following piece:

"Fear no reproach<sup>1</sup>, but bring here the wine; let water remove its intoxicating qualities, and let our morning draughts be protracted till the hour comes for passing round the evening cup. Dispel every care from one who is burdened with affliction; at the very mention of that wine, the eyes shrink from its brightness. Arise! bear it quickly round in a cup of no puny size! nay, pour it out in all its strength and purity. She rose with a glass, brilliant and sparkling so as nearly to burn her hand; she must have taken the refulgence of her own bright forehead or of the sun to form therewith that dazzling goblet. Throughout that day our hands shed the blood of the winecup<sup>2</sup>, but the wine revenged itself upon our legs; a rosy liquor, received from the hand of a gazelle-like nymph, who seemed to have extracted it from her cheeks and then passed it round."

It is mentioned by al-Jihshyārī<sup>3</sup> in his History of the Wazīrs that the Ḥabīb Ibn 'Abd Allāh Ibn Raḡbān of the genealogy given above, was a kātib under the khalīf al-Manṣūr, and the President of the Donation Office<sup>4</sup>; he was still living, by that writer's account, in the year 143 (A.C. 760-1). He adds that Dik al-Jinn the poet

1 The right reading is معزول .

2 Literally : We passed day with the breath (or life) of the cup panting by our hands.

3 "Abū 'Abd Allāh Muḥammad Ibn 'Abbās al-Jihshyārī; a kātib, an historian, and a writer of epistles. He is the author of a history of the wazīrs, a work entitled Mizān al-Shi'r (the balance for poetry)." The author of the Fihrist from which we extract this short notice (see fol. 174) wrote A.H. 377. Al-Jihshyārī was probably still living when these lines were penned. Ḥājji Khalīfah says that he was a native of Kūfah (see his bibliographical dictionary) under the word Mizān), but he appears not to have known the date of his death.

4 The Muslim troops when in actual service received pay, but under the title of a donation; it was furnished to them, at regular intervals, by the Donation Office (Diwān al-'Atā).

was one of his descendants, and that the Mosque of Ibn Raḡbān at Baḡhdād was named after him. This Ḥabīb, says he again, was a malwā to Ḥabīb Ibn Maslamah al-Fihri. I may here add some remarks: Ḥabīb Ibn Maslamah al-Fihri (of the tribe of Quraysh) was one of Mu'āwiyah's favourite officers, having rendered him signal service at the battle of Ṣiffīn. Mu'āwiyah, when his authority was firmly established, dispatched Ḥabīb on a mission of importance, and when the latter was leaving the palace, he was met by al-Ḥasan, the son of (the khalīf) 'Alī, who said to him: "It may be, O Ḥabīb! that the journey you are about to undertake is an act of rebellion against God." — "By no means," retorted Ḥabīb; "I am not going to join your father." — "Say rather," replied al-Ḥasan, "that you conform to Mu'āwiyah's humours because he enjoys prosperity; but the more he has exalted you in the world, the more he has weakened your religious principles; and though you act foully, you should at least speak fairly; then we might apply to you these words of God's: And others acknowledge their crimes, who had mixed a good with an evil deed<sup>1</sup>; but, unfortunately, you are as those of whom God said: Say rather, that their sinful deeds have choked up their hearts!<sup>2</sup>". This Ḥabīb bore the surname of Abū 'Abd al-Raḡmān; he was appointed governor of Armenia by Mu'āwiyah, and he died there A.H. 42 (A.C. 662-3), before reaching his fiftieth year.—Dik al-Jinn had a slave-girl called Dunyā, of whom he was passionately fond, but having suspected her of improper conduct with Waṣīf, his slave-boy, he put her to death; an act of which he afterwards repented. He then composed numerous poems expressive of the love he bore her, and one of these pieces is as follows:

"O bunch of dates! destruction has fallen upon thee<sup>3</sup>. With thy blood I have watered the earth, yet how often did my lips absorb from thine the draught of love. I gave my sword power over the circuit of her neck,<sup>4</sup> and my tears now flow upon her cheeks. By the merits of her sandals I declare that nothing ever

<sup>1</sup> Qur' n, surah 9, verse 103.

<sup>2</sup> Qur' n, surah 83, verse 14.

<sup>3</sup> Literally: O spathe of the date-tree! death has climbed up to thee and gathered for thee with its hands the fruit of destruction.

<sup>4</sup> The autograph has خناقها.

trod on the sands, dearer to me than her sandals. I did not slay her (through insensibility), for I could never avoid weeping when the dust fell upon her face<sup>1</sup>; but I was unwilling that another should love her, and I could not bear that the boy should cast his eyes on her."

In another of those pieces he says:

"She visited my couch after her burial, and I bestowed lengthened kisses on that neck which was adorned by its grace alone. And I said: 'Joy of my eyes! thou hast been sent to me at last! but how was that possible, since the way from the tomb is ever closed?' She answered: 'There my bones are deposited, the sport of worms and the other offspring of the earth, but this is my spirit come to visit thee; such are the visits paid by those who are entombed.'"

The following verses also were composed by him on her; but some say that she herself made them on the death of her son Raghbān:

"O thou for whom I should sacrifice my father's life! I have abandoned thee in the wide desert and shrouded thy face with the dust of the earth! O thou whom, after all my care, I have given over to corruption, and left there, to support my absence either with impatience or indifference! were I able to look on and watch the progress of corruption, I should have left thy face uncovered, not entombed."

His writings abound with fine ideas.—We have spoken of Salamiyah in the life of al-Mahdī 'Ubayd Alāh.

360. ABU 'L-Q̄SIM AL-D̄ RAKĪ.

Abu 'l-Qāsim 'Abd al-'Azīz Ibn 'Abd Allāh Ibn Muḥammad Ibn 'Abd al-'Azīz al-Dārakī ranks among the greatest of the Shāfi'ite doctors; and his father was held to be the chief traditionist of Iṣbahān for the age in which he lived. Abu 'l-Qāsim settled at Naysāpur,

---

<sup>1</sup> Her face was so delicate that an atom of dust would have hurt her.

A.H. 353 (A.C. 964), and during some years he professed the science of jurisprudence in that city, after which he removed to Bagh̄dād, where he continued to reside till his death. He studied the law under Abū Ishāq al-Marwazī (no. 3), and was Abū Ḥāmid al-Isfārā'ī's master in that science after the death of Abū 'l-Ḥasan Ibn al-Marzubān. Most of the shaykhs at Bagh̄dād, and a number of persons from other countries, attended his lessons. On his first arrival there, he commenced by teaching in the Mosque of Da'laj Ibn Aḥmad<sup>1</sup>, situated in the street of Abū Khalaf, in the Grant of al-Rabī<sup>2</sup>; he opened a class also in the great mosque for the discussion of points of law and the instruction of pupils who aspired to the rank of mufti. The place of head-professor of the Shāfi'ite doctrines at Bagh̄dād then devolved to him, and great numbers pursued their studies in a most successful manner under his tuition. In developing the principles of Shāfi'ite jurisprudence, he followed, in some cases, a system peculiar to himself, and which attested, by its excellence, the soundness of his information. He was suspected, however, of holding Motazilite opinions (but) the shaykh Abū Ḥāmid al-Isfārā'ī declared that he never saw an abler doctor of the law. Al-Dārakī learned the Traditions from his maternal grandfather al-Ḥasan Ibn Muḥammad al-Dārakī. When consulted on a point of law, he always took a long time to reflect before giving an opinion and it sometimes happened that his decisions were completely opposed to those of the two imāms, al-Shāfi'ī and Abū Ḥanīfah. When observations were made to him on this subject, he used to answer by citing an appropriate Tradition and tracing it up to the Prophet after which he would observe that it was better to follow the Traditions than the opinions enounced by either of the two imāms. He died at Bagh̄dād on Friday, the 13 of Shawwāl, A.H. 375 (Feb. A.C. 986)*; aged upwards of seventy years. Some say, but erroneously, that his death occurred in the month of Dhū 'l-Qa'dah. His exactitude as a traditionist is universally admitted, and his authority as a doctor is held to be of the highest order.—According to al-Sam'ānī, Dārakī means belonging to Dārak, this place I believe to be one of the villages in the neighbourhood of Işbahān. The same author calls him 'Abd al-'Azīz Ibn al-Ḥasan Ibn Aḥmad al-Dārakī; whether he be right or not, God best knows!

<sup>1</sup> This mosque was probably founded by Da'laj, who, as has been already noticed, no. 4, was remarkable for his wealth and charity.

<sup>2</sup> See no. 223.

*26 February.—Ed.

361. IBN NUBĀTAH THE POET

The poet Abū Naṣr 'Abd al-'Azīz, surnamed Ibn Nubātah, drew his descent from the tribe of Sa'd, a branch of that of Tamīm; his genealogy, which we give here will render this evident: his father 'Umar was the son of Muḥammad Ibn Aḥmad Ibn Nubātah Ibn Ḥumayd Ibn Nubātah Ibn al-Ḥajjāj Ibn Maṣar Ibn Khālīd Ibn 'Amr Ibn Razāḥ Ibn Riyāḥ Ibn Sa'd Ibn Thujayr Ibn Rabī'ah Ibn Ka'b Ibn Sa'd Ibn Zayd Manāt Ibn Tamīm Ibn Murr; the remainder of the genealogy is well known<sup>1</sup>. This able poet, whose compositions display the combined excellencies of style and thought, went from country to country for the purpose of reciting to princes, wazirs, and other great men, the poems which he had composed in their praise. Some brilliant qaṣīdahs and exquisite eulogiums addressed by him to Sayf al-Dawlah Ibn Ḥamdān are still preserved, and one of these pieces we shall give here: it was written by him in a letter to that of a prince, who had just made him a present of a black horse with a white forehead and legs:

"O prince! thou whose generous qualities are the offspring of thy natural disposition, and whose pleasing aspect is the emblem of thy mind; I have received the present which you sent me, a noble steed whose portly neck seems to unite heavens to the earth on which he treads. Hast thou then conferred a government upon me<sup>2</sup>, since thou sendest me a spear to which a flowing mane serves as a banner<sup>3</sup>. We take possession of what thou hast conferred and find it to be a horse whose forehead and legs are marked with white, and whose body is so black, that a single drop extracted from that colour would suffice to form night's darkest shades<sup>1</sup>. It would seem that the morning had struck him on the forehead (and thus made it white), for which reason he took his revenge by wading into the entrails (regions) of the morning (and thus whitening his legs). He paces slowly, yet one of his names is Lightning; he wears a veil (having his face covered with white, as if to conceal it), and yet beauty itself would be his only rival. Had the sun and the moon a portion only of his ardour, it would be impossible to withstand<sup>2</sup> their heat. The eye cannot follow his movements, unless you (rein him in and) restrain his impetuosity. The glances of the eye cannot seize all his perfections, unless the eye be lead away captive by his beauty (and be thus enabled to follow him)<sup>3</sup>".

<sup>1</sup> See Eichhorn's Monumenta Hist. Arab. tab. V.

<sup>2</sup> The true reading is ولنا ; all the manuscripts are wrong except the autograph.

<sup>3</sup> It is perhaps necessary to observe that when a prince conferred a military command upon one of his subjects, he gave him a standard formed of a spear with a cravat or flag tied around the head of it. The poet here compares his horse to a spear on account of his erect and lofty stature; the knotted banner is represented by the mane.

In describing thus the whiteness of his horse's forehead and legs, the poet had an inspiration of great originality; and I do not think that a similar train of thought was ever expressed before. He composed also a long qaṣīdah rhyming in L and containing the praises of Sayf al-Dawlah; from it we extract these verses:

"You have showered down gifts upon me till I felt them irksome, and was almost tempted to extol the passion of avarice (in a patron). If you still wish to bestow favours upon me, give me also the desire to obtain them, or else bestow them not. Your generosity has left me nought to wish for; and you are the cause that I live in the world devoid of hope."

In the first verse of this extract, the poet comes near to the idea expressed by al-Buḥturī in the following lines:

"I left you from a feeling of estrangement which nothing can efface; your generosity put me to the blush, and your favours cast a shade over the sunshine of our friendship. By the abundance of your gifts you repelled me from you, so that I fear we shall never meet again. How strange that presents should cause a rupture of friendship and that marks of kindness should be felt as an insult."

<sup>1</sup> I have endeavoured, by a long paraphrase, to express the thought contained in this verse. The word rendered by we have taken possession is نَحْتَل which has been incorrectly given in all the manuscripts with the exception of the autograph. Its literal meaning is: we dismount, or we stop at our journey's end.

<sup>2</sup> Here again all the manuscripts are wrong except the autograph. For تَمَكَّن we must read يَمَكَّن. The copyists did not understand what they were writing.

<sup>3</sup> Such is the meaning of the original verses, which are as difficult to translate as to understand.

A similar idea is also expressed in a poem addressed by Di'bil Ibn 'Alī al-Khuzā'i to al-Muṭṭalib Ibn 'Abd Allāh al-Khuzā'i the amīr of Egypt; the verses to which we allude begin thus:

"O for the days I passed with al-Muṭṭalib!

*[Having already given them in the life of Di'bil (no. 215), we shall not repeat them here.] It is now a hacknied thought, having passed from one poet to another, and being frequently employed by them all; some of them spreading it out, and others expressing it with concision: thus I met with it in a piece of verse composed by 'Alī Ibn Jabalah al-'Akawwak (a poet whose life we shall give), and addressed by him in a letter to Abū Dulaf al-'Ijili<sup>1</sup>; I should give the piece here were it not so long. With what grace has Abū 'l-'Alā al-Ma'arrī expressed the same thought in this line:

"Did you moderate your kindness, I should visit you; but the sweetest water is repulsive, if its coolness be too great."

Let us return to our subject: Ibn Nubātah's poetry fills a large volume, and the greater part of his verses is good. He at one time went to Ray and recited to Abū 'l-Faḍl Muḥammad Ibn al-'Amīd some qaṣīdahs which he had composed in his praise; he had also a conversation with him, the particulars of which we shall relate in the life of the latter. He was born A.H. 327 (A.C. 938-9), and he died at Baghdād on Sunday, the 3 of Shawwāl, A.H. 405 (March, A.C. 1015)†, shortly after sunrise. His interment took place before the hour of noon, in the Khayzurān cemetery, situated on the east bank of the Tigris.—The following anecdote was related by Abū Ghālib Muḥammad Ibn Aḥmad Ibn Sahl: "I went to visit Abū 'l-Ḥasan Muḥammad Ibn 'Alī Ibn Naṣr al-Baghdādī, the author of the Epistles and of the work called al-Mufāwāḍah (conversation);"

<sup>1</sup> The life of Abū Dulaf will be found in no. 31.

*[ ] Not in the autograph. Instead, Ibn Khallikān has repeated the verses here also.—Ed.

† 27 March.—Ed.

—this Abu 'l-Ḥasan was the brother of the Malikite qāḍī 'Abd al-Wahhāb, and we shall speak of him again in the life of the latter;—” “he then at Wasiṭ and in his last illness. I sat with him for some time, but, as he felt a diarrhoea coming on, I rose to withdraw, on which he repeated to me this verse, by Abū Naṣr 'Abd al-'Azīz (Ibn Nubāṭah):

‘Let your eyes enjoy a parting look at the friend whom you are about to leave; for I do not think that I shall ever see you again in the valley (where we met so often).’

He then said: ‘I went to Abū Naṣr himself the very day on which he died, and he recited to me this verse as I was taking leave of him; and on my way home I was informed of his death.’ On the night of that day Abū 'l-Ḥasan himself expired. We shall give the date of his death in the life of 'Abd al-Wahhāb. It is related by Abū 'Alī Muḥammad Ibn Washāḥ Ibn 'Abd Allāh that he heard Abū Naṣr say: “I was one day making the siesta in the vestibule of my house, when a person knocked at the door. ‘Who is there?’ said I.—‘A native of the East,’ was the answer.—‘What is your business?’

‘Are you not the author of this verse:

‘He who dies not by the sword must die some other way; the modes of death are various, but that evil still remains the same?’

To this I answered that I was the author.—‘Will you allow me then to repeat it as having been authorised to do so by yourself?’—‘Certainly.* The person then went away. Towards the end of the same day, I heard another knock at the door, and on asking who was there, I received this answer: ‘An inhabitant of Tāhart, in the West country’!—‘What is your business?’—‘Are you the author of this verse:

‘He who dies not by the sword, etc.?’

‘I am he.’—‘Will you allow me then to repeat it as having been authorised to do so by yourself?’—‘Certainly.’ I was thus much astonished to find that this verse had reached the East and the West.”

* See no. 236.

362. IBN MUGHALLIS AL-ANDALŪSĪ.

Abū Muḥammad 'Abd al-'Azīz Ibn Aḥmad Ibn al-Sid Ibn Mughallis al-Qaysī al-Andalusī (a member of the tribe of Qays and a native of Spain) was a highly distinguished philologist and grammarian. Having left Spain, he settled in Egypt, where he pursued his literary studies under the tuition of Abū Ya'qūb Yūsuf Ibn Ya'qūb al-Najirmī<sup>1</sup>; he took lessons also from Abū 'l-'Alā Ṣā'jd [Ibn al-Ḥasan]* al-Raba'ī, the author of the Fuṣūṣ (see no. 282). At Baghdād, he increased his stock of information and contributed to that of the others. There exists some good poetry of his composition, such as the following piece:

“Her eyes are languishing, but not with sickness<sup>2</sup>, yet my heart is sick (of love) for her. She has accustomed my eyes to sleeplessness by drawing from them a gush of tears which prevents them from closing. She paid me a visit, not through love, but to let me perceive her dislike.”

He composed a great quantity of verses. Abū 'l-Tāhir * [Ismā'il] Ibn Kḥalaf, the author of the Unwān (see no. 95), maintained a contest with him for superiority and the qaṣīdahs in which they strove to surpass each other are still preserved in the volumes containing their poetical works. To avoid prolixity, we shall not give any passages from them. He died at Old Cairo on Wednesday, the 24 of the first Jumādā, A.H. 427 (March A.C. 1036)†; the funeral service was said over him, in the Muṣallā of al-Ṣāḍafī, by the shaykh Abū 'l-Ḥasan 'Alī Ibn Ibrāhīm al-Hawfī<sup>3</sup> the author of the Tafsīr, or commentary on the Qur'ān; he was interred near the Banū Ishāq.

<sup>1</sup> His life is given by Ibn Kḥallikān.

<sup>2</sup> See no. 11, note on languishing eyes.

<sup>3</sup> His life will be found farther on.

* [ ] This name is omitted by de Slane.—Ed.

† 24 March.—Ed.

—this Abu 'l-Ḥasan was the brother of the Maliki qāḍī 'Abd al-Wahhāb, and we shall speak of him again in the life of the latter;—”
“he then at Wasiṭ and in his last illness. I sat with him for some time, but, as he felt a diarrhoea coming on, I rose to withdraw, on which he repeated to me this verse, by Abū Naṣr 'Abd al-'Azīz (Ibn Nubāṭah):

‘Let your eyes enjoy a parting look at the friend whom you are about to leave; for I do not think that I shall ever see you again in the valley (where we met so often).’

He then said: ‘I went to Abū Naṣr himself the very day on which he died, and he recited to me this verse as I was taking leave of him; and on my way home I was informed of his death.’ On the night of that day Abū 'l-Ḥasan himself expired. We shall give the date of his death in the life of 'Abd al-Wahhāb. It is related by Abū 'Alī Muḥammad Ibn Washāḥ Ibn 'Abd Allāh that he heard Abū Naṣr say: “I was one day making the siesta in the vestibule of my house, when a person knocked at the door. ‘Who is there?’ said I.—‘A native of the East,’ was the answer.—‘What is your business?’

‘Are you not the author of this verse:

‘He who dies not by the sword must die some other way; the modes of death are various, but that evil still remains the same?’

To this I answered that I was the author.—‘Will you allow me then to repeat it as having been authorised to do so by yourself?’—‘Certainly.* The person then went away. Towards the end of the same day, I heard another knock at the door, and on asking who was there, I received this answer: ‘An inhabitant of Tāhart, in the West country’!—‘What is your business?’—‘Are you the author of this verse:

‘He who dies not by the sword, etc.?’

‘I am he.’—‘Will you allow me then to repeat it as having been authorised to do so by yourself?’—‘Certainly.’ I was thus much astonished to find that this verse had reached the East and the West.”

* See no. 236.

362. IBN MUḠHALLIS AL-ANDALŪSĪ.

Abū Muḥammad 'Abd al-'Azīz Ibn Aḥmad Ibn al-Sīd Ibn Muḡhallis al-Qaysī al-Andalusī (a member of the tribe of Qays and a native of Spain) was a highly distinguished philologist and grammarian. Having left Spain, he settled in Egypt, where he pursued his literary studies under the tuition of Abū Ya'qūb Yūsuf Ibn Ya'qūb al-Najirmī<sup>1</sup>; he took lessons also from Abū 'l-'Alā Ṣā'jd [Ibn al-Ḥasan]* al-Raba'ī, the author of the Fuṣūṣ (see no. 282). At Baghdād, he increased his stock of information and contributed to that of the others. There exists some good poetry of his composition, such as the following piece:

“Her eyes are languishing, but not with sickness<sup>2</sup>, yet my heart is sick (of love) for her. She has accustomed my eyes to sleeplessness by drawing from them a gush of tears which prevents them from closing. She paid me a visit, not through love, but to let me perceive her dislike.”

He composed a great quantity of verses. Abū 'l-Tāhir * [Ismā'īl] Ibn Kḥalaf, the author of the Unwān (see no. 95), maintained a contest with him for superiority and the qaṣīdahs in which they strove to surpass each other are still preserved in the volumes containing their poetical works. To avoid prolixity, we shall not give any passages from them. He died at Old Cairo on Wednesday, the 24 of the first Jumādā, A.H. 427 (March A.C. 1036)†; the funeral service was said over him, in the Muṣallā of al-Ṣāḍafī, by the shaykh Abū 'l-Ḥasan 'Alī Ibn Ibrāhīm al-Hawfī<sup>3</sup> the author of the Tafsīr, or commentary on the Qur'ān; he was interred near the Banū Ishāq.

<sup>1</sup> His life is given by Ibn Kḥallikān.

<sup>2</sup> See no. 11, note on languishing eyes.

<sup>3</sup> His life will be found farther on.

* [ ] This name is omitted by de Slane.—Ed.

† 24 March.—Ed.

363. 'ABD AL-ṢAMAD IBN 'ALĪ AL-H<sub>4</sub>SHIMĪ.

Abū Muḥammad 'Abd al-Ṣamad al-H<sub>4</sub>shimī (a descendant from H<sub>4</sub>shim, Muḥammad's great-grandfather), was the son of 'Alī Ibn 'Abd Allāh Ibn al-'Abbās Ibn 'Abd al-Muṭṭalib. The hāfiẓ Abū 'l-Faraj Ibn al-Jawzī mentions, in his work entitled Shudhūr al-'Uqūd, some strange particularities relative to this person. "He was born," says he, "A.H. 104 (A.C. 722-3), and his brother Muḥammad Ibn 'Alī, the father of (the khalifs), al-Saffāḥ and al-Manṣūr, came into the world A.H. 60 (A.C. 679-80); there was thus an interval of forty-four years between the births of each. 'Abd al-Ṣamad died A.H. 185 (A.C. 801), and Muḥammad, A.H. 126 (A.D. 743-4); their deaths were thus separated by a period of fifty-nine years. In the year 50 (A.C. 670-1), Yazīd, the son of Mu'āwiyah, made the pilgrimage, and in the year 150 (A.C. 767-8) 'Abd al-Ṣamad led the pilgrim caravan to Makkah, yet they were both in the same degree of descent from 'Abd Manāf; Yazīd being the son of Mu'āwiyah, the son of Abū Sufyān Ṣakhr, the son of Ḥarb, the son of Umayyah, the son of 'Abd Ṣhams, the son of 'Abd Manāf; and 'Abd al-Ṣamad being the son of 'Alī, the son of 'Abd Allāh, the son of al-'Abbās, the son of al-Muṭṭalib, the son of H<sub>4</sub>shim, the son of 'Abd Manāf: whence it appears that in their respective genealogies five links intervened between each of them and 'Abd Manāf. 'Abd al-Ṣamad witnessed the reigns of al-Saffāḥ and al-Manṣūr, who were both the sons of his brother; he then lived to see the reign of al-Mahdī, to whose father he was a paternal uncle; then the reign of al-Ḥādī, whose grandfather was his nephew; and he died in the reign of al-Rashīd. He said one day to this last khalif: 'Commander of the faithful! in this assembly there are a commander of the faithful, a commander of the faithful's paternal uncle, the paternal uncle of a commander of the faithful's paternal uncle, and the paternal uncle of one [who] was a paternal uncle to a paternal uncle of a commander of the faithful.' And this was the fact, for Sulaymān, the son of Abū Ja'far (al-Manṣūr) was uncle to al-Rashīd, and al-'Abbās was uncle to Sulaymān and 'Abd al-Ṣamad was uncle to al-'Abbās. He died without having cast his first teeth, and those of the lower jaw were united into one mass."—It is stated by Ibn Jarīr al-Ṭabarī, in his History, that 'Abd al-Ṣamad was born in the month of Rajab, A.H. 106 (Nov.-Dec. A.C. 724), and that he died in the month of the latter Jumādā, A.H. 175 (A.C. October, 794); another historian says that his death took place at Baghdād and some persons place his birth in A.H. 109, or 105, at al-Ḥumaymah<sup>1</sup>, a town situated in the country called the Balqā. His mother was the Katīra* in whose praise 'Ubayd Allāh Ibn Qays al-Ruqayyāt<sup>2</sup> composed his qaṣidah, which begins thus:

The sight of Kath<sup>h</sup>rah* renews his joy<sup>3</sup>.

'Abd al-Ṣamad became blind towards the end of his life. We shall give the life of his father 'Alī and his brother Muḥammad.

364. IBN BĀBAK THE POET

Abu 'l-Qāsim 'Abd al-Ṣamad Ibn Maṣṣūr Ibn al-Ḥasan Ibn Bābak was a poet noted for the quantity and the excellence of his productions. I have seen his collected poetical works in three volumes. The cast of his poetry is peculiarly pleasing, and the eulogistic pieces addressed by him to the great men of the numerous countries which he visited were retributed in the most generous manner. The following passages may give an idea of his style:

"A graceful nymph gifted by nature with the sweetest charms, came to visit me with trembling steps, whilst the Pleiades were rising and still hesitating in their career. As she dispelled the shades of night (with the light of her beauty), I exclaimed: 'Is it the eye of the morning which openeth, or a sunbeam darting through the cloud?' She drew near, glancing magic from her eyes, and trembling like a gazelle which crops its food in the lonely desert. During the darkness of that night, which spread over us the softest folds of its mantle, we partook of the purple liquor till the constellation of the Eagle began to sink towards the horizon. We shared a wine which bore on its surface bubbles like

<sup>1</sup> This is probably the Amāime of Berghaus's map of Syria; it is placed at about twenty-five miles to the north-east of Akaba, and about forty to the south of Petra.

<sup>2</sup> See no. 318, note on 'Ubayd Allāh.

<sup>3</sup> This hemistich is incorrectly given in all the manuscripts except the autograph. The true reading is: عاد له من كبر الطرب.

* M. de Slane writes Kath<sup>h</sup>irah while the autograph and Egyptian edition give Kabirah.—Ed.

the drops from a lover's wounded heart, or like the tears from a love-struck suitor's eyes. When we mixed it with water<sup>1</sup> it rose in revolving circlets, which trembled like the eyes of a virgin when the veil which conceals her features is torn away. That liquor is accustomed to take away the reason, and it seems to hold mastery over the thoughts deposited<sup>2</sup> in men's hearts. We passed the night in secret joy; our mutual love stood revealed and our long-hidden passion was disclosed. But towards the hour in which the qaṭā<sup>3</sup> that has outstripped its fellows return from the spring where it took its morning draught,—at the time in which the plaintive doves take refuge in the branches,—she withdrew, vanquished by wine, and as her faltering tongue refused its office, she bade me adieu with her hand.

My dearest friends! mix for us a cup of wine, and let its brightness dispel the shades of night from around us. Let the bubbles spark on its surface, so that I tremble lest they burn my companion when he intends to drink. And then let none deny that the sun has set in my friend's mouth, for the radiance of his cheeks will give them the lie."

One of his qaṣīdahs contains a remarkably tender verse; it is this:

"The zephyr swept by me, and sighed so tenderly, that it seemed to have heard me as I complained of my sufferings."

This poet died at Baḡdād, A.H. 410 (A.C. 1019-20).

365. ABU 'L-MAḤĀSIN AL-RŪYĀNĪ.

Abu 'l-Maḥāsin 'Abd al-Wāḥid Ibn Ismā'īl Ibn Aḥmad Ibn Muḥammad al-Rūyānī, a Shāfi'ite jurisconsult, was one of the most eminent men of his age as a dogmatic theologian, a controvertist, and a teacher of the doctrines peculiar to his sect. He took lessons from Abū 'Abd Allāh Muḥammad Ibn Bayyān [Ibn Muḥammad] al-Kāẓirī (no. 153, note), and from Abū 'l-Ḥusayn 'Abd al-Ghāfir Ibn Muḥammad al-Fārisī at Mayyāfāriqīn; the traditional knowledge which he had received was transmitted through Zāhir Ibn Ṭāhir al-Shahīdī<sup>1</sup> and others to the following generation. The highest respect and veneration were shown to him in the country (where the Saljuqs ruled), and the wazīr Nizām al-Mulk honoured him with special favour on account of his eminent merit. After residing for some time in Bukhārā, he proceeded to Ghaznah and Naysāpur, where he frequented the society of the learned, and attended the conferences presided by Nāṣir al-Marwazī (see no. 269). He then drew up a ta'liqah<sup>2</sup> composed of the observations made by that doctor, and he learned Traditions also. A college was founded by him at Āmul in Ṭabaristān, and he subsequently proceeded to Ray, where he filled the functions of a professor. From thence he went to Iṣbahān and made dictations<sup>3</sup> in the principal mosque. Some instructive works were composed by him, such as the Baḥr al-Madhhab (ocean of the doctrine), one of the most voluminous treatises which the Shāfi'ites possess on their jurisprudence; the Manāṣiṣ, or opinions pronounced by the imām al-Shāfi'ī on points of law; the Kāfi (sufficient)<sup>4</sup>, and the Ḥilyat al-Mu'min (ornament of the true believer)<sup>5</sup>: he wrote also some treatises on dogmatic theology and on controversy. It is related that he used to say: "Were all al-Shāfi'ī's works burned, I could dictate them from memory." The qāḍī and ḥāfiẓ Abū Muḥammad 'Abd Allāh Ibn Yūsuf<sup>6</sup> makes mention of him in his Ṭabaqāt, or chronological biography, of the Shāfi'ite imāms: "Abū 'l-Maḥāsīn al-Rūyānī," says he, "the pearl of the age and the imām

<sup>1</sup> The autograph has شجت , and the other manuscripts سجت , when poured out.

<sup>2</sup> For ودائع read وئائع .

<sup>3</sup> The qaṭā is a sort of grouse which frequents the desert. Every night they fly to the nearest source, which is often at a great distance, and fill their crops with water which they bring back early in the morning to their young. In many Arabic proverbs, allusion is made to the habits of this bird; see M. de Sacy's Chrestomathie, t. II, p. 368, and t. III, pp. 416, 507. Dr. Russel gives a description of it in the History of Aleppo, it is the tetrao alchata of Linnaeus.

<sup>1</sup> Such is the true orthography of this name; not Shahāḥmī, as in no. 87, note.

<sup>2</sup> See no. 311, note.

<sup>3</sup> See nos. 12 and 92, note on Amālī.

<sup>4</sup> This is a treatise on Shāfi'ite jurisprudence.

<sup>5</sup> This is also a work on jurisprudence.

<sup>6</sup> The qāḍī Abū Muḥammad 'Abd Allāh Ibn Yūsuf al-Jurjānī was a ḥāfiẓ and a jurisconsult. He drew up a work on the merits of al-Shāfi'ī, and another on the merits of the imām Aḥmad Ibn Ḥanbal. He composed also a Ṭabaqāt of Shāfi'ite doctors. Born at Jurjān, A.H. 409 (A.C. 1018-9); died in Dhū 'l-Qa'dah, A.H. 489 (October-November A.C. 1096).—(Tab. al-Shāf.) of jurisprudence". Notice is taken of him also by Abū Zakariyā Yahyā Ibn Mandah<sup>1</sup>. He taught the Traditions in different countries, and gave them on the authority of an immense number of persons from whom he had received them. His birth took place in the month of Dhu 'l-Hijjah, A.H. 415 (February, A.C. 1025). The ḥafīz Abū Ṭahir al-Silafī (no. 43) says: "We received intelligence that Abū 'l-Maḥāsīn al-Rūyānī was murdered at 'Āmul in the month of Muḥarram A.H. 502 (August-Sept. A.C. 1108), as he had just finished one of his dictations; he fell a victim to the irritated spirit of sectarian fanaticism." It is mentioned too by Ma'mar Ibn 'Abd al-Wāhid Ibn Fākhīr<sup>2</sup>, in the list of deaths extracted by him from Abū Sa'd al-Sam'ānī's<sup>3</sup> work, that al-Rūyānī was slain by heretics (malāḥid) at 'Āmul, and in the mosque, on Friday, the 11 of Muḥarram* in the above-mentioned year.—Rūyānī means belonging to Rūyān, a city in Ṭabaristān which has produced many learned men.—'Āmul is a city in the same region; we have already spoken of it (no. 286).

366. AL-BABBAGHĀ

Abū 'l-Faraj 'Abd al-Wāhid Ibn Naṣr Ibn Muḥammad al-Makhzūmī (a member of the tribe of Makhzūm) is the poet who is generally known by the surname of al-Babbaghā. Al-Tha'ālībī says in his Yatimah that he was a native of Naṣībīn and speaks of his talents in the highest terms; he gives also a number of epistles and pieces of verse composed by him, and inserts (the poetical correspondence) which passed between him and Abū Ishāq al-Ṣābi, with other circum-

<sup>1</sup> His life is given by our author.

<sup>2</sup> The ḥafīz Abū Ahmad Ma'mar Ibn 'Abd al-Wāhid Ibn Fākhīr drew his descent from the tribe of Quraysh and was a native of Iṣbahān. He was learned in the Traditions, and obtained a great distinction as a preacher. His virtuous conduct procured him the utmost respect and consideration. He died at the age of seventy, on a journey to Hijāz, A.H. 564 (A.C. 1168-9).—(Nujūm, Al-Y fī 'i).—This is certainly the same ḥafīz who is called Ma'mar al-Samānī 'Abd al-Wāhid, in the Ṭabaqāt al-Huffāz; MS. of the Ducal Library at Gotha, of which we possess an edition lithographed by H.F. Wastenfeld. The extreme incorrectness of this work for the names, the dates and the facts, reduces its authority to a very low standard.

<sup>3</sup> The true reading is الحافظ ابني

* 21 August.—Ed.

stances too long to relate<sup>1</sup>. The following are specimens of his poetry:

"O you reign over my heart! my soul (is departing and) biddeth you adieu: it found not patience to console it (for your cruelty); nay, it (became insensible and) ceased to feel the anguish (of unrequited love). It was once my hope long to enjoy the breath of life, but now, since you abandon me, that hope subsists no more. May-God inflict on me no longer the pains of existence! When you are absent, I can find no happiness in life."

*[From the same]:

"Thy image which I see so often in my dreams knows better than thyself how much I love thee, and feels more compassion for thy afflicted suitor than thou dost. When thy cruelty drove sleep from my eyes, that image would have visited my waking hours, could it possibly have done so."

*[From the same]:

"I remember a graceful maid whose countenance was clothed in a robe of beauty and encircled with a broidery of ringlets. When I called upon my heart for strength to endure the pains her cruelty inflicted, that heart became her ally. So perfect are the charms of her face, that the moon seems to have borrowed all her radiance there. When my heart urges me to fly from her tyranny, love says: 'Nought can avail against her; try and soothe her by submission<sup>2</sup>.'"

In one of his comparisons he employs the following original idea:

"The hoofs of his rapid steeds stamp on the very rock the image of a crescent. The eye of the sun was dazzled (by their speed), and the dust which they raised seemed applied to it as a collyrium."

<sup>1</sup> The life of al-Biabba<sup>gh</sup>, some fragments of his poetry, and a part of his correspondence with Abū Ishāq extracted from the Yatimah, were published at Leipsic, 1838, by Ph. Wolff.

<sup>2</sup> The autograph gives the true reading, which is منه فداره. In the printed edition and the other manuscripts, the reading is decidedly bad, as it contains a fault against prosody.

*[ ] Omitted by de Slane.—Ed.

Speaking of Sa'id al-Dawlah<sup>1</sup> the (grand) son of Sayf al-Dawlah Ibn Ḥamdān he says:

"The cloud of his generosity overshadowed mankind; and its lightnings, the foreboders of a grateful shower, never deluded our hopes. His beneficence was no trickling streamlet; he bestowed till nothing more remained for him to give, or for mortals to desire."

In the life of Abū Naṣr Ibn Nubāṭah (no. 361) we have already given some passages containing a similar thought. The greater part of al-Babbaghī's poetry is characterised by the excellence (of its style) and the beauty of its ideas. He had been for some time in the service of Sayf al-Dawlah Ibn Ḥamdān, but, on that prince's death, he travelled from one country to another, and at length died on Saturday, the 29 of Shā'ban, A.H. 398 (May, A.C. 1008).* It is stated however by the Khafīb (see no. 33) in his History, that he died on the eve of Saturday, the 27 of Shā'bān, A.H. 398. Al-Tha'ālībī says: "I heard the amīr Abu'l-Fāḍil al-Mīkalī relate that, on returning from the pilgrimage in the year 390, he entered Baghdād and met there Abu'l-Faraj al-Babbaghī, who was then far advanced in age, his body enfeebled by years, but his mind still possessing its usual vigour and elegance,"—He was surnamed Babbaghā (parrot) for the fluency of his language, or, as some say, for an impediment in his speech which made him lisp: I met with a note in the handwriting of Ibn Jinnī, the grammarian, in which it is stated that this name is to be written Faffaghā, but God best knoweth which is the right orthography<sup>2</sup>.

367. ABŪ MANṢŪR AL-BAGHDĀDĪ

The ustād (master) Abū Manṣūr 'Abd al-Qāhir Ibn Ṭāhir Ibn Muḥammad al-Baghdādī (a native of Baghdād), a dogmatic theologian and a member of the sect of al-Shāfi'ī was well acquainted with the belles-lettres, and versed in a great number of other sciences, particularly arithmetic; of the last he was a complete master and wrote on it some instructive works, one of which bears the title of al-Takmilah (the completion). He possessed great skill in the art of calculating the shares to which the different heirs on an inheritance are entitled, and he composed also a great quantity of poetry. The hāfiẓ 'Abd al-Ghāfir al-Fāris, mentions him in the Siyāq, or continuation of the History of Naysāpur and says: "He came to Naysāpur with his father, and possessed great riches, which he spent on the learned (in the law) and on the Traditionists; he never made of his information a source of profit. He composed treatises on different sciences and surpassed his contemporaries in every branch of learning, seventeen of which he taught publicly. He studied jurisprudence under Abū Ishāq al-Shirāzī, and, on that doctor's death, he filled his place as a professor in the mosque of 'Aqil; during some years he gave lessons there, which were assiduously attended by doctors of the greatest eminence; amongst his pupils were Naṣir al-Marwaz and Zayn al-Islām al-Qushayrī." He died in the city of Isfarā'in, A.H. 429 (A.C. 1037-8), and was interred beside the grave of his master Abū Ishāq.

<sup>1</sup> The history of Sa'id al-Dawlah, extracted from Kamāl al-Dīn's History of Aleppo, has been published in Arabic by professor Freytag at the end of his edition of Lukmān's Fables. Bonn, 1823.

<sup>2</sup> Babbaghī, the Arabic name for the green parrot, is evidently the same word as the Spanish and Portuguese papagayo (parrot), the German papagey, the Italian pappagallo, the old French papegai, and the English popinjay, as there is no p in the Arabic alphabet, a b or an f are equally used to replace it. This word is not originally Arabic; it belongs perhaps to some Indian dialect.

* 8 May.—Ed.

368. ABU 'L-NAJIB AL-SUHRAWARDĪ

Abu 'l-Najīb 'Abd al-Qāhir al-Suhrawardī, surnamed Ḍiyā al-Dīn (splendour of religion), was a descendant of the khālif Abū Bakr; his father 'Abd Allāh being the son of Muḥammad Ibn 'Ammayah 'Abd Allāh Ibn Sa'd Ibn al-Ḥusayn Ibn al-Qāsim Ibn 'Alqamah Ibn al-Naḍr Ibn Mu'adh Ibn 'Abd al-Raḥmān Ibn al-Qāsim Ibn Mu'ammad Ibn Abī Bakr al-Ṣiddīq. But Ibn al-Najjār says in his History of Baghḍād: "I give here the genealogy of the Shaykh Abu 'l-Najīb as I found it in his own handwriting: 'Abd al-Qāhir Ibn 'Abd Allāh Ibn Muḥammad Ibn 'Ammayah 'Abd Allāh Ibn Sa'd Ibn al-Ḥusayn Ibn al-Qāsim Ibn al-Naḍr Ibn al-Qāsim Ibn Sa'd Ibn al-Naḍr Ibn 'Abd al-Raḥmān Ibn al-Qāsim Ibn Muḥammad Ibn Abī Bakr al-Ṣiddīq." This list must be more correct than the former, since it was written out by Abu 'l-Najīb himself. Abu 'l-Najīb, the first teacher of his age in 'Irāq, was born at Suhraward on or about the year 490. (A.C. 1097). He went to Baghḍād and studied jurisprudence at the Niẓāmiyah College under As'ad al-Mihānī (see no. 86) and other masters; he then walked in the path of Ṣ fiṣm, and, having conceived a strong passion for retirement and an aversion for worldly concerns, he abstained, for a long period of time, from all intercourse with mankind, and sedulously devoted his efforts to the task of obtaining the divine favour. He afterwards returned to the world and converted great numbers from their evil courses by his exhortations and admonitions. A convent was built by him on the west bank of the Tigris at Bagħdād, in which he lodged a number of holy men who were his disciples. He was then induced to give lessons in the Niẓāmiyah College, and, during the period of his professorship, the effects of the divine grace with which he was favoured were manifested in the rapid progress of his pupils. His appointment took place on the 27 of Muḥarram, A.H. 545 (May, A.C. 1150)*, and his removal from office in the month of Rajab, 547. The ḥāfiẓ Abu 'l-Sa'd al-Sam'ānī has handed down some Traditions on his authority, and he mentions him also in his work (the supplement to the History of Bagħdād). Abu 'l-Najīb set out on a pilgrimage to Jerusalem, and on his arrival at Mosul, A.H. 557 (A.C. 1162), he gave pious exhortations at sittings held by him in the Old Mosque; he then proceeded to Syria, but on reaching Damascus, he was prevented from visiting the holy city by the rupture of the truce which had been concluded between the Muslims and the Franks, whose projects may God frustrate! On his arrival at Damascus, a most honourable reception was granted to him by al-Malik al-'Ādil Nūr al-Dīn Maḥmūd, the sovereign of Syria. He there held regular assemblies at which he preached, but, after a short stay, he returned to Bagħdād, in which city he died, on Friday, the 17 of the latter Jumādā, A.H. 563 (March, A.C. 1168)† at the hour of evening prayers. Early the next morning he was interred in the convent founded by himself. His birth was on or about the year 490 (A.C. 1097), according to the statement of Shihāb al-Dīn, his brother's son. His nephew Shihāb al-Dīn Aba Ḥafṣ 'Umar al-Suhrawardī shall be spoken of in another part of this work.—Suhrawardī means belonging to Suhraward, which is a village near Zanjan in Persian 'Irāq.

† This link of his genealogy is given in the autograph.

* 26 May.—Ed.

† 29 March.—Ed.

369. ABU 'L-Q 'SIM AL-QUSHAYR

Abu 'l-Qāsim 'Abd al-Karīm Ibn Hawāzin Ibn 'Abd al-Malik Ibn Ṭalḥah Ibn Muḥammad al-Quṣhayrī, a doctor of the sect of al-Shāfi'ī, was one of the most learned men of the age in the science of jurisprudence, Qur'ānic exegesis, the Traditions, dogmatic theology, the belles-lettres, and poetry; he possessed also great skill in penmanship and a profound knowledge of Ṣūfism, to the practices of which he united a perfect acquaintance with the law. He drew his descent from one of the Arabs who settled in Khurasān (on the first conquest of that country by the Muslims), and his family inhabited a place there called Ustuwā. At an early age he lost his father, and his youth was devoted to the study of (Arabic) literature. He possessed a village in the neighbourhood of Ustuwā, and, as it was oppressed by excessive taxation, he resolved on proceeding to Naysāpur that he might acquire a knowledge of arithmetic sufficient to qualify him as an assessor, and thus enable him to protect his village from the rapacity of the revenue officers. On arriving in that city, he happened to attend an assembly presided by the Shaykh Abū 'Alī al-Ḥasan Ibn 'Alī al-Daqqāq, who was the great master (of Ṣūfism) in that age; the discourse which he heard excited his admiration and left so deep an impression on his mind, that he abandoned his former project and entered as a candidate on the path of Ṣūfism. Al-Daqqāq, remarking in his countenance the indications of a noble character, received him with kindness and admitted him (into the order); he then excited his generous ambition and advised him to cultivate the science (of the law). Abū 'l-Qāsim was thus induced to attend the lessons of Abū Bakr Muḥammad Ibn Bakr al-Ṭūsī<sup>1</sup> under whom he pursued the study of jurisprudence till he had noted down the whole course as delivered by that teacher. His next master was Abū Bakr Ibn Fnrak<sup>2</sup> under whom he studied with great assiduity till he mastered the science of dogmatic theology. He then went to the course held by Abū Ishāq al-Isfara'inī, and during the first days he remained seated as a simple auditor, till Ab. Ishāq at length told him that the science which he taught could not be learned by mere listening, and that it was absolutely necessary to take it down in writing. Upon this, Abu 'l-Qāsim repeated to him the whole of the lectures which he had heard on the preceding days. Ab. Ishāq was struck with admiration at a circumstance so extraordinary, and fully appreciating his pupil's great abilities, he treated him with marked honour and said: "It is not necessary that you should attend my lectures; all you have to do is to read my works." Abu 'l-Qāsim then continued his studies at home, and having acquired a complete acquaintance with the systems of doctrine peculiar to the two professors, Ibn Fārak and Ibn Isīḥāq, he pursued the books composed by the qādī Abū Bakr al-Baqillānī<sup>1</sup>. During this time he regularly followed the sittings held by al-Daqqāq and obtained from him his daughter in marriage, although she had many relations entitled to her hand. On the death of his father-in-law, he advanced in the career of Ṣūfism by devoting his efforts to the attainment of spiritual perfection, and to the deliverance of his heart from the consciousness of individuality<sup>2</sup>. About this time he began to compose his works, and before the year 410 (A.C. 1019) he finished his great commentary on the Qur'ān, entitled al-Taysir fī 'Ilm il-Tafsīr (the science of the Qur'ānic exegesis made easy), which is one of the best works on the subject<sup>3</sup>: another of his productions is a treatise on the Men of the Path (see no. 111 note). In making the pilgrimage to Makkah, he met in the caravan, with the shaykh Abū Muḥammad al-Juwaynī, the father of the Imām al-Ḥaramayn (no. 310), Aḥmad Ibn al-Ḥusayn al-Bayhaqi (no. 27), and a number of other eminent men, from whom he learned the Traditions both at Baghdād and in the province of Ḥijāz. He was an expert horseman and well skilled in the use of arms. By the excellence of his sermons and exhortations, he held the first rank as a preacher, and in the year 437 (A.C. 1045-6) he opened a class

<sup>1</sup> Abū Bakr Muḥammad Ibn Bakr—not Ibn Abī Bakr as in most of the MSS.—surnamed al-Ṭūsī al-Nauqānī, a doctor of the sect of al-Shāfi'ī, studied jurisprudence in Nays pur under al-Masarjisi. He was pious, learned, modest and indifferent to wordly honours. He died at Nauqān, A.H. 420 (A.C. 1029).—(Tab al-Sh f.)—Ṭūs, a city in Khur sān, was composed of two towns, Ṭabarān and Nawqān.

<sup>2</sup> His life will be found in this work.

---

<sup>1</sup> The life of this doctor will be found farther on.

<sup>2</sup> I have here paraphrased the technical expressions mujāhida (effort) and taḥrid (the stripping off). According to the Ṣafīs, the union of the soul with divinity is not possible till the creature has lost the consciousness of his own individuality.

<sup>3</sup> In the life of his grandson 'Abd al-Ghāfir al-Fārisī, another commentary of his on the Qur'ān is noticed by Ibn Khallikān.

wherein he taught the Traditions. Abu 'l-Ḥasan 'Alī al-Bāḳharzī mentions him with high commendation in the Dumyat al-Qaṣr, and says that had he struck a rock with the whip<sup>1</sup> of his admonition, it would have melted; and if Satan had attended at his exhortations, he would have been converted to God. The Khaṭīb (no. 33) speaks of him in these terms in his History of Baḡhdād: "He came to us (at Baḡhdād) in the year 448 and taught the Traditions, which we wrote down under his dictation. As a traditionist he was a trustworthy authority. He used also to relate anecdotes<sup>2</sup>; he preached with great elegance and his arguments were most powerful<sup>3</sup>. In dogmatic theology he followed the principles of al-Aṣḥ'arī, and in the developments of the law he held the doctrines of the Shāfi'ites." 'Abd al-Ghāfir al-Fārisī notices him also in his History, and it is related by Abū 'Abd Allāh Muḥammad Ibn al-Faḍl al-Farāwī<sup>4</sup>, that he heard 'Abd al-Karīm al-Quṣḥayrī recite the following verses of his own composing:

"God's blessing on the hour in which we were alone and when I saw your face! A smile then mantled on the mouth of love, in the garden of familiarity. We passed a time of pleasure for our eyes, but the next morning their lids were moist with tears."

It is mentioned by the shayḫ Abū'l-Faṭḥ Muḥammad Ibn Muḥammad Ibn 'Alī al-Farāwī the preacher that Abū'l-Qāsim al-Quṣḥayrī frequently recited these verses, composed by one of the brethren.

"Had you been with us at the moment of our separation and witnessed our repeated adieus, you would have learned that there is a discourse in tears, and that tears are a part of discourse."

These lines are by Dhu 'l-Qarnayn Ibn Ḥamdān, of whom we have already spoken (no. 418).—'Abd al-Karīm al-Quṣḥayrī was born in the month of the first Rabi', A.H. 376 (July-August A.C. 986); he died at Naysāpūr on the morning of Sunday, the 16 of the latter Rabi',

1 The autograph has لبسوط

2 The autograph has وكان يقصر وكان تفتت

3 Literally: His demonstration was fine.

4 His life will be found in this work.

A.H. 465 (December, A.C. 1072)*, before the hour of sunrise. He was buried in the Madrasah, at the foot of the grave in which his master Abū 'Alī 'l-Daqqāq was interred.—I met in his work entitled al-Risālah<sup>1</sup> with two verses which pleased me so much, that I am induced to give them here:

"Some may taste of consolation after having long suffered the pains of love; but in my passion for Laylā, I shall never taste of consolation. And yet all that I ever obtained from her intercourse were hopes never fulfilled and transitory as the flash<sup>2</sup> of the thunder-cloud."

His son Abū Naṣr 'Abd al-Raḥmān was an eminent imām and resembled his father in the sciences which he cultivated and in holding, like him, assemblies at which he preached. He afterwards followed with great assiduity the lessons of the Imām al-Ḥaramayn, till he acquired a perfect knowledge of that jurisconsult's manner of treating the Shāfi'ite doctrines and discussing controverted points. He then set out to make the pilgrimage, and, on arriving at Baghḍād, he held regular assemblies, at which he gave exhortations with a most impressive effect. The shaykh Abū Ishāq al-Shīrāzī attended at these assemblies, and the learned men of Baghḍād unanimously agreed that they had never heard a preacher like him. He pronounced his admonitory discourses in the Nizāmiyah College and in the monastery of the chief of the Ṣūfis (shaykh al-Shuyūṭī); but his zealous attachment for the doctrines of al-Ash'arī led into a controversy with the Hanbalites on points of faith. This caused a riot, in which a number of lives were lost on both sides, and one of Nizām al-Mulk's son was obliged to ride out and allay the tumult. When intelligence of this event reached Nizām al-Mulk, who was then in Iṣbahān, he sent for Abū Naṣr, and having shown him every mark of respect, he gave him an escort of honour to Naysāpūr. On arriving there, Abū Naṣr resumed his lessons and exhortations, and continued to fill that duty till nearly the last moment of his life. About a month before he died, he was struck with a weakness in his limbs, and he expired at Naysāpūr, on the forenoon of Friday, the 28th of the latter

<sup>1</sup> This Risālah is a celebrated epistle or treatise on Ṣūfism.

<sup>2</sup> Here again all the manuscripts except the autograph are wrong. The right reading is كخطه. †

* 30 December.—Ed.

† In de Slane's edition of the text لخطه is given which is wrong.—Ed.

Jumādā, A.H. 514 (Sept., A.C. 1120)*. He was interred in the funeral chapel which is called the Qushayrite Mausoleum.—He knew by heart a great number of poetical pieces and anecdotes, and the following lines, which I met in some composition or other, and afterwards in al-Sam'ānī's work, the Dhayl, were composed by himself.

"My heart abandons me to serve you, and time endeavours (but in vain, to make me forget) you. Fate decided that we should separate, and what can control its decrees? God alone knoweth the depth of my affliction when obliged now to quit you for ever!"

The shaykh Ab. 'Alī al-Daqqāq died A.H. 412 (A.C. 1021) Qushayrī, means descended from Qushayr Ibn Ka'b, the progenitor of a great (Arabian) tribe.—Ustuwā near Naysāp r, is a district covered with villages, which has produced a number of learned men.

370. ABŪ SA'D AL-SAM'ĀNĪ.

The hāfiẓ Abū Sa'd 'Abd al-Karīm al-Sam'ānī, surnamed Tāj al-Islām (the crown of Islamism), was a doctor of the sect of al-Shāfi'ī and a native of Marw. He belonged by birth to the tribe of 'Iamīm and his genealogy (though incomplete) is as follows: 'Abd al-Karīm Ibn Abī Bakr Muḥammad Ibn Abī 'l-Muzaḥḥār al-Manṣūr Ibn Muḥammad Ibn 'Abd al-Jabbār Ibn Aḥmad Ibn Muḥammad Ibn Ja'far Ibn Aḥmad Ibn 'Abd al-Jabbār Ibn al-Faḍl Ibn al-Rabī' Ibn Muslim Ibn 'Abd Allāh Ibn 'Abd al-Mujīb al-Tamīmī.—The shaykh 'Izz al-Dīn 'Alī Ibn al-Aṭṭār<sup>1</sup> speaks of him in these terms, towards the commencement of his Mukhtaṣar (or abridgment of al-Sam'ānī's work, the Ansāb): "Abū Sa'd was the middle pearl of the collar of the Sam'ānī family; their vigilant eye and their helping hand; when he became the head of the family, he rendered its influence complete. To acquire knowledge and learn the Traditions, he journeyed to the East and to the West, to the North and to the South. He travelled to Transoxiana and visited repeatedly all the cities of Khurāsān; he went also to Qumas, Ray, Isbahān, Hamadān, the two 'Irāqs, Hījāz, Mosul, Mesopotamia, Syria, and other places too numerous to be mentioned and too difficult to be enumerated; he there met the men of learning, received from them information, frequented their society, obtained Traditions from them, and took for model their virtuous deeds and praiseworthy conduct. The number of his teachers surpassed four thousand."—During one of his dictations, or extempore lectures<sup>1</sup> he related as follows: "Abū Muḥammad 'Abd Allāh Ibn Muḥammad Ibn Ghālib al-J lī, a jurisconsult who had settled at al-Anbār, recited to me these lines on bidding me adieu:

<sup>1</sup> His life will be found in this work.

* 24 September—Ed.

"When we went forth to bid them adieu, they wept pearls (tears) and we wept rubies (blood). They handed round to us the cups of separation, and it will be long before we recover from the effects of that draught. They departed, and I sent after them a torrent of my tears; on which they exclaimed: 'We shall be drowned!' and I cried out: 'I shall be burned (with grief)!'"

He composed some most instructive and excellent works, such as the Supplement, in fifteen volumes, to the Khāṭib's History of Baghdād; the History of the city of Marw, coming upwards of twenty volumes; the Ansāb (explanation of patronymics and other relative adjectives), in eight volumes. This last is the work which 'Izz al-Dīn Ibn al-Aṭhīr corrected and reduced to three volumes; the abridgement is in every person's hands, but the original is very scarce.—Abū Sa'd al-Sam'ānī says in the biographical notice which he gives of his father: "In the year 497 (A.C. 1103-4) my parent made the pilgrimage, and, on his return to Baghdād, he learned Traditions from a number of teachers. He then gave public exhortations in the Nizāmiyah College, instructed pupils in the Traditions<sup>2</sup> and collected books. When some time had thus elapsed, he travelled to Iṣbahān and received oral information from a great many persons; he then returned to Khurāsān and continued to reside at Marw till the year 509, when he went to Naysāpūr. He took me and my brother with him, and we learned Traditions from Abū Bakr 'Abd al-Ghaffār Ibn Muḥammad al-Shīrūwī<sup>1</sup> and other masters. He subsequently returned to Marw, where he was overtaken by death at the early age of forty-three years<sup>2</sup>. Abū Sa'd was born at Marw on Monday, the 21 of Shā'bān, A.H. 506 (February, A.C. 1113)*, and he died in the same city, on the night preceding the first day of the first month of Rabi', A.H. 562 (December, A.C. 1166)†. His father Muḥammad was an imām<sup>3</sup>, a man of talent, a skilful investigator of the truth, a traditionist, a doctor of the sect of al-Shāfi'i and a ḥāfiẓ. His Imlā (dictation) is a work of an entirely original cast, containing observations on the texts and isnāds<sup>4</sup> (of the Traditions) with elucidations to clear up the doubtful points. He wrote many other works besides, and composed some pretty poetry, which he destroyed<sup>5</sup> a little before his death. He was born in the month of the first Jumādā, A.H. 466 (January, A.C. 1074), and he died at the end of public prayers, on Friday, the 2 of Ṣafar, A.H. 510 (June, A.C. 1116)‡. The next day, Saturday, he was interred near the grave of his father, Abū 'l-Muẓaffar, in the Safhawān, which is one of the cemeteries at Marw. Abū Sa'd's grandfather al-Manṣūr was incontrovertibly the greatest imām of the age in which he lived; this is a point on which his supporters and his adversaries both agreed. He followed the doctrines of Abū Ḥanīfah and was looked up with deference by the other imāms of that sect; but, in the year 462, when he was making the pilgrimage, a circumstance fell under his observation in the province of Ḥijāz, which obliged him to pass over to the sect of al-Shāfi'i.

<sup>1</sup> The following observations on the Amālī or dictations are furnished by Ḥajjī Khalīfah: I shall merely copy M. de Sacy's translation of the passage:—"Amālī est le pluriel d'imlā. Ce qu'on entend par là, c'est qu'un savant est assis, ayant autour de lui ses disciples avec des encriers et du papier. Le savant dit ce que Dieu permet qu'il lui vienne à l'esprit au sujet d'une science et ses disciples l'écrivent. Il se forme de cela un livre qu'on nomme imāl ou amālī. Voilà comme avaient coutume de faire les anciens, soit jurisconsultes, soit docteurs, dans la science des traditions, ou dans la grammaire arabe, ou dans tout autre science de celles qu'ils cultivaient; mais le discredit ou sont tombées la science et les savants, a fait évanouir les traces de cet usage. Il faudra un jour retourner vers Dieu. Les savants de l'école des Schaféites nomment cela taālīk," — (Anthologie Grammaticale, p. 137. See Flügel's H. jji Khalīfa, vol. I, p. 427).

<sup>2</sup> Literally: "And Traditions were read to him"; that is, his pupils read the Traditions aloud, and he made his observations.

<sup>1</sup> The autograph has الشيروى.

<sup>2</sup> When Ibn Khallikān inserted this extract in the margin of his work, he marked a wrong place for it in the text. This is a fault into which he has fallen very frequently. The passages should have come in lower down.

<sup>3</sup> The word imām is employed here to denote one whose opinions were held to be of the highest authority.

<sup>4</sup> See Introduction.

<sup>5</sup> Literally: "Which he washed". That is, he washed off the ink, that the paper might serve again. The writing in oriental manuscripts is easily effaced with water; the paper is generally very thick and glazed over.

* 10 February.—Ed.

† 26 December.—Ed.

‡ 16 June.—Ed.

§ Al-Shīrāzī with its variant reading al-Shīzarī on the margin in 'Abd al-Ḥamid.—Ed.

On his return to Marw, he underwent violent persecutions on this account, and had much to suffer from the spirit of party-zeal; but he supported these trials with great firmness and became the chief imām of the Shāfi'ites. In the fulfilment of this office, he acted as a professor and a mufti, and drew up a great number of treatises on the doctrines of the imām al-Shāfi'ī and on other branches of knowledge. Of these works the most remarkable are: the Minhāj Ahl il-Sunnah (path of the Sunnites); the Intiṣār (vindication); a Refutation of the Principles held by the Qadarites (the partisans of man's free-will), etc. In another work, the Qawāṭi' (decisive arguments), he treats of the dogmas of Islamism, and in his Burhān, or proof (containing a defence of the Shāfi'ite doctrines) he discusses nearly one thousand points of controversy. His Awsaṭ, or Méduim, and his Iṣṭilām, or eradication of errors, are refutations of Abū Zayd al-Dabūsī's compilation, entitled al-Asrār (No. 311.). He wrote also a valuable commentary on the Qur'ān, and he formed a collection of one thousand Traditions received by him from one hundred masters, and which he illustrated with great ability in discourses affixed to them. He was highly celebrated also for the excellence of his sermons. His birth took place in the month of Dhu 'l-Hijjah, A.H. 426 (October, A.C. 1035), and his death in the month of the first Rabī', A.H. 489 (March, A.C. 1096), at Marw. This family produced a great number of other persons remarkable for learning and the exalted posts which they filled. Sam'āni means belonging to Sam'ān, a branch of the tribe c Tamīm. I have heard some learned men observe that this name may be also pronounced Sim'ān. Abū Sa'd 'Abd al-Karīm had a son named Abu 'l-Muẓaffar 'Abd al-Raḥīm whom, when yet a boy, he took with him to learn Traditions from his father (Abū Bakr Muḥammad); he then travelled with him through Khurasān and Transoxiana, for the purpose of letting him hear the Traditions delivered by all the great masters in these countries, and of obtaining (them in) written copies. He drew up also, for his son's use, a Mu'jam, or biographical dictionary of his own masters, in eighteen volumes, and an 'Awālā, or collection of Traditions supported by the highest authority<sup>1</sup>, in two thick volumes. He then made him study jurisprudence, the belles-lettres, and the Traditions, till he acquired considerable information in these branches of learning. 'Abd al-Raḥīm taught the Traditions on the authority of numerous masters<sup>1</sup>, and students travelled from all parts to learn them from him. He was highly venerated in his native country. His birth took place at Naysāpūr, on the eve of Friday, the 17 of Dhu 'l-Qa'dah, A.H. 537 (June, A.C. 1143)*, and he died at Marw between A.H. 614 (A.C. 1217) and 616 (A.C. 1220)<sup>2</sup>.

<sup>1</sup> It may probably be remarked that I gave a different signification to the word 'Awālā عوَالِي from that adopted, after some hesitation, by M. de Sacy, in his

371. IBN ḤAMDĪS AL-ṢAQALLĪ.

Abū Muḥammad 'Abd al-Jabbār Ibn Abī Bakr Ibn Muḥammad Ibn Ḥamdīs al-Azdī (a member of the tribe of Azd) al-Ṣaqallī (a native of Sicily), and a celebrated poet, is spoken of in these terms by Ibn Bassām: "He was a poet of consummate abilities, who aimed at originality of ideas and reached his mark; who expressed them in terms elegant and noble; who had a perfect command of metaphors the most appropriate, and who dived into the ocean of language for the pearl of novelty in thought." The original cast of his ideas is fully displayed in the following piece descriptive of a rivulet:

"There is an object whose component parts are in progressive motion, and whose surface is polished by the zephyr, so that it reveals to the eye that which is contained in its bosom. The pebbles wound

---

(Continued from page 194.)

Abdallatif. I have followed the indications of Ḥājji Khalīfah in his enumeration of the works which are so denominated; and must add that the title of the book cited by M. de Sacy in support of his opinion seems to me to be incorrectly given; إلا سائيد العوالي is a most unusual expression, whereas إلا سائيد العوالي is one commonly employed when speaking of Traditions which can be traced up through an unbroken series of trustworthy Traditionists to Muḥammad himself.

<sup>1</sup> بالكثير is the right reading.

<sup>2</sup> In the autograph these last words have been cut off by the binder, so that only the vowel points and the tops of the longer letters remain. None of my manuscripts fill up the blank, which, I am convinced from the inspection of the autograph, must be read thus: وست عشرة.

*4 June.—Ed.

it with their sharp points, and, as it passes over them, it expresses by its murmurs the pains which they inflict. It might be thought that a despairing lover<sup>1</sup> had put on the form of its waters, and hastened to throw himself into the pond which it supplies."

In one of his qaṣīdahs he says:

"I passed the night in asking for another and another kiss; such are the favours for which I shall never cease to sue her; and I quenched the thirst of love at (her lips—) a source of surpassing in virtues the purest water of the spring."

In another of his qaṣīdahs he begins thus:

"Arise! and let the (maiden) wearer of the scarf hand here the cup! the harbinger of morning has announced to the night that its last hour<sup>2</sup> has come. Hasten towards the pleasures which await us, and, to reach them, take for coursers the forerunners of enjoyment, so rapid in their speed. Hasten before the morning sun has sipped the dews of the night off the lips of the flowers."

One of his original ideas is thus expressed:

"To increase the blackness of her eyes, she has applied antimony around them; thus adding poison to the dart which was already sufficient to give death."

In another poem he thus expresses his longing desire of seeing Sicily again:

"I thought of Sicily, and sadness renewed in my mind the remembrance of that isle. Though expelled from paradise, I shall always speak of its delights. Were my tears not bitter, I should take them for the (copious) streams which flow in that happy ground<sup>3</sup>"

In the year 471 (A.C. 1078-9) he went to Spain and there celebrated in his verses the praises of al-Mu'tamid Ibn 'Abbād, by whom he was most generously recompensed. When Ibn 'Abbad was afterwards led into captivity and imprisoned at Aḡhmāt, Ibn Ḥamdīs heard some verses recited which that prince had composed during his confinement<sup>1</sup> on which he addressed him the following lines in reply:

<sup>1</sup> The autograph gives the true reading, which is حياءاً

<sup>2</sup> In the printed Arabic text, read الليل not الليل

<sup>3</sup> On the conquest of Sicily by count Roger, a great number of the Muslim inhabitants abandoned the island. Some, like Ibn Hammad's, went to Spain, and others to North Africa, Egypt, or Syria. The kitāb 'Imād al-Dīn notices in his Khariḍah a number of literary men who then left the country.

"Do you despair of seeing a day the evening of which will differ from the morning? Reflect that the brilliant planets themselves must (undergo vicissitudes and) pass through the zodiac's various signs. When you left us, and bore off in your hand generosity itself, whilst the mountains of thy liberality were shaken to their basis<sup>2</sup>. I raised my voice and exclaimed: "The hour of judgment has come! behold the firm mountains pass away!"

The idea contained in the last of these verses is nearly similar to that expressed by 'Abd Allāh Ibn al-Mu'tazz in the following lines; they are taken from an elegy composed by him on the death of the wazīr Abu 'l-Qāsim 'Ubayd Allāh Ibn Sulaymān Ibn Wahb:

"The human race remain unmoved, and yet perfection itself is dead; and the vicissitudes of time exclaim: 'Where shall we find more men?' Behold Abu 'l-Qāsim on his bier! arise, and see how mountains are removed from their places!"

The poetical works of Ibn Ḥamdīs have been collected into a dīwān and the greater portion of his poetry is very good. He died in the isle of Mayyurqah (Majorca), A.H. 527 (A.C. 1132-3) [and was interred near the tomb of Ibn al-Labbānah<sup>3</sup> the celebrated poet]; some say, however, that he died at Bajāyah (Bugia in North Africa). In one of his poems, rhyming in the letter M, he speaks of his grey hairs and his staff; this indicates that he had then reached his eightieth year<sup>4</sup> Ṣaqallī means belonging to Ṣaqalliyah (Sicily), an island in the sea of Maḡrib, near North Africa.

<sup>1</sup> These verses are still extant, and may be found in 'Imād al-Dīn's Khariḍah, MS. No. 1375.

<sup>2</sup> Literally: "Whilst the Raḍwā and the Ṭḥabir of yours were shaken." These are the names of two celebrated mountains in Ḥijāz. (See Abu 'l-Fidā's Geography, Arabic text, page 81.)

<sup>3</sup> Abu Bakr Muḥammad Ibn 'Īsā al-Dānī (a native of Denia), surnamed Ibn Labbānah, was the favourite poet and companion of al-Mu'tamid Ibn 'Abbād. Numerous extracts from his composition are given by the kاتب 'Imād al-Dīn in his Khariḍah (MS. No. 1375, fol. 181 et seq.) and by Ibn Khāqān in his Qalī'id al-'Iqyān. The date of his death is not mentioned by either author.

<sup>4</sup> This inference of Ibn Khallikān does not appear to be well narrated.

372. ABŪ ṬĀLIB AL-MA'ĀFIRI

Abū Ṭalib 'Abd al-Jabbār Ibn Muḥammad Ibn 'Alī Ibn Muḥammad al-Ma'āfiri al-Maghribī<sup>1</sup> was a master of the first authority in the science of philology and in all the branches of the belles-letters. In his travels he visited Baghdād, where he continued his studies and gave lessons to a number of pupils, who all profited under his tuition. In the year 551 (A.C. 1156-7) he arrived in Egypt, where he had for a disciple the learned shaykh Abū Muḥammad Ibn Barī (see his life, No. 328). He wrote a great deal, and his handwriting was very good, but in the Maghrib character; the greater part of these writings is on literature. I have seen a considerable quantity of them, and observed that his orthography was extremely correct<sup>2</sup>. * [I saw the two following lines inscribed by his own hand on the cover of the work entitled al-Mudḥayyal fi 'l-Lughat<sup>3</sup>:

"I implore whatever person sees my writing to address a sincere prayer for me to the merciful God, that He may be turned towards me with indulgence and grant me forgiveness."

He taught the contents of the work called al-Musalsil with the authorisation of the author, Abu 'l-Ṭāhir Muḥammad Ibn Yūsuf Ibn 'Abd Allāh al-Tamīmī; of this we shall speak again in the life of Abu 'l-Ṭāhir which will be found among those of the Muḥammads<sup>4</sup>—Abū Ṭalib died A.H. 566 (A.C. 1170-1) as he was returning from Egypt to Maḡrib. Ma'āfiri means belonging to the tribe of

<sup>1</sup> Al-Maghribi signifies native of Maghrib, or the West; a term applied not only to North Africa, but to Spain. From the silence of the Spanish Arab biographers, I am induced to believe that he belonged to the former country.

<sup>2</sup> This passage may perhaps signify, "that his memory was very good"—a circumstance proved by the correctness of the pieces which he wrote from memory.

<sup>3</sup> This work is not noticed by Ḥājji Khalīfah.

<sup>4</sup> This passage is given by two of my MSS. but it does not exist in the autograph. Its place is marked there, however, by these words in red ink, هنا يكتب التغرىج, that is: let the passage on the fly-leaf be written here. This fly-leaf has been lost, and I suspect the authenticity of the passage as now printed, and must add that, none of my MSS. contain the life of Abu 'l-Ṭāhir al-Tamīmī to which reference is here made.

* [ ] From 'I saw' to 'Muḥammads' omitted in the autograph.—Ed.

† M. de Slane gives al-Muzil.—Ed.

Ma'āfir Ibn Ya'fur; this tribe is very numerous and the greater portion of it inhabits Egypt.

373. 'ABD AL-RAZZAQ AL-ŞAN'ĀNĪ

Abū Bakr 'Abd al-Razzāq Ibn Hammām Ibn Nāfi' al-Şan'ānī was allied, by right of enfranchisement, to the tribe of Ḥimyar. Abū Sa'd al-Sam'ānī says of him: "It is stated that, after the death of the Prophet<sup>ﷺ</sup>, no one had so many visitors from distant countries as he." He taught the Traditions on the authority of Ma'mar Ibn Rāshid, a mawlā of the tribe of Azd and a native of Baṣrah (see Introduction, note), al-Awzā'i, Ibn Jurayj, and others. The chief imāms of Islāmism in that period cited him as their authority for some of the Traditions which they taught; amongst the number were Sufyān Ibn 'Uyyanah (who was one of his own masters), Aḥmad Ibn Ḥanbal and Yahyā Ibn Ma'in.<sup>1</sup> He was born A.H. 126 (A.C. 743-4), and he died in the month of Şawwāl, A.H. 211 (January, A.C. 827) in Yaman. Şan'ānī means belonging to Şan'a, one of the most celebrated cities in Yaman. In forming this relative adjective an n is added, as in Bahrānī derived from Bahrā<sup>2</sup> but such cases are of rare occurrence. *

374. ABŪ NAŞR IBN AL-ŞABBĀGH.

Abū Naşr 'Abd al-Sayyid Ibn Muḥammad Ibn 'Abd al-Wahid Ibn Aḥmad Ibn Ja'far, generally known by the name of Ibn al-Şabbāgh (the son of the dyer), was chief *Şhāfi'*ite jurisconsult of Persian and Arabian 'Irāq. (By his learning) he equalled Abū Ishāq al-Şhīrāzī, and by his knowledge of the *Şhāfi'*ite doctrines he surpassed him. Persons came from all countries to study under him, and his veracity as a traditionist, his piety and his virtuous conduct, which showed him to be a model set up by God to confound the perverse on the day of judgment<sup>1</sup>, were all equally conspicuous. His principal works are the Shāmil (comprehensive), which is not only one of the best treatises possessed by the Shāfi'ites on their system of jurisprudence, but also one of the most authentic in its traditional contents and the most conclusive in its reasonings; —The Tadhkirat al-'Ālim wa'l-Ṭarīq al-Sālim (remembrancer of the learned and safe path); the 'Uddah (supply provided for emergencies); these two last are on the principles of jurisprudence. On the opening of the Nizāmiyah College at Baḡhdād, he acted as chief professor, but was replaced, after a lapse of twenty days, by Abū Ishāq al-Shīrāzī; he was reinstated, however, on the death of the latter. Abū 'l-Ḥasan Muḥammad Ibn Hilāl Ibn al-Ṣābi<sup>2</sup> says in his History: "The erection of the Nizāmiyah College was commenced in the month of Dhu 'l-Ḥijjah, A.H. 457 (November, A.C. 1065), and this establishment was opened on Saturday, the 10 of Dhu 'l-Qa'dah, 459 (September, A.C. 1067).* Nizām al-Mulk having given directions that the place of chief professor in it should be filled by Abū Ishāq al-Shīrāzī, it was settled with him that he should come forward and give lessons on that day. When the people were assembled, Abū Ishāq did not appear, and after a fruitless search, they decided on sending for Abū Naṣr Ibn al-Ṣabbāgh, who came and was installed. Abū Ishāq then showed himself in the mosque where he used to teach, and by this conduct he excited the manifest displeasure of his pupils, who ceased to attend his lessons and wrote to him that if he did not choose to profess in the Nizāmiyah, they would quit him for Abū Naṣr al-Ṣabbāgh. He consented to their wishes, and on Saturday, the first of Dhu 'l-Ḥijjah†, Ibn al-Ṣabbāgh was removed and Abū Ishāq seated in his place. Ibn al-Ṣabbāgh had occupied the post during twenty days." Ibn al-Najjār says in his History of Baḡhdād: "On the death of Abū Ishāq Abū Sa'd al-Mutawallī was established in the vacant place; but, in the year 476 (A.C. 1083-4), he was removed, and Ibn al-Ṣabbāgh reappointed;

<sup>1</sup> The lives of all these doctors will be found in this work.

<sup>2</sup> Bahrā is the name of a tribe sprung from Qudā'ah.

* In 'Abd al-Hamid following passage occurs: Abū Muḥammad 'Abd Allāh Ibn al-Ḥārith al-Şan'ānī said: "I heard 'Abd al-Razzāq saying: He experiences disgrace who associates one for a long time. He continued: I heard him reciting: That was the time we amuse with it, and now it amuses with us.

<sup>1</sup> I have here paraphrased the word Imām. See No. 258, note.

<sup>2</sup> See No. 125, note.

* 22 September.—Ed.

† 13 October.—Ed.

the latter held the post till 477, when it was again conferred on Abu Sa'd, who held it till his death. We have already mentioned something of this in the life of Abū Ishāq al-Shīrāzī (No. 5). Ibn al-Ṣabbāgh was born at Baḡhdād, A.H. 400 (A.C. 1009-10), and he died in the same city in the month of the first Jumādā, A.H. 477 (September, A.C. 1084); or, by another account (given as a rectification of the preceding date), on Thursday, the 15 of Shā'bān of that year.* Towards the close of his life, Ibn al-Ṣabbāgh lost his sight.

375. 'ABD AL-WAHHĀB AL-MĀLIKĪ.

The qādī Abū Muhammad 'Abd al-Waḥḥāb Ibn 'Alī Ibn Naṣr Ibn Aḥmad Ibn al-Ḥusayn Ibn Hārūn Ibn Mālik Ibn Ṭawq al-Tha'labī, a native of Baḡhdād and a doctor of the sect of Mālik, drew his descent from Mālik Ibn Ṭawq al-Tha'labī, the lord of Raḡhabah<sup>1</sup>. He was an able jurisconsult, an elegant scholar, and a poet. He composed a treatise on the doctrines peculiar to his sect, and this work, entitled al-Talqīn (tuition), is one of the most instructive on the subject, although it forms but a small volume. Among his other numerous productions, may be specified the Ma'ānah, or aid, and a commentary on the Risālah<sup>2</sup>. The Khaṭīb (Abū Bakr Aḥmad al-Baḡhdādī) speaks of him in the history of Baḡhdād, and says: "He received lessons from Abū 'Abd Allāh Ibn al-'Askarī, 'Umar Ibn Muḥammad Ibn Sabannak<sup>3</sup> and Abū Ḥafṣ Ibn Shāhīn<sup>4</sup>. He transmitted from his masters a small portion of traditional information, <sup>1</sup> The city of Raḡhabah, situated on the Euphrates in lat. 34° 37', at the distance of eight days' journey from Damascus and of five from Aleppo, was founded by Mālik Ibn Ṭawq, one of the Khalīf al-Rashīd's generals, who was then governor of Mesopotamia.

<sup>2</sup> I follow the reading of the autograph and al-Yāfi'i where I find "شرح الرسالة" and not "في شرح الرسالة". All the other MSS. and Ḥajjī Khalīfah give the latter reading.

<sup>3</sup> All the MSS. except the autograph have "من قبل"; but that has "من قبل". Abu 'l-Qāsim 'Umar Ibn Sabannak died A.H. 377 (A.C. 987-8) — (Nujūm).

<sup>4</sup> See No. 164, note on Abū Ḥafṣ.

* 19 December, 1084.—Ed.

and I wrote down (some of it) from his own lips. He was a trustworthy traditionist, and an abler jurisconsult than he was never met with among the Malikite doctors. In the examination of legal points he displayed great acuteness, and the exposition of the results to which he thus attained was marked by great clearness. He filled the place of qādī at Bādarāyā and Bākusayā<sup>1</sup>; towards the latter period of his life he travelled to Egypt, in which country he died." Ibn Bassām speaks of him in the Dha'hirah in the following terms: "He was the last remnant of (the illustrious) men, and the (sole) tongue (to set forth the doctrines of) the followers of analogy<sup>2</sup>; I met with some poetry of his containing thoughts brighter than the morning, and expressed in words sweeter than is the obtaining of success in undertakings. Baḥdād rejected him, as is the old established custom of cities towards their men of merit; and such is the rule of conduct which Fortune follows, in every epoch, towards the people of talent: he therefore bade adieu to its inhabitants, and said farewell to its waters and its shades. I was told that, on the day of his departure, its great men and its eminent writers<sup>3</sup> formed a large company and a numerous troop to escort him out of the city, and that he said to them: 'Had I found among you a roll of bread every morning and every evening, I should not have turned from your town, as I would then have obtained all I wished for.' He used to express his feelings on this subject in some verses which I shall give here:

'Of all the abodes on earth, let Baḥdād receive my salutation; it is entitled to repeated salutations (of farewell) from me. I left it, not through hatred, and yet I knew (what perversity filled) the quarters on both sides of the river. But large as it was, I could find no ease within it, and even the means of subsistence were refused me. That city is like a friend whose company is anxiously desired, but whose character removes him (from our affection) and counteracts his good qualities.'

He then set out for Egypt, and as he passed through Ma'arrat al-Nu'mān he met Abu 'l-'Alā al-Ma'arri (No. 46), who received him with hospitality, and afterwards alluded to the circumstance in one of his poems. These are his words:

<sup>1</sup> It appears from the Marāṣid, that these two places were situated near al-Nahrawān.

<sup>2</sup> See No. 2, note on aḥkām, No. 231, note, and Introduction.

<sup>3</sup> Literally: Its inkhorn wearers. These words signify probably the kātibs, or persons employed in the civil service.

'Ibn Naṣr the Mālikite visited our country on his journey, and we praised the misfortunes which force a man to abandon his native place and to travel. When he explains a point of law, his reasonings give new life to Mālik, and when he utters verses, the Wandering King<sup>1</sup> seems to revive in his person.'

On arriving in Egypt, he bore the standard (of superiority) and filled it far and wide (with his renown)<sup>2</sup>; he drew after him its chiefs and its princes; there the signal favours of fortune reached him and gifts the most desirable poured like a torrent into his hands. But he had scarcely arrived there, when he longed to eat of a particular dish, and, having partaken thereof, he died. They relate that, when he rolled in agony, his soul mounting and descending in his throat, he exclaimed: 'There is no god but God! when we began to live, we died!' 'He composed some charming verses, such, for instance, as the following:

"I kissed that sleeping beauty, and she awoke, exclaiming: 'Hasten to chastise the thief.' I replied: 'May my life be sacrificed for thy welfare! I am (not a thief, but) an extortioner, and as such I can only be sentenced to restitution. Receive then the kiss and abstain from tyranny; if that kiss suffice thee not, I shall add a thousand to it.' She answered: '(No! I must have) retaliation! this, as reason tells us, is sweeter than honey to the heart of the self-avenger.' The rest of that night, my right arm was the girdle which encircled her waist, and my left arm was the necklace on her bosom. She then said: 'Did you not declare that you abstained from all worldly pleasure?' 'No!' I replied, 'but it is from abstinence, (such as that,) that I abstain! "

*[He also says]:

"Baghdād is a delightful residence for those who have money, but for the poor it is an abode of misery<sup>3</sup> and suffering. I walked all day through its streets bewildered and desolate; I was (treated with neglect) like a Qur'ān in the house of an atheist."

<sup>1</sup> The wandering king (al-Malik al-Dillīl); this was a surname given to Amro 'l-Qays, of whom Muḥammad said that he was the "greatest of all the poets. See my Diwān d'Amro 'l-Qays, page xxiv.

<sup>2</sup> Literally: And filled its land and its sky.

• [ ] The phrase is omitted by de Slane.—Ed.

I had some verses on my mind, the author of which I did not know; but I have since found them attributed, in a number of places, to the qāḍī 'Abd al-Wahhāb; they are as follows:

"How can we hope to quench our thirst if the seas exact water from the wells?¹ How prevent the vile from attaining their ends, if the great retire from the world to the pious solitude of the cell? The elevation of the base over the noble would be a great misfortune. When the low and the exalted are on an equality, 'tis then we would find pleasure in the society of death."

(Ibn Bassām) the author of the Dhakhīrah mentions that 'Abd al-Wahhāb held the office of qāḍī in the city of Is'īrd², and another writer states that he filled that function at the towns of Bādarāyā and Bākusiyyā in 'Irāq. On being questioned concerning the time of his birth, he replied: "I was born at Baḥdād on Thursday, the 7 of Shawwāl, A.H. 362 (July, A.C. 973)*". He died at Old Cairo on the eve of Monday, the 14 of Ṣafar, A.H. 422 (February, A.C. 1031)†; some say, however, that his death occurred in the month of Shā'bān of that year. He was interred in the lesser Qarāfah cemetery, between the sepulchral chapel of the imām al-Shayfī and the gate of the Qarāfah, near the graves of Ibn al-Qāsim and Aḥḥab; I have visited his tomb. His father ('Alī Ibn Naṣr) was one of the most eminent scribes³ of Baḥdād. His brother, Abu 'l-Ḥasan Muḥammad Ibn 'Alī Ibn Naṣr was a learned scholar and drew up a work, entitled al-Mufāwaṭṭah (conversation), for the amusement of al-Malik al-'Azīz Jalāl al-Dawlah Abu Maṣṣūr, the son of Abu Ṭāhir, the son

---

¹ This verse probably means: How can we expect a recompense for our poetical eulogiums, if the sovereign exact from our patrons the little wealth which they possess?

² Is'īrd, a city of Mesopotamia, is situated near the Tigris, at the distance of a day and a half to the south of Mayyāfāriqin.

³ See No. 24 note on 'adl.

* 10 July.—Ed.

† 8 February.—Ed.

of Bahā al-Dawlah, the son of 'Aḍad al-Dawlah<sup>1</sup> Ibn Buwayh; in this book, which is very interesting and contains about thirty sheets<sup>2</sup>, he relates various events of which he had been a witness. He composed also some epistles. His birth took place at Baḡhdād in one of the months of Jumādā, A.H. 372 (A.C. 982); he died on Sunday, the 26 of the latter Rabi', A.H. 437 (November, A.C. 1045)* at Wāsiṭ, whither he had gone up from Baṣrah. Their father Abu 'l-Ḥasan 'Alī (Ibn Naṣr) died on Saturday, the 2nd of Ramaḍān, A.H. 391 (July, A.C. 1001).†

376. THE ḤĀFIẒ 'ABD AL-GĤANĪ IBN SA'ĪD.

Abū Muḥammad 'Abd al-Gḥanī Ibn Sa'īd Ibn 'Alī Ibn Sa'īd Ibn Biṣhr Ibn Marwān Ibn 'Abd al-'Azīz al-Azdī (a member of the tribe of Azd) and a native of Egypt, was the most eminent ḥafīẓ of the age in that country. He composed some useful works, such as a Muṣṭabih al-Nisbah, or treatise on those relative adjectives the derivation of which might be mistaken, another on those (geographical) names each of which designate different places (al-Mu'talif wa 'l-Muḥtalif), etc. Great numbers studied under him with much profit to themselves. A close intimacy and friendship subsisted between him, Abū 'Usāmah Junādah the philologist, and Abū 'Alī al-Muqrī al-Anṭikī (a teacher of the readings of the Qur'ān and a native of Antioch). These three used to meet at the library (founded by al-Ḥakim)<sup>3</sup> and discuss literary subjects; but when Abū Usāmah and Abū 'Alī were put to death by al-Ḥakim the sovereign of Egypt, the ḥafīẓ 'Abd al-Gḥanī retired to a place of concealment, lest he should experience the same fate on account of his having frequented their society, and he did not appear in public till he received a full pardon. Of this we have already spoken in the life of Abū Usāmah (No. 139).

<sup>1</sup> Ibn Khallikān; in giving this genealogy, has forgotten here the name of Rukn al-Dawla, Ibn Buwayh.

<sup>2</sup> Sheets in Arabic Kurrāsah: see No. 340, note.

<sup>3</sup> See No. 139.

* 13 November.—Ed.

† 26 July.—Ed.

'Abd al-Ghanī was born on the 28 of Dhu 'l-Hijjah, A.H. 332 (August, A.C. 944)*, and he died at Old Cairo on the eve of Tuesday, the seventh of Ṣafar, A.H. 409 (June, A.C. 1018)† : he was interred, the following day, in the Muṣallā of the Festival<sup>1</sup>. It is stated by Abu 'l-Qāsim Yaḥyā Ibn 'Alī al-Ḥaḍramī, surnamed Ibn al-Ṭahḥān, in the historical work designed by him as a continuation to that of Ibn Yūnus al-Miṣrī (see no. 343), that 'Abd al-Ghanī Ibn Sa'id was born A.H. 333 (A.C. 944-5). His father Sa'id died A.H. 338, aged forty-three years. 'Abd al-Ghanī himself mentioned that he had never received any traditional information from his father, Sa'id.

377. 'ABD AL-GHĀFIR AL-FĀRISĪ.

The ḥāfiẓ Abu 'l-Ḥasan 'Abd al-Ghāfir Ibn Ismā'il Ibn 'Abd al-Ghāfir Ibn Muḥammad Ibn 'Abd al-Ghāfir Ibn Aḥmad Ibn Muḥammad Ibn Sa'id al-Fārisī (native of the province of Fārs) was a traditionist and a grammarian of the highest rank. At the age of five years he was able to read the Qur'ān, and could repeat the creed in Persian, (his native language). He studied jurisprudence with great assiduity, during four years, under Abu 'l-Ma'ālī Imām al-Ḥaramayn, the author of the Nihāyat al-Maṭlab, which is a treatise on the doctrines of the Shāfi'ite sect and on points of controversy. He was a daughter's son<sup>2</sup> of the imām Abu 'l-Qāsim al-Quṣṭhayrī (No. 369) and learned from him a great quantity of Traditions, as also from his grandmother Fātimah, the daughter of Abī 'Alī al-Daqqāq (No. 369), his maternal uncles Abī Sa'd and Abī Sa'id, the sons of Abu 'l-Qāsim al-

1 The original text has بحضرة مصلی العيد . I am unable to fix the precise meaning of the word حضرة in this place.

2 The word سبط (Sibt) signifies a grandson by the female line ابن البنت (the son of the daughter), as the philologists define it. Thus Ḥasan and Ḥusayn were the sibts of Muḥammad. A grandson by the male line is a ḥafid (حفيد). This distinction has generally escaped the attention of orientalists.

* 21 August, but according to the autograph it should be 28 Dhu 'l-Qa'dah (22 July).—Ed.

† 24 June.—Ed.

Qushayrī, his own parents Abu 'Abd Allāh Ismā'il and Amat al-Rahīm (the handmaid of the Clement), daughter to 'Abd al-Karīm al-Qushayrī and a great number of other teachers. He then left Naysāpūr and proceeded to K̲h̲uwārizm, where he continued his studies under the most eminent masters of that country, and opened a private course for the instruction of pupils. He travelled from thence to Ghaznah, and then to India, teaching the Traditions and explaining (his grandfather's work) the Laṭ'if al-'Ishārāt (subtle indications)<sup>1</sup>. On his return to Naysāpūr he officiated as a preacher, and, during a number of years, he gave lessons every Monday evening in the mosque of 'Aqil; he then composed his numerous works, of which the principal are the Mufhim (elucidator), in which he explains the obscure points in the Ṣaḥīḥ of Muslim; the Siyāq, or continuation of (the Ḥakīm Ibn al-Bayy's) history of Naysāpūr, which work he finished towards the end of Dhu 'l-Qa'dah, A.H. 518; the Majma' al-Ṭiḥārāt (collection of observations little known), in which he elucidates the rare expressions occurring in the Traditions; he wrote besides many other instructive works. He was born in the month of the latter Rabī', A.H. 451 (May-June, A.C. 1059), and he died at Naysāpūr, A.H. 529 (A.C. 1134-5).

378. ABU 'L-WAQT AL-SIJAZI.

Abu 'l-Waqt 'Abd al-Awwal Ibn Abī 'Abd Allāh 'Isā Ibn Shu'ayb Ibn Iṣḥāq al-Sijazī knew by heart a great quantity of Traditions handed down from the highest authorities. He lived to an advanced age, and became the link which united the Traditionists of the rising generation to those of the past. In the year 621 (A.C. 1224) I heard al-Bukhārī's Ṣaḥīḥ explained by the shayḥ Abu Ja'far Muḥammad Ibn Hibat Allāh Ibn al-Mukarram Ibn 'Abd Allāh al-Ṣūfī, a man of holy life; he taught this work by right of his having studied it at the Nizāmiyah College, under the tuition of this Abu 'l-Waqt, in the year 553.* [Abu 'l-Waqt had learned it in the month of Dhu 'l-Qa'dah, <sup>1</sup> According to Ḥājji Khalifah, this is a commentary on the Qur'ān.

*The name of the month first Rabī' (April) omitted by de Slane.—Ed.

A.H. 465 (July, A.C. 1073), from Abu 'l-Ḥasan 'Abd al-Raḥmān Ibn Muḥammad Ibn Muẓaffar al-Dāwūdī, who taught it with the authorisation of Abū Muḥammad 'Abd Allāh Ibn Aḥmad Ibn Ḥammūyah al-Sarakhsī, under whom he studied it in the month of Ṣafar, A.H. 381 (April-May, A.C. 991). Ibn Ḥammūyah had been authorised to teach it by his own master Abū 'Abd Allāh Muḥammad Ibn Yūsuf Ibn Maṭar al-Farabrī, in A.H. 316 (A.C. 928); and al-Farabrī taught it with the permission of the author al-Bukhārī under whose tuition he had read it twice; the first time in A.H. 248 (A.C. 862-3), and the second in 252 (A.C. 866)<sup>1</sup>. Abu 'l-Waqt led a life of holiness and passed most of his time in the practice of piety. He was born in the month of Dhu 'l-Qa'dah, A.H. 458 (October, A.C. 1066), at Herat, where his father had settled, and he died on the eve of Sunday, the 6 of Dhu 'l-Qa'dah, A.H. 553 (November, A.C. 1158)*, at Baḥdād where he had arrived on Tuesday, the 21 of Shawwāl, A.H. 552†, and taken up his abode in the Ribāṭ of Fayrūz. He died in that convent, and prayers were said over him there; but afterwards, the funeral service was celebrated in the presence of a great concourse of people, at the principal mosque, by the shayḥ 'Abd al-Qādir al-Jilī<sup>2</sup>. He was interred in the Shūnīzi Cemetery

1 This passage is written in the margin of the autograph. The original text will be found in the appendix to the Arabic edition.

2 Abū Muḥammad 'Abd al-Qādir Ibn Abī Ṣāliḥ Mūsā Ibn Abī 'Abd Allāh Ibn Yaḥyā Ibn Muḥammad Ibn Dāwūd Ibn Mūsā Ibn 'Abd Allāh Ibn Mūsā Ibn 'Abd Allāh Ibn al-Ḥasan Ibn 'Alī Ibn Abī Ṭālib al-Jilī, surnamed Muḥi al-Dīn (reviver of religion), was one of the most eminent ṣūfī doctors. By his self-mortification, his piety and his application to contemplative devotion, he attained the highest degree of holiness, and often received special proofs of God's favour, the veils which concealed the Truth, or Divine presence, having been frequently withdrawn to give him a glimpse of the Being Who is the source of all happiness and the sole object worthy of love. Al-Yāfi' devotes eleven pages of the Mir'at al-Jinn to the enumeration of his excellencies, and informs us that in another work, the Naṣṣ al-Maḥāsīn he has mentioned some of the innumerable miraculous acts which this saint performed by a concession of the Divine grace. 'Abd al-Qādir was born at Jil, which is a collection of villages beyond Ṭabaristān. This place is called also Gīl, Gilān and Jilān, whence the surnames of Jilī, Gīlī Jilānī and Gilānī which are given to him by different writers. It may here be

(Continued on page 209)

* 30 November.—Ed.

† 26 November, A. C. 1157.—Ed.

under the same seat (dakkah) in which the body of the celebrated ascetic Ruwaym<sup>1</sup> was deposited. Abu 'l-Waqt commenced learning the Traditions somewhat later than the year 460 (A.H. 1067-8), and he was the sole survivor of those who taught Traditions on the authority of al-Dawādī. His father died between the years 510 and 520 of the Hijrah. Sijazi means belonging to Sijistān, as has been already observed; this relative adjective is formed irregularly<sup>2</sup>. My master Abu Ja'far Muḥammad Ibn Hibat Allāh Ibn al-Mukkarram al-Ṣūfī was born on the eve of the 27 of Ramaḍān, A.H. 538 (April, A.C. 1144)*; he died at Baḡhdād on the eve of the 5th of Muḥarram, A.H. 621 (January, 1224) †. He was buried in the Shunīzī Cemetery.

(Continued from page 208.)

observed that there was a village bearing the name of Gil, and lying on the bank of the Tigris at a day's journey from Baḡhdād, on the road to Wāsiṭ; this place was also called Jil. Hence originated the terms Jil al-'Ajam (Persian Jil) to mark the place of 'Abd al-Qādir's birth and Jil al-'Irāq to designate this latter place. Another Jil existed near al-Madā'in. 'Abd al-Qādir's mother bore the name of Umm al-Khayr Fā'imah; she was a woman of holy life and the daughter of a man celebrated for his piety and his progress in Ṣūfism. Abū 'Abd Allāh Rizq Allāh Ibn 'Abd al-Wahhāb al-Ṣawma'ī الموصمی, 'Abd al-Qādir was born A.H. 471 (A.C. 1078-9); he went to Baḡhdād in 488 (A.C. 1095), and died in that city (where he held the place of guardian of Abū Ḥanīfah's tomb), A.H. 561 (A.C. 1165-6). The order of dervishes, called after him the Q drīs, acknowledges him as its founder.

<sup>1</sup> Abū Muḥammad or Abu 'l-Ḥasan Ruwaym Ibn Aḥmad Ibn Zayd Ibn Ruwaym, an eminent Ṣūfī and a native of Baḡhdād, was a disciple of al-Junayd. He was also distinguished as a ḥafīẓ, a Qur'ān-reader (according to the system of Nāfi'), and a doctor of the law, in which he was a Zāhirite, or follower of the imām Dāwūd al-Iḥbāhānī. His master al-Junayd esteemed him highly, and used to say of him, alluding to their application to spiritual exercises; "Ruwaym was busy when at liesure, but we others were liesurely in our business." رويم مشغول فارغ وكننا فارغين مشغولين. He died at Baḡhdād A.H. 303 (A.C. 915-6).—(Al-Yāfi'i; Al-Dhahabī).

<sup>2</sup> The regular form would be Sijistānt.

<sup>3</sup> Read الخامس.

* 3 April, Subsequent edition, add: 'It is said 46 or 37'.—Ed.

† 28 January.—Ed.

379. IBN KULAYB AL-ḤARRĀNĪ.

Abu 'l-Faraj 'Abd al-Mun'im Ibn Abi 'l-Faṭḥ 'Abd al-Wahhāb Ibn Sa'd Ibn Ṣadaqaḥ Ibn al-Ḥuṣayn<sup>1</sup>* Ibn Kulayb al-Ḥarrānī, surnamed Shams al-Dīn (the sun of religion), was merchant and a member of the sect of Aḥmad Ibn Ḥanbal. His family belonged to Ḥarrān, but he himself was born in Baḥdād and made his residence in that city. As he knew a quantity of Traditions supported by the highest authorities, persons came from all parts to learn them from him, and he became the link which connected the rising generation of Traditionists with the past. By his extensive acquirements in the Traditions, and by the number of masters from whom he had received them, he surpassed all his contemporaries. He was born in the month of Ṣafar, A.H. 505 (August-Sept., A.C. 1111), and he died at Baḥdād on the eve of Monday, the 27th of the first Rabī', A.H. 596 (January, A.C. 1200)†. The next morning he was buried near the spot where his father and family were interred, in the cemetery called after Aḥmad Ibn Ḥanbal, and situated at the Ḥarb Gate. He preserved the vigour of his mind and all his bodily faculties till the last. In the course of his life he had no less than one hundred and forty-eight concubines.

380. THE KĀTĪB 'ABD AL-ḤAMĪD.

‡[Aba Ḡhālīb] 'Abd al-Ḥamīd Ibn Yahyā Ibn Sa'd, a mawlā to the tribe of 'Āmir Ibn Luwayyi Ibn Ḡhālīb, was a kātib so highly celebrated for the elegance of his style that his talent became proverbial: "Epistolary writing," it was said, "began with 'Abd al-Ḥamīd and finished with Ibn al-'Amīd". It was not only as a kātib that he possessed abilities; he was also a perfect master of the belles-lettres and of all the branches of science. Syria was his native place, but when he commenced life as a boys' teacher, he travelled from one country to another. Writers of <sup>1</sup> This name is so indistinctly written in the autograph, that it is illegible.

---

* M. de Siane gives al-Ḥaṣīn.—Ed.

† 15 January.—Ed.

‡ [ ] The Kuniyah 'Aba Ḡhālīb' omitted in the autograph.—Ed.

epistles copied his style and followed closely in his footsteps; and it was he who first smoothed the way to the introduction of eloquence into letter writing. His collected epistles fill nearly one thousand leaves (two thousand pages). It was also he who first lengthened the epistle and employed complimentary eulogiums in certain parts of it, which improvement was adopted by his successors. He was kātib, or secretary, to Marwān Ibn Muḥammad al-Ja'dī, the last of the Umayyad sovereigns. Marwān one day received from a provincial administrator the present of a black slave; displeased with the exiguity of the gift, this prince ordered his secretary to write a short letter to that ʿāmil, blaming him for his conduct and Abū Ghālib wrote these words: "Hadst thou found a worse colour than black and a number less than unity, thou wouldst have sent them. Adieu!" A saying of his was: "The pen is a tree the fruits of which are words, and reflection is a sea the pearls of which are wisdom." Ibrāhīm Ibn al-ʿAbbās al-Ṣulī once said of him, on hearing his name mentioned: "Language was his element; I never wished to possess the language of any kātib so ardently as I wished for his." In one of his epistles Abū Ghālib says: "Mankind are [of various classes and different characters; some are precious jewels not to be sold for any price; and others so liable to be suspected, that no one would buy them <sup>1</sup>." A letter in which he recommends the bearer to a man in power is thus worded: "The person who delivers you this letter has the same right to your benevolence as to mine; having judged you the only one on whom to place his hopes, and me the only one to assist him in his project; I here fulfil his wish, do you realise his expectations?" He said also: "The best style is that whereof the words are exalted and the thoughts original <sup>2</sup>." The following verse was often repeated by him:

"When *kātib*s are insulted<sup>3</sup>, their inkhorns become bows, and their pens, arrows."

1 As the merit of this passage consists principally in alliteration and parallelism, it disappears in the translation. None of the manuscripts, except the autograph, gives the text of it correctly; nearly every word is more or less altered. In the printed text read يباع and يتاع.

2 Literally: The words of which are stallions, and the thoughts virgins.

3 For خرج read جرح. All the manuscripts except the autograph are wrong.

He accompanied Marwān Ibn al-Ḥakam in his last campaign and was present at all his battles; of these events we have taken some notice in the life of Abū Muslim (No. 347). It is related that when Marwan was reduced to the conviction that his power was drawing to an end, he said to Abū Ghālib: "It is necessary for me that you side with the enemy and appear to desert me; their admiration for you as a learned scholar and the necessity which they lie under of having a katib like you, will induce them to place confidence in you. Then you may perhaps be able to do me service whilst I yet live; and, in case of my death, you will certainly be the means of protecting my harem from dishonour." To this, Abū Ghālib replied: "The course which you advise me to take is the most advantageous one for you, and the most dishonourable for me; my opinion is, that we must bear with patience till Almighty God favour us with success; and if He do not, let us die together." He then recited this line:

"I am to conceal fidelity in my heart and bear the exterior of a traitor; but where shall I find an excuse<sup>1</sup> sufficiently clear to satisfy all men."

The foregoing anecdote is related by Abu 'l-Ḥasan al-Mas'ūdī in his Murāj-j-al-Dhahab (meadows of gold). Abū Ghālib 'Abd al-Ḥamīd was then slain with Marwān on Monday, the 13th of Dhu 'l-Hijjah, A.H. 132 (July, A.C. 750)* (see No. 347), at Buṣīr, a village in the province of al-Fayyūm, in Egypt. I find among my rough notes the following passage in my own hand-writing: "On the death of Marwān Ibn Muḥammad the Umayyad, 'Abd al-Ḥamīd sought for concealment in Mesopotamia, but, being betrayed, he was arrested and sent by Abu 'l-'Abbās—the ḫalīf al-Saffāḥ, I should think" to 'Abd al-Jabbār Ibn 'Abd al-Raḥmān, the commander of the police guards, who caused a tray to be heated in the fire and then placed on the prisoner's head till he expired. 'Abd al-Ḥamīd was a native of al-Anbār, but he dwelt at al-Raqqah. His master in penmanship was Sālim, the mawlā of Hishām Ibn 'Abd al-Malik. His son

<sup>1</sup> Here again all the manuscripts, including those of al-Mas'ūdī (who gives the passage), are in the wrong. For بغدر read بغدر.

* According to Edward Mahler 13 Dhū 'l-Hijjah fell on Thursday, 23 July and Monday was 10th of the month. —Ed.

Ismā'il was an able kātib and is counted amongst the most famous of them. Ya'qūb Ibn Dāwūd, the wazīr to al-Mahdī, and whose life we intend to give, was at first a kātib in 'Abd al-Ḥamīd's office and under his orders; it was from him he learned his business. When Marwān was flying before the army of his adversary, he reached B. ṣīr and asked what was the name of the place. On being informed that it was B. ṣīr, he said: "Ilā Allāh al-Maṣīr (it is now that we must appear before God!)"<sup>1</sup>. He was slain in that place, as is well known—Ibrāhīm Ibn Jabalah related as follows: "The kātib 'Abd al-Ḥamīd perceived me writing a very bad hand, on which he said to me: 'Do you wish your writing to be good?' 'Yes,' I replied. 'Then,' said he, 'let the stem of your reed-pen be long and thick, let its point be fine, and cut it sloping towards the right hand.'—I followed his advice, and my writing became good."

381. 'ABD AL-MUḤSIN IBN GHALBŪN AL-ṢŪRĪ.

Abū Muḥammad 'Abd al-Muḥsin Ibn Muḥammad Ibn Aḥmad Ibn Ghālīb Ibn Ghālīb al-Ṣūrī (a native of Tyre) was a good poet, a talented scholar, and one of the ornaments of Syria. His verses, equally remarkable for elegance of style, beauty of thought, charm of expression, and pleasing regularity of imagery, form a diwān of masterpieces. One of his poems contains the following fine passage:

"It is to punish (my indiscretion) or to compel me to pay a tribute (of admiration) that the image of her charms never leaves my sight.<sup>2</sup> Her glances and her stature possess the qualities of the sword and of the spear (sharpness and slenderness). The water of youth is in her face, mixed with the fire (carnation) of her cheeks. One morning she came to me and said: 'Take your choice—my aversion or my absence; I can offer no other conditions'. I replied, whilst my tears flowed in a torrent, like the rushing of the pilgrims through the pass of al-Māzamayn<sup>1</sup> : 'Do not do so; if the time for your aversion or absence come, my death comes also!' In pronouncing these words I seemed to have given her the order to retire, for she arose and hastened to leave me. She then set out with the caravan—may their camels be overwhelmed with fatigue wherever they first alight! (then I may be able to overtake them). The vicissitudes of fortune showed me my life under two aspects; I marked my days with black, and I passed them in lingering agony; each day was for me equal to two nights of a fiction. Who then can make me understand the difference between gold and silver? Both are to me unknown, so long is it since I saw them, whilst I sought my livelihood by my poetic talent, the worst of menial trades! Such was my case till 'Alī Ibn al-Ḥusayn came (to my assistance), and to-day (for lustre and exaltation) poetry holds the third rank being only surpassed by Sirius and Canopus<sup>2</sup>."

<sup>1</sup> Būṣīr sounds somewhat like Būs Sir, which words mean calamity in the result. Marwān augured evil from the name.

<sup>2</sup> As it is impossible to translate this piece literally, I have merely endeavoured to express the thoughts as closely as the different genius of the two languages would permit.

The qaṣīdah from which these verses are taken was composed by 'Abd al-Muḥsin on 'Alī Ibn al-Ḥusayn, the father of the 'wazīr Abu 'l-

<sup>1</sup> Burckhardt says in his Travels in Arabia, vol. II, p. 55. "The Hadj (body of pilgrims) passed at a quick pace in the greatest disorder, amidst a deafening clamour, through the pass of Mazoumeyn, leading to Mezdelfe (Muzdalifah) where all alighted, after a two hours' march."—In place of مثل المازمين as the printed text and the MSS. have it, the autograph bears نوق الوجنتين; the verse would then signify: "I replied, whilst my tears flowed in torrents down my cheeks." This reading was felt by the copyists to be inadmissible on account of the recurrence of the word الوجنتين at the end of the two verses coming very close to each other; this is contrary to the rule by which verses ending with the same word must be separated by at least six others. The corrected reading seems to be perfectly warranted.

<sup>2</sup> It is thus I render the word الشعرين; which is the true reading, and found in the autograph alone. This makes another correction necessary in the same verse: حالية a word pointed variously in the MSS. must be replaced by ثالثة. For the next word كحال I am inclined to adopt لحال; in the autograph it may be read either way. At a later period Ibn Khallikān inserted in the margin an additional line at the end of this piece; it is more or less corrupted in the few manuscripts which reproduce it, and now I give it here correctly after the autograph: اغنى واعفى مدحه العالمين عن كذب ومين * "The act of celebrating his glory enriches and causes to flourish those who avoid lies and falsehood." It may be observed that I read العالين all in this verse.

* This verse is omitted in Cairo text.—Ed.

Qāsim Ibn al-Maḡhribī. Respecting this piece, which is of considerable length and great merit, the following curious anecdote is told: There was in the city of 'Asqalān a man of high rank, called Dhu 'l-Manqabatayn (the possessor of the two merits), to whom a certain poet went one day and recited this piece in his praise; on coming to that part of it where the eulogium is generally introduced, he added:

'You are the possessor of every merit: why then confine yourself to two?'

The ra'īs listened with attention to the verses, and expressed his admiration, after which he gave a considerable reward to the poet; but when the latter withdrew, one of the persons present observed to him, that the poem he had just heard was by 'Abd al-Muḥsin. "I am aware of that," replied the ra'īs, "and I know it by heart." He then recited it, on which the other said to him: "What induced you then to treat that fellow with so much attention and reward him so generously?" To this the ra'īs answered: "I did solely on account of that verse which he inserted in the poem, namely: You are the possessor of every merit, etc.; It is not 'Abd al-Muḥsin's, and I am perfectly convinced that it could have been made on me only, and it is really very fine."—We shall now give another passage of 'Abd al-Muḥsin's poetry but must observe that al-Tha'alibī, in his continuation of the Yatimah, attributes it to Abu 'l-Faraj Ibn Abī Ḥuṣayn 'Alī 'Abd al-Malik, a native of Raqqah<sup>1</sup>, and whose father had been qādī of Aleppo; but as these very verses are to be found in 'Abd al-Muḥsin's diwān and as al-Tha'alibī sometimes falls into mistakes, attributing pieces to the wrong author, this may perhaps be one of his blunders†; the lines are as follows 2:

"I stopped at (an-avaricious) friend's who suffered as much from my visit as I did from hunger; and I passed the night with him as a guest;

1 The Yatimah furnishes very little information respecting 'Alī Ibn 'Abd al-Malik al-Raqqī, but it appears from that work, that he lived at Aleppo in the reign of Sayf al-Dawlah Ibn Ḥamdān, and that he addressed some qaṣīdahs to Abū Farās (No. 146), who replied to them in the same manner.

2 In the printed text, the words أج must be suppressed.

• M. de Slane gives al-Hasīm.—Ed.

† "In his diwān he related that he composed these lines in praise of his brother 'Abd al-Ṣamad." in the autograph and 'Abd al-Ḥamid.—Ed.

such was the decree of fate, so often unjust to the man of noble mind. His reason was troubled by the uneasiness my presence caused him, and he had not well recovered, when he addressed me in these terms: 'Why do you travel abroad?' To which I replied: 'The Prophet<sup>P</sup>, whose words always furnish good counsel and lead to prosperity has said. Travel; you will get rich.' To this my host replied: "But he ended his saying thus: fast; you will enjoy good health."

The two verses which follow are attributed to him by the author of the Yatimah :

"Your generosity has planted a garden of gratitude in my heart: but that garden now suffers from drought; let him who planted it give it water. Hasten to revive it whilst life lingers in its branches; once the shrub is dried up, its verdure cannot be restored."

Happening to pass one day near the tomb of a friend, he recited these lines :

"On passing by thy tomb, I marvelled how my steps had been so well directed towards it. It may seem to thee that I have at length forgotten our mutual acquaintance; ah! how true the words; those who say: 'The dead have no friends.'"

When his mother died he was deeply afflicted, and, on her burial he pronounced these verses;

"(The object of my affection is now deposited as) a pledge underneath the stones in the sandy desert. She is gone and the ties which held me to her have been broken. I used to weep when she complained of her sufferings; but now I weep because she complains no longer."

This idea is taken from al-Mutanabbi, who says:

"I complain because I no longer feel the pains of sickness; I suffered from them once, but then I had my limbs."

<sup>1</sup> The same thought is thus expressed in a verse of a long qaṣīdah

---

1 I suspect the authenticity of the passage which follows: it is written in the margin of the autograph, but in the handwriting of a person who, if we may judge from the general character of his additions, does not seem to be very exact in his quotations.

composed by Abū Muḥammad 'Abd Allāh Ibn Muḥammad, a native of Aleppo, and generally known by the name of Ibn Sinān al-Khafājī<sup>1</sup>:

"Others weep over the ruins of the dwelling where their friends once resided! O that I had such a motive to shed tears!"

The merits of 'Abd al-Muḥsin are great and numerous; but I am obliged to be concise. He died on Sunday, the 9th of Shawwāl, A.H. 419 (October, A.C. 1028)*; aged eighty years, or perhaps somewhat more.

382. AL-ḤĀFIZ AL-'UBAYDĪ.

Abu 'l-Maymūn 'Abd al-Majīd†, surnamed al-Ḥāfiz (the guaraiian), was the son of Muḥammad Ibn al-Mustansir Ibn al-Zāhir Ibn al-Ḥākim Ibn al-'Aziz Ibn al-Mu'izz Ibn al-Manṣūr Ibn al-Qā'im Ibn al-Mahdī 'Ubayd Allāh: we have already spoken of al-Mahdī and some of his descendants. Al-Ḥāfiz received the oath of fidelity from the people of Cairo as regent and immediate successor to the throne, on the same day in which his cousin al-'Āmir was murdered, and he engaged to act in that capacity till the delivery of the female of whom al-'Āmir had left in state of pregnancy. Of this last circumstance we shall again speak towards the end of this article. On the same morning, the wazīr Abū 'Alī Aḥmad, the son of al-Afḍal Shāhanshāh, the son of Amīr al-Juyūsh Badr al-Jamālī, §<sup>2</sup> received from the troops the oath of allegiance to himself, and having proceeded to the palace, <sup>1</sup> Ibn Sinān al-Khafājī, a poet and an elegant scholar, made his literal studies under Abu 'l-'Alā al-Ma'arri and other masters, and obtained also a considerable reputation as a Traditionist. He died at the castle of Bā'arān باعران, in the province of Aleppo, A.H. 466 (A.C. 1073-4)—(Al-Nuḡūm al-Zāhirah).

---

<sup>2</sup> See No. 272.

* According to Edward Mahler's calculation Sunday fell on 5 Shawwāl corresponding to 27 October.—Ed.

† Al-Ḥamid according to de Slane.—Ed.

‡ Abu al-Qāsim in the autograph.—Ed.

§ [His father's notice is given in letter shin. And when 'Āmir had put Afḍal to death he had put all his children under arrest including the said Abū 'Alī but after 'Āmir's assassination the army released him and took oath of allegiance at his hand is omitted by de Slane].—Ed.

he put al-Ḥāfiẓ into confinement, took all the authority into his own hands and governed most equitably. He restored to the former possessors the sums which had been extorted from them, and having made open profession of his faith as a follower of the twelve imāms he rejected the pretensions maintained by al-Ḥāfiẓ and the 'Ubaydite family, and caused public prayers to be offered up from the pulpits for the Qā'im, him who is to rise up at the end of time, and whom, in their mistaken belief, they designate as the expected imām (al-Imām al-Muntaẓir)<sup>1</sup>. By his orders, al-Qā'im's name was inscribed on the coinage, and the words hasten to the excellent work were omitted in the adhān or call to prayer. Things continued in this state, till an officer of the court attacked and slew him in the Great Garden (al-Bustān al-Kabir), outside of Cairo. This event happened on the 15 of Muḥarram, A.H. 526 (December, A.C. 1131)*, and was the result of a plot devised by al-Ḥāfiẓ. The troops immediately hastened to deliver the prince, and having proclaimed him sovereign under the title of al-Ḥāfiẓ, public prayers were offered up for him from all the pulpits of the kingdom. Al-Ḥāfiẓ was born at 'Asqalān, in the month of Muḥarram, A.H. 467 (September, A.C. 1074), and was proclaimed regent on that day in which al-'Īmir was murdered. (See his life in this work). On the death of Al-Ḥamad Ibn Al-Afdāl he received the oath of allegiance as sovereign, and he died towards the close of Sunday eve, the 5 of the latter Jumādā, A.H. 544 (October, A.C. 1149)†; some say, 543. According to another statement, his birth took place on the 13 Ramaḍān. A.H. 468‡. §[The reason of his being born at 'Asqalān was this: During the severe dearth which afflicted Egypt under the reign of his grandfather al-Mustansir, (and of which we shall mention some particulars in the life of that prince), his father left the country and retired to 'Asqalān, <sup>1</sup> This was equivalent to a declaration that the Fāṭimides were not the true imāms, and had no right to the throne. He intended to establish his own sovereignty as protector of the empire till the coming of the Expected Imām. See further details in the Extraits du Kamel Altwarykh, published by the Academie des Inscriptions, page 393.

* 7 December.—Ed.

† 9 October.—Ed.

‡ 20 April 1076.—Ed.

§ [ ] From 'The' (p. 218) to 'work' (p. 219) not in autograph.—Ed.

where he awaited the cessation of the famine and the return to abundance; and it was whilst he resided there that al-Ḥāfiẓ was born. This we give on the authority of our master 'Izz al-Dīn Ibn al-Aṭṭār, who states it as a fact in his great historical work.] Al-Ḥāfiẓ and al-'Āḍid were the only two sovereigns of that dynasty whose fathers had not reigned before them. (Of al-'Āḍid we have already spoken, No. 329). As for al-Ḥāfiẓ, his accession to the supreme power resulted from the circumstances which we shall here relate: al-'Āmir died without male children, but left a wife in a state of pregnancy; this caused great agitation among the people of Egypt, and they said "No imam of this family dies without leaving a male child, to whom he transmits the imamate by a special declaration; (what is to be done now)." But a declaration to that effect had already been made by him in favour of the child still in the womb, which however happened to be a girl. Then occurred the events of which we have already noticed where we related what passed between al-Ḥāfiẓ and Aḥmad Ibn al-Afḍal. Al-Ḥāfiẓ was therefore declared regent, but, for the reason just stated, the absolute authority attached to the imamate was withheld from him, as they had resolved on waiting till the child was born. Al-Ḥāfiẓ was subject to violent attacks of cholic, and it was for him that Shīrmāh the Daylamite, or Mūsā al-Naṣṣārānī (Moses the Christian) as some say, made the instrument called the drum of the cholic, which was preserved in the treasury of this dynasty till the accession of Ṣalāḥ al-Dīn, who ordered it to be broken. The history of this drum is well known. I was informed by the grandson of the Shīrmāh above mentioned, that his grandfather had formed it out of the seven metals, which he combined (successively) together at the moments in which each of the seven planets reached its point of culmination. The nature of this drum was such that when any person beat it, wind escaped from his body through the natural vent; it was this which rendered it so serviceable in cases of cholic<sup>1</sup>

---

<sup>1</sup> It is related by a grave historian, Sibṭ Ibn al-Jawzī cited by Abu 'l-Maḥāsīn in his Nujūm, that one of Ṣalāḥ al-Dīn's Kurdiṣh soldiers, not being aware of the effects which this drum produced, began to beat it, but immediately experienced its influence to such a degree, that he broke it to pieces in a fit of indignation.

383. 'ABD AL-MŪMIN ĀL-KŪMĪ.

Abū Muḥammad 'Abd al-Mūmin Ibn 'Alī al-Qaysī<sup>1</sup> al-Kūmī was the sovereign indebted for his authority to the exertions of Muḥammad Ibn Tūmart, better known by the name of the Maḥdī. 'Abd al-Mūmin's father, a man of consummate prudence and gravity, held an eminent rank in the tribe of Kūmiyah, and sold earthen vessels of his own manufacture. It is related that as he was one day engaged at his usual work, with his child 'Abd al-Mūmin sleeping near him, he heard a humming in the air, and on looking up, saw a swarm of bees like a dark cloud which descended towards the house and settled on 'Abd al-Mūmin, so as to cover him entirely, but without awakening him. His mother screamed with terror at the sight, but the father told her that the child was in no danger. "I only wonder," said he, "what this may portend." He then washed the clay off his hands, and having dressed himself, he waited to see what the bees would do. They at length flew away, and the child awoke unharmed; not the least trace of hurt appeared on his body, although his mother examined him carefully, neither did he utter the slightest complaint. There was a man in the neighbourhood noted as a diviner, and to him the father went and related what had occurred. "This boy," said the diviner, "will soon come to something great; the people of Maḡrib will be all united in obedience unto him." The subsequent history of 'Abd al-Mūmin is well known<sup>2</sup>. I read in a history of Maḡrib that Ibn Tūmart had got into his possession the book called al-Jafr<sup>3</sup>, and that it contained an indication of all that he was to accomplish, of the history of 'Abd al-Mūmin, of his personal

---

1 'Abd al-Mūmin bore the surname of al-Qaysī (descendant from Qays Ibn Ḡhaylān, or Qays 'Aylān, Ibn Nizār Ibn Ma'add Ibn 'Adnān), because the Berber tribe to which he belonged claimed its descent from the great Arabic stem of 'Adnān.

2 See Abu 'l-Feda, t. III, p. 399, and the Portuguese translation of Ibn 'Abd al-Ḥalīm's Qartas, published at Lisbon in 1828 under the title of Historia dos Soberanos Mohametanos aue reinara na Mauritania. My edition of Ibn Kḥalūn's history of the Berbers will contain full information respecting the origin, organisation, and history of the Muwaḥḥid dynasties. See also the Extraits du Kamel Altevaykh, published by the Academie des Inscriptions, p. 334.

3 Of this book Ibn Kḥallikān will speak farther on.

appearance, and of his very name. A considerable time' says this author, was passed by Ibn Tumart till he at length found 'Abd al-Mumin, who was still a boy ; and thenceforward he treated him with marked honour and placed him at the head of his disciples. He then communicated to him the secret (of his destiny) and proceeded with him to the city of Morocco, which was at that time under the rule of Abu 'l-Hasan 'Ali Ibn Yusuf Ibn Tāshifin, the king of the al-Mulaththamūn<sup>1</sup> ; it would be too long to relate what passed between that prince and him ; we shall merely state that the former expelled him from the city, on which he proceeded to the mountains, where he levied troops and gained over to his cause the tribe of Masmudah. We shall only state in a summary manner, that the Mahdi did not make any conquest, but that it was by means of the troops which he had raised, and of the system which he had organised that his successor 'Abd al-Mūmin effected the conquest of that country.—Ibn Tumart was always predicting the noble qualities which his disciple was to display, and, every time he saw him, he recited these verses.

"You possess in perfection all the qualities with which thou hast been favoured; and hence proceed joy and happiness for us all. Thine is the smiling mouth, the liberal hand, the noble soul, and the open countenance."

I have found these verses attributed to Abu 'l-Shis al-Khuza'i, the celebrated poet<sup>2</sup>.—The Mahdi Ibn Tūmart used also to say to his disciples. "Your comrade will be the conqueror of kingdoms." It is not true that the preference which their master showed him was a sufficient intimation of his intention, and they acknowledged him for their chief. It was thus that the authority of 'Abd al-Mūmin was established. The first city which he took was *Oran, then Tilmsen, the Fez, then Sale, and then Ceuta; after these conquests he proceeded to Morocco, which he besieged eleven months, and 1 They were called al-Mulaththamūn, because they used to wear a lithām, or bandage, across the lower part of their face, as is still the custom in the desert from which they originally came. This is the same race which is called the Almoravites (al-Murābitūn), or Almoraves by European writers.

2 See No. 213.

* Wahrān, Tilimsūn.

carried towards the beginning of A.H. 542<sup>1</sup>. Having thus grounded his power, he extended his domination over al-Maghrib al-Aqṣā, al-Maghrib al-Adnā, the other provinces of North Africa, and the greater portion of Spain. He then received the title of Amīr al-Mu'minin, and the poets celebrated his glory in eulogistic poems of the greatest beauty. The katib 'Imād al-Dīn mentions in his Khariḍah that Abū 'Abd Allāh Muḥammad Ibn Abi 'l-'Abbās, a jurisconsult of Tifaṣh<sup>2</sup> addressed him in a qasidah beginning thus:

"Never was a braver deportment seen among the hostile swords and spears than that of the khalif 'Abd al-Mu'min, the son of 'Alī."

On hearing this verse, the prince motioned to him that what he had said was quite sufficient, and he ordered him a reward of one thousand gold pieces. When 'Abd al-Mu'min had established his authority on a solid basis, and had attained an advanced age, he left Morocco and entered Sale, where a violent attack of sickness carried him off. He expired on one of the last ten days (the 27) of the month of the latter Jumāda, A.H. 558 (June, A.C. 1163)<sup>3</sup>, after a reign of thirty-three years and some months. It is said that his body was taken to Tinmalil<sup>4</sup>; the place mentioned in the life of the Mahdī Muḥammad Ibn Tumart, and there interred. Towards the latter period of his life, he was an aged man with hair completely white. I copy the following passage from an historical work containing an account of his life with a description of his person; it is the author who speaks: "I saw an aged man of upright stature, with a large head, dark blue eyes, a bushy beard, callous hands, tall even when seated, with teeth of the purest white, and a mole on his right cheek." The year of his birth is uncertain; some say A.H. 500 (A.C. 1106-7), and others, A.H. 490. He nominated as a successor to 1 According to Ibn Khaldūn and Ibn 'Abd al-Ḥalīm, the city of Morocco was taken in the month of Shawwāl, A.H. 541 (March, A.C. 1147).

2 The katib gives no further information respecting this poet, but the anecdote is mentioned by different historians. Tifaṣh, the ancient Tipasa, lies about forty miles to the south of Bona, in North Africa.

3 Ibn Khallikān writes the name of Tin Mall. I follow the African historians. This stronghold was situated to the east of Morocco in the heart of Mount Atlas.

• June. But this addition is made by de Slane.—Ed.

the throne his son Abu 'Abd 'Allah Muḥammad, but the authority of this prince was soon shaken, and himself deposed in the month of Shā'ban, in the first year of his reign<sup>1</sup>. His brother Yūsuf (whose life shall be given in this work) was then proclaimed sovereign.—Kūmī means belonging to Kūmah a small tribe established on the sea-coast in the province of Tilimsen. 'Abd al-Mūmin was born at Tālirah, a village in that region.—As for the book called the Jafr, it is spoken of by Ibn Qutaybah towards the beginning of his work entitled I'htilāf al-Ḥadīth, where he concludes a long dissertation with these words: "And something stranger than the foregoing mode of interpreting is that followed by the Rāfiḍites<sup>2</sup> in their interpretation of the Qur'ān and their pretended knowledge of its hidden meaning, conveyed to them by the Jafr, a work mentioned in these verses by Sa'd Ibn Hārūn al-'Ijlī, the chief of the Zaydites<sup>3</sup>:

'Behold the Rāfiḍites torn by dissensions, yet all holding shocking opinions respecting Ja'far<sup>4</sup>. Some call him an imam, and others the Immaculate Prophet; but what causes my inexpressible astonishment is their volume (jild) the Jafr!—I renounce before God to all the followers of the Jafr.'"<sup>5</sup>

There are many more verses in the same piece, but I confine quotation to these, because they make mention of the Jafr, and that is all I require. After giving the whole piece, Ibn Qutaybah continues thus: "This is the jild (volume or skin) of the Jafr, in which they

1 Further particulars respecting Abū 'Abd Allāh Muḥammad's reign will be found in the life of his brother Yūsuf Ibn 'Abd al-Mūmin.

2 The word Rāfiḍī signifies literally, heretic; it is applied to designate the different Shiite sects.

3 The Zaydites acknowledged for Imām Zayd, the son of 'Alī the son of Ḥusayn, the son of 'Alī Ibn Abi Ṭālib.

4 Ja'far the son of Muḥammad the son of 'Alī al-Baqir was considered by one of the Shiite sects as the true Imām.

5 These verses would not lead the reader to suppose that the author himself was a partisan of Ja'far, as Ibn Khaldūn, who calls him Hārūn Ibn Sa'id al-'Ijlī has explicitly stated. See an extract from his Prolegomena in M. de Sacy's Chrestomathie, tom. II, p. 300. I cannot discover any mention of Sa'id Ibn Hārūn in al-Shahristānī, but feel convinced, from the examination of the verses quoted here as his, that Ibn Khaldūn is mistaken. D'Herbelot has some observations on the Jafr worthy of notice. See Bib. Orient, Geogr. U. Giamc.

pretend that the Imām wrote whatever was requisite for them to know, and every thing which is to happen till the day of judgment; but God knoweth best (if its contents be true). I must add that by the Imām they mean Ja'far al-Ṣādiq<sup>1</sup>, him of whom we have already spoken. (No. 128) Abu 'l-'Alā al-Ma'arrī alludes to the Jafr in the following lines, taken from one of his poems:

"They wonder at the family of the Prophet<sup>2</sup>, because they got their knowledge from the skin of a kid (jafr); yet the mirror of the astrologer, small though it be, shows him all the inhabited regions of the world and the deserts."

The word jafr signifies a four months kid, at which age its sides swell out (jafara) and it quits dam. The feminine of this word has a final h (a). In that time it was their custom to write on skins, (blade) bones, potsherds, and all things of that sort.

384. ABU 'L-QĀSIM AL-ANMĀ'Ī.

Abu 'l-Qāsim 'Uṭhman Ibn Sa'id Ibn Baḥshār al-Anmā'ī surnamed also al-Aḥwal (the squinter), an eminent doctor of the Shāfi'ite sect, studied jurisprudence under al-Muzanī (No. 90) and al-Rabī' Ibn Sulaymān al-Murādī (No. 221). Amongst his own disciples, he counted Abu 'l-'Abbās Ibn Surayj (No. 20). It was through him that the people of Bagḥdād were inspired with such ardour as they then showed to procure and learn by heart the writings of al-Shāfi'ī. He states that he heard al-Muzanī<sup>2</sup> say: "For the last fifty years I have read the treatise (on jurisprudence) transmitted down from al-Shāfi'ī, and I do not recollect having read it a single time without deriving from it a great quantity of information which I did not possess before." Al-Anmā'ī died at Bagḥdād in the month of Shawwāl, A.H. 288 (Sept.-Oct., A.C. 901).—Abu Ḥafṣ 'Umar Ibn 'Alī al-Muṭawwa'ī<sup>3</sup>

1 Read الصادق in the printed text. *

2 Read الوزني in the printed Arabic text.

3 It appears from Ḥājji Khalīfah that al-Muṭawwa'ī lived before the time of Abu 'l-Tayyib Sahl al-Ṣu'lūkī, for he states in his bibliography that the former was the first who composed a Ṭabaqāt of Shāfi'ite doctors, and al-Ṣu'lūkī the second. The life of al-Ṣu'lūkī is given No. 270.

mentions an Abu 'l-Qasim 'Abd Allāh Ibn Aḥmad Ibn Bashshār al-Anmāṭī (a relation of the preceding) in his work entitled Kitāb al-Mudhhab fi Dhikri A'immati 'l-Madhhab [the book with the gilt case, containing an account of the great doctors of the (Shāfi'ite) sect.]—Anmāṭī means maker and seller of anmāṭ, or bed furniture, such as rugs, mats, pillows, etc. It is the people of Egypt who call them by this name and who give to the seller of such wares the appellation of Anmāṭī.

385. ḌIYĀ-AL-DĪN AL-HADBĀNĪ.

Aba 'Amr 'Uthman Ibn 'Isā Ibn Dirbas Ibn Fīr Ibn Jahm Ibn 'Abdūs al-Hadṭanī<sup>1</sup> al-Marānī, surnamed Ḍiyā al-Dīn (splendour of religion), was one of the most learned doctors of the age in Shāfi'ite jurisprudence. He was a brother of the qāḍī Ṣadr al-Dīn Abu 'l-Qāsim 'Abd al-Malik, hākim<sup>2</sup> of Egypt, and acted as his deputy at Cairo. When a boy, he studied in Arbela under the shaykh al-Khiḍr Ibn 'Aqīl, (no. 205); after which he went to Damascus, where he put himself under the tuition of 'Abd Allāh Ibn Abī 'Uṣṣan (no. 313), and acquired a profound knowledge of the general principles of jurisprudence and of Shāfi'ite law. The first satisfactory commentary ever composed on Abū Ishāq al-Shīrāzī's Muḥadḍḥab was written by him; it forms nearly twenty volumes, but remains incomplete, as the author only went as far as the chapter on evidence, which, with the remaining chapters, he left uncommented: this work he entitled al-Istiqṣā li Madhāhib il-Fuqahā (diligent examination of the different systems established by the jurisconsults). He composed also, amongst other works, a full commentary, in two volumes, on Abū Ishāq al-Shīrāzī's treatise on the general principles of jurisprudence, the Luma'. (Some years) previously to the death of the qāḍī Ṣadr al-Dīn, an event which occurred on the eve of Wednesday, the 5th of Rajab, A.H. 605 (January, A.D. 1209)*, he was removed from the place of deputy ḥākim and appointed to fill the post of professor in a college founded for him in the Castle of Cairo by the amīr Jamāl al-Dīn Khushṭurīn al-Hakkārī. He held this post during the remainder of his life, and expired at Cairo on the 12th of Dhū 'l-Qa'dah, A.H. 602 (June, A.D. 1206).† aged ninety years. He was interred in the lesser Qarāfah Cemetery. The qāḍī Ṣadr al-Dīn was buried in the mausoleum bearing his name and situated in the same cemetery. When this qāḍī was asked the date of his birth, he indicated the end of the year 516 (A.D. 1123), or the beginning of 517, being in doubt respecting the precise epoch<sup>2</sup>.—Mārānt means belonging to the Banū Mārān, a tribe inhabiting the Murāj (meadows) below Mosul<sup>3</sup>.

<sup>1</sup> The orthography of this name is fixed by al-Yāfi'i, but its signification is not given there nor in any of the other works consulted by me. The author of the Ṭabaqāt al-Fuqahā says that he was a Kurd.

<sup>2</sup> The office appears to have been the same as that of grand qāḍī (Qāḍī 'l-Quḷāt), but with this additional privilege that the person who filled it possessed uncontrolled executive power as redresser of grievances (See no. 141, note on Inspection of Grievances).

386. TAQĪ AL-DĪN IBN AL-ṢALĀḤ.

Abū 'Amr 'Uthmān Ibn 'Abd al-Raḥmān Ibn 'Uthmān Ibn Mūsā Ibn Abi 'l-Naṣr al-Naṣrī al-Kurḍī al-Shāhrazūrī (a descendant of Abū Naṣr the Kurd and a native of Shāhrazūr) was a jurisconsult of the sect of al-Shāfi'ī. He bore the surname of Taqī al-Dīn (pious in re-

<sup>1</sup> This name is written in the autograph خشتورین. It is so incorrectly transcribed in all the other MSS., that I was unable to fix its true orthography.

<sup>2</sup> The autograph contains the following marginal note: "The Sultān Ṣalāḥ al-Dīn entrusted him with the qāḍiship of (all) Egypt, after he had acted as qāḍī of al-Gharbiyah, one of the provinces in that country. This nomination took place on the 22nd of the latter Jumādā, A.H. 566; some say 565." This passage is to be found in some of the other MSS., but the date which they give is 586, which I knew, from Ibn Hujr's Qāḍis of Egypt, to be false. This led me suppress the passage in the Arabic text, but it shall be given in the appendix.

<sup>3</sup> The Murāj of Mosul, called also Marj Abi 'Ubaydah, lies to the east of the city. It is a low ground, surrounded by hills and covered with meadows and villages.—(Marāṣid.)

* 4th January.—Ed.

† 20th June.—Ed.

ligion) and was generally known by the name of Ibn al-Ṣalāḥ al-Sharakhānī. This doctor was one of the most eminent men of his time by his deep acquaintance with the sciences of Quranic interpretation, Traditions, jurisprudence, names of men (or biography of Traditionists), and every branch of knowledge connected with the Traditions and with the oral transmission of philological learning. He possessed also a considerable degree of information in many other departments of science. His fatwās, or legal opinions, were considered of great validity, and he was one of the masters from whose tuition I derived great profit. He made his first studies in jurisprudence under his father al-Ṣalāḥ<sup>1</sup>, who was one of the most distinguished Shaykhs among the Kurds; he was then taken by his parent to Mosul, where he studied for some time, and I have been told that he had repeatedly gone over the whole of (Abū Ishāq al-Shīrāzī's) Muḥadḍḥab with his masters, before his moustaches were grown. He was then employed at Mosul as an under-tutor by the learned shaykh 'Imād al-Dīn Abū Ḥāmid Ibn Yūnus. After a short stay in that city, he travelled to Khūrāsān, where he remained for some time, occupied in acquiring a knowledge of the Traditions extant in that country; he then returned to Syria and was appointed professor in the Nāṣiriyyah College at Jerusalem, founded by al-Malik al-Nāṣir Ṣalāḥ al-Dīn. During his residence in that city he successfully directed numerous pupils in their studies, and he afterwards removed to Damascus, where he obtained the professorship in the college, called the Rawāḥiyyah after its founder al-Zakī Abū 'l-Qāsim Hibat Allāh Ibn 'Abd al-Wāḥid Ibn Rawāḥah al-Ḥamawī (native of Hamāt), the same person who founded the Rawāḥiyyah College at Aleppo. When the Dār al-Ḥadīth (or school for teaching the Traditions) was erected at Damascus by al-Malik al-Aṣḥraf, the son of al-Malik al-'Ādil Ibn Ayyūb, he was nominated to that professorship and taught the Traditions to numbers of pupils; he subsequently became professor in the Madrasah Sitt al-Shām, a college within the city walls, founded by Sitt al-Shām Zamarrud<sup>2</sup> Khātūn, the daughter of Ayyūb and the uterine sister of Shams al-Dawlah Tūrān Shah.

<sup>1</sup> From this it appears that his father 'Abd al-Raḥmān bore the title of Ṣalāḥ al-Dīn.

<sup>2</sup> Zaman according to de Slane who has not read the name correctly. The autograph, the Cairo Edition and Tehrān Edition give Zamarrud.—Ed.

It lies to the south of (the hospital founded by Nūr al-Dīn and named after him) al-Bīmāristān al-Nūrī. Sitt al-Shām erected also the college outside Damascus which contains her tomb, the tomb of her brother, and that of her husband Naṣīr al-Dīn, the son of Asad al-Dīn Shāyrah, and sovereign of Emessa<sup>1</sup>. Ibn al-Ṣalāḥ held simultaneously those three places and filled with strict punctuality his duties in each, never interrupting the regular course of his lectures unless forced to do so by unavoidable circumstances; he was (indeed) firmly grounded in learning and piety. I went to him in the beginning of the month of Shawwāl, A.H. 632 (end of June, A.D. 1235), and resided with him at Damascus for a year, which time I passed in close study. He composed an instructive work on the sciences connected with the Traditions, and another on the rites of the Pilgrimage, in which he treated the subject at length, and inserted many observations useful and requisite to be known. His Ishkālāt is an elucidation of the obscurities in (Abū Ḥamid al-Jhazzālī's treatise on jurisprudence), the Wasīṭ and his fatwās also have been collected by one of his pupils and form a volume. He continued till the last to lead a righteous life, passed in piety, application to study and assiduity in teaching. His death took place at Damascus on Wednesday morning, the 5th of the latter Rabi', A.H. 643 (September, A.D. 1245)*; on the afternoon of the same day, the funeral service was said over him, and he was interred in the cemetery of the Sūfis, outside the gate of Naṣr. He was born A.H. 577 (A.D. 1181-2) at Sharakhān.—His father al-Ṣalāḥ died at Aleppo on the eve of Thursday, the 27th of Dhu 'l-Qa 'dah, A.H. 618 (January A.D. 1222)† and was buried at a place called al-Jabul<sup>2</sup>, outside the gate of <sup>2</sup> I have printed this name الجبل but the autograph has الجبل , an unpronounceable word. It is true that the whole of this passage is in the margin of the autograph and not in the author's handwriting; it must have been inserted however with his authorisation. There exists a village called al-Jebbūl الجبول at the distance of eighteen or twenty miles from Aleppo, but it lies to the south-east of the city, whereas the gate of al-Arba'in is on the north side of it.

---

<sup>1</sup> See No. 124, and No. 116.

* 18 September.—Ed.

† 13 January.—Ed.

Arba'īn<sup>1</sup>, in the tomb of the shaykh 'Alī Ibn Muḥammad al-Fārisī.<sup>2</sup> His birth is placed by approximation in the year 539 (A.D. 1144), as he did not himself know the exact date. He held the professorship in the Asadiyah College, founded at Aleppo by Asad al-Dīn Shīrkūh Ibn Shādhī; before his nomination he had studied at Baghdād, and taken lessons from Shīraf al-Dīn Ibn Abi 'Uṣṣūn (no. 313).—Sharahān is a village in the province of Arbela, near Shāhrazūr. Al-Zakī Ibn Rawḥah died at Damascus on Tuesday, the 7th of Rajab, A.H. 622 (July, A.D. 1225)*, and was buried in the cemetery of the Ṣufīs. It is stated by Shihāb al-Dīn 'Abd al-Raḥmān Abu Shāmah<sup>3</sup>, in his Annals, that Ibn Rawḥah died A.H. 623—Sitt al-Shām, the daughter of Ayyūb, died on Friday, the 16th of Dhu 'l-Qa'dah, A.H. 616 (January, A.D. 1220)†

1 In the Arabic text I have printed al-Arba'īn on the authority of some of my MSS. and on that of Russel. See History of Aleppo, Vol. I. p. 13, note.

2 In the autograph this name is indistinctly written, that may be read al-Fasl الفاسى.

3 The shaykh Abu 'l-Qāsim 'Abd al-Raḥmān Ibn Ismā'il Ibn Ibrahim Ibn 'Uṭhmān, surnamed Shihāb al-Dīn (flambeau of religion) was a jurisconsult, a grammarian, a teacher of the readings of the Qur'ān a historian, and a traditionist. He was generally known by the name of Abū Shāmah because he had a large mole on the left temple. He was born at Damascus in one of the months of Rabi', A.H. 599 (end of A.D. 1202); before attaining the age of ten years he had mastered all the Qur'ān and at the age of sixteen he had acquired a perfect acquaintance with the art of Qur'ān-reading, under al-Sakhāwī (see his life no. 431). One of his masters was Ibn al-Ṣalāḥ al-Dhahabī says that he wrote a great deal on different branches of science, and that he possessed great abilities as a doctor, a professor, and a mufti. He died at Damascus in the month of Ramadān, A.H. 665 (June, A.D. 1267). His principal works are a commentary on the Shāṭibiyah (see the life of Ibn Fīrah, no. 512); two abridgements of the history of Damascus the first in fifteen volumes, and the second in five; a commentary on al-Sakhāwī's qaṣṣidat in honour of the Prophet; the Kitāb al-Rawḍatayn or Two Gardens, containing the history of Nūr al-Dīn and Salāḥ al-Dīn (a copy of which important work is in the Bib. du. Roi); a continuation of the preceding a treatise on dogmatic theology; an introduction to grammar; a versified edition of al-Zamakhsharī's Mufaṣṣal, etc. He left many other works, but unfinished.—(Tab. al-Shi'fīn).

* 15th July.—Ed

† 24th January.—Ed

['Abd al-Ḥamid adds the following passage which he says was in one of the MSS before him. It may however be noted that this passage is not to be found in the author's autograph, nor it is included in de Slane's edition.

"And it has been related on the authority of Taqī al-Dīn surnamed Ibn al-Ṣalāḥ, may Allāh, be He Exalted show him mercy, that he said : Al-Shaykh al-Ṣāliḥ, 'Alī Ibn al-Ruwās, may Allāh sanctify his soul ; informed me ; he said : I was inspired with these words in sleep : Avoid asking (begging) as far as you can, because there is fresh subsistence for every day. Solicitation of demands diminishes the value. There is nothing good of action in yearning. Sometimes a thing different from this is one of the proper etiquette before Allāh, be He Exalted. Good fortunes have degrees. So do not hurry to get a fruit before it ripens, because you will get it at the proper time. Do not hurry in your needs, otherwise they will be beyond your power ; and despair will (overpower) you. Allāh knoweth best"].

387. IBN JINNĪ.

Abu 'l-Faḥḥ 'Uṭṭmān Ibn Jinnī, a native of Mosul, was one of the great masters in the science of grammar. He studied the belles-lettres under Abu 'Alī 'l-Fārisī (no. 155), and, on quitting him, he commenced as teacher in Mosul. His former master, happening to pass through the city, saw him surrounded by pupils at their lessons, on which he said to him : " You are rotten before you are ripe." <sup>1</sup> On hearing these words he abandoned his class, and became the assiduous disciple of Abu 'Alī till he acquired a perfect knowledge of the science. His father Jinnī was a Greek slave belonging to Sulaymān Ibn Fahd Ibn Aḥmad al-Azdī, a native of Mosul and to this circumstance he alludes in the following passage from one of his poems:

---

<sup>1</sup> Such appears to be the meaning of the expression. زبیت وانت حصرم which signifies literally: You give out must although you are an unripe grape.

"Were I sprung from nothing, my learning would be a title of nobility. But I come of princes powerful and noble, Caesars, whose voice silenced the threats of adversity. For them the Prophet prayed<sup>1</sup>, and the prayer of a prophet is glory sufficient."

He composed some fine poetry. The following lines of his indicate that he had only one eye, which is said to have been really the case; but some attribute them to Abū Maṣṣūr al-Daylamī :

"Thy rigour towards me who have committed no fault denotes an evil intention. I swear by thy life ! that I wept till I felt afraid for my single eye. And yet were it not that I should never see thee again, it would be no advantage for me to preserve my sight."

I saw a qaṣīdah of his, in which he laments the death of al-Mutanabbī, and I would give it here were it not so long.—As for Abū Maṣṣūr al-Daylamī, better known as Abū 'l-Ḥasan 'Alī Ibn Maṣṣūr, he was the son of a soldier in the service of Sayf al-Dawlat Ibn Ḥamdān, and was a good but licentious poet. He also had but one eye, and on this defect he composed some fine verses, such as these :

"O you have no witnesses to prove that you were in love ! know that mine are my eyes, with which I wept till one of them was lost. And yet how strange it is, that the eye which I have still remaining, abstains."<sup>2</sup>

He also made the following ingeniously turned verse on a handsome boy who had but one eye :

"He has one eye which strikes all eyes (with admiration), and another which was struck by (evil) eyes."

Ibn Jinnī composed a number of instructive works on the science of grammar, namely : the Kitāb al-Khaṭṭ (on the principles of grammar ;) the Sirr al-Ṣanā'at (secret of the art); the Munṣif

---

1 This may be an allusion to the satisfaction expressed by Muḥammad on learning how favourably his letter, in which he invited the emperor Heraclius to embrace Islamism, had been received by that prince. Or perhaps it may refer to the lively interest which Muḥammad took in the triumph of the Greeks over the Persians; an event which the Muslims pretend was foretold in the Qur'ān many years before. See Sūrat 30.

2 It abstained from the pleasure of seeing the beloved, lest her charms should have deprived it of sight.

(impartial), intended to elucidate Abū 'Uthmān al-Māzinī's (no. 115) treatise on the declensions and conjugations; the Talqin (instruction); the Ta'aqub (mutual succession) the Kāfi (sufficient), being a commentary on al-Aḥfash's (no. 252) ; treatise on rhyme a work on the genders ; a treatise on the nouns ending with a short alif and those ending with a long one ; the Tamām (completion), being a commentary on the poems of the Hudhaylites ; the Manhaj (highway), treating of the derivation of those proper names which occur in the Ḥamāsah; a concise treatise on prosody; another on rhyme ; al-Masā'il al-Khaṭiriyāt (questions incidentally suggested) al-Tadhkirah al-Iṣbahānīyah (memorial of Ispahān); extracts from Abū 'Alī 'l-Fārisi's Tadhkirah, selected and put in order; the Muqtaḍib (rough draught), treating of the concave verbs; the Luma' (flashes); the Tanbih (warning); the Muḥadḍḥab (regularly drawn up); the Tabṣirah (elucidation); etc. It is said that the shaykh Abū Ishāq al-Shīrāzī borrowed from him the titles of his own works, for he also composed a Muḥadḍḥab and a Tanbih, but on jurisprudence, and a Luma' and a Tabṣirah on the principles of jurisprudence. Another work of Ibn Jinnī's is the Faṣr (disclosure),<sup>1</sup> forming a commentary on the Diwān of al-Mutanabbī, which work he had read through under the tuition of the author. In this commentary I read the following passage : "A person once asked al-Mutanabbī why, in his verse, Bādīn hawāka ṣabarta am lam taṣbira (suffer as you may, with firmness or with impatience, you cannot conceal your love), he wrote the word with a final alif, notwithstanding the presence of the apocopating particle lam, which required taṣbir. To this he answered : ' Were Abū 'l-Faṭḥ here'—meaning me—'he would tell you the reason'. —The alif replaces here the simple corroborative nūn; the original form of the word is taṣbīran, but when this nūn is followed by a full stop, an alif is put in its place; it is thus that al-A'ṣḥa says : Adore not Satan, adore God; (la ta'budi 'l-Shayṭāna wa Allāha fa'buda) ناعبدنا; here the original form of the word is fa'budan ناعبدون, but the subsequent stop brings in the alif ! to replace the nūn. Ibn Jinnī was born at Mosul some time before A.H. 330 (A.D. 941); he died at Baghdād on Friday, the 27th of Ṣafar, A.H. 392 (January, A.D. 1002)<sup>1</sup>.

<sup>1</sup> The title of this work is written differently in each of the MSS. I discovered it at length in the Fihrist, and the autograph gives it with the vowel points

• 16 Janury.—Ed.

388. ABŪ 'AMR IBN AL-ḤĀJIB.

Abu 'Amr 'Uthmān Ibn 'Umar Ibn Abī Bakr<sup>1</sup>, surnamed Jamāl al-Dīn (beauty of religion), and generally known by the appellation of Ibn al-Ḥājib (the son of the chamberlain), was a jurisconsult of the sect of Mālik. His father was a Kurd and served the amīr 'Izz al-Dīn Mūsak al-Ṣalāhī in the capacity of a chamberlain. His son Abu 'Amr was yet a boy when he studied the Qur'ān at Cairo; he then applied himself successively to Malikite jurisprudence, Arabic grammar, and the readings of the Qur'ān, sciences in all the branches of which he acquired a consummate knowledge and attained distinction. He then proceeded to Damascus, where he opened a class in that corner of the Great Mosque which is appropriated to the Malikites. Multitudes attended his lessons, and nothing could abate his zeal as a professor. He was deeply versed in a great number of sciences, but grammar became his favourite study. His (principal) works are an abridgment of the Malikite doctrines, a short introduction to grammar, entitled the Kāfiyah (sufficient), and a treatise of a similar kind on the grammatical inflexions, entitled al-Shāfiyah (satisfactory); to illustrate each of these works, he composed a commentary.

['Abd al-Ḥamīd adds with a note: the same is omitted from MS. 1. He says: Which غَد (tomorrow) is with يَد (hand) of د (play) of letters in which I have followed in rhyming letters which are 'ayns.*

And the Ink-pot, salmon and whale are nūns which I have not followed and the matter is clear.

These were parallels to two famous verses which run thus:

Some times people treated rhymes

There are bending and softness in rhymes,

I have followed them in their 'ayn, 'ayn, 'ayn,

Nūn, nūn, nūn have not followed them.

1 The following passage is written in the margin of the autograph: ابن يونس الدوني ثم المصري "Ibn Yūnus al-Duwani al-Miṣrī (native of Egypt)."
Al-Duwani probably signifies belonging to Duwin دوين or Tovin, a town in Armenia.—It may however mean belonging to Dunaq دونق, a village near Nahāwand, or to Dūn, a village near Dinawār.

* I have made the medial letter of the word as rhyming letter.—Ed.

† Not in the Autograph.

By three 'ayns he means words ghad, yad and dad, because the measure of each of them is fa', since غد was or ginally غدو , يد was يدى and دد was ددن . By three nūns he means, according to his statement, ink-pot, salmon and whale.

He composed three verses containing the names of the arrows of gambling.

They are (1) fadhḥ (unique), (2) taw'am (twins), (3) raqib (watcher). Then (4) ḥils (saddle-cloth), (5) nāfis (breathing), then (6) musbil (flowing),

And (7) al-Mu'allā (elevated) and (8) al-waghgh (stupid), then (9) safḥ (ewd).

And (10) manī' (impregnable) and the last three are left over. And the shares increase,

Like it if you count one by one.]<sup>1</sup>

He wrote also on the principles of jurisprudence, and all his productions, are highly elegant and instructive. He contradicted the grammarians on some particular points and quoted, to confute them and bring their rules into doubt, examples (from ancient authors) extremely difficult to solve : he was (indeed) gifted with great penetration. Having left Damascus, he returned to Cairo, where he settled, and had crowds of pupils who assiduously attended his lessons. (When I was a qāḍi there) he came before me repeatedly to give evidence, and I then questioned him on obscure points of grammar, to which he made most satisfactory replies, with great sedateness of manner and complete self-possession. One

---

1 "In the days of Jānīliyah the Arabs were fond of gambings or casting lots by arrows. A group of ten Arabs used to buy a young camel which was cut into ten portions and the yāsr presiding distributed the portions among his companions by means of arrows on which he had written their names and which he drew at random out of a bag. In another system 28 portions were made of the animal ; there was one part for the first arrow, 2 for the second and 3 for the third and so on upto 7 ; the three last got nothing". (Vide Shorter Encyclopaedia of Islām under malsr).

[In the above verses the name of the ten arrows are given in order.—Ed.]

of the questions which I proposed to him was relative to the incidental conditional phrase employed in another phrase of the same kind, as it occurs in this expression : in akalti in sharibti faanti ṭāliqun (wife! if you eat, if you drink), you are divorced by the fact<sup>1</sup> and I asked him how it could be shown that, in this phrase, the priority of the act of drinking to that of eating is implicitly declared; and that such is the case, is proved by the fact that the divorce then takes place (by law), whereas had she eaten first and drunk afterwards, she would not have been divorced. I consulted him also on this verse of al-Mutanabbī's :

"I endeavoured to support my woes till I could endure them no longer (lāta muṣṭabari), and I faced every danger till no more remained for me to face (lāta muḡṭaḥami)."

Respecting this verse, I asked him what was the reason that muṣṭabar and muḡṭaḥam were here in the genitive, although lata is not one of those parts of speech which have the power of governing a noun in that case? On both these questions he spoke at some length and gave an excellent solution to each; and were his answers not so long, I would give them here<sup>2</sup>. Ibn al-Ḥajib afterwards removed to Alexandria with the intention of taking up his residence there, but he had not been long in that city, when he died. This event took place after sun-rise on Thursday, the 26th of Shawwāl, A.H. 646 (February, A.D. 1249)<sup>3</sup>, and he was buried outside the gate which opens towards the sea (Bab al-Baḥr). His birth took place towards the end of the year 570 (A.D. 1175) at Asnā, a small village in the dependencies of al-Qūsiyah, which place is situated in Upper Ṣa'id, a province of Egypt.

---

<sup>1</sup> This phrase signifies: Wife! if you eat when drinking, you are divorced. The solution of numerous questions similar to this is given in the Fatwa 'Ālamgir, Vol. I, p. 579, et seq.

<sup>2</sup> The commentators on al-Mutanabbī say that in the expression lata muṣṭabari the noun حين is understood, it is therefore equivalent to لأت حين مصطبر.

<sup>3</sup> 10 February. Ed.

389. AL-MALIK AL-'AZ Z THE SON OF ŞALĀḤ AL-D N.

Abu 'l-Faṭḥ 'Uṭḥmān, surnamed al-Malik al-'Azīz 'Imād al-Dīn (the mighty prince, column of the faith), acted as viceroy of Egypt during the absence of his father, the Sultān Şalāḥ al-Dīn Yūsuf Ibn Ayyūb, in Syria. On the demise of his father at Damascus, he took possession of the supreme power with the unanimous consent of the great military officers of the empire. This is an event so well known that any relation of it is unnecessary<sup>1</sup>. His conduct as a sovereign was marked by such piety, virtue, magnanimity, and beneficence, as entitled him to the reputation of sanctity. He learned Traditions at Alexandria from the ḥāfiẓ al-Silafī (no. 43) and the jurisconsult Abu 'l-Ṭāhir Ibn 'Awf al-Zuhri<sup>2</sup>; at Cairo he received lessons from the learned grammarian Abū Muḥammad Ibn Barī (no. 32<sup>1</sup>), and other eminent masters. It is said that his father preferred him to all his other children. Al-Malik al-'Azīz was in Syria when his son al-Malik al-Manṣūr Naṣir al-Dīn Muḥammad came into the world; and the letter of congratulation which al-Qaḍī al-Faḍīl (no. 349) wrote to him from Cairo, announcing the happy event, was worded in these terms: "The humble servant of our master al-Malik al-Nāṣir kissed the ground before him, and prays God to preserve his well directed and exemplary life! may He increase his happiness of others! may the number of his friends, servants, and followers be multiplied so that his authority have the rein an arm of might! may God so augment the abundance of his offspring that it may be said : There is the Adam of kings, and these are his sons! His servant now informs him that the Almighty, to Whom all dominion belongeth, hath favoured him, al-Malik al-'Azīz, (may his arms be triumphant!) with a signal blessing, a young prince, pure and holy, sprung from a generous stock the branches of which are engrafted one on the other. and produced by a noble family of which the princes are nearly equal to the angels of heaven, and of which the slaves are sovereigns on this earth." Al-Malik al-'Azīz was born at Cairo on the 8th of the first Jumādā, A.H. 567 (January, A.D. 1172)*. (His death was the result of an accident;) having gone to (the province of) al-Fayyūm, he rode out to hunt, and as he was galloping full speed after a beast of chase, his horse fell with him, and the injury which he sustained brought on a fever : he was borne in that state to Cairo, and he died there on the seventh hour of the night preceding Wednesday, the 21st of Muḥarram, A.H. 595 (November, A. D. (1198).†

<sup>1</sup> See Abu 'l-Feda's Annals; tom. IV, p. 133 et seq.

<sup>2</sup> Abu 'l-Ṭāhir Ismā'īl Ibn Makki Ibn Ismā'īl Ibn 'Isā Ibn 'Awf al-Zuhri al-Quraṣhī al-Iskandarānī (a member of the tribe of Zuhrah, which is a branch of that of Quraysh and native of Alexandria), surnamed also Ṣadr al-Islām (centre of Islamism), was a doctor of the sect of Mālik and a mufti of the highest consideration. He studied jurisprudence under Abū Bakr al-Ṭurṭuṣhī, and he learned Traditions from him, Abū 'Abd Allāh Muḥammad Ibn Aḥmad al-Rāzī, and others. The ḥāfiẓ al-Silafī took notes at his lectures and gave Traditions on his authority. He was esteemed one of the most learned doctors of his sect, and the Sultān Şalāḥ al-Dīn studied Mālik's treatise on jurisprudence, the Muwaffī, under him. He composed a number of works and educated many disciples. This doctor was highly respected for his piety and mortified life. He was born A.H. 485 (A.D. 1092), and he died in the month of Şhā'bān, A.H. 581 (November, A.D. 1185).—(Al-Suyūṭī's Ḥuṣn al-Muhaḍḍarah; MS. 652, fol. 118. Al-Y. fi's Annals; MS. 6' ).

[ʿAbd al-Ḥamīd adds the following passage and says in footnote : omitted from MS No. 1.

I reproduce a portion from the writing of al-Qāḍi al-Faḍīl relating to al-Malik al-'Azīz Ibn Ṣalāh al-Dīn, may Allāh show him mercy ; which runs thus : When it was Saturday, 19th Muḥarram, A. H. 595, (21st November, A. C. 1198), the disease of al-Malik al-'Azīz took a serious turn and his life was feared. In the night belching commenced and the pulse began to weaken, and the physician became despaired (of his life) in the morning. When it was the afternoon ; a good news was spread that he had recovered and regained his consciousness. He talked to them who were around him. The Amīrs and the chieftains came to him. Then he (al-Qāḍi) said after that : When the darkness of Sunday night spread, his strength began to fail and belching became severe, the matter worsened, fever became intense, the pulse weakened, unconsciousness became frequent and his death took place in the seventh

* 6 January.—Ed.

† 25 November. But Cairo edition gives Sunday, 20 Muḥarram/21 November. The former is given in the autograph and the Tehran edition.

hour of Sunday night. When it was the end of the night, Fakhr al-Dīn Jihār Kas, (Chahār Kas) Asad al-Dīn Sarāsiṅqar and a party of Mamlūks (slaves) emerged and invited the amīrs who came and learnt of his death. The persons mentioned above said : We were unanimous in our opinion that the eldest son of al-'Azīz whose age was near about ten years and whose name was Muḥammad and whose appellation was Nāṣir al-Dīn should be placed in authority and control of affairs, and that Bahā al-Dīn Qaṣṣūṣh should be his atābak. They said : The Sulṭān had appointed this child his nā'ib (vicegerent) and made Qarāq sh his tutor. We want to gather the amīrs and send the servants conveying to them letter from the Sulṭān as if he was alive. The contents of the letter should be : This my son will be Sulṭān after me, so take oath of allegiance to him and take care to fulfil it for my sake. Thereupon I said to them: If on hearing this message from the Sulṭān, the amīrs demand the Sulṭān, what will you say to them ? So they changed about addressing the amīrs when they would come that the Sulṭān had left a will, and that he had taken the decision. The people were entering to fulfil the promise made to the grandfather and father of this child. Then I said to them : Do not wait for the gathering of all the amīrs, because if all of them assemble, do not be certain that they all would not disagree. On the other hand say to the amīrs who are present : We are unanimous so be with us and we have taken the oath of allegiance so take oath as we have taken. They brought the Qur'ān and were quick to instruct them. The affair went on this plan. When the ceremony of oath taking was over or a larger part of it had been over, they brought the child. When the people saw him, they wept, shrieked and stood before him. All this had taken place before Sunday morning dawned. Then the prescribed morning prayer was offered. Then they commenced the preparation of carrying (the body of) al-Malik al-'Aziz to his grave. His body was washed at the place of his death. The people gathered to say obsequies over him between al-zuhr and al-'aṣr. There was a very large crowd gathered and a warner stood up. They were not free from his burial till the time of sunset. His son was given the title of al-Malik al-Nāṣir after his grandfather's and bears it to this day.]

This event was announced to his uncle al-Malik al-

'Ādil in a letter of consolation addressed to him by al-Qāḍī 'I-Faḍīl, and a passage of which we shall transcribe here : "And we now say, in bidding farewell to the blessing of al-Malik al-'Aziz's existence: There is no power and no might but in God! the words of those who endure with resignation ;—and we say moreover, inasmuch as a blessing still subsisteth among us by the existence of al-Malik al-'Ādil: Praise be to God, the Lord of all creatures! the words of those who utter thanksgiving.—From this unfortunate event has resulted that every heart is broken, and that the extreme of affliction is drawn (down upon us); an occurrence such as this is for every individual (and especially for those who resemble your humble servant), one of death's most effective admonitions,—and how much the more effective when exemplified in the fate of a youthful king! May the mercy and blessing of God be shed over his countenance; and may the Divine favour make easy for him the path to paradise!

And when the beauty of other countenances is effaced (by death), may the earth abstain from obliterating the beauty of his.

Thy humble servant, whilst he thus traces these lines in respectful duty, is undergoing the combined sufferings of mind and body; having pains in the limbs, and sadness parching the heart! he is the more afflicted by the loss of such a master, as it was not long since that he saw the father of that master among the living; each day his grief has been renewed, and the first wound was scarcely healed when it was opened by a second! May God not deprive the Muslims of the consolation which they find in the existence of their sultān al-Malik al-'Ādil! inasmuch as he hath not refused to them a befitting model of patience in the conduct of their blessed Prophet."—Al-Malik al-'Aziz was buried in the lesser Qarāfah, in the sepulchral chapel erected over the grave of the Imam al-Shāfi'ī. His tomb is a conspicuous object in that cemetery.

390. THE SHAYKH 'ADĪ IBN MUSĀFIR AL-HAKKĀRĪ.

The shaykh 'Adī Ibn Musāfir al-Hakkārī was an ascetic, celebrated for the holiness of his life, and the founder of a religious order called after him al-'Adawiyah. His reputation spread to distant countries and the number of his followers increased to an immense multitude. Their belief in his sanctity was so excessive that, in saying their prayers they took him for their qiblah<sup>1</sup> and imagined that, for the next life, they would have in him their most precious treasure and their best support. Before this, he had followed as a disciple [like 'Aqil al-Manahi, Hammād al-Dabbās, Abu 'l-Najīb 'Abd al-Qādir al-Shahrzū I, 'Abd al-Qādir al-Jilī and Abu 'l-Wafā al-Ḥalwānī].<sup>2</sup> a great number of eminent shaykhs and men remarkable for their holiness ; he then retired from the world and fixed his residence in the mountain of the Hakkār tribe, near Mosul, where he built a cell (or monastery) and gained the favour of the people in that country to a degree unexampled in the history of the anchorites. It is said that the place of his birth was a village called Bayt Fār, situated in the province of Ba'labakk, and that the house in which he was born is still visited (as a place of sanctity). He died A.H. 557 (A.D. 1162), or as some say, A.H. 555 in the town where he resided, (in the Hakkārī country), and was interred in the monastery which he had erected. His tomb is much frequented, being considered by his followers as one of the most sacred spots to which a pilgrimage can be made. His descendants continue to wear the same distinctive attire as he did and to walk in his footsteps ; the confidence placed in their merits is equal to that formerly shown to their ancestor, and like him they are treated with profound respect. Abu 'l-Barakāt Ibn al-Mustawfī<sup>1</sup> notices the shaykh 'Adī in his history of Arbela, and places him in the list of those persons who visited that city. Muẓaffar al-Dīn, the sovereign of Arbela, said that, when a boy, he saw the shaykh 'Adī at Mosul : according to him, he was a man of middle size and tawny complexion ; he related also many circumstances indicative of his great sanctity. The shaykh died at the age of ninety years.

391. 'URWAH IBN AL-ZUBAYR.

Abu 'Abd Allāh 'Urwah Ibn al-Zubayr, surnamed al-Quraṣhī al-Asadī (a descendant of Asad and a member of the tribe of Quraysh).

<sup>1</sup> See no. 16, note on qiblah.

<sup>2</sup> Not in the autograph, but added, by 'Abd al-Ḥamid.

was one of the seven great jurisconsults of Madinah, (we have already noticed five of them in this work under the proper heads). His father al-Zubayr Ibn al-'Awwam was one of the ten Companions to whom Muḥammad<sup>o</sup> declared that they should enter paradise. Al-Zubayr was the son of al-'Awwam Ibn Khuwaylid Ibn Asad Ibn 'Abd al-'Uzzā Ibn Quṣayyi Ibn Kilāb (the rest of the genealogy is well known)<sup>1</sup>, and of Ṣafiyah, the paternal aunt of the Prophet. The mother of 'Urwah was Asmā the daughter of Abū Bakr al-Ṣiddīq ; the same who was surnamed Dhāt al-Niṭāqayn (the wearer of the two girdles)<sup>2</sup>, [and designated as one of the old women of paradise.]* 'Urwah was the uterine brother of 'Abd Allāh Ibn al-Zubayr ; the third brother, Muṣ'ab, being born of another woman. He has handed down a particular manner of reading certain words (ḥurūf) of the Qur'ān, and he received Traditions from his maternal aunt, 'Āyishah, the Mother of the faithful, Ibn Shīḥāb al-Zuhrī and others<sup>4</sup> [have given Traditions on his authority]*. 'Urwah was a man of learning and holy life ; when in Syria with al-Walīd Ibn 'Abd al-Malik, a mortification settled in his foot and he was obliged to have it amputated. The operation was performed in the room where al-Walīd was sitting, but as his attention was engaged by persons who were conversing with him, and as 'Urwah made not the slightest movement, he was not aware what was doing till he perceived the smell caused by the hot iron which had been applied to the wound.<sup>5</sup> This fact is mentioned by Ibn Qutaybah in his Kitāb al-Ma'ārif. That same night, 'Urwah did not omit reciting his usual task of pray-

<sup>1</sup> Kilāb was the son of Murrah Ibn Ka'b Ibn Luwayyi Ibn Gh lib Ibn Fīhr Quraysh.

<sup>2</sup> Asmā was called Dhāt al-Niṭāqayan from her having torn her girdle in two that she might tie up with the pieces, the bag of provision and the water-skin which Muḥammad and Abū Bakr were taking with them when they migrated from Makkah to Madinah. Her death occurred A.H. 73 (A.D. 692-3).—(Al-Yāfi'i, Matthew's Mishkāt, Vol. II, p. 745., MS. 855, fol. 13).

<sup>3</sup> I have not been able to discover the origin of this appellation [but this is in the autograph nor in 'Abd al-Hamid.—Ed.]

<sup>4</sup> Read in the printed text: ابن شهاب الزهري وغيره. The other reading, although borne out by manuscripts of good repute, is evidently incorrect [It is not in the autograph.—Ed.]

<sup>5</sup> In eastern countries the stump of the amputated limb is scared with a hot iron or plunged into boiling pitch, in order to stop the hemorrhage.

* شقيق means the brother born of the same father and mother.—Ed.

ers. It is related that when he was making this visit (to Syria), his son Muḥammad died, and that, on return to Madīnah, he merely said: "We have had sufferings in this journey." He survived the amputation of his foot eight years.<sup>1</sup> *[Ishaq Ibn Ayyub, 'Āmir Ibn Ḥafṣ and Salamah Ibn Muḥār'b said: 'Urwah Ibn al-Zubayr came to al-Walīd Ibn 'Abd al-Malik and with him was his son Muḥammad Ibn 'Urwah. Muḥammad entered the enclosure of animals. An animal struck him and he fell dead. A mortification settled in the foot of 'Urwah but he did not omit reciting his usual task of prayers that night. Al-Walīd said to him: Get it amputated otherwise the whole body will become septic. Thereupon he got it amputated with a saw; he was a very old man at that time, there was none to hold him. He said: We have had calamities in this journey. In that very year a party of the Banu 'Ābs came there. Among them there was a blind person. Al-Walīd asked him about his eyes. He said: O Amīr al-Mūminīn! I passed one night in the middle of a valley. I do not know any member of the tribe of 'Ābs possessing more wealth than me. A flood overtook us and carried away my wife, children and wealth except a camel and a new born child. The camel was unruly and got scared. I left the child and followed the camel. I had not gone far when I heard the cries of my son with his head in the mouth of a wolf who was eating it. I went close to the camel to detain him, but he struck me with his leg on my face. The blow deprived me of my eyes. Thus I was left without any wealth, wife, children and eyesight. Al-Walīd said: Take him to 'Urwah so that he may know that there are persons more afflicted than him.

The best condolence was offered to him ('Urwah) by Ibrāhīm Ibn Muḥammad Ibn Ṭalḥah who said: By Allāh! you are not in need of walking, nor of running. One of your limbs and one of your sons have preceded to paradise, and the whole (body) will follow to the parts, if Allāh, be He Great, will. May Allāh preserve for us that of your knowledge and wisdom of which we are in need and which is indispensable (for us). May Allāh benefit you and us with it. Allāh is the Supporter of your reward and Guarantor of your reckoning.

<sup>1</sup> Here a note in the autograph refers the copyists to a taḥrījah, (extract or fly-leaf), containing probably some additional information. This fly-leaf must have been lost at an early period, since its contents have not been inserted in any of the subsequent manuscripts.

* [The paragraph missing in de Slane's manuscripts is given by 'Abd al-Hamid on the authority of 'Abu al-'Abbās al-Mubarrad mentioned in the Kitāb al-Maṣālik. The English translation of the paragraph is given in [ ].—Ed.]

Sa'īd Ibn Asad narrated ; he said : Damrah related to us on the authority of Ibn Shawdhāb ; he said : When it was the time of ripening dates, 'Urwah Ibn al-Zubayr used to make an opening in the wall so the people could enter (the orchard), eat dates and carry them. When he entered it he repeatedly recited this verse :

"If only, when thou enterest the garden, thou hadst said : That which Allāh willeth (will come to pass). There is no strength save in Allāh"<sup>1</sup>.

He continued reciting till he went out of it. He used to read one fourth of al-Qur'ān every day from a scribed copy, and he also recited it in the night prayers. He did not omit it except in the night his foot was amputated. He re-started the practice from the following night.

Ibn Qutaybah and others said : When a butcher (الجزار) was called to amputate it (foot), he (butcher), said to him ('Urwah) : We shall make you drink wine, so that you may not feel pain. Thereupon he said : I shall not take the assistance of a thing forbidden by Allāh in the hope of getting strength. They said : Then we shall make you drink narcotic. He said : I do not like to render any one of my limbs inactive and I shall not feel pain on account of this ; take this into consideration. He (Ibn Qutaybah) said : A party of strangers came in. He said : What are they for ? They said : They will hold you since some times the pain overcomes forbearance. He said : I hope I am sufficient for myself. Then his heel was cut with the knife. When it reached the bone, the saw was placed there and it was amputated while he was saying tahlil and takbīr.<sup>2</sup> Then olive oil was boiled in ladles of iron and he was cauterised by it. He fell in a swoon. Then he regained (consciousness) and he rubbed sweat from his face. When he saw his foot in their hands, he took it and turned it in his hand, then he said :

1 Al-Qur'ān, XVIII, 40.

2 To say : There is no god save Allāh and Allāh is Great. These are formulas of prayer.

By Him Who supported me with thee ! He should know that I did not walk to an unforbidden place; or he said : to sin. When his son entered the stable of al-Walid Ibn 'Abd al-Malik and a beast killed him, nothing was heard from him ('Urwah) about him (son) till he returned to al-Madīnah. Then he said : O Allāh ! for me there were four limbs out of which Thou hast taken one and left three, praise be to Thee. By Al'āh ! if Thou hast taken Thou hast left as well, and if Thou hast afflicted Thou hast kept safe for long.]

On the death of his brother, 'Abd Allāh, he went to 'Abd al-Malik Ibn Marwān and said to him one day : "I wish you to give me the sword which belonged to my brother 'Abd Allāh."—"It is (in the armoury)," answered the Khalīf, "with the other swords, and I should not know it amongst them."—"Let them be brought here," replied 'Urwah, "and I will point it out". By 'Abd al-Malik's orders the swords were brought in, and 'Urwah selected from among them one very much hacked on the edge. "Did you know it before?" said the prince.—"No," replied the other.—"How then have you recognised it?"—"By these words of the poet al-Nābighah :

"Their only fault lies in their swords, which are broken-edged with striking hostile squadrons".

It was this 'Urwah who dug the well at Madīnah which bears his name ; none of the other wells in the city furnish better water than it does. He was born A.H. 22 (A.D. 642-3); but some say A.H. 26. He died A.H. 93 (A.D. 711-2), or A.H. 94, at Fur'a,<sup>1</sup> a village belonging to him and situated near Madīnah. Fur'a was also the place of his internment, according to (Muḥammad) Ibn Sa'd. The year 94 was called the year of the jurisconsults.<sup>2</sup> We shall speak of his son Hishām.—The following anecdote is related by (Abū 'Abd al-Raḥmān Muḥammad) al-'Utbi : 'Abd al-Malik Ibn Marwān, 'Abd Allāh Ibn al-Zubayr, and his two brothers Muṣ'ab and 'Urwah were assembled together within the precincts of the Sacred Temple (at Makkah) at the time in which they acknowledged the authority of Mu'āwiyah Ibn Abī Sufyān,<sup>1</sup> when one of them exclaimed : " Come, let us each make a wish."<sup>2</sup> On this 'Abd Allāh Ibn al-Zubayr said : " My wish is to possess the two Holy Cities and obtain the Khalifate."—" Mine," said Muṣ'ab, " is to possess the two 'Irāqs and to have for wives the two pearls of the tribe of Quraysh, Sukaynah the daughter of al-Ḥusayn<sup>3</sup> and 'Āyishah, the daughter of Ṭalḥah<sup>4</sup> ."—" My wish," said 'Abd al-Malik, " is to possess all the earth and succeed to Mu'āwiyah."—"Urwah then said : " I care not for those things which you desire ; my wish is self-mortification in this life, the possession of paradise in the next, and the honour of being one of those whose authority will be cited as transmitters of the science of the law." The vicissitudes of time effected at length the fulfilment of their wishes; and 'Abd al-Malik Ibn Marwān used to say : " If any one has a desire to see a man (who will be) one of the inhabitants of paradise, let him look at 'Urwah Ibn al-Zubayr."

<sup>1</sup> The author of the Mar'īd says: Fur'a, pronounced by some Furu'a, is the name of a village in the canton of al-Rabadhah, and on the road leading to Makkah. It lies at the distance of eight posts برد from Madinah, or, it is said four days' journey.—He says of al-Rabadhah الربذه that it is a village three miles اميال from Madinah.—Here for اميال miles, we must perhaps read الليال nights.

<sup>2</sup> See no. 114.

392. RUKN AL-DĪN AL-ṬAWŪSĪ

Abu 'l-Faḍl al-'Irāqī Ibn Muḥammad Ibn al-'Irāqī al-Qazwīnī, surnamed Rukn al Dīn (column of the faith), and generally known by the appellation of al-Ṭawūsī, was an imām of great abilities and a controvertist of the highest order. He studied controversy under the Ḥanifite doctor Raḍī al-Dīn al-Naysāpūrī,<sup>5</sup> the author of the

1 The precise period of this event is uncertain.

2 It is supposed by Muslims that the wishes made in the temple of Makkah are generally fulfilled.

3 See no. 256.

4 'Āyishah was the daughter of Ṭalḥah Ibn 'Ubayd Allāh al-Taymī and of Umm Kulthūm, the daughter of the khalif Abū Bakr. On her marriage with Muṣ'ab Ibn al-Zubayr, her husband settled on her a dowry of one hundred thousand dīnārs. She died A.H. 123 (A.D. 740-1).—(Nujūm).

5 It appears from the Ṭabaqāt al-Ḥanafiyah that Raḍī al-Dīn al-Naysāpūrī composed two works, the Ṭarīqah fi 'l-Khilāf and the Makārim al-Aḥlāq. Ḥajjī Khalīfah notices them both, but furnishes no information respecting their author. I do not think that this doctor was the same person as the Muwaiyad al-Naysāpūrī surnamed Raḍī al-Dīn, whose life is given by Ibn Khalīkān.

Ṭarīqat fi 'l-Khilaaf (system of controversy), and attained great skill in this science. He drew upon it three Ta'liqahs, one of them an abridgment, the other a Medium treatise, and the third a full exposition. Students flocked to Hamadān from countries far and near, that they might place themselves under the tuition of such a master, and it was by them that his Ta'liqahs were put down in writing. A college called the Hājibiyah was built for him at Hamadān by the hājib, or chamberlain Jamāl al-Dīn.<sup>1</sup> His Medium treatise is better than the two others, because he displays in it more legal knowledge and furnishes more abundant information; at the present day, this work is more generally studied than any other on the same subject. The reputation of the author spread abroad, and his systems of controversy were introduced into distant countries. He died at Hamadān on the 14th of the latter Jumādā, A.H. 600 (February, A.D. 1204)*.—I do not know, neither does al-Sam'ānī mention, the derivation of the word Ṭawūsī but I have heard a number of jurisconsults, who were his fellow-countrymen, say that this surname is borne by a great many persons in Qazwīn, and that they all claim to be descended from the ṭabi'; Ṭawūs Ibn Kaysān (no. 285); al-Ṭawūsī may perhaps be one of those.

393. SHAYDHALAH

Abu 'l-Ma'ālī 'Azīz Ibn 'Abd al-Malik Ibn Maṣṣūr al-Jīlī<sup>2</sup> generally known by the name of Shaydhalah, was an able doctor of

---

<sup>1</sup> Hamadān ceased to be the capital of 'Irāq on the fall of the Seljūq dynasty there, A.H. 590. It was most probably before that year that the chamberlain Jamāl al-Dīn built the college in question. He must therefore have been in the service of the sultān Arsilān, who died A.H. 571, or of his son Ṭuḡhrīl, who fell in the battle with Tukush Khān, sultān of Khwarezm, A.H. 590

<sup>2</sup> See no. 378, note on Jīlī.

* 18 February.—Ed.

the sect of al-Shāfi'i and an eminent preacher; highly distinguished by the elegance of his language, the unction of his style, and his well-stored memory. He drew up some works on jurisprudence, the principles of the Muslim religion, and pulpit oratory; he collected also a great quantity of poetry composed by the Arabs of the desert. The place of qāḍī in the suburb of al-Azaj at Baghdād was filled by him for some time, and he was remarkable for the perspicacity of his judgment. He had learned a great quantity of Traditions from many masters, and he professed openly the doctrines of al-Ash'arī. One of his sayings was this: "It was said to Moses: "Thou shalt not see me <sup>1</sup>, because he was told to look at the mountain and did so. Then it was said to him: O thou who seekest to see us, why look at any thing else?"<sup>1</sup> He recited, on this idea also, the following verses:

"O you who pretend, in word, to be a sincere friend and brother; did you say the truth, you would not look at any other but me! You have walked the path of one who loved me, but you chose another object for the sincerity of your attachment; shame! how can a heart love equally two persons?"

[ 'Abd al-Hamid adds and the same is found in the Autograph :

He said : My father recited before me at the time of his emergence from Baghdād for performing pilgrimage.

"I stretched an infirm hand to bid farewell.

And the other is on intense heat above my heart.

May not this covenant be the last of our covenants ;

And may not this farewell be the last one ].

Shayḍhalah died at Baghdād on Friday, the 17th of Ṣafar, A.H. 494 (December, A.D. 1100)*, and was interred outside the Ābrez Gate, opposite the tomb of Abū Ishāq al-Shīrāzī.—Shayḍhalah was a surname which he received, but its signification is unknown to me.

<sup>1</sup> Qur'ān, surat 7, verse 139-

* 21 December.—Ed.

394. 'AṬĀ IBN ABĪ RABĀḤ

Abu Muḥammad 'Aṭā Ibn Abī Rabāḥ Aslam (or Salīm) Ibn Ṣafwān was a mulatto, born at al-Janād, and a mawlā to the Fihri family of Makkah, or to the family of Jumāḥ: some, however consider him as a mawlā to Abu Maysarah al-Fihri. He held a high rank at Makkah as a jurisconsult, a ṭābi', and a devout ascetic, and he derived (his knowledge of the law and the Traditions) from the lips of Jābir Ibn 'Abd Allāh al-Anṣārī, 'Abd Allāh Ibn 'Abbās (no. 43, Note), 'Abd Allāh Ibn al-Zubayr, and many others of Muḥammad's Companions. His own authority as a traditionist was cited by 'Amr Ibn Dīnār (no. 249, note), al-Zuhri,<sup>2</sup> Qatādah,<sup>3</sup> Mālik Ibn Dīnār,<sup>4</sup> al-Ā'mash (no. 259), al-Awzā'i (no. 336), and a great number of others who had heard him teach. The office of mufti at Makkah devolved to him and to Mujāhid (no. 249, note) and was filled by them whilst they lived. Qatādah declared him to be the most learned of all men in the rites of the pilgrimage, and Ibrāhīm Ibn 'Umar Ibn Kaysān said: "I remember that, in the time of Umayyids, a crier was ordered by them to proclaim to the pilgrims that no one should apply for farwās to any person but 'Aṭā Ibn Abī Rabāḥ." It is to him that the poet alludes in these lines:

"Ask the mufti of Makkah if it be a crime in him whose heart is inflamed with love, to visit the object of his passion and clasp her in his arms?—The mufti replied: 'God forbid that piety should refuse to bleeding hearts the means of closing their wounds.' "

When these two verses were repeated to him, he exclaimed (with great simplicity): "By Allāh! I never said any such thing". It has been handed down by doctors of our sect (the Shāfi'ite) that 'Aṭā held it lawful to have commerce with female slaves when their masters authorised it; and Abu 'l-Futūḥ al-'Ijlī (no. 87) inserts

1 Abū 'Abd Allāh Jābir Ibn 'Abd Allāh al-Salamī al-Anṣārī (a member of the tribe of Salimah and one of the Anṣār) embraced Islāmism one year before the first pact made with Muḥammad at al-'Aqabah (Abulfeda Annals, tom. I p. 53). and was present at the second. He died A.H. 78 (A.D. 697-98), aged ninety-four years. (Nujūm Sayar al-Salaf).

2 The life of al-Zuhri will be found amongst those of the Muḥammads. [No. 537.—Ed.]

3 The life of Qatādah is given by Ibn Khalikān. [no. 516.—Ed.]

4 The life will be found in this work. [no. 525.—Ed.]

the following observation on this subject in his elucidation of the obscure passages in the Waslī and the Wajīz, where he explains the third chapter of the section on deposits: "It is related that 'Aṭā sent his female slaves to his guests." But in my opinion this is highly improbable, for even were it considered lawful, jealousy and manly feelings would prevent it; and how could an illustrious Imām like him be even suspected of such a thing: my only motive for speaking of it here is the singularity of the doctrine itself. 'Aṭā was black in colour, blind of an eye, flat-nosed, having the use of only one arm, lame of a leg, and woolly-haired; when advanced in life he lost the use of his sight. Sulaymān Ibn Rafī' said: "I went into the Sacred Mosque and saw all the people assembled around some person, and on looking to see who it was, behold! there was 'Aṭā sitting on the ground and looking like a black crow".* He died A. H. 115 (A.C. 733-4);

---

* The following passage is not found in the autograph nor in de Slane, but it is found in Cairo edition of 1948:

It is related on the authority of Waki'; he said: Abū Ḥanīfah al-Nu'mān Ibn Thābit said to me; "I committed mistakes five times in performing the rituals of ḥajj at Makkah, and a barber taught me the correct way of performing them. When I wanted to get my head shaved, he asked me if I was an A'rābi. I replied in the affirmative and he had put me this question because I had enquired him as to what he would charge for it. He had said to me that no bargaining was made about the performance of the rituals of ḥajj. He asked me to sit down and I sat down turning my face from the direction of qiblah. He pointed out to me that I was to turn my face towards the qiblah. Then I wanted to get my head shaved from the left side. He asked me to turn my head to the right side. I turned my head accordingly and he began to shave my head and I remained silent. Then he asked me to recite Takbīr (to say Allāh Akbar: Allāh is Great). I complied with it till I got up to depart. He asked me whither I wanted to go. I replied that I wanted to start on my journey. Then he asked me to offer two rak'ahs before departure. Then I thought that it could not be if the barber had no knowledge. So I put a question to him wherefrom he had acquired that knowledge. He replied that he had seen 'Aṭā Ibn Abi Rībāh doing like wise."

It is stated on the authority of Khalīfah Ibn Sallam, on the authority of Yūnus; he said; "One day I heard al-Ḥasan al-Baṣrī saying that those were three characteristics of a hypocrite. When he talked he spoke lies and when some say 114, at the age of eighty-eight years. It is related, however, by Ibn Abi Laylā,<sup>1</sup> that 'Aṭā performed the pilgrimage seventy times and lived to the age of one hundred. Al-Janad is the name of a wellknown town in Yaman which has produced many learned men.
(Continued on page 250)

[This note refers to the word "thing" in line 12 from bottom on page 248.—Ed.]

In the autograph the word شيء is written with a ḍammah on the last letter, which indicates it to be in the nominative case. Were this reading admitted, the verse would signify: "God forbid that the closing up of the wounds in bleeding hearts should destroy piety"; and the point of the anecdote would be lost.

395 AL-MUQANNA' AL-KHURĀSĀNĪ

Al-Muqanna' al-Khurāsānī (the veiled imposter of Khurāsān), whose real name was 'Aṭā, but whose father's name is unknown to me, began his life as a fuller at Marw. Having acquired some knowledge of (natural) magic and incantations, he pretended to be something was entrusted to him, he misappropriated it, and when he made a promise, he did not keep it. When it reached 'Aṭā, he said that all these characteristics were present in the sons of Jacob. They talked and spoke lies when entrusted with something, embezzled it and they did not keep the promise when made it. Ultimately Allāh raised them to prophethood. It reached al-Ḥasan who remarked and over every lord of knowledge there is one more knowing.' "

(Continued from page 249)

It is difficult to accept these statements as genuine as they are not included in the autograph nor in de Slane's edition.

As regards the statement ascribed to al-Ḥasan al-Baḡrī is based on several *Ḥadīth*es (see Ṣaḥīḥ al-Bu ḥārī Leyde edition, Vol. I, p. 16; Ṣaḥīḥ al-Muslīm, Karachi edition, Vol. I, p. 56).

<sup>1</sup> This is the Muḥammad Ibn Abi Laylā whose life will be found further on. He must not be confounded with the 'Abd al-Raḥmān Ibn Abi Laylā whose life has been given (no. 335), and who was his father.

* Al-Qur'ān, Sūrah 12, verse 76.

animated by the divinity, which had passed to him by transmigration, and he said to his partisans and followers: "Almighty God entered into the figure of Adam, and it was for that reason that He told the angels to adore Adam, and they adored him except Iblis, who proudly refused,<sup>1</sup> and who thus justly merited the divine wrath. From the figure of Adam, God passed into that of Noah, and from Noah to each of the prophets successively, and of the sages, till he appeared in the figure of Abū Muslim al-Khurāsānī (no. 347) from whom he passed into me". His assertions having obtained belief with some people, they adored him and took up arms in his defence, notwithstanding the horrible extravagance of his pretensions and the deformity of his person. He was low in stature, ill made, blind of an eye, and a stutterer; he never let his face be seen, but always veiled it with a mask of gold, and it was from this circumstance that he received his name. The influence which he exercised over the minds of his followers were acquired by the delusive miracles which he wrought in their sight by means of magic and incantations. One of the deceptions which he exhibited to them was the image of a moon, which rose so as to be visible to the distance of a two months journey, after which it set; and he thus inspired them with the firmest belief in his words. It is to this moon that Abu 'l-'Alā al-Ma'arri (no. 46) alludes the following lines:

"Awake (from the delusions of love)! that full moon<sup>2</sup> whose head is shrouded in a veil is a false and delusive object, like the moon of the veiled impostor."

This verse forms part of a long Qasidah, Abu 'l-Qāsim Hibat Allāh Ibn Sinā al-Mulk, another poet whose life we shall give in this work, speaks of this moon also in a long poem of his, where he says:

"Beware! the veiled (impostor's) rising moon is not more pregnant with magic than the glances of that turbaned moon".

When the reputation of al-Muqanna's conduct became public, the people rose up against him and laid siege to the castle which

1 Qur'ān, sūrah 2, verse 32.

2 In poetry a full moon means a handsome face.

served him as a place of refuge. Perceiving that death was inevitable, he assembled his women and gave them a poisoned drink; after which he swallowed a draught of the same liquor and expired. On entering the castle, the Muslims put all his followers to the sword. This occurred A. H. 163 (A. C. 779-80): may God's curse be upon him! and may God protect us from deceptions! I never found the name or the situation of this castle mentioned by any person, till I read in Shihāb al-Dīn (Yāqūt) al-Ḥamawī's<sup>1</sup> work, wherein he treats of the places which bear the same name, that there are four places called Sanām,* and that one of them, situated in Transoxiana, had been inhabited by al-Muqanna' al-Khārījī (the heretic rebel). This appears to be the castle in question. I have since found, in the history of Khurāsān, that it is the very one, and that it is situated in the canton of Kash<sup>2</sup>.

396 'IKRIMAH

Abū 'Abd Allāh 'Ikrimah Ibn 'Abd 'Allāh, a mawlā of 'Abd Allāh Ibn 'Abbās, drew his origin from the Berbers of Maghrib. He belonged first to al-Ḥusayn Ibn al-Ḥirr<sup>3</sup> al-Ambārī, by whom he was given to Ibn 'Abbās, who was then governor of Baṣrah<sup>4</sup> for 'Alī Ibn Abī Ṭālib. His new master took great pains in teaching him the Qur'ān and the Sunnah and gave him (the) Arabic names (by which he was thenceforward known). 'Ikrimah transmitted Traditions on the authority of Ibn 'Abbās, 'Abd Allāh Ibn 'Umar (no. 299

1 His life is given by Ibn Khallikān.

2 Kash lies in Transoxiana. I feel it necessary to make an observation on the passage commencing with I never found the name. It has been added in the margin of the autograph by Ibn Khallikān himself, but this last phrase, I have since found in the history of Khurāsān etc., does not exist in that manuscript, although given in others. I merely notice the fact here, reserving my conclusion for another occasion.

3 The autograph has العمر.

4 See (no. 288), and note.

* de Slane gives Sanān.—Ed.

and 249n). 'Abd Allāh Ibn 'Amr Ibn al-Āṣi<sup>1</sup>, Abu Hurayrah (no. 250n) Abū Sa'id al-Khudri,<sup>2</sup> al-Ḥasan Ibn 'Alī Ibn Abī Ṭālib, and 'Āyishah. He was one of the principal tābi'is and jurisconsults of Makkah (but) he was constantly removing from one town to another. It is related that Ibn 'Abbās himself had ordered him to go forth and give fatwās to the people. Sa'id Ibn Jubayr (no. 249) having been asked if he knew of any person more learned than himself, answered: "'Ikrimah". The Khārijite opinions held by 'Ikrimah exposed him to the animadversion of the public. He taught Traditions (as has been just said) on the authority of a number of Muḥammad's Companions, and Traditions were given on his authority by al-Zuhri, 'Amr Ibn Dinār (no. 255n), al-Sha'bi (no. 296) Abū Ishāq al-Sabi'<sup>3</sup> and others. His master Ibn 'Abbās died without giving him his liberty, and 'Alī, the son of Ibn 'Abbās, sold him to Khālid Ibn Yazid Ibn Mu'awiyah for four thousand dinārs, but 'Ikrimah went to him and said: "There is no good in you; you have sold your father's earning for four thousand dinārs". On this 'Alī obtained Khālid's consent to annul the bargain, and granted 'Ikrimah his liberty. 'Abd Allāh Ibn al-Ḥārith relates as follows: "I went to visit 'Alī the son of 'Abd Allāh Ibn 'Abbās, and I saw 'Ikrimah tied up at 1 'Abd Allāh the son of 'Amr Ibn al-Āṣi embraced Islamism previously to his father's conversion, and obtained permission from the Prophet to write to his parent and inform him of the doctrines of his new faith. He was only thirteen years younger than his father, and he often reproached him for his turbulent and seditious conduct. By his profound devotion and learning he obtained general respect, and he died A. H. 72, (A. C. 691-2), at the age of seventy-two years. The place of his death is not known with certainty; some authorities say Syria, and others, Egypt or Makkah or Ṭā'if. Talqīḥ MS. No. 361, fol. 40).

2 Abū Sa'id Sa'd Ibn Mālik Ibn Sinān Ibn Tha'lab al-Khudri (of the tribe of Khudrah) was one of Muḥammad's Companions and an anṣar of the third class. At the age of thirteen years he took up arms for the Prophet and accompanied his father to 'Uḥud. When the Muslim troops were passed in review before the battle, he was found to be too young and sent back. The father fell at 'Uḥud, and the son afterwards accompanied the Prophet in twelve of his expeditions. He died at Madinah, A. H. 74 (A. C. 693-4), and was interred in the Baqi' cemetery. Nujūm. Siyar al-Salaf. Talqīḥ.

3 The life of al-Sabi' is given in this work.

the door of a privy, on which I said: 'Is it thus that you treat your slave?' To which he replied: 'Know that that fellow has told lies of my father'." 'Ikrimah died A. H. 107 (A. C. 725-6); others say 106, or 105, or 115; he was then aged eighty or eighty-four years. Muḥammad Ibn Sa'd<sup>1</sup> relates the following circumstances on the authority of al-Wāqidi<sup>2</sup> who states that he learned them from Khālīd Ibn al-Qāsim al-Bayāḍi: "'Ikrimah and the poet Kuthayyir, the lover of 'Azzah, died in the year 105 and on the same day; in the afternoon, funeral prayers were said over them at the usual place; I was present at the ceremony, and the people said: 'Our most learned jurisconsult and our best poet are dead.'"' They both died at Madīnah, but some state, erroneously however, that 'Ikrimah's death took place at al-Qayrawān. 'Ikrimah was much addicted to travelling in distant countries, and he visited, amongst other places, Khurāsān, Ispahān, and Egypt. The primitive signification of the word 'Ikrimah is a hen-pigeon but it was subsequently employed as a proper name for persons. 'Umārah Ibn Ḥamzah, the mawlā of al-Manṣūr, so noted for his vanity,<sup>3</sup> and was descended from 'Ikrimah; according to the Khaytib (no. 33), he was the son of 'Ikrimah's daughter<sup>4</sup>.

1 "the life of Muḥammad Ibn Sa'd will be found in this work.

2 The life of al-Wāqidi will be found further on.

3 'Umārah Ibn Ḥamzah Ibn Mālik Ibn Yazid Ibn 'Abd Allāh, a mawlā to Al-'Abbās Ibn 'Abd al-Mālik, was a kātib in the service of the khālif al-Manṣūr, who entrusted him with the receivership of the revenues of Baḡrah. His style was remarkable for purity and elegance, and his liberality unbounded. He carried his vanity, however, to so great an extreme, that it was proverbially said: "such a one is vainer than 'Umārah Ibn Ḥamzah". Some persons obtained from him a gift of one hundred thousand dirhims, and when he was informed by his chamberlain that they had come to thank him for his generosity, he answered: "Tell them that I have delivered them from the opprobrium of poverty, and shall not impose upon them the burden of gratitude." Numerous other anecdotes are related of his excessive vanity. A palace in Baghdād called the hotel of 'Umārah (dār 'Umārah) was so called after him. He died A. H. 199 (A.C. 814-5). (Abridged History of Baghdād by the Khaytib No. 634, fol. 6 et 146. Al-Nujūm al-Zāhirah, in anno). Some anecdotes respecting him will be found in this work.

4 Read ابن ايمته عكرمه -

397 ZAYN AL-'ĀBIDĪN

Abu 'l-Ḥasan 'Alī, the son of al-Ḥusayn, the son of 'Alī Ibn Abī Ṭālib, is generally known by the appellation of Zayn al-'Ābidīn. (the ornament of the adorers), but was sometimes designated as 'Alī the Less. As none of the other children of al-Ḥusayn left issue, all his descendants are sprung from this son. Zayn al-'Ābidīn is one of the twelve imāms, and ranks among the principal Tābi'īs. It was observed by al-Zuhrī that he never met a member of the tribe of Quraysh possessing nobler qualities than he. His mother Sulāfah was daughter to Yazdegird, the last of the kings of Persia, and she was aunt to the mother of Yazid Ibn al-Walid the Omayyide, surnamed al-Nāqīṣ. When Qutaybah Ibn Muslim al-Bāhili, the lieutenant-governor of Khurāsān, had overthrown the royal dynasty of Persia and Fayrūz the son of Yazdegird, he sent the two daughters of the latter to al-Ḥajjāj Ibn Yūsuf al-Thaqafī (no. 144), who was then governor of 'Irāq and Khurāsān. Al-Ḥajjāj kept one of them for himself and sent the other, whose name was Shāh Farīd, to al-Walid Ibn 'Abd al-Malik, and she bore him his son Yazid, who was afterwards surnamed al-Nāqīṣ (the diminisher), because he diminished the donations, or pay, granted to the troops. Zayn al-'Ābidīn was also called Ibn al-Khayratayn (the son of the two preferred ones), because the Prophet<sup>ﷺ</sup> had said: "Of all the human race, Almighty God has preferred two (families); the tribe of Quraysh amongst the 'Arabs, and the Persians amongst the foreign nations". Abu 'l-Qāsim al-Zamakhsharī relates the following circumstance in his work entitled Rabī' al-Abrār: "Amongst the number of the Persian captives brought to Madīnah by the Companions, in the *kh*alīfate of 'Umar Ibn al-Khaṭṭāb, were three daughters of Yazdegird. When they had sold the other prisoners, 'Umar ordered them to sell the daughters of Yazdegird also, but 'Alī said: 'The daughters of kings are not to be treated as those of the common people.' 'And what must be done with them?' said 'Umar — 'Alī replied: "Let a price be set upon them, to be paid by him who wishes to possess them", 'This proposal having received 'Umar's consent, 'Alī brought them all, and gave one of them to 'Abd Allāh Ibn

'Umar, another to his own son al-Ḥusayn, and the third to his ward Muḥammad, the son of Abū Bakr al-Ṣiddiq. 'Abd Allāh's concubine bore him a son named Sālim, al-Ḥusayn's bore Zayn al-ʿĀbidīn, and Muḥammad's bore al-Qāsim. These three children were cousins by their others' side, and their mothers were daughters to Yazdegird<sup>1</sup>. Al-Mubarrad gives the following anecdote in his Kāmil: "A man of the tribe of Quraysh, whose name was not mentioned to me, made a relation which I here give: I used to sit in company with Sa'īd Ibn al-Musayyab (no. 250), and he asked me one day who were my maternal uncles? to which I replied that my mother was a slave-girl. It seemed to me that this answer diminished his regard for me, but I waited for some time, and Sālim, the son of 'Abd Allāh, the son of 'Umar Ibn al-Khaṭṭāb entered. When he withdrew, I said: 'Pray, sir, who is that?' 'Good God!' exclaimed he, how is it possible that you do not know so eminent a person of your own tribe? why? that is Sālim, the son of 'Abd Allāh, the son of 'Umar Ibn al-Khaṭṭāb.' 'And who,' said I, 'was his mother?' 'A slave-girl', was his reply. Then came in Qāsim, the son of Muḥammad Ibn Abī Bākr, who sat down for some time and then retired. 'Pray sir,' said I, 'who is that?' 'How' exclaimed he, 'you do not know so eminent person of your own family? how very strange! why, that is al-Qāsim the son of Muḥammad Ibn Abī Bakr al-Ṣiddiq.' 'And who,' said I, 'was his mother?' 'A slave girl'. I waited yet longer, and 'Alī, the son of al-Ḥusayn, the son of 'Alī Ibn Abū Ṭālib entered. When he went away, I said to Ibn al-Musayyab: 'Pray, sir, who is that?' 'That is a person', replied he, 'whom it is impossible for a Muslim not to know; that is 'Alī, the son of al-Ḥusayn, the son of 'Alī Ibn Abī Ṭālib!' 'Who was his mother?' said I. 'A slave girl'! he replied. On this I addressed him in these terms: 'I remarked, sir, that your regard for me was lessened when you learned that my mother was a slave-girl; but do not these persons resemble me in the same respect?' From that moment I acquired increased favour in the sight of al-Musayyab". The people of Madīnah had a dislike to taking concubines, but their feelings on this point were completely changed when 'Alī, the son of al-Ḥusayn, al-Qāsim the son of Muḥammad, and Sālīm the son of 'Abd Allāh grew up and surpassed every person in the city by their piety and their knowledge of the law. Ibn Qutaybah mentions, in his Kitāb al-Ma'ārif, that Zayn al-Ābidīn's mother was a native of Sind and that her name was Sulāfah; others however call her Ghazālah, and God knows best which is right. Zayn al-Ābidīn was most attentive to his mother, and it was said to him: "You are certainly a most dutiful son, but why do we not see you eat out of the same dish with her?" To which he replied: "Because I should be afraid that in stretching forth my hand to take a morsel, that morsel might be one on which she had already cast her eyes; and I should have thus committed an undutiful act". The story of Abū 'l-Mikhash with his son<sup>1</sup> is quite the contrary of the foregoing, for he said: "I had a daughter who sat at table with me, and put forth a hand like a bunch of dates, joined to an arm (long and white) like the crown-bud of the palm-tree, and she never cast her eyes on a good morsel without offering it to me. I found a husband for her, and I had after that a son who sat with me at table, and put forth a hand (broad and black) like the scale<sup>2</sup> of a palm-tree, joined to an arm like the cross post of tent-frame; and, by Allāh! he never cast his eyes on a nice bit, but his hand had already seized it." Ibn Qutaybah says in his Kitāb al-Ma'ārif that on the death of Zayn al-Ābidīn's father, his mother married Zubayd,<sup>3</sup> his father's mawlā and he himself enfranchised one of his slave-girls and married her. The conduct drew upon him a letter of reproaches from 'Abd al-Malik Ibn Marwān, but he replied to it in these words: "Ye have in the apostle of God an excellent example,"<sup>4</sup> and he manumitted and married Ṣafīyah

<sup>1</sup> This is in contradiction with Ibn Khallikān's own statement.

1 Read ابنه مع ابنه .

2 What is meant by the scale of the palm-tree is the broad excrescence on the trunk to which the stem of the leaf was attached, and which remains when the leaf falls off.

3 Read in the printed text يزيد -

4 Qur'an, sūrat 33, verse 21.

the daughter of Huyayyi Ibn Akḥṭab; he manumitted also Zayd Ibn Ḥārithah and gave him in marriage Zaynab Bint Jahsh the daughter of his paternal aunt". The merits and excellencies of Zayn al-Ābidīn are beyond enumeration. He was born on a Friday, in one of the months of A. H. 38 (A.C. 658-9); he died at Madinah, A. H. 94 (A.C. 712-3), some say 96 [or 92], and was interred in the cemetery of al-Baqī', in the tomb of his uncle al-Ḥasan Ibn 'Alī. The mausoleum in which they are deposited contains also the tomb of al-'Abbās.

398 'ALĪ AL-RIDĀ

Abu 'l Ḥasan 'Alī al-Ridā,<sup>1</sup> the son of Mūsā al-Kāẓim, the son of Ja'far al-Šādiq, the son of Muḥammad al-Bāqir, the son of 'Alī Zayn al-Ābidīn, him whose life has been just given, is considered by (that sect of the Shi'ites called) the Imāmites as one of the twelve imāms. Al-Māmūn married him to his daughter Umm Ḥabīb,* and having nominated him successor to the Khalifate, he caused his name to be inscribed (as such) on the gold and silver coinage. In executing this resolution, al-Māmūn proceeded in the following manner: When in the city of Marw, he had a census taken of all the male and female descendants of al-'Abbās, and found that their number was thirty-three thousand, old and young.<sup>2</sup> He then sent for 'Alī (al-Ridā), and having granted him a most honourable reception, he convoked the principal officers of the empire and informed them that, after examining throughout the descendants of al-'Abbās and those of 'Alī Ibn Abī Ṭālib, he did not find amongst them a more excellent person than 'Alī (al-Ridā), nor one better entitled to the empire.

1 Al-Ridā signifies the accepted, the pleasing. This surname was given to him by al-Māmūn on nominating him successor to the empire. Abu 'l-Fidā says that the full title was: al-Ridā min 'Āl Muḥammad, which Reske has rendered by communibus votis electus vir de gentilitate Muhammedis, but I believe it to mean acceptissimus apud Deum vir de gentilitate Muhammedis.

2 This seems to be an exaggeration.

* [in the year H. 202] written on the margin of the autograph supported by Cairo edition.—Ed.

He then declared him his successor, and ordered the black standards and livery (of the 'Abbasides) to be suppressed. When intelligence of these proceedings reached those descendants of al-'Abbās who were in 'Irāq, they felt that resolute measures were necessary to prevent the supreme authority from passing out of the hands of their family, and they in consequence pronounced the deposition of al-Māmūn and took the oath of fealty to his uncle, Ibrāhīm Ibn al-Mahdī, whom they declared khalif. This event took place on Thursday, the 5th of Muḥarram A. H. 202 (25th July, A. C. 817); some say, however, that it occurred in A. H. 203. It would be too long to relate the particulars of this event, the results of which are well known; we have besides given a summary sketch of them in the life of Ibrāhīm Ibn al-Mahdī (no. 8). 'Alī al-Riḍā was born at Madīnah, on a Friday, in the year 153 (A. C. 770), but this is contradicted by other statements, which place his birth in A. H. 151, on the 7th or 8th of Shawwāl, or on the 6th of that month.* He died in the city of Ṭūs on the last day of Ṣafar, A. H. 202 (September A. C. 817),† or according to others, on the 5th of Dhu 'l-Ḥijjah, or the 13th of Dhu 'l-Qa'dah, A. H. 203 (May, A. C. 819)‡. Al-Māmūn said the funeral service over him and had him buried near the tomb of his own father al-Rashīd. His death was caused by eating too many grapes; but some attribute it to a slow poison. It is of him that Abū Nuwās speaks in the following lines:

"People said to me: You are the ablest of all men in the various styles of noble discourse; your eulogies expressed, in admirable verse, are a blossom filling the hand of him who culls it with a fruit of pearls. Why then have you neglected to celebrate the son of Mūsā and extol the noble qualities united in his person?" My answer was: "I am unable to utter praises suited to the merits of an imām to whose father (the angel) Gabriel acted as a servant!."

1 The poet means the imām's forefather Muḥammad, to whom Gabriel was sent with the different passages of the Qur'ān.

* 25, 24 or 23 October 768.—Ed.

† 16 September.—Ed.

‡ 4 or 12 May.—Ed.

He composed these verses because one of his companions had said to him : "I never saw a more shameless fellow than you ; there is not a sort of wine nor beast of chase but you have made some verses on it ; and here is 'Alī Ibn Mūsā al-Riḍā, living in your own time, and yet you have never noticed him." To this Abū Nuwās replied : "By Allāh ! my silence has no other motive than the respect I bear him ; it befits not a person of my rank to compose verses on a man like him". Some time after this, he recited the piece here given. The following lines were pronounced by him also in praise of al-Riḍā,<sup>1</sup> (and mention is made of the circumstance (by Ibn al-Jawzī) in the Shudhūr al-'Uqūd under the year 201 or 202).

"The immaculate (descendants of 'Alī), the pure of heart ! whenever their name is pronounced, benedictions accompany it. He whose descent you cannot trace up to 'Alī, has no title to boast of ancient ancestry. When God created and established the world, he made you pure, O mortals ! and chose you for His own ; but you (sons of 'Alī) are the noblest of mankind ; it is you who possess the knowledge of (God's) book and of the meaning conveyed by its sūras<sup>2</sup>"

Al-Māmūn said one day to 'Alī Ibn Mūsā ; "What do your brethren say of our grandfather al-'Abbās Ibn 'Abd al-Muṭṭalib" ? "That", replied 'Alī, which they ought to say of a man (so highly favoured) that, when God imposed on his creatures obedience to the Prophet<sup>3</sup>, He prescribed to the Prophet<sup>3</sup> the duty of obedience towards him<sup>3</sup>". On receiving this answer, al-Māmūn ordered, him a present of one million dirhims. His brother Zayd Ibn Mūsā having revolted at Baṣrah against al-Māmūn and given the inhabitants a prey to violence and rapine,

1 The phrase which follows is written in the margin of the autograph, but has been scored out.

2 Some of the Shī'ite sects believe that every verse of the Qur'ān has not only a literal, but a hidden meaning ; which last is known to their imām alone.

3 This precept is not in the Qur'ān. The author of the Majma' al-Aḥbāb (MS, fonds St. Germain, No. 131) states, in his life of al-'Abbās, that the Prophet treated him with the deference and respect due to a parent.

this khalif sent 'Alī Ibn Mūsā to turn him from his evil course. On meeting him 'Alī said: "Woe be to thee, O Zayd! thou hast treated the Muslims of Baṣrah most cruelly, and yet thou callest thyself a son of Fāṭimah, the daughter of the Prophet<sup>ﷺ</sup>. By Allāh! the Prophet<sup>ﷺ</sup> himself is thy greatest foe. Know that he who pretends to derive honourable qualities from God's Prophet<sup>ﷺ</sup> should manifest the same to others!". When this discourse was related to al-Māmūn, he burst into tears and exclaimed: "It is thus that all the members of the Prophet's family should be!" The last words of 'Alī Ibn Mūsā's reprimand convey an idea which he had borrowed from a saying of Zayn al-'Ābidīn's (him whose life has been just given). That imām always travelled incognito, and when asked his motive, he replied: "I detest assuming the qualities to which my descent from the Prophet<sup>ﷺ</sup> entitles me, when I cannot manifest them to others".

399 ABU 'L-ḤASAN AL-'ASKARĪ

Abu 'l-Ḥasan 'Alī al-'Askarī, surnamed al-Hādī (the director), and held by the Imāmīte Shī'ites as one of the twelve Imāms, was the son of Muḥammad al-Jawād and the grandson of 'Alī al-Riḍā; having just given the life of the latter, it is unnecessary for us to trace up the genealogy farther (as it will be found there). Secret information having been given to al-Mutawakkil that this Imām had a quantity of arms, books, and other objects for the use of his followers concealed in his house, and being induced by malicious reports to believe that he aspired to the empire, he sent one night some soldiers of the Turkish guard to break in on him when he least expected such a visit. They found him quite alone and locked up in his room, clothed in a hair-shirt, his head covered with a woollen cloak, and turned with his face in the direction of Makkah; chanting, in this attitude, some verses of the Qur'ān expressive of God's promises and threats, and having no other carpet between him and the earth than sand and gravel. He was carried off in that attire and brought, in the depth of the night, before al-Mutawakkil, who was then engaged in drinking wine. On seeing him, the khalif received him with respect, and being informed that nothing had been found in his house to justify the suspicions cast upon him, he seated him by his side and offered him the goblet which he held in his hand. 'Commander of the faithful !' said Abu 'l-Ḥasan, "a liquor such as that was never yet combined with my flesh and blood : dispense me therefore from taking it". The khalif acceded to his request and then asked him to repeat some verses which might amuse him. Abu 'l-Ḥasan replied that he knew by heart very little poetry ; but al-Mutawakkil having insisted he recited these lines :

1 Literally; "He that takes by the Prophet should give by him".

"They passed the night on the summits of the mountains, protected by valiant warriors, but their place of refuge availed them not. After all their pomp and power, they had to descend from their lofty fortresses to the custody of the tomb. O what a dreadful change ! Their graves had already received them when a voice was heard exclaiming : 'Where are the thrones, the crowns, and the robes of state ? Where are now the faces once so delicate, which were shaded by veils and protected by the curtains of the audience hall?'<sup>1</sup> To this demand, the tomb gave answer sufficient : 'The worms,' it said, 'are now revelling upon those faces ; long had these men been eating and drinking but now they are eaten in their turn.' "

Every person present was filled with apprehension for Abu 'l-Ḥasan 'Alī's safety ; they feared that al-Mutawakkil, in the first burst of indignation, would have vented his wrath upon him ; but they perceived the khalif weeping bitterly, the tears trickling down his beard, and all the assembly wept with him. Al-Mutawakkil then ordered the wine to be removed, after which he said : "Tell me ! Abu 'l-Ḥasan ! are you in debt ?". "Yes", replied the other, "I owe four thousand dīnārs". The khalif ordered that sum to be given him, and sent him home with marks of the highest respect. Abu 'l-Ḥasan was born at Madīnah, A. H. 214, on Sunday, the <sup>1</sup> When the sovereign gave audience, one or more curtains were always drawn between him and the public. In old times, the number of curtains was seven, and they were placed at some distance from each other.

13th of Rajab (Sept. A.C. 829)*; others say on the day of 'Arafah (the 9th of Dhu 'l-Hijjah); some persons again place his birth in the year 213. Al-Mutawakkil was at length induced, by the numerous unfavourable accounts which he received of Abu 'l-Ḥasan's conduct, to have him taken from Madīnah and sent to Sarr-man-r'ā. This town was also called al-'Askar (the army), because al-Mu'taṣim, the prince who built it, removed his army (from Baghdad) to that station. It was on account of his residence there that Abu 'l-Ḥasan was surnamed al-'Askari. He passed twenty years and 9 months at that place, and he died there on Monday, the 24th of the latter Jumādā, A. H. 254 (June, A. C. 868).† Others place his death on the 25th or on the 4th of that month; some again say that he died on the 3rd of Rajab of the year just mentioned. He was interred in the house where he dwelt‡.

400 'ALĪ IBN 'ABD ALLĀH IBN AL-'ABBĀS

Abū Muḥammad 'Alī Ibn 'Abd Allāh Ibn al-'Abbās Ibn 'Abd al-Muṭṭalib Ibn Hāshim al-Hāshimī, grandfather to the khalīfah al-Saffāh and al-Manṣūr, was the youngest son of his father. Distinguished for the eminence of his rank, the nobleness of his descent, and his talent as an elegant speaker, he was equally conspicuous for his beauty, wherein he surpassed every other member of the tribe of Quraysh. [The autograph adds: He was most distinguished of them and offered prayers more than any one else and so he was called al-Sijjad.] "He possessed five hundred olive-trees, and he said every day a prayer of two rak'ahs at the foot of each: he was called Dhu 'l-Thafināt". So says al-Mubarrad in his Kāmil, but the hāfiẓ Abū 'l-Faraj Ibn al-Jawzī states, in his Kitāb al-Alqāb, that the person who bore this surname was 'Alī Ibn al-Ḥusayn (Zayn al-'Ābidīn) and that he was so denominated because he prayed one thousand rak'ahs every day, so that callosities (thafināt) were formed on his knees like those on the limbs of * 16 September, but according to Edward Mahler's calculation the day was Thursday. In 213 it was Sunday, 27 September 828.—Ed.

† 21 June, the date was 26 or 25.—Ed.

‡ 31 May or 28 June.—Ed.

camels. It is related that 'Alī Ibn Abī Ṭālib missed Ibn 'Abbās one day at the prayer of noon and asked the persons present what could be his motive for staying away; they replied that a son was born to him, and when the prayer was over, 'Alī said: "Let us go and see him." On entering, he congratulated Ibn 'Abbās, and then said: "I thank the Giver and mayest thou find a blessing in the gift! what name has he received from you?" "Would it be right for me", replied Ibn 'Abbās, "to give him a name and not wait till thou shouldst do it?" 'Alī then told them to bring the child, and having taken it in his arms, he chewed a date and rubbed the roof of its mouth with it<sup>1</sup>; he then handed it to the father, saying: "Here! take it, Abu 'l-Amlāk<sup>2</sup>; I give it 'Alī for a name and Abu 'l-Ḥasan for a surname". When Mu'āwiyah got possession of the khalīfate, he said to Ibn 'Abbās: "None of your family should bear the same name and surname as that man; I shall call the child Abū Muḥammad". This appellation then became current as his surname. It is al-Mubarrad who relates this anecdote in his Kāmil, but the ḥāfiẓ Abū Nu'aym says in his Ḥilyat al-Awliyā: "When 'Alī Ibn 'Abd Allāh went to see 'Abd al-Malik Ibn Marwān, that khalīf said to him: "Change thy name and thy surname, for I cannot bear to hear them pronounced." The other replied: 'As for the name, no; but as for the surname, give me that of Abū Muḥammad'. It was thus that his surname was changed". I must observe that 'Abd al-Malik's motive in speaking so was the hatred which he bore to 'Alī Ibn Abī Ṭālib, and this was so excessive that he could not endure to hear his name and surname pronounced. Al-Wāqidī says that Abū Muḥammad was born on the night in which 'Alī was murdered (a statement in contradiction to that made by al-Mubarrad), and God alone knoweth the truth. Al-Mubarrad says also<sup>3</sup>: "Alī (Ibn 'Abd Allāh) was flogged twice, and, each

1 Muḥammad did the same with 'Abd Allāh Ibn al-Zubayr, and the custom was kept up by his pious Muslims.

2 This is the first time I find this surname given to Ibn 'Abbās.

3 It may be remarked that, throughout this article, the numerous extracts from al-Mubarrad's Kāmil are either silly fables, or else in contradiction with the statements of other authors.

time, by the order of al-Walīd Ibn 'Abd al-Malik. The first time was for having married Lubābah<sup>1</sup>, the daughter of 'Abd Allāh Ibn Ja'far Ibn Abī Ṭālib. She had been already married to 'Abd al-Malik, but one day he took a bite out of an apple and handed her the rest. Now, as he had a bad breath, she called for a knife, and being asked by him what she wanted to do with it, she replied: 'To cut off the part of the apple which is spoiled'. He immediately divorced her, and she was taken in marriage by this 'Alī Ibn 'Abd Allāh. In consequence of this, al-Walīd flogged him, saying: 'Ah! you mean to degrade the khalifs by marrying their mothers.' (For it was a motive of this kind which led Marwān Ibn al-Ḥakam (al-Walīd's grandfather) to marry the mother of Khālīd, the son of Yazīd, the son of Mu'āwiyah). 'Alī Ibn 'Abd Allāh replied: 'My intention was to quit this town; and, as I am her cousin, I married her to be her protector'.<sup>2</sup> [Others say that 'Abd al-Malik married Lubbanah, the daughter of 'Abd Allāh Ibn Ja'far, and as he had a bad breath, she suggested to him the propriety of using a tooth brush. He took her advice, but divorced her. She then became the wife of 'Alī Ibn 'Abd Allāh Ibn 'Abbās, who was bald and always wore a skull cap; 'Abd al-Malik then sent a girl to pull off his cap unawares and thus expose his baldness to Lubbānah, with whom he was sitting. On this Lubbānah said: "I like a bald Hāshimite better than a foul-breathed Omayyide."] Relative to the second flogging which 'Alī Ibn 'Abd Allāh received, we shall give a relation of it furnished by Abū 'Abd Allāh Muḥammad Ibn Shujā' and which was headed with the names of the persons through whom it had successively passed down till he received it; the narrator says: "I one day saw 'Alī Ibn 'Abd Allāh flogged with a whip, and paraded about on a camel, with his face towards the tail, whilst a crier proclaimed: 'This is 'Alī Ibn 'Abd Allāh the Liar', On this, I went up to him and said: 'What is the reason of their calling you a liar?' and he answered: 'They were told that I had declared that the sovereign authority would be exercised later by my two sons; and, by Allāh! their descendants shall continue to hold it till they be mastered by their own slaves; a small-eyed race, with broad faces like doubly-strengthened shields<sup>1</sup>.” Ibn al-Kalbī says, in his Jamharat-al-Nisab, that the person who presided at the flogging of ‘Alī Ibn ‘Abd Allāh Ibn al-‘Abbās was Kulthūm Ibn ‘Iyāḍ Ibn Waḥwāḥ Ibn Qushayr al-A‘war Ibn Qushayr, the commander of the khalif al-Walīd Ibn ‘Abd al-Malik’s police guards: he afterwards governed North Africa in the name of Hishām Ibn ‘Abd al-Malik, and he was slain in that province<sup>2</sup>. Another author mentions that Kulthūm was slain in the month of Dhu ‘l-Hijjah, A. H. 123 (Oct.—Nov., A. C. 741). “‘Alī Ibn ‘Abd Allāh,” says a narrator, “went with his two grandsons, the (future) khalifs al-Saffāḥ and al-Manṣūr, into the presence of Sulaymān Ibn ‘Abd al-Malik”—this is a mistake; it was with Hishām Ibn ‘Abd al-Malik that the circumstance occurred—“and that khalif made room for him on his throne, showed him great kindness and asked him what he required. ‘Alī answered; ‘I am thirty thousand dirhims in debt;’ on which the khalif gave orders to pay the sum for him. He then said: ‘You will recommend that my two boys be well treated.’ The khalif gave orders to that effect, and ‘Alī thanked him and said: ‘You and they are relation by blood’. When ‘Alī turned to withdraw, Hishām said to the company: ‘That shaykh has grown old and has fallen into dotage; he says that the authority which we exercise will pass into the hands of his children. Those words were overheard by ‘Alī, who exclaimed: ‘And so it shall be, by Allāh! these two shall reign.’” ‘Alī was held in the highest respect by the people of Hijāz: Hishām Ibn Sulaymān al-Makhzūmī related on this subject as follows: “Whenever ‘Alī Ibn ‘Abd Allāh came to Makkah to perform the pilgrimage or to visit the temple, the Quraysh suspended the assemblies which they held in the Sacred Mosque and deserted the places where public lessons were usually given, for the purpose of keeping him company and giving him a mark of the profound respect and veneration which they bore him: when he sat down,

<sup>1</sup> The autograph has لبابه

* From "others" to "Omayyide" not in the Autograph.—Ed.

1 This prophecy was probably supposed to designate the Turkish troops in the service of the khalifs.

2 See the extract from al-Nuwayrī given by me in the Journal Asiatique for November, 1841.

they sat down; when he stood up, they stood up; and when he walked, they all crowded around him and walked with him. This they continued to do till he left the Sacred Territory". He was of a fair complexion, large in body, and wore a long beard. His feet were so large, that he could find no shoes or boots to fit him, unless they were made on purpose by his orders. He was so extremely tall, that when he performed the circuits around the Temple on foot, with the rest of the people about him, he seemed to be on horseback. Yet, tall as he was, he only came up to the elbow of his father 'Abd Allāh, and he only came up to the elbow of his father al-'Abbās, whose stature was surpassed, in an equal degree, by that of his father 'Abd al-Muṭṭalib<sup>1</sup>. An old woman who saw 'Alī Ibn 'Abd Allāh making the circuits around the Ka'bah and surpassing in height every person there, asked who he was, and being informed that he was 'Alī Ibn 'Abd Allāh, the grandson of al-'Abbās, she exclaimed: "There is no god but God! people would doubt my memory, were I to say that I saw al-'Abbās going round this sacred House, and that he looked like a white tent<sup>2</sup>." All this is mentioned by al-Mubarrad in his Kāmil; he states also that al-'Abbās had a powerful voice, and that, one morning at daybreak, a hostile troop having come down upon them, he cried out as loud as he could, "The enemy! to arms!" and that every pregnant female who heard him miscarried<sup>3</sup>. Abū Bakr al-Ḥāzimi<sup>4</sup> says in his (geographical) work containing the list of those names which are borne by more than one place, under the letter ghayn, where he notices two places called al-Ghābah: "Al-'Abbās Ibn 'Abd al-Muṭṭalib would stand on Sa'a, a hill near Madinah, and call to his slave-boys at al-Ghābah, loud enough to be heard by them. This he did towards the end

---

1 Ibn Khallikān has borrowed this absurd lie from al-Mubarrad. It may, however, be founded on fact, as each of these persons might have been only a boy when seen at the side of his father.

2 It must be recollected that the iḥrām, or cloak worn by the pilgrims when they perform the circuits round the Ka'bah, is of white wool.

3 This may be true, but it was rather, through fear of the enemy than from the loudness of al-'Abbās's voice.

4 His life is given by Ibn Khallikān.

of the night; and there are eight miles between Sal'a and al-Ghābah'. 'Alī Ibn 'Abd Allāh died at al-Sharāt, A. H. 117 (A. C. 735), aged eighty years. He was born, according to al-Wāqidī, on the night in which 'Alī Ibn Abī Ṭālib was murdered; namely, the eve of Friday, the 17th of Ramaḍān, A. H. 40 (January, A. C. 664); * but other dates are assigned to his birth. (He says also that) 'Alī Ibn 'Abd Allāh died A. H. 118. Another historian places his death in the month of Dhu 'l-Qa'dah; Khalifah Ibn Khayyāt, in A. H. 114, and a fourth, in A. H. 119. He wore his hair dyed black, and his son Muḥammad, the father of Al-Saffāh and al-Manṣūr, dyed his red, so that the persons who did not know them, mistook one for the other. Al-Sharāt is a place in Syria, on the road leading from Damascus to Madīnah; it is situated near al-Shawbek, in the province of al-Balqā'. In the environs lies the village called al-Ḥumaymah, which was the property of this 'Alī and of his children during the reign of the Omayyide dynasty: al-Saffāh and al-Manṣūr were born and brought up there; they proceeded from thence to Kūfah, where, as is well known, al-Saffāh was proclaimed khalīf. We shall give the life of Muḥammad, the son of 'Alī Ibn 'Abd Allāh. Al-Ṭabarī says, in his History, that al-Walīd Ibn 'Abd al-Malik Ibn Marwān removed 'Alī Ibn 'Abd Allāh Ibn al-'Abbās from Damascus and assigned him al-Ḥumaymah as a residence, in A. H. 95 (A. C. 713—4). His descendants continued to dwell there till the fall of the Omayyides, and he had upwards of twenty male children born to him in that place.

401 THE QĀḌĪ ABU 'L-ḤASAN AL-JURJĀNĪ

The qāḍī Abu 'l-Ḥasan 'Alī Ibn 'Abd al-'Azīz al-Jurjānī was a doctor of the sect of al-Shāfi'i an elegant scholar and a poet. The shaykh Abū Ishāq al-Shīrāzī mentions in the Ṭabaqāt al-Fuqahā

1 In Berghaus' map of Syria, al-Sharāt or Schera, as he writes it, is placed between 'Aqabah and Petra, in lat. 38° 28' and long. 33° 26' E from Paris.

* 24 January but the day according to Eduard Mahler was Sunday.—Ed.

(biographical dictionary of jurisconsults), and remarks that his poetical works have been collected into a diwān. It was the qāḍī 'I-Jurjānī who composed these lines :

"They said to me : 'You are full of backwardness' ; (why not celebrate the praises of the great?). They might have seen, however, that I was a man who shunned a station in which dishonour had been his lot."

The piece which contains this verse is of great length, and so well known that it is needless to give it here. Al-Tha'ālibī speaks of him in these terms in the Yatīmah : "He was the pearl of the age, the wonder of the world, the pupil of the eye of science, the pinnacle of the diadem of the belles lettres and the cavalier of the army of poetry. To penmanship like that of Ibn Muqlah, he united the prose-style of al-Jāhīz and the poetic talent of al-Buḥturī. In his youth he acted as the lieutenant of al-Khidr,<sup>1</sup> journeying throughout the earth and travelling to the provinces of 'Irāq, Syria, and elsewhere; during which expeditions he acquired such a stock of varied information and instruction, as rendered him a beacon in the regions of science, and in learning, perfection itself". He then gives numerous extracts from his poetry, and amongst others, the following lines :

"Thy lover is tormented by his passion; let him experience thy kindness; be not cruel, but appreciate his merit, for he is the last (and most patient) of thy lovers".

A distich expressing a similar thought was recited to me by my friend Ḥusām al-Dīn 'Isā Ibn Sinjar al-Ḥājirī, of whom I shall again speak. It was composed by himself and runs as follows :

"O thou for whose cheeks I should give my eyes; none (of thy lovers) have kept their plighted faith but me; let me implore thee to show me a moment's kindness; I am the last (and most patient) of them all".

<sup>1</sup> The patriarchs al-Khidr and Elias are the protectors of travellers; the first is constantly journeying throughout the earth for that purpose, and the latter throughout the sea. They are the guardians and escorts of the pilgrims on the way to Makkah and back again.—(See M. Reinaud's Monumens arabes, persans et turcs, vol. I. p. 170).

The following verses are by al-Jurjānī :

"They told me to employ humility as a step to wealth, but they knew not that abasement is (as bad as) poverty. There are two things which prohibit me from riches ; my honest pride and fortune's unkindness. When I am told that wealth is within my reach, I look and perceive that, before I attain it, I must pass through stations worse than poverty itself".

By the same :

"They told me to roam through the earth, and that the means of livelihood are always ample. I replied : They are ample, but to reach them is difficult. If I have not in the world a generous patron to assist me or a profession to support me, where shall I find a means of livelihood?"

In an address to the Ṣāhib Ibn 'Abbād ( no. 93 ) he says :

"Let us not blame the (poetic) ideas which you rejected, if they produce no effect when brought together. All originality of thought was engrossed by the promptness of your genius. and the rarest terms, the most fleeting modes of expression, became familiar to your mind. So, when we aim at originality, we can only find ideas stolen from you and repeated to satiety".

A piece addressed by him to the Wazīr, in which he felicitates him on his restoration to health, contains this passage :

"Must every day renew our fears for the cessation of noble deeds?—deeds which cause all noble hearts to vibrate with sympathy ! Thy body received a share of ever perfection ; how then did sickness fall to its lot ? When the soul of the Wazīr is afflicted, the souls and hearts which hold their life from his are filled with anguish. By Allah ! I shall never look with pleasure on a beloved face whilst the face of the wazīr is emaciated by sickness. I mistake ; that extenuation results from his ardent soul inciting him to noble deeds. Cease then to grieve because that sky is overcast ; it will soon begin to shed (refreshing) showers."

By the same :

"I never employed the pleasure of existence except when at home, with a book for my companion. Nothing is dearer to me than science, and I desire no other society. Intercourse with mankind is a degradation and the only one; avoid the world, and live in honour and authority".

By the same:

"Alas! what means this separation? why those journeyings forth and departures without end? When these dear friends have left me, let me die; I shall then have obtained my last remaining wish".

He composed a great quantity of poetry, all in a simple style, and he wrote a work entitled al-Wasāṭah bayn al-Mutannabbī wa ẖuṣūmihi (mediation between al-Mutanabbī and his adversaries) in which he displayed great abilities, vast learning, and extensive information. The Hākim Abū 'Abd Allāh Ibn al-Bayyī states, in his history of the eminent men of Naysāpūr, that he died in that city on the last day of Ṣafar, A. H. 366 (October, A. C. 976)*; at the age of seventy-six years. The following relation is furnished by another historian: "He (al-Jurjānī) was a man of strict veracity, and his conduct as a qāḍī was most commendable; when he arrived at Naysāpūr with his brother Muḥammad, in the year 337 (A. C. 948-9), he had not reached the age of puberty. They both took lessons from the different masters there, and he died, in the post of grand-qāḍī, at Ray, A. H. 392 (A. C. 1301-2). His body was transported to Jurjān and there interred". The statement of the Hākim is however the most authentic and the truest. Jurjān is the name of a great city in the province of Māzandrān.

402 IBN AL-MARZUBĀN

Abu 'l-Ḥasan 'Alī Ibn Aḥmad Ibn al-Marzubān, the Shāfi'ite doctor, was a native of Baghdād. His talents as a jurisconsult and his profound piety ranked him as one of the most illustrious<sup>1</sup> among, the learned. He studied jurisprudence under Abu 'l-Ḥusayn Ibn al-Qaṭṭān,<sup>1</sup> and gave lessons in the same science to Abu Ḥāmid al-Isfarā'īnī, on the first arrival of the latter at Baghdād. It is related that he used to say: "I do not know any person who can complain of being wronged by me"; he was a jurisconsult, however, and well knew that speaking ill of any person in his absence is wrong done to him.<sup>2</sup> He filled the post of professor at Baghdād. and had a peculiar manner of setting forth the system of al-Shāfi'i's doctrine. He died in the month of Rajab, A. H. 366 (Feb. March, A. C. 977). Marzuṭān is a Persian word meaning master (or lord) of the frontier; marz signifies frontier<sup>3</sup> and bān, master. This was originally a title given to those who were next in rank to the king.

<sup>1</sup> The autograph has "أعلى"; the other MSS. are wrong.

* 27 October—Ed.

403 AL-MĀWARDĪ

Abu 'l-Ḥasan 'Alī Ibn Muḥammad Ibn Ḥabīb, a native of Baṣrah and generally known by the surname of al-Māwardī, was one of the most distinguished and eminent jurisconsults of the Shāfi'ite sect. He studied law at Baṣrah under Abu 'l-Qāsim al-Ṣaymarī,<sup>4</sup> and then at Baghdād under Abū Ḥāmid al-Isfarā'īnī.

1 See his life, No. 23.

2 I do not understand this observation, unless it signify that he never spoke ill of any person. I find my conjecture confirmed by al-Yāfi'i who says:

معناه أنه لم يعتب أحدا إذا الغيبه أحد المظالم

3 The word marz is the same as the English word marches. Marzubān is equivalent to lord of the marches, lord marcher, or marquis.

4 Abu 'l-Qāsim al-Wāḥid Ibn al-Ḥusayn Ibn Muḥammad al-Ṣaymar was one of the most eminent imāms of the Shāfi'ite sect. He studied under Abū Ḥāmid al-Marwarrūdī and Abu 'l-Fayyāḍ al-Baṣrī. Having acquired a profound acquaintance with the system of Shāfi'ite jurisprudence, he gave lessons which were attended by pupils from all parts of the world. He composed a number of excellent works on the doctrines of his sect, and one of them, the Ṭīḍāḥ or eluc dation, forms five volumes. His other works are the Kifāyah (sufficiency), an abridged treatise which was commented by him in another work entitled

(Continued on page 272)

The knowledge which he had acquired, from oral transmission, of the doctrines of his sect was most extensive,<sup>1</sup> and it is impossible to read the Hāwī (or comprehensive), a work composed by him on that subject, without acknowledging his profound learning and perfect acquaintance with the whole system of Shāfi'ite jurisprudence. The office of qāḍī in a great number of towns was (successively) conferred upon him, and he (at length) took up his residence at Baghdād, in the darb<sup>2</sup>, or street, of al-Za'farān<sup>3</sup>. Abū Bakr al-Khaṭīb, the author of the History of Baghdād, gives some traditional information on his authority and remarks that he held the highest character for veracity. Besides the Hāwī, he composed many other works, of which we may mention his Explanation of the Qur'ān, another treatise (on the same subject) entitled al-Nakat wa 'l-'Uyūn<sup>4</sup>; the Adab al-Dīn wa 'l-Dunyā (instructions for this world and the next); the al-Aḥkām al-Sultāniyah (statuta sultanica);<sup>5</sup> the Qānūn al-Wizārah (organisation and functions of the wazirate); the Siyāsāt al-Mulk (administration of the state); and Iqnā' fi 'l-Madhhab (institution satisfaciens. de doctrinā sectae Shāfi'ite), which last is an abridged treatise. He drew up some other works on the fundamentals of jurisprudence and on literature, and he contributed greatly by his labours to the general stock of information.<sup>6</sup> It is said that, whilst he lived, he did not publish any of his works, but put them all up together in a (safe) place, and that, on the approach of death, he said to a person the Irshād. It is here necessary to remark that Abū Bakr al-Bayḍāwī composed another commentary on the Kifāyah, entitled also the Irshād. The precise year of Abū 'l-Qā'im al-Ṣaymarī's death is not known, but al-Dhahabī says in his Tārī al-Islām that he was still alive and at Baḡrah in A. H. 402 (A. C. 1014—5). Ṣaymarī is derived from Saymara, the name of a river near Baḡrah, the banks of which are covered with villages. Tah. al-Shāf.)

(Continued from page 271)

1 The original merely says; "He was ḥāfiẓ to the doctrine".

2 In the printed Arabic text, for درب read درب.

3 See No. 149.

4 This title may be rendered by puncta et oculi or leptida dicta et fontes.

5 This is a most learned and perfectly systematic treatise on the political and religious organisation of the Muslim state.

6 Literally: And the public profited by him.

who possessed his confidence : "The books in such a place were composed by me, but I abstained from publishing them, because I suspected that, although my intention in writing them was to work in God's service, that feeling, instead of being pure, was sullied by baser motives. Therefore, when you perceive me on the point of death and falling into agony, take my hand in yours, and if I press it, you will know thereby that none of these works has been accepted from me ; in this case, you must take them all and throw by night into the Tigris ; but if I open my hand and close it not, that is the sign of their having been accepted, and that my hope in the admission of my intention as sincere and pure has been fulfilled". "When al-Māwardī's death drew near", said that person, "I took him by the hand and he opened it without closing it on mine whence I knew that his labours had been accepted, and I then published his works". Towards the beginning of the History of Baghdād, the Khaṭīb has the following passage : "Al-Māwardī told me that he was in Baghdād when his brother wrote him these lines from Baṣrah :

"I have long desired to visit Baghdād and enjoy the sweetness of its air (hawā), but fate refused my wish ! How then can I support my absence from it now, since it possesses sweetness of air (hawā) and the dearest object of my love (hawā)<sup>1</sup> ?".

"Abu 'l-'Izz Aḥmad Ibn 'Ubayd Allāh Ibn Kādīsh relates as follows : Abu 'l-Ḥusayn al-Māwardī repeated to me the following lines as having been recited to him at Baṣrah by their author, the kātib Abu 'l-Khayr of Wāsiṭ :

"The pen of destiny traces future events ; 'tis therefore all the same to labour or to repose. 'Tis folly in you to toil for subsistence ; the child in the womb receives its full provision ! " "

It is related that, on his return from Baghdād to Baṣrah, al-Māwardī recited these words of al-'Abbās Ibn al-Aḥnaf's :

"I dwelt in it for a time with dislike ; but when accustomed to it, I left it against my will. It was not that the place pleased me, but it embittered my life to quit those I loved. I departed from it, though its aspect gave pleasure to my eyes but I left my heart as a hostage behind me".

---

1 Literally : Since it unites in itself the two hawās, one of them having a long final a and the other a short one.

His reason for reciting these verses was, that he belonged to Baṣrah and had no wish to leave it; wherefore he went to Baghdād against his will: after some time, he became reconciled to the place and forgot Baṣrah, so that it gave him great pain to quit it. Al-Sam'ānī attributes the foregoing lines to Abū Muḥammad al-Muzanī, an inhabitant of Transoxiana. Al-Māwardī died at Baghdād on Tuesday, the 30th of the first Rabi', A. H. 450 (May A. C. 1058),* aged eighty-six years; he was interred the next morning in the cemetery at the Gate of Ḥarb. Al-Samānī says that Māwardī means a seller of māward or rose-water.

404 ABU 'L-ḤASAN AL-ASH'ARĪ.

Abu 'l-Ḥasan 'Alī al-Ash'arī drew his descent from Ibn Abi Mūsā, one of the Prophet's Companions; he was the son of Ismā'il Ibn Abi Bishr Ishāq Ibn Sālim Ibn Ismā'il Ibn 'Abd Allāh Ibn Mūsā Ibn Bilāl Ibn Abi Burdah 'Āmir Ibn Abi Mūsā. This able dogmatic theologian and defender of the sunnite doctrines was the founder of the sect called Ash'arites, and his celebrity is sufficiently great to dispense us from making a long article on him. The qāḍī Abū Bakr al-Bāqillānī was the great champion and supporter of his peculiar doctrines.<sup>1</sup> Abu 'l-Ḥasan al-'Ash'arī used to attend, every Friday, the lessons given in the mosque of al-Manṣūr at Baghdād, by the Shāfi'ite doctor Abū Ishāq al-Marwazī; and he would then take his place amongst the other pupils. He was born in Baṣrah, A. H. 270 (A. C. 883—4); some say 260; and he died suddenly at Baghdād between A. H. 330 and 340 (A. C. 942—952); it is stated however by Ibn al-Hamadānī,<sup>2</sup> in his continuation of al-Ṭabarī's History, that al-Ash'arī died A. H. 330 and another account refers his death to the year 324. He was interred between the suburb of al-Karkh and the Baṣrah Gate. Mention has been already made of his ancestor Abū Burdah (no 295) "Ash'arī means descended from Ash'ar; the real name of Ash'ar was Nabī, the son of Udad Ibn Zayd Ibn Yashjub: he was surnamed Ash'ar (the hairy) because he came into the world with hair on his body". Such are the words of al-Sam'ānī. The ḥāfiẓ Abu 'l-Qāsim Ibn 'Asākir has written a volume on the merits of al-Ash'arī.<sup>1</sup> *{Abu 'l-Ḥasan al-Ash'arī was at first a Mu'tazilite, but he then made a public renunciation of his belief in man's free-will ('adl), and of the opinion that the Qur'ān was created. This occurred in the great mosque of Baṣrah, on a Friday; he was sitting in the chair from which he taught when he cried out as loud as he could: "They who know me, know whom I am; as for those who did not know me, I shall tell them: I am 'Alī Ibn Ismā'il al-Ash'arī, and I used to hold that the Qur'ān was created, that the eyes (of men) shall not see God, and that we ourselves are the authors of our evil deeds<sup>2</sup>; now, I have returned to the truth; I renounce these opinions and I take the engagement to refute the Mu'tazilites and expose their infamy and turpitude". He was strongly inclined to gaiety and humour. His works are the Luma' (flashes), the Mūjaz (abridgment), the Iḍāḥ al-Burhān (elucidation of the work called the Burhān); the Tabiyīn (illustration) treating of the dogmas of religion; the Kitāb al-Sharḥ wa 'l-Tafsīl (explanation and exposition), being a refutation of the people of falsehood and error (the Mu'tazilites). He is also the author of the treatises containing the refutation of the Mulāhidāh (impious) belonging to the various Mu'tazilite, Rāfiḍite Jahmite, Kharijite, and other heretic sects. He was interred in the Mashru 'l-Zuwāyā (street of the cells); his sepulchral monument

1 The doctrines of Al-Ash'arī are set forth by al-Shahrastānī; see page 65 of the printed Arabic text.

2 See No. 125 and 167.

* 26 May.—Ed.

1 What follows exists no longer in the autograph, but these words in red ink هاهنا التخریج (hahuna 'l-Takhrīj) indicate sufficiently that the contents of a fly-leaf, now lost, were to be inserted here. It fortunately happens that the whole passage is preserved in two of my manuscripts.

2 See Pocock's Specimen, page 234, and Dr. Curenton's Shahristān, page 30.

*{ } From "Abu 'l-Ḥasan to end not in the autograph.—Ed.

has a mosque at one side and lies near a bath : it is situated on the left hand, when going from the Bāzār to the Tigris. Al-Ash'arī supported himself on the produce of a landed estate which his ancestor Bilāl Ibn Abī Burdah had erected into a waqf, for the support of his descendants<sup>1</sup>; and his daily expense was seventeen dirhims. The foregoing observations are taken from the Khaṭīb. Abū Bakr al-Širafī<sup>2</sup> said : "The Mu'tazilites went with their heads up till such time as—God produced al-Ash'arī to the world". Al-Ash'arī's works are fifty-five in number].

405 AL-KIYĀ AL-HARRĀSĪ

Abu 'l-Ḥasan 'Alī Ibn Muḥammad Ibn 'Alī al-Ṭabarī (a native of Ṭabaristān), and generally known by the appellation of al-Kiyā al-Harrāsī, was a doctor of the sect of al-Šhāfi'ī. On leaving his native place, he proceeded to Naysāpūr and studied jurisprudence under the Imām al-Ḥaramayn till he excelled in that science. His countenance was handsome, his voice clear and loud, his style elegant, and his language agreeable. From Naysāpūr he removed to Bayhaq where he taught publicly for some time and then went to 'Irāq, where he was appointed head-professor at Nizāmiyah College of Baghdād. This place he continued to hold till his death. In the Siyāq, or continuation of the History of Naysāpūr, the ḥāfiẓ 'Abd al-Ghāfir al-Fārisī (no. 377) speaks of him in these terms : "He was one of the Imām al-Ḥaramayn's principal undertutors<sup>3</sup>; a second Abū Ḥāmid al-Ghazzālī; nay, 1 By the Muslim law, a man may settle the income of his lands and tenements on his descendants to the last generation. He has only to convert his property into a waqf (by making over to a charitable establishment), with the reservation that the annual income is to be applied to that purpose. On the failure of descendants, the income reverts to the establishment.

2 The life of Abū Bakr Muḥammad al-Š'raf will be found in this work.

3 The Arabic word is مُعِدِّ Mu'idd; it corresponds in some degree to the French repetiteur. The mu'ids were chosen by the professor among his most advanced scholars, and their duty was to instruct the junior pupils and make them repeat their lesson till they knew it by heart. See M. de Sacy's Abd Allatif, p. 459.

more profound in learning, more holy in life, more pleasing in voice, and more agreeable in countenance". After his arrival in Baghdād, al-Kiyā al-Harrāsī was attached to the service of Majd al-Mulk Barkyāruq, the son of Saljūq sul'ān Mālik Shāh (no. 107), and was raised by his favour to wealth and honour. Under that dynasty, he filled the duties of chief Qādi. He possessed great information in the science of the Traditions, and he used to cite them with success in his discussions and conferences. On this subject, one of his sayings was: "When the horseman of the Traditions gallops about in the hippodrome of contestation, the heads of analogical deductions are struck off and given to the winds!". The following relation was made by the ḥafīẓ Abu 'l-Ṭāhir<sup>2</sup> al-Silafī: "When I was in Baghdād, in the year 495, I asked a fatwā (legal opinion) from our master Abu 'l-Ḥasan on a point which I had argued with the jurisconsults in the Nizāmiyah College; the question I proposed to him was expressed in these terms: 'What does the Imām (whom God may favour!) say of this: a man willed one-third of his property to the learned and to the jurisconsults; are the writers of the Traditions included in the legacy or not?' Under this question the shaykh wrote as follows: 'They are; and why should they not? has not the Prophet<sup>3</sup> said: "He who, for the advantage of my people, preserves forty Traditions relating to their religion, shall be raised up by God, on the day of the resurrection, as a jurisconsult and learned man".' " Al-Kiyā's opinion having been asked respecting (the legality of cursing) Yazid the son of Mu'āwiyah, he returned the following answer: "He was not of the Companions, for he was born in the days of 'Umar Ibn al-Khaṭṭāb<sup>4</sup>. As for the opinion of the early Imāms on this subject, we shall state that Aḥmad (Ibn Ḥanbal) has expressed

1 He means to say that a legal opinion formed from analogical deductions must yield to the authority of a genuine Tradition. See Introduction to Vol. I.

2 The surname of Abu 'l-Ṭāhir may be written indifferently with or without the article.

3 See Mathew's Mishkāt, Vol. I, p. 65.

4 Muḥammad gave repeated injunctions that no person should curse or speak ill of his Companions. See Mishkāt et. seq.

himself twice on it ; once he said that the curse might be implied, and another time that it should be openly expressed, Mālik has delivered two similar opinions, and Abū Ḥanīfah also : but I hold one only — that it should be openly expressed. And why should it not ? Was not Yazid a player at nerd<sup>1</sup>, a hunter with trained leopards, and an inveterate wine-bibber, on which subject his poetry is sufficiently known, One of these pieces ran as follows :

“When the wine-cup assembled my companions, and the musician sung to excite the joys of love, I bade them take a full share of pleasures and delight, for even the things which last the longest must have an end.”

He continued his answer in the same strain, and wrote on the back of the leaf<sup>2</sup> : “Had I space enough left, I should slack the rein in exposing the infamies of this man. Signed, ‘Alī Ibn Muḥammad.’” The Imām Abū Ḥāmid al-Ghazzālī was once consulted on the same subject, and he gave an opinion altogether contrary to the foregoing. The questions proposed to him were these : “Should a person who openly cursed Yazid be considered as a reprobate, or should he be treated with indulgence ? Had Yazid the intention of slaying al-Ḥusayn, or was it done in self-defence ? Is it permitted to say God have mercy on him when speaking of Yazid, or is it better to suppress the prayer ? May the mufī be rewarded with the Divine favour for dissipating our doubts !” His answer was as follows : “It is absolutely forbidden to curse a Muslim, and he who curses a Muslim is himself the accursed ; The blessed Prophet<sup>ﷺ</sup> having said : The Muslim is not a curser. And how should it be allowable to curse a Muslim, when it is not permitted to curse the beasts of the field ? The prohibition from doing so has been transmitted down to us ; and moreover, the dignity of a Muslim is greater than the dignity of the Ka'bah, according to the positive declaration of the blessed Prophet<sup>ﷺ</sup>. Now, it is certain that Yazid was a Muslim, but it is not certain that he slew al-Ḥusayn, or that he ordered or consented to his death ; and as long as these circumstances remain undecided, it is not allowable to believe that he acted so. Besides, it is forbidden to think ill of a Muslim since Almighty God has said: Be not ready to entertain unfavourable opinions (of another), for some times those opinions are a crime<sup>1</sup>, and the blessed Prophet<sup>2</sup> has declared that the blood, the wealth, and the reputation of the Muslim are sacred, and of him no ill should be thought. Moreover, if any person assert that Yazīd ordered al-Ḥusayn's death or consented to it, he gives thereby an evident proof of his extreme folly; for, were he to endeavour to discover the true circumstances of the death of such great men, wazīrs, and sulṭāns as perished in his own time—were he to essay to find out who ordered the deed to be committed, who consented to it, and who disapproved of it, he would not succeed,—not even if the murder were perpetrated in his neighbourhood and in his presence. How then could he pretend to know the particular of a similar occurrence which took place in a distant country and in a by-gone age? And how can he know the truth (of Yazīd's conduct), now that nearly four hundred years have elapsed, and that the crime was committed in a place far remote? It must be considered also that this event was taken up by party-spirit, and that false statements respecting it abounded on all sides; the true circumstances of it cannot therefore be known; and such being the case, it is incumbent on us to think well of every Muslim who can possibly deserve it. To this we shall add some observations: suppose that there be positive proof of one Muslim's having murdered another, the doctrine of the orthodox jurisconsults<sup>2</sup>, is, that the murderer is not an infidel, because the act itself is not an act of infidelity, but of disobedience (towards God). It may also happen that the murderer repent before he dies. And if an infidel be converted from his infidelity, it is not allowable to curse him; how much the less then is it allowable to curse him who repents of having committed murder? Besides, how can it be known that the murderer of al-Ḥusayn died

1 A sort of backgammon. See Hyde's Historia Nerdiludii in his treatise de Ludis Orientalibus

2 This is not usual in fatwās or in letters.

---

1 Qur'an, sūrat 49, verse 12.

2 Literally: Of the people of the truth.

unrepenting? and He (God) accepteth the repentance of His creatures<sup>1</sup>. Wherefore, in as much as it is not lawful to curse a Muslim after his death, he who curses him is a reprobate and disobedient to God. Suppose even that it were permitted to curse him, the abstaining therefrom would be no crime, according to the unanimous opinion of the Imāms; nay, the man who never once, during the course of his existence, cursed Satan, will not be asked on the day of judgment why he cursed him not. And as for him who cursed Satan, he shall be asked his motive for so doing, and how he knew that Satan was rejected and accursed. The accursed are those who are far removed from Almighty God, but who those may be is a mystery, except in the case of such persons as die infidels; for we know by the Divine law that they are accursed. As for the invoking of the Divine mercy on Yazīd, it is allowable, nay, acceptable (in the sight of God),—nay, it is included in these words which we utter in every prayer: O God! pardon the men and the women who believe; for Yazīd was a believer. God knows if my opinion be right. Signed: al-Ghazzālī". Al-Kiyā al-Ḥarrāsī was born in the month of Dhu 'l-Qa'dah, A.H. 450 (Dec.-Jan, A.C. 1058-9); he died at Baghdād on the afternoon of Thursday, the 1st of Muḥarram A.H. 504 (July, A.C. 1110),* and was buried in the funeral chapel erected over the tomb of the shaykh Abū Ishāq al-Shirāzī. The shaykh Abū Ṭālib al-Zaynabī,<sup>2</sup> and the Qaḍī 'l-Quḍḍāt Abū 'l-Ḥasan Ibn al-Dāmaghānī, who were the chiefs of the Ḥanīfite sect at that time, attended his funeral notwithstanding the coldness which had subsisted between them and him; one of them stood at the head of the corpse, the other at the foot, and Ibn al-Dāmaghānī recited this appropriate verse:

"The wailings and lamentations of the female mourners are useless! like words uttered yestereven, thou existest for us no longer."

The following verse was then pronounced by al-Zaynabī:

1 Qur'an, sūrat 9, verse 105.

2 Abū Ṭālib al-Ḥusayn al-Zaynabī, the Ḥanīfite doctor, surnamed Nūr al-Hudā (light of the direction), died A. H. 512 (A. C. 1118-9). (Al-Yaḥi'ī)

* 20 July.—Ed.

"Women are sterile and have produced none like him; nay, they will never produce his equal,"

I do not know for what reason he received the name of al-Kiyā which is a Persian word signifying a man of rank and influence. The ḥāfiẓ Ibn 'Asākir states, in his great historical work, that the celebrated poet Abū Ishāq Ibrāhīm al-Ghazzālī (no. 17) passed some time under al-Kiyā's tuition at the Nizāmiyah Collge, and that he composed the following extempore lines on his death :

Behold the work of Fate, which spareth none and letteth none escape! Mankind has no place of refuge from Fate's decrees. Were exalted station a protection against its attacks, no eclipse would even obscure the brightness of the sun and moon. Ask the dastard who lives in apprehension of death, if precaution ever availed against it; Islāmism weeps the absence of its sun, and sheds floods of tears, compared to which the rain would be found less copious. Behold that learned Divine who used to receive us with an open and smiling countenance; with that look of pleasure which, to a visitor, was the best of welcomes. Death may tread him under foot, but his vast learning has spread abroad to distant climes. O thou who wert the pillar of the faith! may the clouds of heaven shed a copious shower, each morning, on thy tomb. Thou hast left us in affliction and the news of this misfortune has reached all mankind—has the news of their desolution at length reached thee? Thy instructive lessons gave new life to (al-Shāfi'i) Ibn Idris, and at (the beauty) of their composition, intelligence and reflection stood amazed. He who was so fortunate as to note them down, possesses now a flambeau of unfading brightness. The obscurities of jurisprudence, elucidated by thy words, are like the foreheads of brown horses marked with a white star. Did I know thy equal, I should invoke him and exclaim: 'The age is impoverished and requires soccours from thy riches!.' "

---

1 In this verse I follow the printed text and the later MSS. but the autograph has ثردا not ثردا. If this reading be adopted, the sense is: "Our age requires a man like him".

406 THE ḤĀFĪZ ABU 'L-ḤASAN AL-MAQDISI

Abu 'l-Ḥasan 'Alī, the son of al-Anjab Abu 'l Makārim al-Mufaḍḍal Ibn Abi 'l-Ḥasan 'Alī Ibn Abi 'l-Ghayth Mufarrij Ibn Ḥāṭim Ibn al-Ḥasan Ibn Ja'far Ibn Ibrāhīm Ibn al-Ḥasan al-Lakhmi al-Maqdisi (a member of the tribe of Lakhm and sprung from a family belonging to Jerusalem), was an eminent doctor of the Malikite sect, and a ḥāfīz of the highest reputation for his learning in the Traditions and the sciences connected with them. Alexandria was the place of his birth and residence. When the ḥāfīz al-Silafī settled in that city, Abu 'l- Ḥasan al-Maqdisi became his disciple and profited greatly under his tuition; such was also the case with our learned master Zakī al-Dīn 'Abd al-'Azīm al-Mundhīrī (no. 43n), who completed his education under the same ḥāfīz. Al-Mundhīrī spoke of his condisciple as a person of great talent and holiness of life; he recited to me numerous pieces of verse composed by him, such as those which follow:

"I have now passed my sixtieth year, and must declare that the happiest of my days were mixed with affliction. Visitors ask me who I am?—Judge what is the state of him who has settled in (a spot which is always) a field of battle!"

"(O my soul!) hold firm by the doctrines transmitted from the best of Prophets, from his Companions and his Tābi'is. When thou hast used thy efforts in propagating his religion, thou mayest perhaps be perfumed with the sweet odour of that pious work. To-morrow, on the day of reckoning, when the fires of hell shall rage intensely, fear lest thou becomest a prisoner there."

"There are three b's which torment us, bakk (bugs), burgūth (fleas), and barghash (gnats); the three fiercest species of created beings, and I know not which is the worst."

"There was a maid with rosy lips, whose kiss gave new life to him whom she saluted; wine mixed with musk seemed to be contained within them. I tasted not her lips, but I state the fact on good authority; I learned it from the tooth pick which had been with herself."

This is now a common idea, having been rendered familiar to us by the verses of the ancients and the moderns. It is thus that Bāshshār Ibn Burd says in one of his pieces :

"O thou whose lips are the sweetest in the world ! not that I have made the test, but the evidence of the toothpicks suffices."

And al-Abiwardī says in one of his poems :

"Her companions told me that they learned from the toothpick of arūk-wood that her lips were sweet."

The ḥāfiẓ al-Maqdisī was a deputy-ḥākim<sup>1</sup> at Alexandria, and professed in that city at the College which bears his name ; he then removed to Cairo and continued, till his death, to fill the place of professor in the Ṣaḥibiyah college ; founded by the Wazīr Ṣaḥī al-Dīn Abū Muḥammad 'Abd Allāh Ibn 'Alī, better known by the surname of Ibn Shukr.<sup>2</sup> He was born at Alexandria on the eve of Saturday, the 24th of Dhu 'l-Qa'dah, A.H. 544 (March, A.C. 1150)*, and he died at Cairo on Friday, the first of Sha'bān, A.H. 611 (December, A.C. 1214).† His father al-Qāḍī 'l-Anjāb (the most noble Qāḍī) Abū 'l-Makārim al-Mufaḍḍal died in the month of Rajab, A.H. 584 (August September, A.C. 1188) ; he was born A.H. 503 (A.C. 1109-10). Maqdisī means belonging to Bayt al-Maqdis (the House of the Holy Place, Jerusalem).

407 SAYF AL-DĪN AL-'ĀMIDĪ

Abū 'l-Ḥasan 'Alī Ibn Abī 'Alī Ibn Muḥammad Ibn Sālim al-Tha'labī‡ (member of the tribe of Tha'labah and) surnamed Sayf al-Dīn (sword of the fai.h) al-'Āmidī, was a dogmatic theologian—On commencing his studies, he went down to Baghdād, and as he belonged to the sect of Aḥmad Ibn Ḥanbal, he put himself under the

1 See No. 385, note.

2 See No. 88, note.

* 25 March.—Ed.

† 5 December.—Ed.

‡ The autograph reading is al-Taghlibī (member of the tribe of Taghlib).—Ed.

tuition of the Ḥanbalite doctor Ibn al-Mannī Abu 'l-Faḥ Naṣr Ibn Fityān; but, after some time, he passed over to the sect of al-Shāfi'i and attended the lessons of the shaykh Abu 'l-Qāsim Ibn Faḍlān<sup>1</sup>, under whose direction he studied controversy and rose to distinction by his acquirements in that science. Having committed to memory the Ṭarīqah, or system of controversy, composed by the Sharīf<sup>2</sup> and the Zawā'id, or appendix to the controversial treatise of As'ad al-Mihani<sup>3</sup> (no. 86), he passed into Sayria and studied the intellectual sciences with such success, that he was pronounced to be the most learned person of the age in these branches of knowledge. He then removed to Egypt and occupied the post of under-tutor in the college situated in the lesser Qarāfah cemetery, near the tomb of the Imām al-Shāfi'i. He then became professor in the mosque at Cairo, called al-Jāmi' al-Zāfirī, and his increased reputation attracted numerous pupils. The successful results of his tuition excited at length the jealousy of some native jurisconsults, who formed a party against him, and accused him of heterodoxy, laxity of moral principle, atheism and attachment to the doctrines of the (ancient Greeks) philosophers and sages. They then drew up a complaint in which they denounced him guilty of these crimes, and affixed to it their signatures with the declaration that he deserved the punishment of death. I have been informed by one of those doctors, who was a man of intelligence and instruction, that, on remarking the excessive animosity by which the cabal was actuated, he inscribed the following verse with his signature on the document, when it was brought to him that he might insert in it a declaration similar to that of the others :

1 Abu 'l-Qāsim Yaḥyā Ibn 'Alī Ibn al-Faḍl Ibn Hibat Allāh, surnamed Ibn Faḍlān and Jamāl al-Dīn (beauty of religion), was a learned doctor of the sect of al-Shāfi'i. He studied jurisprudence at Baḥḥad, his native place, under Abū Maṣṣūr al-Razzāq, and at Naysāpūr under 'Alī Ibn Muḥammad Ibn Yaḥyā, a disciple of al-Ghazzālī. He professed at Baḥḥad, and was considered as one of the first master's in the science of jurisprudence, dogmatic theology, controversy, and dialectics. Born A. H. 515 (A. C. 1121-2); died in the month of Ṣhaḥbān A. H. 555 (June, A. C. 1199). (Ṭab al-Shāfi'.)

2 This Ṭarīqah is designated further on as the Jadl; it seems to have been a treatise on points of law controverted between the orthodox sects. The author, who is here designated the Sharīf, is unknown to me, and has not been noticed by Ḥajjī Khalīfah. The whole passage of Ibn Khalīkān has been repeated, without any observation, in the Ṭabaqāt al-Shāfi'īn and by al-Yāfi'i in his Annals.

3 Read الميهني in the printed text, not, البيهقي.

"They envied the man because they could not equal him in merit ; such are his foes and accusers."

When Sayf al-Dīn perceived his enemies combined against him and discovered their projects, he withdrew secretly from the country and proceeded to Syria. He then settled in the city of Ḥamāt and composed a number of instructive works on dogmatic theology, the fundamentals of jurisprudence, logic, philosophy, and controversy. Of these we shall indicate the Abkār al-Askār (original ideas) on scholastic theology ; an abridgment of the same, entitled Manā'ih al-Qarā'ih (borrowings from natural genius) ; the Rumūz al-Kunūz (indications of hidden treasures) ; the Daqā'iq al-Ḥaqā'iq (subtilia veritatum) ; the Lubāb al-Albāb (core of the hearts) ; the Muntihā 'l-Sūl (results of inquiry) ; being a treatise on the fundamentals (of faith and jurisprudence). He composed also a system of controversy, an abridgment of the same, and a commentary on the Sharīf's Jahl, or treatise on dialectics. The number of his works amounted to about twenty. Having removed to Damascus, he obtained the professorship in the 'Azīziyah college, but after a lapse of some time he was deprived of his place, on account of some suspicions which had been cast upon him. From that period till his death, he remained unoccupied and confined himself to his house. He died on the 3rd of Ṣafar, A.H. 631 (November, A.C. 1233)*, and was buried at the foot of mount Qāsiyūn. His birth took place A.H. 551 (A.C. 1156). " 'Āmidī means belonging to 'Āmid, a large city in Diyār Bakr, near the country of Rūm (Asia Minor). Abu l-Faṭḥ Naṣr Ibn Fityān Ibn al-Manni was a doctor of the law and a traditionist.

---

1 By system of controversy is meant a general view of all the points on which the orthodox sects disagree ; with the arguments in favour of the opinions held by the sect to which the author belongs.

* 8 November.—Ed.

He instructed numerous disciples. Born A.H. 501 (A.C. 1107-8); died, 5th Ramaḍān, 583 (November, A.C. 1187).*

408 AL-KISĀ'Ī

Abu 'l-Ḥasan 'Alī Ibn Ḥamzah Ibn 'Abd Allāh Ibn Bahman Ibn Fayrūz, surnamed al-Kisā'ī a mawlā to the tribe of Asad and a native of Kūfah, was one of the seven readers of the Qur'ān. In grammar, philology, and the Qur'ānic readings he displayed abilities of the highest order, but in poetry his skill was so inferior that it was currently said: "Amongst all the learned in grammar, there is not one who knows less of poetry than al-Kisā'ī." He was tutor to al-Amin the son of Hārūn al-Rashīd and instructed him in the belles-lettres. Having neither wife nor slave-girl, he addressed some verses to al-Rashīd, complaining of his celibacy<sup>1</sup>, and that khalīf ordered him a present of ten thousand pieces of silver, a beautiful slave-girl with all her attire, a eunuch, and a horse completely harnessed. Being one day in company with Muḥammad Ibn al-Ḥasan, the Ḥanīfite jurisconsult, at an assembly held by al-Rashīd, he remarked that a person versed in one science could find his ways in all the others, on which Muḥammad said to him: "What is then your opinion of a man who, in making the satisfactory prostrations which some neglect or irregularity in the prescribed prayers rendered necessary again commits an irregularity? must he renew his prostrations?" To this he replied in the negative<sup>2</sup>, and gave for reason that a noun which has already assumed the diminutive form cannot be diminished again. It is thus that I found this anecdote related in a number of places, but the Khaṭīb says, in his History of Baghdād, that the conversation took 1 Ibn Khaṭīb gives the verses, but they cannot be translated. They form an enigma the word of which designates the attribute of Priapus.

2 This is conformable to the law which says: سجود السجود في سجود السجود لا يجب.

* 8 November. — Ed.

place between Muḥammad Ibn al-Ḥasan and al-Farrāʾī, who were sisters' sons. Muḥammad then asked him if the sentence of divorce joined to the condition of possession was valid? Al-Kisāʾī answered that it was not, and gave for reason that the torrent does not precede the rain<sup>2</sup>. He had some conferences and discussions

1 The lives of the grammarian Abū Zakariya Yahyā al-Farrāʾī and of the jurisconsult Muḥammad Ibn al-Ḥasan will be found in this work.

2 The sentence of divorce joined to the condition of possession (ta'liq al-ṭalāq ba 'lmilk) is when a man says to a woman who is not his wife. If I marry thee, thou art divorced, or when he says: Every woman whom I may marry is divorced. The Ḥanifite doctors admit the validity of the divorce in this case, and consider it as immediately effected by the act of marriage. The Shāfiʿites deny its validity. Al-Kisāʾī denied it also on the principle that the torrent does not precede the rain, or, in other words, that the consequence cannot precede the antecedent. The expression he makes use of was proverbial among the Arabs of the desert, and well known also to every philologist and grammarian. It is to be found in Freytag's Meidani, Vol. I, page 613, under another form, namely سبق مطره سيله precessit pluvia ejus torrentem ejus,

The milk or possession is effected by the act of marriage التزويج سبب للملك and the married man is malik or possessor. The persons who take an interest in this question will find the requisite information in D'Oshson's Tableau general de l'empire ottoman, tom. V., p. 208. and Hamilton's Hidāyah, Vol. I. The following extracts from works of high authority are relative to this question; but as their technicality renders a literal transmission extremely difficult, I prefer giving them in the original language.

إذا اُضيف الطلاق إلى النكاح وقع عقيب النكاح نحو ان يقول
لامرأة ان تزوجتك فانت طالق او كل امرأة تزوجها فهي طالق
... و اذا اُضافه إلى الشرط وقع عقيب الشرط مثل ان يقول لامراته
ان دخلت الدار فانت طالق - ولا يصح اضافة الطلاق الا ان يكون
الطالق مالكا او يضيفه إلى ملك والاُضافه إلى سبب الملك كالتزويج
كا لا اضافة إلى الملك -

(Fatāwā 'Ālamgiri, Vol. I. p. 586)

قول ابي حنيفة انه يصح تعليق الطلاق والعق بالملك
فيلزم الطلاق او العتق سواء اطلق او عمم او خصص و صورته ان
يقول لا جنبه ان تزوجتك فانت طالق او كل امرأة تزوجها

(Continued on page 289)

with Sibawayh and Abū Muḥammad al-Yazīdī, of which we shall take further notice in the lives of these two grammarians. The traditional knowledge handed down by al-Kisā'ī was received by him from Abū Bakr Ibn 'Ayyāsh (no. 242), Ḥamzah al-Zayyāt (no. 199), Ibn 'Uyaynah (no. 255), and others; among the persons who transmitted the information furnished by al-Kisā'ī were al-Farrā and Abū 'Ubayd al-Qāsim Ibn Sallām. Al-Kisā'ī died A.H. 189 (A.C. 804-5) at Ray, to which city he had accompanied Hārūn al-Rashīd. Al-Sam'ānī observes that the death of Muḥammad Ibn al-Ḥasan occurred on the same day and at the same place, but Ibn al-Jawzī remarks, in his Shudhūr al-'Uqūd, that he (the latter) died at Zanbawayh,* a village in the canton of Ray. Al-Sam'ānī states again that al-Kisā'ī died at Ṭūs in A.H. 182 (A.C. 798-9); or 183. God knows best the truth! It is related that al-Rashīd said on this occasion: "The sciences of jurisprudence and grammar have been interred at Ray." Kisā'ī means a wearer of a Kisā or cloak: he received this name because, on his arrival at Kūfah, he went muffled up in a cloak to Ḥamzah Ibn Ḥabīb al-Zayyāt, who (being then engaged in giving lessons to his pupils) asked which of them wished to read? To this one of them replied: "He with the cloak (al-Kisā'ī)."* Others state that he was so called because he had used a cloak instead of an Ihrām when performing the pilgrimage.

409 AL-DĀRAQUṬNĪ

Abu 'l-Ḥasan 'Alī Ibn 'Umar Ibn Aḥmad Ibn Maḥdī, a ḥāfiẓ of great learning and celebrity, and a jurisconsult of the sect of

(Continued from page 288)

فهو طالق او يقول لعبد ان ملكتك فانت حر او كل عبد اشتريته
فهو حر و قول مالك انه يلزم الطلاق او العتق اذا خصص او
عين قبيله او قريه او امرأة بعينها لا ان اطلق او عمم و قول
الشافعي و احمد انه لا يلزم الطلاق او العتق مطاقا -

(al-Mizān al-Sharāniyah. MS. No. 369, fol. 194).

* The Egyptian edition gives Ranbawayh.—Ed.

al-Shāfi'i, was a native of Baghdād. He acquired his knowledge of the law from Abū Sa'īd al-Iṣṭakhrī the Shāfi'ite doctor (no. 150); but this statement is contradicted by some, who pretend that one of Abū Sa'īd's disciples was his master in that science. He learned the reading of the Qur'ān, by audition and repetition<sup>1</sup>, under Muḥammad Ibn al-Ḥasan al-Naqqāsh. 'Alī Ibn Sa'īd al-Qazzāz, Muḥammad Ibn al-Ḥusayn al-Ṭabarī and other eminent teachers of the same period. When a mere boy, he began to learn Traditions from Abū Bakr Ibn Mujāhid (no. 11, note), and having at length come to be considered as the sole Imām (or first master) of the age in that science, none of his contemporaries ever disputed his title. Towards the end of his life he commenced teaching the Qur'ān readings at Baghdād. He was well informed on the points wherein the doctors of the different sects disagree, and he knew by heart many of the diwāns, or collected poetical works, of the desert Arabs. As one of these dīwāns consisted of the poems composed by al-Sayyid al-Ḥimyarī<sup>2</sup>, he was held by some for a 1 See the observations No. 249, note.

2 I am indebted to M. Caussin de Perceval for the following note on al-Ḥimyarī:

Esseyid al-Ḥimyarī, dont le prenom était Abou Hāchīm et le véritable nom Ismail, était fils de Mohammad fils de Yezyd fils de Rabia, etc. Son grand-père Yezyd avait composé des satires contre Zyād (Ibn Abihi) et ses fils, et fut pour cela jeté en prison et tourmenté par Obaydallah fils de Zyād. Les trois poètes arabes qui ont fait le plus de vers sont Bechar, Abou'l-Atahiyya et Esseyid; personne n'a pu recueillir toutes leurs poésies. Quant à Esseyid, ses vers sont tombés dans l'oubli, malgré leur nombre et leur mérite, parcequ'ils sont remplis d'attaques contre les compagnons du 1/4 Prophète, contre Abou Becr, Omar, Othman et contre Ayecha et autres épouses de Mahomet. Les père et mère d'Esseyid étaient de la secte hérétique des Ebadhi "أبا ضيعه", lui il était de la secte chiite des Keissani كيسانية. (Cette secte, suivant Ibn Khaldoun, trait son non de son fondateur Kessān). Il admettait l'imāmat de Mohammad Ibn al-Hanafiya (his life is given by Ibn Khallikan) et professait l'opinion du retour "يقول بالرجعة" c'est-à-dire qu'il croyait que Mohammad Ibn el-Hanafiya n'était point mort et qu'il reviendrait un jour. Esseyid a fait beaucoup de poésies on l'honneur des Hachemites, particulièrement des Alides, et contre les ars adversaires. Lorsque les Omeyyades furent renversés, il complimenta Abu 'l-Abbas Seffah, qui, pour le recompenser follower of the Shī'ite doctrines. Traditional information was given on his authority by Abū Nu'aym (no. 32) the author of the Ḥilyat al-Awliyā and by many other persons. In the year 376 (A.C. 986-7) he gave evidence as a witness before the qādī Ibn Ma'rūf (no. 154) an act of which he afterwards repented, "because," said he, "the statements which I furnished relative to the blessed Prophet were admitted on my own authority as exact, whereas my declaration in a court of justice is not receivable unless corroborated by that of another person<sup>1</sup>." Amongst the works composed by him are a Sunan, or collection of Traditions, and a Mukhtaliḥ wa Mu'taliḥ<sup>2</sup>. He was induced to leave Baghdād and travel to Egypt by the intelligence which he received that Abu 'l-Faḍl Ja'far Ibn Ḥinzābah (no. 130), the Wazīr of Kāfūr, had the intention of composing a Musnad<sup>3</sup>. As he wished to assist in that work, he undertook the journey and remained with the Wazīr for sometime, during which he received from him marks of the highest honour, with a liberal subvention for his expenses, and an abundance of presents. He de ses vers, lui dit de demander ce qu'il voudrait. Esseyid demanda pour Souleyman fils de Habib le gouvernement d'el-Ahwāz, qui lui fut accordé. Le cadī de Basra, Sewwar fils d'Abadallah, ayant un jour refusé d'admettre son témoignage en justice. Esseyid lui écrivit une lettre où il le baffouait et alla ensuite reciter au calife Mansour une satire virulente contre ce magistrat ; celui-ci vint à l'instant se plaindre. Mansour lui dit en riant : Ne sais-tu pas qu'Eyas fils de Moāwia recur le témoignage de Farazdak ; pourquoi blesser un homme qui a une langue comme celle d'Esseyid ?" Ensuite le calife ordonna à Esseyid de faire sa paix avec le cadī. Mais l'inimitié du poète et du juge continua, et ils cherchaient à se nuire réciproquement. Esseyid ayant dit un jour au calife que Sewwar voulait suborner des témoins pour le condamner comme coupable de vol, Mansour fit venir le cadī "et lui dit : "Je t'ôte à l'égard d'Esseyid tes fonctions de juge". Esseyid mourut à Wasit, les uns disent sous le règne de Mansour, d'autres sous celui de Haroun—[According to Abū'l-Maḥāsīn, in his Nujūm, this poet died A. H. 171 (A. C. 787-8).

(Continued on page 291)

(Continued from page 290)

1 In all civil and criminal causes, generally speaking the evidence of two witnesses is requisite to establish the proof of a fact. In civil matters, witnesses may, if they like, withhold their evidence.

2 This is a treatise on such traditionists as might be confounded with others from the similarity of their names.

3 See No. 130, note on Musnad.

thus, by the favour of Ibn Ḥinzābah became possessor of a large fortune, and he remained with him till the completion of the work. During that period, he and the ḥāfiẓ 'Abd al-Ḡhanī Ibn Sa'īd (no. 376) contributed their joint efforts to the task of extracting (the materials of) the Musnad (from various sources) and writing them out. 'Abd al-Ḡhanī used to say: "The persons who discoursed the best of all on the Traditions of the Prophet<sup>2</sup> were three in number; 'Ali Ibn al-Madīnī<sup>1</sup> in his age, Mūsā Ibn Ḥārūn<sup>2</sup> in his, and al-Dāraquṭnī in ours." One of al-Dāraquṭnī's pupils having asked him if he ever saw a person equal to himself (in learning), he returned no direct answer, but merely observed that God had said: "Justify not yourselves<sup>3</sup>." The other insisted notwithstanding, and al-Dāraquṭnī at length replied: "If you mean in a single science, I have seen (persons) more able than myself; but if you mean in all the branches of knowledge which I possess,

---

1 Abu 'l-Ḥasan 'Alī Ibn 'Abd Allāh Ibn Ja'far Ibn Najīb Ibn al-Madīnī, a mawla to the tribe of Sa'd, a ḥāfiẓ of the highest eminence, and one of the great imāms of Islāmism, was a native of Baḡrah. His acquirements in the Traditions were most extensive, and he displayed great penetration in appreciating their authenticity and the credibility of the persons by whom they had been transmitted down العلل والتعديل والجرح. He composed nearly two hundred works on the subject, and his authority was cited by al-Bukhārī, Aḥmad Ibn Ḥanbal, Abū Dāwūd, al-Nisā'i, Ibn Mājah, al-Termedī, and others. His conduct and demeanour were modelled on that of the early Muslims, and his actions, words, dress, manner of sitting, and general behaviour were noted down, by the learned doctors of that time, as worthy of imitation. He received his traditional knowledge from his own father, who was also a celebrated traditionist, and from Ḥammād Ibn Zayd, Sufyān Ibn 'Uyaynah, Hughaym, and others. Al-Bukhārī said of him: "I was never sensible of my inferiority but in the presence of 'Alī Ibn al-Madīnī;" and Ibn 'Uyaynah declared that were it not on Ibn al-Madīnī's account, he would never have given lessons ما جلت. He was born. A. H. 161 (A. C. 777-8), and he died in the month of Dhū 'l-Qā'dah, A. H. 234 (May-June, A. H. 849). 'Uyūn al-Tawārīkh, Al-Nujūm al-Zāhirah. Ṭabaqāt al-Fuqahā. Abu 'l-Feda's Annals; and Reiske's note).

2 The ḥāfiẓ Abū 'Imrān Mūsā Ibn Ḥārūn was a native of Baḡhdād. He bore the reputation of being the first imām of the age in the science of Traditions. He died A. H. 294 (A. C. 906-7).—(Al-Yāfi'i).

3 Qur'an, sūrat 53, verse 33.

why then I never met my equal." He was versed in a great variety of sciences, and was a master of the highest rank in those connected with the Qur'ān. His birth took place in the month of Dhu 'l-Qa'dah, 306, (April, A.C. 919), and his death occurred at Baghḍād on Wednesday, the 8th (some say the 2nd) of Dhu 'l-Qa'dah, A.H. 385 (December, A.C. 995).* Some place his death in the month of Dhu 'l-Ḥijjah. The funeral service was said over him by Abu Ḥāmid al-Isfara'īni (no. 25), and he was buried in the cemetery at the Convent Gate (Bāb al-Dayr), near the tomb of Ma'rūf al-Karkhīl. Dāraqutnī means belonging to Dār al-Qutn (cotton-house), an extensive quarter of Baghḍād.

410 AL-RUMMĀNĪ

Abu 'l-Ḥasan 'Alī Ibn 'Isā Ibn 'Alī Ibn 'Abd Allāh al-Rummānī was a celebrated and learned Imām in the sciences of grammar and scholastic theology. He is also the author of an interpretation of the Qur'ān. His master in general literature were Abū Bakr (Muḥammad) Ibn al-Sarrāj; and some of the information which he acquired was transmitted down from him by Abū 'l-Qāsim (Muḥammad) al-Tanūkhī<sup>2</sup>, Abū Muḥammad al-Jawharī, and others. He was born at Baghḍād. A.H. 296 (A.C. 903-9), and he died on the eve of Sunday, the 11th of the first Jumādā. A.H. 384 (June, A.C. 994)†; according to another statement, he died A.H. 382. His family belonged to Sarraman-raa. Rummānī may here possibly signify a seller of Rummān or pomegranates, but it may also serve to designate a native of Qaṣr al-Rummān, a well-known castle at Wāsiṭ. A great number of persons have received this surname for one or the other reason, but which of these it was that procured it for Abu 'l-Ḥasan is not specified by al-Sam'ānī.

1 The life of Ma'rūf is given by Ibn Khallikān.

2 The lives of three persons just mentioned are given by Ibn Khallikān.

* 4 December or 28 November.—Ed.

† 24 June.—Ed.

411 ABU 'L-ḤASAN AL-ḤAWFĪ

Abu 'l-Ḥasan 'Alī Ibn Ibrāhīm Ibn Sa'id Ibn Yūsuf al-Ḥawfī was a learned grammarian and an able expositor of the Qur'ān, on which last subject he left an excellent work. He directed the studies of numerous pupils with success, and I have remarked, in many books on philological subjects, certificates in his own hand-writing to prove that the possessors of these books had read them under his tuition; in this he followed the general custom of teachers. He died on Saturday morning, the 1st of Dhu 'l-Hijjah, A.H. 430 (August, A.C. 1039).* Relative to Ḥawf from which the surname of Ḥawfī is derived, al-Sam'ānī says: "I imagined that it was a village in Egypt, till I saw in al-Bukhārī's historical work that it is situated in 'Umān. Abu 'l-Ḥasan al-Ḥawfī drew his origin from this place: he possessed a great portion of the works composed by Abū Ja'far al-Naḥḥās (no. 39). On this I must observe that Ḥawf is not, as he supposes, a village in Egypt, but a well-known tract of country in the province of Sharqiyah, the capital of which is Bulbays: they give the name of Ḥawf to all the Rif, or cultivated part<sup>1</sup> of that country, but I do not know of village there so called. Abu 'l-Ḥasan belonged to the Ḥawf in Egypt. The preceding article had been finished some time when I met with a notice containing the particulars of al-Ḥawfī's life. From this it appears that he belonged to a village called Shubra 'l-Nakhlah<sup>2</sup>, in the province of Sharqiyah; he then went to Old Cairo (Miṣr), where he studied under Abū Bakr, al-Adḥuwī, and met with a number of learned Maghribīns, from whom he derived considerable information; he then commenced as a professor of grammar, and composed a large work on that

1 The difficulty of reconciling the accounts, given by Arabic geographers, of the Ḥawf and the Rif was first pointed out by M. de Sacy in his 'Abd-Allatif. M. Quatremere, has some observations on the subject in his Recherches sur l'Egypte, p. 179. et seq. The solution of the difficulty is due to M. Reinuad. See his translation of Abu'l-Feda's Geography, page 141, note.

2 In the place of "النخلة" the autograph has a word which may be read "اللمعة" or "اللمعة".

* 25 August — Ed.

science, and another, in ten volumes, containing the grammatical analysis of the Qur'ān. A great number of his treatises are still studied.

412 AL-AKHFASH AL-AŞGHAR

Abu 'l-Ḥasan 'Alī Ibn Sulaymān Ibn al-Faḍl, better known by the appellation of al-Akhfash al-Aşghar (al-Akhfash the less), was a learned grammarian. The information which he communicated to his pupils was given by him on the authority of al-Mubarrad. Tha'lab, and other great masters; his own authority was cited by al-Marzubānī, Abu 'l-Faraj al-Mu'āfā al-Jarīrī, and others. His character as a trustworthy transmitter of traditional knowledge is well established. He must not be confounded with al-Akhfash al-Akbar, or with al-Akhfash al-Awsaṭ (no. 252): al-Akhfash al-Akbar, whose real names were Abu 'l-Khaṭṭāb 'Abd al-Ḥamid Ibn 'Abd al-Majīd: was a native of Hajar and a mawlā to one of the tribes inhabiting that region. He was a grammarian, a philologist, and a transmitter of expressions peculiar to the Arabs of the desert, some of which are made known, for the first time, by himself. Sibawayh, Abū 'Ubaydah, and other eminent scholars of the same period, received a portion of their information from him. As I was unable to discover the date of his death, I could not devote a special article to him in this work<sup>2</sup>. As for al-Akhfash al-Awsaṭ, whose name was Sa'īd Ibn Mas'adah, and who had been a pupil of Sibawayh, he has been already noticed (no. 252). Al-Akhfash al-Aşghar and the poet Ibn al-Rūmī were at enmity with each other, and as the latter was very superstitious, al-Akhfash used to go to his door, early in the morning, and pronounce word of ill omen: this prevented Ibn al-Rūmī from stirring out during that day. Being provoked at length by this annoyance, the poet attacked his enemy in a number of satires, which are still extant in the collection of his works; but al-Akhfash got them off by heart and cited them with approbation in his lessons; testifying at the same time how proud he was of the honour done to him by Ibn al-Rūmī in satirizing him. When this came to the ears of the poet, he discontinued his attacks. "The stock of poetry" says al-Marzubānī, which al-Akhfash knew by heart and taught with the authorisation of his preceptors, was very limited; this was also the case with his grammatical information. He never drew up a single work, nor pronounced a line of poetry composed by himself; and when questioned on a point of grammar, he would lose patience and dismiss the applicant with an abrupt refusal." He died suddenly at Baghdād, in the month of Dhu 'l-Qa'dah, A.H. 315 (December-January, A.C. 927-8); others say, in the month of Shabān of that year, or in the year 316. He was interred in the cemetery at the bridge of Baradān. In the year 287 (A.C. 900) he visited Egypt, and in 306 (A.C. 918-9) he proceeded from that country to Aleppo. Akhfash means having little eyes and a bad sight. Baradān is the name of a village in the dependencies of Baghdād; it has produced a number of learned men and other remarkable persons. "This al-Akhfash," says Abu l-Ḥasan Thābit Ibn Sinān (no. 125n), "used to pay assiduous court to Abū 'Alī Ibn Muqlah<sup>1</sup>, by whom he was treated with great attention and kindness. He one day complained to him of the extreme indigence to which he was reduced, and requested him to acquaint the Wazīr Abu 'l-Ḥasan 'Alī Ibn 'Isā with his situation, and pray him to inscribe his name on the list of literary men who received pensions. Abū 'Alī spoke to the Wazīr on the subject, informing him al-Akhfash was in very reduced circumstances and had hardly any means of existence for which reason he begged of him to settle a pension on him as on the other literary men of the time. To this the Wazīr gave a positive refusal expressed in the rudest manner, and that in the presence of a large company. Abū 'Alī felt so highly offended at Wazīr's conduct that he retired from the assembly and went home, repenting of having asked any thing from him. As for al-Akhfash, he remained in his former state and became quite dispirited. His misery at length reached to such a pitch, that he was obliged by hunger to eat raw beetroots. It is said that he died suddenly of a spasm of the heart."

1 The lives of these two persons are given by Ibn Khallikān.

2 See the author's observations in the preface, Vol. I.

1 The life of Ibn Muqlah is given by Ibn Khallikān.

413 AL-WĀḤIDĪ

Abu 'l-Ḥasan 'Alī Ibn Aḥmad Ibn Muḥammad Ibn 'Alī Ibn Maṭṭūyah al-Wāḥidī al-Maṭṭūwī, the author of the celebrated commentaries (on the Qur'ān), was the first master of his time in the sciences of grammar and Qur'ānic exegesis. The divine grace which attended him is manifest in his works; they were universally considered as excellent, and were frequently cited by professors in their lessons. Three of them, the Basīṭ (in extenso), the Wasīṭ (medium), and the Wajīz (compendium), or on the interpretation of the Qur'ān, and their titles have been adopted by Abū Ḥāmid al-Ḡhazzālī for three of his own works. He composed also a treatise on the motives for which the different portions of the Qur'ān were revealed; a work called the Ta'ḥbīr (indication)<sup>1</sup>, containing an explanation of the (ninety-nine) excellent names given to God; a full commentary on the poems of al-Mutanabbi, surpassing in excellence all the numerous works on the same subject, and containing many curious observations: it is thus that after explaining the following verse:

"When noble deeds, swords, spears, the daughters of A'waj—all are assembled together,"

He adds; "A'waj was a stallion of noble race, belonging to the tribe of Hilāl Ibn 'Āmir. The owner was asked what was the greatest degree of speed which he ever remarked in him, and he replied: 'I was riding him and lost my way in the desert, but, seeing a flock of qaṣās<sup>2</sup> in quest of water, I followed them with a tight rein, and we all arrived at the spring in a single heat.' This was a most extraordinary thing, for qaṣās are very swift of flight, and when they make towards a watering-place, their speed is much greater than ordinary. This, however, was not sufficient for the Arab in his description, and he added that he kept in his horse with a tight rein; had he not done so, he would have outstripped the qaṣās: which is a fine specimen of amplification. The horse was named A'waj (the twisted) for this reason: when he was a 1 In the autograph this title is written Taḥbīr (embellishment).

2 See No. 364, note on qaṣa.

foal, a hostile troop came down to attack the tribe, on which they took to flight, and as the little animal had not sufficient strength to keep up with them, they put him into a sack and carried him off. His back got a twist from this treatment, and he was therefore called A'waj." The verse just cited is taken from the poem in which the author laments the death of Fātik al-Majnūn<sup>1</sup>. Al-Wāḥidī was a pupil of al-Tha'labī, the author of celebrated commentary on the Qur'ān (no. 30); he learned from him the science of Qur'ānic interpretation, and ended by surpassing him. He died of a lingering disease in the month of the latter Jumādā, A. H. 468 January-February, (A.C. 1076), at Naysāpūr. Muttawī means decended from Mattūyah. I do not know the origin of the relative adjective Wāḥidī, neither does al-Sam'ānī mention it. I have since discovered that Abū Aḥmad al-'Askarī (no. 382) derives it from al-Wāḥid, the name of a person who was the son of al-Dīn Ibn Mahrah.<sup>2</sup>

414 IBN MĀKŪLĀ

The Amir Abū Naṣr 'Alī, surnamed Sa'd al-Mulk (the good fortune of the kingdom), and generally known by the name of Ibn Mākūlā, was the son of Hibat Allāh Ibn 'Alī Ibn Ja'far Ibn 'Allakān Ibn Muḥammad Ibn Dulaf Ibn Abi Dulaf al-Qāsim Ibn 'Isā [Ibn Idrīs Ibn Ma'qal Ibn 'Umayr]* al-'Ijlī: the remainder of the genealogy is given in the life of his ancestor Abū Dulaf al-Qāsim. His family belonged to Jarbādhāqān, a place near Iṣpahān, and his father Abu 'l-Qāsim Hibat Allāh was Wazīr to the Imām (Khalīf) al-Qā'im bi'amar Allāh. His paternal uncle Abu 'Abd Allāh al-Ḥasan Ibn 'Alī, who filled the place of qūḍī at Baghdād, had learned a great quantity of Traditions: he composed also some instructive works, after studying under the most eminent masters in 'Irāq Khurāsān, 1 His life is given by Ibn Khallikān, and the poem will be found in M. Grangeret de Lagrange's Anthologie Arabe.

2 This Mahrah may perhaps be the son of Quḍā'ah, noticed by Ibn Qutaybah, Eichhorn's Monumenta Hist. Arab. XI.

* [ ] Addition in the autograph supported by Egyptian edition.—Ed.

Syria, and other countries, Abū Naṣr (Ibn Mākūlā), a man celebrated for his talents and learning was sedulously and successfully devoted to the research of such proper names, as were uncertain in their meaning and derivation<sup>1</sup>. The Khātib Abū Bakr, author of the History of Baghdād, had taken the Mukhtaliḥ wa Mu'taliḥ of al-Dāraqūṭnī (no. 409), and the Mushtabih al-Nisbah of the hāfiẓ 'Abd al-Ḡhanī (no. 376) and combined them together, with some additions of his own: forming thus a new work to which he gave the title of al-Mu'tanif Takmilat 'l-Mukhtaliḥ (the recommenced, being the completion of the Mukhtaliḥ). The Amīr Abū Naṣr augmented this Takmilah with the names which he had discovered, and made it into a new work under the title of al-Ikmāl (the completion). This last is extremely useful for fixing the orthography and pronunciation of proper names, and clearing up the uncertainties which may subsist on these points: it is the standard authority of the persons engaged in this study and of the traditionists, in as much as it surpasses all similar productions by its intrinsic excellence. A supplement, composed with no inferior talent, was added to it afterwards by Ibn Nuṭṭah, (a traditionist) whose life shall be given in this work. The talent displayed by the Amīr Ibn Mākūlā in his Ikmāl is quite sufficient for his reputation: it is a monument of the extensive acquirements, solid learning, and correct information of the author. The following lines are attributed to him:

"Strike thy tent and quit the land where thou art despised; avoid humiliation; humiliation should always be avoided. Depart from the place where thy merit is not acknowledged; the aloes-wood is employed for common uses in its nativeland."<sup>2</sup>

He was born at 'Ukbarā on the 5th of Ṣha'bān, A.H. 421 (August, A.C. 1030)*, and he was murdered at Jurjān by his servants between the years 470 and 480. Ibn al-Jawzī mentions, in his Kitāb al-Muntaẓim, that he was killed in A.H. 475, (A.C. 1082-3) or in 487, according to some. Another authority gives 479 as the year, and Khurāsān

1 The autograph has الإلفاظ المشبهة في الأسماء الأعلام.

2 Literally: The green aloes-wood in its localities is (as common) wood.

* 12 August.—Ed.

as the place of his death but al-Ahwāz is also indicated as the country where he met with his fate. Al-Ḥumaydī<sup>1</sup> says: "He set out for Khurāsān with some young Turkish slaves who belonged to him; but they murdered him at Jurjān and fled with his money. The crime remained unpunished." The poet Ṣurr-Durr (whose life we shall give) celebrated the praises of Ibn Mākūlā, and the eulogium is still extant in his collected poetical works. The meaning of the word Mākūlā is unknown to me; and I am unable to say whether the title of Amīr was given to him because he was really one, or because he was a descendant of (the Amīr) Abū Dulaf al-'Ijlī. Of 'Ukbara I have already spoken in the life of Abū 'l-Baqā (no. 324),

415 ABU 'L-FARAJ AL-IṢPAḤĀNĪ

Abu 'l-Faraj 'Alī, the Kātib and author of the Kitāb al-Aghānī<sup>2</sup> was a member of the tribe of Quraysh and a descendant of Marwān Ibn Muḥammad, the last of the Omyyide khalifas. His genealogy is thus given: Abū 'l-Faraj 'Alī Ibn al-Ḥusayn Ibn Muḥammad Ibn Aḥmad Ibn al-Haytham Ibn 'Abd al-Raḥmān Ibn Marwān Ibn 'Abd Allāh Ibn Marwān Ibn Muḥammad Ibn Marwān Ibn al-Ḥakam Ibn Abi 'l-'Āṣi Ibn 'Umayyah Ibn 'Abd Shams Ibn 'Abd Mināf. His family inhabited Iṣpahan, but he passed his early youth in Baḥdād, and became the most distinguished scholar and most eminent author of that city. It would be too long to enumerate the learned men from whom he received and transmitted down his information. He was well acquainted with the days (or contests) of the Arabs, their genealogy and history "Amongst

1 The life of Abū 'Abd Allāh al-Ḥumaydī is given in this work. He died A. H. 488.

2 A considerable portion of this article has already appeared in a French translation. See M. Quatremere's Memoire sur le Kitāb al-Aghānī in the Journal Asiatique for November, 1835. It may be remarked that in rendering certain expressions and passages, I have occasionally differed from the learned scholar.

the persons whom we met with," says al-Tanūkhī<sup>1</sup>, "and who professed Shi'ite opinions, was Abu 'l-Faraj al-Ispahānī. I never found a person knowing by heart such a quantity—as he did of poems, songs, historical relations, anecdotes of ancient times, authentic narratives<sup>2</sup>, and genealogies; besides which he possessed information in other sciences, such as philology, grammar, story-telling, biography, and the history of the Muslim conquests; he was acquainted also with the branches of knowledge requisite for a boon-companion, such as falconry, farriery, the preparation of beverages, a smattering of medicine and astrology, etc." His verses combine the learning of the scholar with the grace and elegance of the poet; his other works are excellent; and one of them, the Kitāb al-Aghāni (book of songs)<sup>3</sup> is unanimously considered as unequalled. It is said that he was fifty-years in compiling it, and that he took it to Sayf al-Dawlat Ibn Hamdān, who remunerated him with one thousand pieces of gold, regretting at the same time his inability to offer a more adequate recompense. It is related that when the Ṣāhib Ibn 'Abbād (no. 93) was travelling or changing residence, he took with him for perusal thirty camel-loads of books on literary subjects; but, on receiving the Kitāb al-Aghāni, he found he could dispense with all the others and took it alone. The other works of Abu 'l-Faraj are: the Kitāb al-Qiyān (history of female musicians); (the Kitāb al-Imā' al-Shawā'ir, history of the female slaves who were poets); the Kitāb al-Diyārāt (book of monasteries)<sup>4</sup>; the Kitāb Da'wat al-Tijār (on the mercantile profession)<sup>5</sup>; a collection of songs without note or comment; the 1 Abu 'l-Qāsim 'Alī al-Tanūkhī and his son Abū 'Alī al-Muḥassin were both contemporaries of Abu 'l-Faraj; it is therefore difficult to say which of them is the person cited here by Ibn Khallikān. Their lives are given in this work.

2 Literally: Narratives with their Isnads. See Introduction.

3 A complete edition of this important work, text and Latin translation, has been undertaken by professor Kosegarten. The three first parts have appeared under the title of Alīi Ispahanensis liber Cantilenarum magnus.

4 This was a collection of the best poems inspired by the view of Christian monasteries and the aspect of monastic life. It was a very common subject with the Muslim poets of the third and fourth century of the Hijrah. See the life of al-Shābughī in this work.

5 Literally: On the merchants' calling.

Adventures of Jahẓat al-Barmaki (no. 54); the Kitāb Maqāṣil il-Tālibiyyin (account of the tragical fate of 'Alī Ibn Abī Tālib's descendants); the Kitāb al-Ḥarāt (book of taverns);<sup>1</sup> and the Ādāb al-Ghurabā (manners or literary studies of foreigners). A number of works composed by him for the Omayyids of Spain are still extant in that country; he forwarded them privately to these princes, and the marks of their beneficence were transmitted to him in the same manner. Amongst these works were the following: Genealogy of the descendants of 'Abd Shams; Battle-days of the Arabs, containing an account of one thousand seven hundred combats; the Kitāb al-Ta'dil wa 'l-Intiṣāf (impartial examination and appreciation of the noble deeds and the opprobrious action of the Arabs); the Jamharat al-Nisab (comprehensive genealogical treatise); the Genealogy of the descendants of Shaybān; the Genealogy of the Muhallabite family; the Genealogy of the descendants of Tāḥlāb; the Genealogy of the descendants of Kilāb; History of the slave-boys who were good singers, etc. Abu 'l-Faraj was exclusively attached to the Wazīr al-Muhallabi, and he composed some pieces of poetry in his praise, one of which is as follows:

"When we sought for means of subsistence and took shelter under his protection, he gave relief yet spared our feelings; he was beneficent, yet vaunted not the greatness of his favours. We went to him poor, and he restored us to wealth; we had recourse to his liberality in our distress, and he placed us in the midst of abundance."

A Great concubine belonging to the Wazīr having been delivered of a son, the poet congratulated him on the happy event in the following lines, forming part of a qaṣīdah:

"Receive a pledge of happiness in the birth of that infant, which heaven has sent thee as a blessing! The moon, pervading with its lustre the depths of night, is but an emblem of its beauty. Blessed be the propitious hour in which a virtuous mother, a daughter of the Aṣfars<sup>2</sup>, brought it forth! It rejoiceth in its exaltation

1 Probably a collection of tavern anecdotes and verses in praise of wine.

2 For the origin of the denomination Aṣfar and Banu 'l-Aṣfar given to the Romans by Arabic writers, see M. de Sacy's note in the Journal Asiatique for January, 1836.

on the two highest pinnacles of mortal glory! sprung, as it is, from the united stocks of the Muhallabs and the Caesars. The sun of the morning was in conjunction with the moon of the night, and their union has produced Jupiter<sup>1</sup>."

The following lines were written by him to a man of rank who was suffering from sickness<sup>2</sup>:

"O Abū Muḥammad! thou so worthy of praise! O thou who art so fair (ḥasan) in thy noble deeds and thy generosity! O swollen sea of liberality! Mayest thou be preserved from sick-bed visitors, from the remedies of illness and from the approach of pain<sup>3</sup>!"

He composed a great deal of poetry, and his talents have rendered him illustrious. His birth took place, A. H. 284 (A. C. 897-8), the year in which the poet al-Buḥturī died; he expired at Baghdād on Wednesday, the 14th of Dhu 'l-Hijjah, A. H. 356 (November, A. C. 967)*; some say, but erroneously, that he died A. H. 357. Previously to his death, his intellect became disordered. Two men of great learning and three powerful princes died in the year 356; namely this Abū 'l-Faraj, Abū 'Alī 'l-Qālī, Sayf al-Dawlat Ibn Ḥamdān, Mu'izz al-Dawlat Ibn Buwayh, and Kāfir al-Ikhshidī; (see their lives in this work)

416 IBN 'ASĀKIR, THE ḤĀFIZ

The ḥāfiz Abū 'l-Qāsim Ibn Abī Muḥammad al-Ḥasan Ibn Hibat Allāh Ibn 'Abd Allāh Ibn al-Ḥusayn, generally known by

1 To render this verse intelligible, it should be paraphrased thus: Thou, O Wazīr! whose glory is resplendent as the midday sun, was joined to a maiden whose beauty equalled the lustre of the moon, and this union has produced a child, who, like the planet Jupiter announces by his presence happiness and joy.

2 The poet has skilfully indicated in his verses that this person's name was Abū Muḥammad al-Ḥasan.

3 The merit of this last verse consists in the curious example of alliteration which it offers in the original text.

* 20 November. -- Ed

the appellation of Ibn 'Asākir and surnamed Thiqat al-Dīn (sincere in faith), was a native of Damascus and chief traditionist of Syria in that age. He ranked also among the most eminent jurisconsults of the sect of al-Shāfi'ī, but, having made of the Traditions his favourite study, he acquired in that science a degree of superiority which no other had ever attained, and it was to his proficiency therein that he was indebted for his reputation. His zeal in this pursuit and his desire of communicating personally with the teachers of the Traditions led him to visit distant countries and travel to and fro through various regions, in company with the hāfiẓ Abī Sa'd 'Abd al-Karīm al-Sam'ānī. In committing to memory the text of each Tradition, he never neglected learning by heart the isnād<sup>1</sup> from which it derived its authority; he was, indeed, a pious and conscientious hāfiẓ. In the year 520 (A. C. 1129) he heard the disciples of al-Barmakī, al-Tanūkhī<sup>2</sup>, and al-Jawharī<sup>3</sup> delivered Traditions at Baghdād; after which he proceeded to Khurāsān and visited Naysāpūr, Herāt, Ispahān, and Persian 'Irāq; at that time, he made his extracts from different authors and composed his own instructive works. He discussed with great eloquence the traditional information which he had collected, and he displayed a most happy talent in compiling and drawing up the materials of his works. He composed a great (biographical) history of Damascus in eighty volumes, containing most curious information, and written on the plan of (the Khafīb's) History of Baghdād. I was one day with my master 'Abd al-'Azīm al-Mundhirī, the chief hāfiẓ of Egypt, (may God prolong his days for our instruction!)<sup>4</sup> and the conversation happening to fall on this history, he brought me out a volume of it, and spoke longly on its merits and excellence: "I cannot but think," said he, "that

1 See Vol. I, Introduction.

2 The life of Abu 'l-Qāsim 'Alī, al-Tanūkhī will be found in this work.

3 Abū Muḥammad al-Ḥasan Ibn 'Alī Ibn al-Ḥasan Ibn Muḥammad, surnamed al-Jawharī, was the first hāfiẓ سند of the age in 'Irāq, and resided in Shīrāz, but removed afterward to Baghdād. Born A. H. 364 (A. C. 974-5); died A. H. 454 (A. C. 1062).—Nujūm.

4 The autograph which contains this passage was written at Cairo, A. H. 655. 'Abd al-'Azīm al-Mundhirī died the ensuing year. See No. 43, note.

the author must have made the resolution of composing this history on the very day in which his intelligence could form a reasonable conception, and that he began from that moment to collect the materials; for the ordinary life of a man, passed in study and devoted to the subject, would be insufficient for the task of assembling so much information as that book contains." This observation is perfectly true, and its correctness will be admitted by every person who examines the work; for how could any man find time enough to compose one like? and it must be also taken into consideration that the published text consists of passages selected, after verification, from an immense mass of written notes. He composed some other good and instructive works, and a considerable quantity of poetry<sup>1</sup>, of which we may give the following passage:

"The science of Traditions forms an important part of knowledge, and its fairest branch is that of well-authenticated statements. But the most useful, in my opinion, and the finest consists in instructive information conveyed by<sup>2</sup> dictation. You will find that nothing gives more certitude to science than its utterance from the lips of men. Be ardent, then, my friend! in its acquisition, and receive it with untiring zeal from the mouths of men. Take it not from books, or the faults on the copyists will overwhelm you with vexation."

The following piece also is attributed to him:

"Alas, my heart! grey hairs have come! what means thy youthful passions and those verses expressive of thy love? My youth has fled; it seems as if that time had never been! Hoary age has come; I feel as if it had always been my companion! preoccupied by my thoughts, the strokes of fate fell upon me unawares. O that I knew with whom I shall be (classed on the day of judgment), and what may be the lot which God will declare to be mine for all eternity."

In the (original Arabic) of this last piece, the poet imposed on himself the unnecessary obligation of making the two last syllables

1 The text has بأس به لا شعر literally, in French: pus mal de vers.

2 The autograph has في not, .

of each verse rhyme together. The second verse is taken, with very slight alteration, as may be seen, from a poem of 'Alī Ibn Jabalah al-'Akawwak', where he says:

"Youth, as if it had never been; and hoary age as if it had never ceased to be."

The ḥāfiẓ Ibn 'Asākir was born on the first of Muḥarram, A. H. 499 (September A. C. 1105)* and he died at Damascus on the eve of Monday the 21st of Rajab, A. H. 571 (February, A. C. 1176).† He was buried in the cemetery at the Lesser Gate (al-Bāh al-Ṣaghīr), near the spot where his father and other members of his family were interred. Funeral prayers were said over him by the shaykh Quṭb al-Dīn Mas'ūd al-Naysāpūrī<sup>2</sup>, and the Sulṭān Ṣalāḥ al-Dīn was present at the ceremony. His son Abū Muḥammad al-Qāsim, surnamed Bahā al-Dīn (Splendour of religion), who was also a ḥāfiẓ, died at Damascus on the 9th of Ṣafar, A. H. 600 (October, A. C. 1203)‡, and was buried the same day outside the gate called Bab al-Naṣr. His birth took place in that city on the eve of the 15th of the latter Jumādā, A. H. 527 (April, A. C. 1133)§. His brother Hibat Allāh Ibn al-Ḥasan Ibn Hibat Allāh, surnamed Ṣā'in al-Dīn (custodiens fidem), was a learned jurisconsult and traditionist; he died at Damascus on Sunday, the 23rd of Shabān, A. H. 563 (June, A. C. 1168)|| and was buried, the next morning, at the Lesser-Gate Cemetery. According to the statement of his brother the ḥāfiẓ, he was born on one of the first ten days of the month of Rajab, A. H. 488 (July, A. C. 1095); he went to Baghdād, A. H. 520 (A. C. 1126), and after studying under As'ad al-Mihānī (no. 86) and Ibn Barhān (no. 38), he returned to Damascus and gave lessons in the western

1 The life of al-'Akawwak is given in this work.

2 His life is given by our author.

* 13 September.—Ed.

† According to Mahler's calculation 21 Rajab fell on Wednesday 4 February.—Ed.

‡ 19 October.—Ed.

§ 23 April.—Ed.

|| 2 June.—Ed.

Maqṣūrah<sup>1</sup> of the Great Mosque. He gave also opinions, as a muftī on points of law, and taught the Traditions.

417 AL-SIMSIMĀNĪ

Abu 'l-Ḥasan 'Alī Ibn 'Abd Allāh Ibn al-Ghaffār al-Simsimānī was celebrated for his abilities as a philologist, and the books on literary subjects which contain notes in his handwriting are sought after with avidity. All I know respecting his personal history is, that he received lessons from Abū Bakr Ibn Shādhān and Abu 'l-Faḍl Ibn al-Māmūn. His veracity as a transmitter of traditional information was generally acknowledged. The Khafiẓ mentions him in the History of Baghdād and says: "I took notes when he dictated his lessons; he wrote a great deal, and his penmanship was extremely elegant and correct. He commenced his career as a professor at Baghdād by transmitting orally to his pupils the pieces of general literature which he had received in the same manner from his own masters, and by instructing them in a portion of the same science which had been already committed to writing<sup>2</sup>. The greater part of his books were written out by himself, and, on his death, they came into the possession of the learned scholar Ibn Dinār al-Wāsiṭī, but most of them were destroyed by an inundation." He died on Wednesday, the 4th of Muḥarram, A.H. 415 (March, A.C. 1024)*—I did not know the origin of the surname Simsimānī, till I found the following passage in al-Ḥarirī's Durrat al-Ghawṭ: "When they (the vulgar) wish to employ the relative adjectives derived from fākihah (fruit), bāqillah (greens), and simsim (sesame), they say fākihānī (fruiterer), bāqillānī (green-grocer), and simsimānī (seller of sesame); but they are wrong." He then points out the nature of the fault, and continues: "The 1 Every great mosque has a large pew (maqṣūrah) on the left side of the miḥrāb for the chaunters, and another on the right side for the suṭṭān, if it be an imperial mosque. It must have been in the suṭṭān's Maqṣūrah, that Hibat Allāh gave his lessons.

2 The Arabic says simply: by relating, and by teaching to read literature.

* 18 March — Ed.

proper form of locution is simsiml, to designate a seller of sesame ;" he then adds further observations with which he concludes his dissertation. When I met this passage, I became aware that Abu 'l-Ḥasan's surname simsimānī was derived from simsim, and that it was a word employed conventionally by the vulgar.

418 THE SHARĪF AL-MURTAḌĀ

The Sharīf Abu 'l-Qāsim 'Alī, surnamed al-Murtaḍā (gratum habitus), and naqīb, or chief, of that class of Muslims who drew their descent from 'Alī Ibn Abī Ṭālib, was the brother of the Sharīf al-Raḍī, whose life we shall give, and the son of al-Ṭāhir, Dhi 'l-Manāqib, the son of Abū Aḥmad al-Ḥusayn, the son of Mūsā, the son of Muḥammad, the son of Ibrāhīm, the son of Mūsā al-Kāzīm, the son of Ja'far al-Ṣādiq, the son of Muḥammad al-Bāqir, the son of 'Alī Zayn al-'Ābidin, the son of al-Ḥusayn, the son of 'Alī, the son of Abī Ṭālib. He possessed the highest abilities in scholastic theology, general literature, and poetry, and is author of some works on the system of doctrine held by the Shi'ites; he composed also a discourse on the fundamentals of the Muslim religion, and a great quantity of poetry, which has been collected into a Diwān. In describing the ṭayf, or image of the beloved seen by the lover in his dreams<sup>1</sup>, he displays great talent, and he recurs to the subject very frequently. It is a controverted point wheather the book entitled Nahj al-Balāghah (high-road of precision in discourse), and containing a collection of sayings by the Imām 'Alī Ibn Abī Ṭālib, was compiled by al-Murtaḍā or by his brother al-Raḍī: it has been even stated that these sayings were never uttered by 'Alī, and that the person who collected them and attributed them to that Imām was himself the author of them: of this God is the best judge! He wrote also a work under the title of al-Ḡhurar wa 'l-Durar (stars and pearls), consisting of discourses which he had pronounced at assemblies presided by himself; they embrace a variety of subjects connected with general literature and contain observations on points of grammar, philology, etc. is an instructive work and indicated not only the great talent of the author, but his extensive information in the sciences. Ibn Bassām [al-Andulusi], speaks of him towards the end of Dhakhirah "This Sharif" says he, "was generally considered as the greatest Imām of 'Irāq; to him the learned of that country had recourse. and from him its great men received instruction. He was the master of its schools. and the possessor of the rare (information) and the familiar (knowledge) there subsisting. He was one of those whose reputation spread abroad, whose name gained publicity for his verses, whose virtues and deeds found praise in the sight of God. Add to this, his compositions on religious subjects and his works on the principles of Muslim sciences; treatises which declare him a branch of that (noble) stem and a member of that illustrious (family, the.) house (of 'Ali)."<sup>1</sup> He gives also some pieces of verse by al-Murtaḍā, one of which is as follows:

<sup>1</sup> See Vol. I, Introduction.

"She granted me favours with reluctance in my waking hours, but when I slept, she bestowed them in abundance<sup>1</sup>. Then we met, and enjoyed my wishes; it was happiness unalloyed, had it not been all a dream. Since night is then the time of lovers' meetings, night is surely better than day<sup>2</sup>."

This thought is borrowed from the lines of Abū Tammām al-Ṭā'i, in which he says:

"My imagination called on her to visit my sleeping hours, and she came in secret and unseen. O what a meeting is that wherein the souls enjoy delight whilst the bodies are not aware! Such interviews as these have for us but one defect—we are then under the influence of a dream."

Another of al-Murtaḍā's pieces is the following:

"My two dearest friends! chief ornaments of the tribe of Qays! love subdues man's character to mildness. Let me turn my thoughts towards you so that I may for a moment forget my cares; 'tis thus you will delight me, and let me quench my thirst with repeated draughts from the cup which tears have filled. Let sleep not approach my eyelids; I bestow it upon lovers (who require it.)"

1 For كثير<sup>2</sup> read كثير<sup>1</sup>—The poet's meaning in this piece will be better understood on a perusal of the observations relative to the Ṭayf al-nūṭal, inserted in the Introduction to Vol. I.

2 The Arabic words signify also: "Evil fortune is better than good." The point of the verse lies in this double meaning which allows the poet to advance a paradox unexpectedly.

When these lines came to the knowledge of the poet al-Buṣrawī, he observed that al-Murtaḍā bestowed what he did not possess on persons who would not receive it<sup>1</sup>. He says in another piece:

"When a distant journey willed that we should separate, that moment discovered whose love was sincere and whose affected; and on the evening of the caravan's departure, I seemed, from my restless agitation, like a man distracted."

The idea expressed in the first of these verses is taken from a poem rhyming in K, which was composed by al-Mutanabbī in praise of 'Aḍud al-Dawlat Ibn Buwayh. As the poet was then on the point of leaving the court of the prince and proceeding from Shīrāz to 'Irāq, he addressed him this poem as a farewell. It was in this journey that al-Mutanabbī lost his life, as we have already observed (no. 49). The following is the passage to which we allude:

"Amongst the lovers was one distinguished by the ardour of his passion and another who pretended to partake therein; but when the visages were drowned in tears, he that really wept was easily distinguished from the pretender."

I extract the following verses from the Jināḥ al-Janān, in which they are given as al-Murtaḍā's by the Qāḍī al-Rashīd Aḥmad Ibn al-Zubayr, the author of that work (no. 64):

"I and those who blamed me for loving are at daggers-drawing: I am a Khārijite<sup>2</sup> in love (and hold that) none but the fairest have a right to power."

1 He means that al-Murtaḍā's affection for his absent friends put sleep out of his power, and that true lovers had nothing to do with sleep. But al-Buṣrawī should have recollected that every lover desires sleep so that he may dream of his mistress.

2 Khārijite signifies heretic and exteriorist. The poet employs this equivocal word designedly, but his real meaning is: "I love her for her body, not for her mind". See a similar quibble in the life of Ibn Ḥazm al-Zāhiri; No. 423.

The same writer attributes to him also the lines which follow :

"Mistress of my heart ! full-moon (of beauty) resplendent in the darkest shades of night ! take me by the hand and draw me from the abyss into which I have fallen. The miracles wrought by thy beauty never cease ; like the sea, we may speak<sup>1</sup> of its marvels without restraint. I conjure thee, in the name of Him Who formed thy cheeks and gave them sovereign power over our hearts, to stretch forth thy dear hands, as I do mine, and pray that I may be delivered from the passion which thou hast awakend in my bosom."

He gives also al-Murtaḍā's the following verses ;

"Bear from me this message to one whose cheeks have been wounded by (our indiscreet) glances (and are suffused with blushes) ; Let those features, wounded as they are, beam kindness upon me. O thou whose eyes are languishing, but not from feeble health ! blame me not if I die of the malady which they have caused, I have adventured into (the ocean of) thy love, with a heart which has embarked on the same sea, to reach thee or to perish<sup>2</sup>"

The following anecdote is related by the Khafī Abu Zakariyā Yahyā al-Tabrizī, the philologer : "Abu 'l-Ḥasan 'Āli Ibn Aḥmad Ibn 'Āli Ibn Sallak al-Fāli, a man well versed in the belles-lettres, possessed an extremely correct copy of Ibn Durayd's Jam-harah, which poverty compelled him to sell. It was bought by the Sharīf al-Murtaḍā for sixty dinārs<sup>3</sup>, and on turning over the leaves, he found in it the following lines in the handwriting of al-Fāli, the person who sold it :

"It was my companion for twenty years, and yet I sold it ! my sorrow and regret will long endure under that privation. I could never have thought that I should have sold it, even had my debts retained me for ever in prison. But I was constrained to it by misery and poverty and the state of my children, over whom I

1 Literally : Like the sea, the history of which has no bounds. If, in place of حدث, the reading حدث be adopted, the sense is : Speak of it without restraint.

2 The words اما واما signify "either one way or the other". that is, 'I shall risk the alternative'.

3 Twenty-five or thirty pounds sterling, at the lowest evaluation.

wept in sadness. Unable to suppress my gushing tears, I said (to my wife) like one heart-broken<sup>1</sup> and afflicted: 'O Umm Mālik! necessity forces the most precious objects from even the miser's hands.' ***

This al-Fālī drew his surname from Fālah a town in Khūzes-tan near Aydhaj<sup>2</sup>. He had been a long time an inhabitant of Baṣrah and had studied there under Abū 'Amr Ibn 'Abd al-Wāḥid al-Hāshimī and other eminent masters of the epoch; he then removed to Baghdād, where he settled and taught the Traditions. His grandfather's name is to be pronounced Sallak, but, in another place, I found it written Silk. Al-Murtaḍā was equally distinguished for the elegance of his genius and for his virtues. He was born A.H. 355 (A.C. 965-6) and he died at Baghdād on Sunday, the 25th of the first Rabī', A.H. 436 (September, A.C. 1044).† He was interred in (the court of) his house on the evening of the same day. Abu 'l-Ḥasan al-Fālī died on the eve of Friday, the 8th of Dhu 'l-Qa'dah, A.H. 443 (January, A.C. 1057)‡, and was buried in the cemetery at the Jāmi', (or mosque) of al-Manṣūr. He was an elegant scholar and a poet. Some historical relations are given on his authority by the Khaṭīb Abū Bakr in his History of Baghdād, by Abu 'l-Ḥusayn [Ibn] al-Ṭuyūrī, and others.

419 AL-KHILA'Ī

The Qāḍī Abu 'l-Ḥusayn<sup>3</sup> 'Alī Ibn al-Ḥasan Ibn al-Ḥusayn Ibn Muḥammad surnamed al-Khila'ī, and the author of the (work

1 Literally: Branded on the heart or heart-burned.

2 The town of Aydhaj lies, or lay, at four days journey east of 'Askar Mukram.

3 In the autograph this name was originally written al-Ḥasan; but in remodelling the article, the author substituted al-Ḥusayn. Towards the end, he has left the name uncorrected.

* The Cairo edition adds: He (al-Murtaḍā) returned the copy and (bestowed) dīnārs on him (al-Fālī).—Ed.

† 19 October—Ed.

‡ 17 January—Ed.

on the Traditions, called after him) al-Khila'iyāt, was a follower of the sect of al-Shāfi'i and an inhabitant of Egypt. but his family belonged to Moṣul. He studied under Abu 'l-Ḥasan al-Ḥawfī (no. 411), Abū Muḥammad Ibn al-Naḥḥās, Abu 'l-Faṭḥ al-'Addās, Abū Sa'd al-Mālīnī<sup>1</sup>, Abu 'l-Qāsim al-Ahwāzī, and other masters. The Qāḍi 'Iyāḍ al-Yaḥsubī<sup>2</sup> relates as follows: "I asked Abū 'Alī al-Ṣadafī respecting al-Khila'i whom he had met with in his journey to the East<sup>3</sup>, and he replied: 'He was a jurisconsult and composed some good works; having been appointed Qāḍi, he filled the duties of this office for one day only, and obtained permission to resign: he then retired into a hermitage in the Qarāfah. On the death of al-Ḥabbāl<sup>4</sup> he became chief traditionist<sup>5</sup> of Egypt.'" Mention is made of him also by the Qāḍi Abū Bakr Ibn al-'Arabī<sup>6</sup>, who says: "This Shaykh lived, retired from the world, in the Qarāfah; "He was the sole transmitter of certain Traditions founded on the highest authority, and also the sole possessor of some curious and useful information on a variety of points. Al-Ḥumaydī<sup>7</sup> gave Traditions on his authority and designated him by the surname of al-Qarāfī." Another writer says: "Al-Khila'i held the post of Qāḍi at Fāmiyah, and Abū Naṣr Aḥmad Ibn al-Ḥasan al-Shīrāzī selected some portions of the information which he heard at his lectures (and taught them to others). The last survivor of those

1 According to the Nujūm, a ḥāfiẓ and Ṣūfī, whose name was Abū Sa'd Aḥmad Ibn Muḥammad al-Mālīnī and who had travelled through different countries, died A. H. 412 (A. C. 1021-2)—Mālīnī means native of Mālīn, a collection of villages so called in the neighbourhood of Herāt.

2 His life will be found in this work.

3 It is necessary to observe that the qāḍi 'Iyāḍ was a native of Ceuta in North Africa.

4 Abū Ishāq Ibrāhīm Ibn Sa'id al-Nu'mānī, surnamed al-Ḥabbāl (the rope maker), was a ḥāfiẓ of great learning and eminence. After travelling through various countries and receiving traditional information from a great number of masters, he proceeded to Egypt, where he settled, and died A. H. 482 (A. C. 1089-90), at the age of ninety years.—(Nujūm).

5 The original manuscript has مسند, which is here a noun in the accusative case.

6 His life will be found in this work.

7 The life of al-Ḥumaydī is given in this work.

who transmitted the same information on Abū Naṣr's authority was Abū Rifā'ah. I obtained from these notes the knowledge of a fact which was thus handed down by al-Aṣma'i: 'The seal of Abū 'Amr Ibn al-'Ala bore the following inscription:

'The man whose wordly prospects are his chief concern, clings to a rope that will surely fail him.'

'I asked Abū 'Amr about it, and he told me that as he was one day, at noon, taking a walk round his farm, he heard a voice reciting this verse, but could see no person. He then had it engraved on his ring.' " Abu 'l-'Abbās Ṭha'lab attributed the verse to Hānī Ibn Tawbah, Ibn Suḥaym Ibn Murrah, generally known by the surname of al-Shuway'ir al-Ḥanafī. The Ḥāfiẓ Abū Ṭāhir al-Silafī says: "When Abu 'l-Ḥusayn al-Khila'i was teaching the Traditions, he concluded the sitting with the following prayer: 'O God! complete favours which Thou hast granted: take not away the graces which Thou hast bestowed; discover not the faults over which Thou hast cast a veil, and pardon those which Thou hast rendered public.' " Al-Khila'i was born at Miṣr (Old Cairo) in the month of Muḥarram A. H. 405 (July, A. C. 1014), and he died there on Saturday, the 18th of Dhu 'l-Ḥijjah, A. H. 492 (December, A. C. 1099)*, others say that his death took place on the 26th of the month. His father died in the month of Shawwāl, A. H. 448 (December, A. C. 1056). Khila'i is derived from Khila' (pelisses); Abu 'l-Ḥusayn was so surnamed because he sold pelisses to the princes of Miṣr. The Qarāfahs are two in number, the Greater and the Less; the former lies outside Miṣr (Old Cairo), and the latter outside Cairo; this last contains the tomb of Imām al-Shāfi'i. The Banū Qarāfah, a branch of the tribe of al-Ma'āfir Ibn Ya'fur had settled in these two places which were therefore named after them—Fāmiyah, or, as it is sometimes written, Afūmiyah is the name of a castle and canton in the province of Aleppo<sup>1</sup>.

---

1 Fāmiyah, the Apamea of the ancients, is placed, in Brockhaus' map of Syria, in lat. 35° 18', and long. 34° 12' E. from Paris.

* 5 November.—Ed.

420 AL-SHĀBUSHTĪ

The kātib Abu 'l-Ḥusayn<sup>1</sup> 'Alī Ibn Muḥammad al-Shābushtī, an elegant scholar and a man of talent, was attached to the service of al-'Azīz Ibn al-Mu'izz the 'Ubaydite (Faṭimite), sovereign of Egypt, as private librarian and reader (daftar khu'ān); and his agreeable conversation and pleasing manners rendered him the companion of his master's social and convivial parties. He wrote some good works, one of which, entitled Kitāb al-Diāryāt (book of convents), contains the indication of every convent in 'Irāq, Moṣul, Syria, Mesopotamia, and Egypt, with all the poems composed on each of them and an account of what passed in them. This book is drawn up on the plan of the similar works, bearing the same title, which were composed by the two Khālidites<sup>2</sup> and by Abu 'l-Faraj al-Iṣpahānī: a great number of books have been written on this subject. His other works are the Kitāb al-Yusr ba'd al-'Uṣr (ease after pain); the Marātib al-Fuqahā (classified list of jurisconsults); the Kitāb al-Tawqif wa 'l-Takhwif (attention arrested and apprehension inspired), and a number of letters and epistolary essays, containing passages of poetry and moral maxims. He composed also some treatises on literary and other subjects. His death took place A.H. 390 (A.C. 1000), or, according to the Amīr al-Mukhtār al-Musabbihī, in 388; another author names the day, which was Tuesday eve, the 15th of Ṣafar.* He died in Old Cairo. I repeatedly made researches to discover the origin of the surname Shābushtī, but all my pains were fruitless, till I found some years afterwards, in Abū Ishāq al-Ṣābi's work, the Tājī (no. 14), that the chamberlain to the Daylamite prince Washmagīr Ibn Ziyār was called al-Shābushtī, and that he was killed, near Iṣpahān, A.H. 326 (A.C. 937-8). It appears therefore that this is a Daylamite name, and that it resembles a relative adjective in no other point but its form. It is possible that the Kātib Abu 'l-Ḥusayn may have been descendant of this person, and was therefore designated by the appellation of Shābushūtī, which patronymic he transmitted to his descendants. The Washmagīr just mentioned was the father of the Amīr Qābūs, whose life will be found farther on.

1 I follow the autograph for the orthography of this name.

2 The two Khālidites, whose names were Abū Bakr Muḥammad and Abū 'Uḥmān Sa'd, were poets highly distinguished by Sayf al-Dawlat Ibn Ḥamdān, sovereign of Aleppo. Farther notice shall be taken of them in another part of this work. See also No. 240.

* 15 February, 998.—Ed.

421 IBN AL-QĀBISĪ

Abu 'l-Ḥasan 'Alī Ibn Muḥammad Ibn Khalaf al- a'āfirī al-Qarawī (a member of the tribe of Ma'āfir, a native of Qayrawān), and generally known by the appellation of Ibn al-Qābisī (son of the native of Qābis), was a master of high authority in the science of the Traditions, their isnāds<sup>1</sup> and every thing connected with them, and great reliance was placed on his veracity. He composed a work entitled al-Mulakhkhaṣ (chosen selection), containing all those Traditions, supported by an unbroken chain of authorities, which are contained in Ibn Qāsim's edition of Mālik's Muwaffāʿ<sup>2</sup>. This treatise, though short, is one of the best on the subject. Ibn al-Qābisī was born on Monday, the 7th of Rajab A.H. 324 (June, A.C. 936)*, he set out for the East on Saturday, the 10th of Ramaḍān, A.H. 352 (October, A.C. 963)†, and in A.H. 353, he made the pilgrimage to Makkah, where he heard al-Bukhārī's Ṣaḥīḥ explained by Abū Zayd<sup>3</sup>. He then returned to Qayrawān, where he arrived on Wednesday morning, the 1st or 2nd of Shabān, A.H. 357‡. This we give on the authority of Abū 'Abd Allāh Mālik Ibn

1 See Vol. I, Introduction.

2 See No. 337.

3 The full name of this Abū Zayd is Muḥammad Ibn Aḥmad al-Marwazī al-Fāshānī. His life is given by Ibn Khallikān.

* 30 May.—Ed.

† 3 October.—Ed.

‡ 1 July, 968.—Ed.

Wuhayb<sup>1</sup>. It is related by the ḥāfiẓ al-Silafī, in his work the Mu'jam al-Safar<sup>2</sup>, that a person said at an assembly presided by Ibn al-Qābisī at Qayrawān: "Al-Mutanabbī has expressed the following thought with no inferior talent:

'Our heart is required to forget thee, but nature resists the effort of him who would change its ways.' "

On this, Ibn al-Qābisī replied: "I pity your intelligence! what has prevented you from recollecting these words of God (where the thought is expressed much better): 'No change (can be wrought) on what God had created; that is (a principle of) the right religion; but the greater part of mankind know it not.'<sup>3</sup>" Ibn al-Qābisī died on the eve of Wednesday, the 3rd of the latter Rabi', A.H. 403 (October, A.C. 1012)*, and was interred on the afternoon of the following day at Qayrawān. A multitude of people passed the night at his tomb; tents were erected in the neighbourhood, and poets came forward, reciting elegies on his death. When far advanced in age, he used to repeat the following verse of al-Zuhayr Ibn Abi Sulmā's (the author of the Mu'allaqah):

1 Read وهيب in the printed text. Abū 'Abd Allāh Mālik Ibn Wuhayb, a native of Spain and one of the Wazīrs in the service of 'Alī Ibn Yūsuf Ibn Tāshīfin, the emperor of Morocco, was a member of the committee of doctors appointed by that prince to examine Maḥdī Ibn Tūmart, and the only man among them who penetrated into his projects. He is the author of a work entitled Qurādat al-Dīḥab (grains of gold) containing accounts of the most despicable characters among the Arabs both before and after Islamism. This treatise, said to be very curious, was seen by the Shaykh Muḥī al-Dīn 'Abd al-Wāḥid in the library belonging to the 'Abd al-Mūmin family. He remarked also a copy of Ptolemy's Almagest in the handwriting of Ibn Wuhayb. (Page 183 of 'Abd al-Wāḥid al-Murraḥḥī's Kitāb al-Mu'jib, MS. of the Leyden Library, Cat. No. 1798. M. Weyer has given a notice on this MS. in the Prolegomena ad ed. Ibn Abdunī, p. 6.)

2 This was probably a series of biographical notices on the doctors and other learned men with whom al-Silafī became acquainted in his travels, or from whom he took lessons.

3 Qur'ān, sūrat 30, verse 29.

* 22 October.---Ed.

"I suffer the afflictions of existence, but I know that he who has lived eighty years must undergo afflictions."

Qābisī means belonging to Qābis, which is a city in the province of Africa, near al-Mahdiyyah. When it fell into the possession of Tamīm Ibn al-Mu'izz Ibn Bādīs (no. 123), Abū Muḥammad, the Khāṭib, or preacher, of Sūsah, pronounced a long Qaṣidah, which began thus :

"Fortune, though called the frowning, smiled (upon thee) when the vigour of thy resolution forced Qābis to open its gates. Thou hast espoused it, a virgin fortress, and the dowry it received consisted in spears, swords, and horsemen. It was the will of God that thou shouldst gather the fruit of the tree which had been planted by thy father<sup>1</sup>. He that presses his suit with the point of the spear obtains stately castle<sup>2</sup> for brides".

422 IBN AL-QAṬṬĀ'

The philologist Abu 'l-Qāsim 'Alī, surnamed Ibn al-Qaṭṭā', a member of the tribe of Sa'd, a Sicilian by birth, but an Egyptian by residence and death, was the son of 'Alī Ibn Ja'far Ibn Muḥammad Ibn 'Abd Allāh Ibn al-Ḥusayn Ibn Aḥmad Ibn Muḥammad Ibn Ziyādat Allāh Ibn Muḥammad Ibn al-Aghlab al-Sa'dī Ibn Ibrāhīm Ibn al-Aghlab Ibn Sālam Ibn 'Iqāl Ibn Khafājah Ibn 'Abd Allāh Ibn 'Abbād Ibn M.ḥrath Ibn Sa'd Ibn Ḥarām<sup>3</sup> Ibn Sa'd Ibn Mālik Ibn Sa'd Ibn Zayd Manāt Ibn Tamīm Ibn Murr Ibn Udd Ibn Ṭabikhah Ibn al-Yās Ibn Muḍar Ibn Nizār Ibn Ma'add

1 This is perhaps an allusion to the embellishments which Qābis received from al-Mu'izz.

2 The words rendered stately castles signify also fair ladies dwelling in castles. In the original Arabic, the double meaning of these words helps out the metaphor.

3 The autograph has حرام .

Ibn 'Adnān'. Such is the genealogy which I found in my own handwriting among my rough notes, but I do not know from what source I drew it, and there exists another list copied from the handwriting of Ibn al-Qaṭṭā' himself; it is as follows: 'All the son of Ja'far Ibn 'Alī Ibn Muḥammad Ibn 'Abd Allāh Ibn al-Ḥusayn al-Sa'dī al-Shantarīnī belonging to Santar. m a descendant of the tribe of Sa'd Ibn Zayd Manāt Ibn Tmīm. I am unable to say which is the more correct. Ibn al-Qaṭṭā' held a high rank by his acquirements in literature, and especially in philology. He composed some instructive works, such as the Book of Verbs, which is admirably executed and surpasses the former work, that of Ibn al-Qaṭṭāh<sup>2</sup>, on the same subject. Another work of his, containing a most complete collection of the Forms of Nouns, remains a proof of his extensive information. He wrote also a good and elegant treatise on prosody; a work containing extracts from the productions of the poets who were natives of the Island<sup>3</sup>, and entitled al-Durrat al-Khaṣīrah (the precious pearl); and the Lumaḥ al-Mulaḥ, or glimpses at beauties, containing a collection of notices on many of the poets of Spain. He was born in Sicily on the 10th of Ṣafar, A.H. 433 (October, A.C. 1041),* and he studied the belles-lettres under the most eminent masters in that island, such as Ibn al-Barr the philologist and others. He acquired also a complete mastery of grammar. When Sicily was on the point of falling into the possession of the (Norman) Franks, he left the country, and in A.H. 500 (A.C. 1106-7) he arrived in Egypt, where he was received with every mark of honour. As an oral transmitter of pieces of literature preserved by tradition, he was accused of incorrectness and carelessness. In the year 446 he began to compose verses, of which the following may serve as specimens. On a young female who had an impediment in her speech:

1 We have here an instance of the utility which may sometimes be derived from the long genealogies given by Ibn Kḥallikān. Had he curtailed this list, we should not have known the ancestry of the Aḥlabite family and the links of their genealogical chain up to 'Adnān.

2 His life will be found in this work.

3 I do not know whether Spain or Sicily be meant by the island in this case, but it is generally the former which is so designated.

* 9 October.--Ed.

"Behold a gazelle whose tongue is knotted, but yet undoes my knots (dissolves my forces) and weakens my fortitude. Those who knew not her worth reproached me for loving her, but I said to them: 'Have you never heard of the (enchantments wrought by) breathing on knots?' "1.

From one of his Qaṣīdahs:

"Consume not thy life in the pursuits of love; let not (the cruelty of) Su'dā or (of) Nu'm afflict thee any longer. Lament not over the ruined cottage on the edge of the desert, where Mayyah<sup>2</sup> once resided; and shed not the drops of thy eyelids over mouldering walls<sup>3</sup>. The true object of man's life is to obtain one necessary thing<sup>4</sup>, but (the memory of his) culpable discourses and conduct subsists after him<sup>5</sup>."

A great deal of poetry was composed by him. He died at Old Cairo in the month of Ṣafar, A.H. 515 (April-May, A.C. 1121).

423 IBN ḤAZM AL-ZĀHIRI

Abū Muḥammad 'Alī generally known by the appellation of Ibn Ḥazm al-Zāhiri) was the son of Aḥmad Ibn Sa'id Ibn Ḥazm Ibn Ghālīb Ibn Ṣāliḥ Ibn Kḥalaf Ibn Ma'dān Ibn Sufyān Ibn Yazīd. His ancestor Yazīd was a mawlā to Yazīd Ibn Abī Sufyān Ṣakhr Ibn Ḥarb Ibn Umayyah Ibn 'Abd Shams the Umayyide, and the first of the family who embraced Islamism. They were originally from Persia, and Kḥalaf was the first of his forefathers who went 1 An allusion to a verse of the Qur'ān, sūrat 113.

2 Su'dā, Nu'm, and Mayyah are names of females, and occur frequently in poems.

3 This verse is not given in the autograph. [In our copy it is given.—Ed.]

4 Salvation is probably meant.

5 I omit translation of the piece which follows, for motives already stated. In the second verse is a play upon the word حمز which is a proper name, and حمز which signifies burning coals.

to Spain. Ibn Ḥazm was born in the eastern quarter of Cordova<sup>1</sup> on Wednesday morning, before sunrise, the 30th of Ramaḍān, A.H. 384 (November, A.C. 994)* : He was a learned ḥāfiẓ, versed in all the sciences connected with the Traditions and in their application to jurisprudence ; he possessed also great skill in deducing from them and from the Qur'ān the solution of questions touching the secondary principles of the law. He had been at first a follower of the Shāfi'ite sect, but abandoned it for that of the Zāhirites<sup>2</sup>. His knowledge was of the most varied kind, and although he, as his father before him, had held an exalted post in the wazirate and the administration of the empire, he manifested the utmost indifference to worldly advantages. His profound humility equalled the greatness of his talents ; the number of works composed by him was very considerable ; and, possessing a large collection of books, formed by himself, on the Traditions, traditional information, and original subjects, he had also a memory richly stocked with such information as could only be supplied by oral transmission. He composed a work on the application of the traditions to jurisprudence, and entitled Kitāb al-Iṣāl ilā fahmī Kitāb al-Ḥiṣāl, etc. (guidance to the understanding of the book called al-Ḥiṣāl), being a collection of laws on the duties of Muslims, on what is lawful and what unlawful, on the Sunnah, on the Ijmā'<sup>3</sup>, and containing, besides, the opinions of the Companions, of the Tābi'is, and of the Imāms of Islamism their successors, on questions relating to jurisprudence and the rites of the pilgrimage. This is an extensive compilation, and contains the arguments employed by the different orthodox sects for and against the points in which they 1 He means the suburb on the left bank of the Guadaquivir.

---

2 The sect of the Zāhirites, or exteriorists, was founded by Dāwūd Ibn 'Alī al-Iṣṭihānī ( No. 211 ) They were so denominated because they understood the words of the Qur'ān in their plain literal sense, and rejected the tāwīl, or allegorical interpretation to which other sects have recourse in certain cases. They differed completely from the Ḥanīfite sect in rejecting the Qiyās (see Vol. I, Introduction.

3 See No. 227, note.

• 7 November.—Ed.

disagree. His Kitāb al-Iḥkām li 'Uṣūl il-Aḥkām<sup>1</sup> is a treatise drawn up with great care, containing the proofs (on which the author founded his principles). His other works are, the Kitāb al-Faṣl (a distinctive view of religions, and of the philosophical and religious sects); a treatise on the Ijmā'. Questions on points in the different sections of jurisprudence: the Marātib al-'Ulūm, being a classification of the sciences, an indication of the manner in which they are to be studied, an exposition of their mutual connection; the Izhār Tabdīl al-Yahūd wa 'l-Naṣrā (exposure of the alterations made by the Jews and the Christians in the Pentateuch and the Gospel, and indication of those passages still extant with them which they cannot explain away)<sup>2</sup>; he was the first ever treated this subject. His other works are, the Taqrib etc. (Study made easy), being an introduction to logic, written in the plainest language, and illustrated by examples drawn from the science of jurisprudence; this treatise is drawn up on an original plan, as it was the author's intention to make known the real nature of the science and remove the prejudices which were entertained against it as a futile study<sup>3</sup>. "His master in logic was a native of Cordova named Muḥammad Ibn al-Ḥasan al-Madḥijī, generally known by the name of Ibn al-Kattānī<sup>4</sup>, who was a good scholar, a poet, a physician, and the author of some treatises on medicine and the belles-lettres. He died later than A.H. 400 (A.C. 1009)." Such are the observations given, on the authority of Abū 'Abd Allāh al-Ḥumaydī, by Ibn Mākūlā in his Ikmāl<sup>5</sup>, under the head of al-Kattānī, where he notices two persons of the name. A little volume of Ibn Ḥazm's entitled Nuḡḡ al-'Arūs<sup>6</sup>, furnishes much information and contains a great quantity of curious and interesting matter. Ibn Bashkuwāl speaks of him in these terms; "Of all

1 It would appear from the title that this work treated of judicial astrology.

2 He means the texts in which the Muslims pretend that the mission of Muḥammad is foretold.

3 The autograph gives the true reading المخرقين .

4 Read here and lower down الكتاني .

5 See No. 414 .

6 This title may signify bridegroom—or perhaps brideul—anecdotes.

the natives of Spain, Ibn Ḥazm was the most eminent by the universality and the depth of his learning in the science cultivated by the Muslims; add to this his profound acquaintance with the (Arabic) tongue, and his vast abilities as an elegant writer, a poet, a biographer, and an historian. It was stated by his son Abū Rāfi' al-Faḍl that he possessed about four hundred volumes, containing nearly eight thousand leaves, which had been composed and written out by his father." "We never saw his like," says the Ḥāfiẓ Abū 'Abd Allāh al-Ḥumaydī, "for penetration, promptitude in learning by heart, nobleness of character and piety. I never met a person who could extemporise poetry more rapidly than he. He recited to me the following verses as his own :

"Though now on a distant journey and absent from thee in body, my soul abideth near thee for ever; nay, a faint image (of thyself) still fleets before the sense of sight, and (my) eyes, struck by that aspect, pour forth a stream of tears."

Ibn Ḥazm has thus again expressed the same thought :

"My brother said: 'Thou art afflicted because thou shalt be absent from us in body, but thy soul will never leave us.' I replied: 'The sense of sight alone is worthy of trust, and therefore one friend always desires the sight of another.'!"

In one of his pieces he says :

"A severe censor blamed me on account of one whose beauty had made me captive, and he long reproached me for my love: "How" ? said he, 'can you have fallen a victim to the beauty of the only (female) face you ever saw, and yet you know not how her body may be ?' I answered: 'The excess of thy blame proceeds from injustice: and, if I pleased, I could make a long defence: seest thou not that I am a Zāhirite (eterniorist), and place my trust in what is visible, till farther proof be given ?' "

The following verses are given as his by the Ḥāfiẓ al-Ḥumaydī :

"We remained a moment together and then departed, but a moment's interview can give no solace to the heart inflamed with passionate desire. The coming of lovers together seemeth not a meeting, if their reunion is again to be dissolved by separation."

Al-Ḥumayd- mentions also that the following lines were recited to him by Ibn Ḥazm, as having been composed by 'Abu Jahwar<sup>1</sup>.

"Though persons of genius may be dwelling far apart, their souls can still hold converse. How often have pen and paper enabled the hearts of separated lovers to meet again!"

Ibn Ḥazm had arguments and discussions with Abu 'l-Walid al-Bāji (no. 263), too long to be explained here. He was so ardent in his attacks against the learned men who preceded him, that hardly a single one could escape the virulence of his tongue. By this conduct he estranged the hearts of his contemporaries and became an object of hostility to the jurisconsults of the epoch. These persons, animated by their enmity, concurred in refuting his opinions, exposing them as false, treating him as a reprobate, cautioning their rulers against the dangers of his proceedings, and forbidding the public to have any intercourse with him or to listen to his lessons. In consequence of this, the sovereign of the different (Spanish) provinces expelled him from their states, and he was driven to the open country near Lablah (Niebla), where he breathed his last on Sunday afternoon, the 28th of Shā'bān. A.H. 456 (August A.C. 1064)*; some say, however, that he died at Manta Lisham a village of which he was the possessor. It was of him that Abu 'l-'Abbās Ibn al-'Arif (no. 67) said: "The tongue of Ibn Ḥazm and the sword of al-Ḥajjāj Ibn Yūsuf were brothers." His reason for making this remark was the frequency of Ibn Ḥazm's attacks upon the Imāms<sup>2</sup>. His father Abū 'Umar Aḥmad was a Wazīr under the (hājib al-Manṣūr, the founder of) the 'Āmirite dynasty, an accomplished scholar and elegant writer, a man of learning and a holy life. He died in the month of Dhu 'l-Qa'dah, A.H. 402 (June, A.C. 1012). The following verse is mentioned by Abū Muḥammad Ibn Ḥazm as forming part of the admonitions addressed to him by his father the Wazīr :

1 Abū Marwān 'Abd al-Malik Ibn Jahwar, an eminent Wazīr, a kātib, a poet, and an accomplished scholar, lived in the reign of 'Abd al-Rahmān al-Nāṣir, the Omayyide. This prince died A. H. 350 (A. C. 962).—(Bughyat al-Multamils)

2 See No. 67, note.

* 15 August.—Ed.

"If you wish to pass your life in wealth, adopt such a mode of life as will not cause you discontent if reduced to an inferior station."

Al-Ḥumaydī<sup>1</sup> relates the following anecdote in his Jadhwat al-Muqtabis : The Wazīr Abū 'Umar Aḥmad was sitting at a public audience given by his master al-Manṣūr Abū 'Āmir, Muḥammad Ibn Abi 'Āmir, when a supplication was presented to him by a woman in favour of her son who had incurred al-Manṣūr's anger by some heinous crime which he had committed, and was then detained in prison by his order. The perusal of the paper excited al-Manṣūr's wrath to an extreme, and he exclaimed : "By Allāh ! thou has reminded me of him." He then took a pen with the intention of writing the document the word yuslab (let him be crucified), after which he handed the paper to the Wazīr, who immediately drew up a regular order conformable to the decision, and addressed to the commander of the Shurṭah, or police guards. "What have you written there ?" said al-Manṣūr to him. "An order for his liberty," replied Abū 'Umar. "And who directed you to do so ?" exclaimed al-Manṣūr in a passion. The Wazīr handed the supplication which al-Manṣūr had written by mistake the word yutlaq (let him be set free). "By Allāh ! " said al-Manṣūr, on seeing it, "I meant to write let him be crucified." He then struck out the word with the intention of writing yuslab, but he again traced the word yutlaq. The Wazīr then took the paper and was drawing up an order for the prisoner's liberation, when al-Manṣūr remarked it, and exclaimed, in a more violent passion than at first ; "Why did you do so ?" The Wazīr showed him the decision in his own handwriting, and the prince effaced it, but again committed the same mistake. The Wazīr then commenced a new order of liberation addressed to the wāll, or commander, and al-Manṣūr, who observed him, flew into a greater rage than ever, Abū 'Umar then showed him the paper on which, for the third time, he had written yufḥaq. Struck with the singularity of the circumstance, al-Manṣūr exclaimed: "Be it so! let him be set at liberty in spite of me; for when God wills that a man should be set free, I cannot prevent it." Abū Muḥammad (Ibn Ḥazm) had a son, gifted with a noble character and great talents, whose name was Abū Rāfi' al-Faḍl; he was employed in the service of al-Mu'tamid Ibn 'Abbād, the sovereign of Seville and other cities of Spain. It happened that the suspicions and anger of al-Mu'tamid were excited against one of his uncles, Abū Ṭālib 'Abd al-Jabbār Ibn Muḥammad Ibn Ismā'il Ibn 'Abbād, and he thought of putting him to death. The Wazirs were therefore called in, and he said to them: "Does any of you know if there was ever a khalif or a prince who put his uncle to death for conspiracy against him?" On this Abū Rāfi' stepped forward and said: "May God's assistance never fail you! we know of none who ever did so, but we know of one who pardoned his uncle who had revolted against him, al-Mamūn, namely, who forgave Ibrahim Ibn al-Mahdi" (no. 8) When al-Mu'tamid heard these words, he kissed the speaker between the eyes and gave him thanks, after which he sent for his uncle and treated him with affability and kindness. Abū Rāfi' was slain at the battle of al-Zallāqah, on Friday, the 15th of Rajab, A.H. 479 (October, A.C. 1086). * We have given a full account of this engagement in the life of Yūsuf Ibn Tāshifīn. Lablah (Niebla) is a town in Spain. Manta Lishām is a village in the dependencies of Lablah; it belonged to Ibn Ḥazm and he visited it from time to time.

---

<sup>1</sup> His life is given by our author.

424 IBN SĪDAH

The Ḥāfiẓ Abū 'l-Ḥasan 'Alī Ibn Ismā'il, surnamed Ibn Sīdah, and a native of Murcia, was highly distinguished by his learning in philology and grammar, and by his acquirements in such portions of these sciences as were preserved by oral transmission. On this matter he composed some works, one of which, the Muḥkam

* According to Mahler's calculation 15 Rajab fell on Monday, 26 October.—Ed.

(fixed), is very voluminous and contains information on the various branches of philology. Another extensive work of his on the same subject is entitled al-Mukhaṣṣiṣ (the specifier). He composed also a commentary, in six volumes, on the Ḥamāsah, entitled Kitāb al-Anlq<sup>1</sup>, and a number of other instructive treatises. Ibn Sīdah was a blind man, as his father also; he made his first studies in philology under his father, who was well versed in that science, and he then received lessons from Ṣa'īd al-Baghḍādī (no. 282) and 'Alī Ibn 'Umar al-Ṭalamankī. The latter reverts to this circumstance in the following anecdote: "When I went to Murcia, the inhabitants requested me most earnestly to explain the Gharīb al-Muṣannaf<sup>2</sup>, on which I told them to look for a person to read the book to them, and that I would follow him in my own copy of it. On this, they brought me a blind man, called Ibn Sīdah, who repeated its contents from the beginning to the end, and I was much struck at the excellence of his memory." Ibn Sīdah possessed considerable abilities as a poet. He died in Denia on Sunday evening, the 25th of the latter Rabi', A.H. 458 (March, A.C. 1066*), at the age of about sixty years. I read on the cover of a copy of Muḥkam a note written by some learned native of Spain, in which it is said that Ibn Sīdah was in good health previously to the morning prayer of the Friday (before his death), and that he continued so till the hour of evening prayer, when he entered the water-closet and came out with his tongue paralyzed, and unable to utter a word; he remained in that state till the afternoon of the Sunday above mentioned, when he died. Some place his death in the year 448 (A.C. 1056), but the former date is more authentic and is generally admitted. Murcia is a city in the east of Spain. Ṭalamankī means belonging to Ṭalamankah (Salamanca?) which is a city in the west of Spain. Denia is a city in the east of the same country.

1 This title means liber pulchri, which may perhaps signify livre du bel esprit.

2 Hājji Khalīfah notices two works bearing this title: one by Abū 'Amr al-Shaybānī (see Ibn Khallikān), and the other by Abū 'Ubayd al-Qāsim Ibn Sallām, a learned scholar whose life will be found in this dictionary.

* 26 March.—Ed.

425 ABU 'L-ḤASAN AL-ḤUṢRĪ

Abu 'l-Ḥasan 'Alī Ibn 'Abd al-Ḡhanī al-Ḥuṣrī al-Fihrī (a member of the tribe of Quraysh), and a native of Qayrawān, was a poet of celebrity, and, although afflicted with blindness, a teacher of the Qur'ān-readings. Ibn Bassām, the author of the Dhakhīrah, speaks of him in these terms: "He was a sea of eloquence the master of his art and the chief of the company (of poets). He porceeded to Spain towards the middle of the fifth century of the Hijrah, on the ruin of Qayrawān<sup>1</sup>, the place of his abode. In those days polite literature was highly encouraged and sedulously cultivated in our country. he was therefore caressed by the provincial sovereigns, as the meadows are caressed by the zephyr; they were all desirous of possessing him, as houses are desirous of possessing inhabitants; although, as I have been informed, he was of disagreeable character, notorious for his evil tongue, and as keen for satire as a thirsty man for water. They give in, however, to his humour, and supported with patience the frequency of his caprices and the rarity of his affable moments<sup>2</sup>. When those sovereigns were deprived of their possessions (by Yūsuf Ibn Tāshifīn) he settled at Tanger, much reduced in circumstances and relapsed into (the former moroseness of) his character." Abu 'l-Ḥasan, the subject of this article was cousin by the mother's side to Abū Ishāq al-Ḥuṣrī (no. 15), the author of the Zahr al-Ādāb. Ibn Baskhuwāl makes mention of him in the Ṣilat, and al-Ḥumaydī says that he was well acquainted with the readings of the Qur'ān and the mode by which each of them had been transmitted down; that he gave public lessons in Qur'ān-reading at Ceuta and elsewhere, and that he composed a Qasidah in two hundred and ninety verses, setting forth the points peculiar to Nāfi's system of Qur'ān-reading. His collected poetical works are still extant, and one of his pieces is the widely diffused Qasidah which begins thus:

1 In A. H. 449 (A. C. 1057—8), Qayrawān fell into the power of the nomadic Arabs who had left Upper Egypt a few years before. See Abu 'l-Feda's Annals, year 422; and my edition of Ibn Khaldūn's History of the Berbers, in Arabic, page 17.

2 Literally: The intervals of his drought and the rarity of his rain.

"O night of the afflicted lover ! when will thy morning arrive ? Is it deferred to the day of judgment. The friends who passed the evening in conversation are now asleep, but he, separated from his beloved, is kept awake by the visits of grief."

This poem is so well known that it is unnecessary to insert it ; and a counterpart of it, in the same rhyme and measure, has been composed by my friend Najm al-Dīn Mūsā al-Qamrāwī the jurisconsult, in which he says :

"Bear to my beloved this message : 'The friends of him whom thou hast reduced to sickness are weary of visiting his couch, and those who envied thy captive lover now deplore his misery. Thy cruelty has left him only that breath of life which each sigh raises from his breast. Hārūt<sup>2</sup> himself acknowledges that the power of magic is derived solely from thy eyes<sup>3</sup>.* When thou sheathest thy glances in thy eyelids, they inflict deadly wounds : what must they be when thou drawest them from their scabbard ! How often had thy cheek been smoothed to an expression of benignity, whilst thy eyebrow formed an arch above it. My heart acknowledged no other power but thine ; why then<sup>4</sup> condemn it eternally to the flames of separation ?"

The lines which follow are by al-Ḥuṣṛī :

"When she offered me the cup of welcome on which her lips had impressed a seal of musk, I said to her : "Was this ruby liquor extracted from thy cheeks ?" 'No' she replied ; 'When was wine ever extracted from the rose ?' "

1 Farther notice will be taken of al-Qamrāwī towards the end of the article.

2 See No. 286, note on Hārūt.

3 عنين , the root of the word لعنن* is not to be found in the dictionaries. The reading in the printed text might be supposed to be incorrect, were it not confirmed by the autograph. From its being here employed conjointly with the verb اسند it must have the signification of to attribute the origin of a person or thing to.....

4 Read فلم in the printed text.

* يعنى means that عن is used in narrating weak traditions in which the narrator does not say 'he said or narrated' on the other hand he says 'it is related on the authority of'.—Ed.

At the time in which he resided at Tanger, he sent his servant-boy to al-Mu'tamid Ibn 'Abbād, the sovereign of Seville, which city was called Ḥimṣ (Emessa) by the people of that country; he then waited in fruitless expectation of the boy's return, and having been informed that al-Mu'tamid took no notice of him, he composed these lines:

"Awake the drowsy carawān and reporach Fortune with her cruelty! Ḥimṣ is a paradise, and it said to my boy: 'Thou shall not return from this!' May God have mercy on my boy! he has died of hunger in paradise!"

In the original Arabic the poet makes each of these verses end in a double rhyme, although the rules of prosody by no means placed him under such a restraint. The following relation was delivered by Tāj al-'Ulā Abū Zayd, surnamed al-Nassābah (the genealogist): "I was told by Abu 'l-Aṣḡagh Nubātah Ibn al-Aṣḡagh Ibn Zayd Ibn Muḥammad al-Ḥārithī al-Andalusī that he heard his grandfather Zayd Ibn Muḥammad relate as follows: "Al-Mu'tamid Ibn 'Abbād, the sovereign of Seville, sent five hundred pieces of gold to Abu 'l-'Arab al-Zubayrī with the order to come to him, and employ the sum for his travelling expenses." Abu 'l-'Arab was then in Sicily, his native country. His name were Abu 'l-'Arab Muṣ'ab Ibn Muḥammad Ibn Abi 'l-Furāt al-Qurayshī (of the tribe of Quraysh) al-Zubayrī al-Ṣāqallī (native of Sicily), the poet. "He sent also a similar sum to Abu 'l-Ḥasan al-Ḥuṣrī, who was then at Qayrawān. In reply to his invitation, Abu 'l-'Arab wrote him these verses:

"Wonder not at my head, how grief has turned it grey; but wonder that the pupils of my eyes are not turned grey (and blinded with weeping). The sea is in the power of the Christians (Rūm), and no ship can sail on it without danger, but the land belongs to the Arabs!"

As for al-Ḥuṣrī, he replied in these terms:

---

1 He probably means to justify his non-compliance with al-Mu'tamid's wishes, by making a pun on his own name, and giving him to understand that the 'Arab prefers remaining on terra firma.

'You order me to take ship and cross the sea ; make that proposal to some other, and blessings be upon you! you are not a Noah to save me in his ark, nor a Messiah with whom I may walk upon the waters.'

"Some time after, he went to Spain and sung the praises of al-Mu'tamid and other princes." He died at Tanger, A.H. 488 (A.C. 1095). The birth of al-Qamrāwī (the person incidentally mentioned in this article) may be placed, by approximation, A.H. 591 (A.C. 1194-5); he died towards the end of the month of Šafar. A. H. 651 (April; A. C. 1253), on his return from Yaman, at a place called Rās al-Dawā'ir, situated between 'Aydḥāb and Sawākin, on the coast of the sea of 'Aydḥāb (the Red Sea). Qamarāwī means belonging to Qamrā, which is a landed estate in the province of Šarkḥad, in Syria. Of Ḥuṣrī we have already spoken (no. 15). Tanjah (Tanger is a town in the West Country (al-Gharb) at two days' journey from Sibtah (Ceuta), another town in the same region. Abu 'l-'Arab al-Zubayrī was born in Sicily, A.H. 423 (A.C. 1032); on its conquest by the (Norman) Christians (Rūm) in A.H. 464 (A.C. 1072), he emigrated to Spain and sought the protection of al-Mu'tamid Ibn 'Abbād. "I have been informed," says Ibn al-Šayrafī<sup>1</sup> "That he was still alive, in Spain, in A.H. 507 (A.C. 1113-4)."

426 IBN KHARŪF

Abu 'l-Ḥasan 'Alī al-Ḥaḍramī, a native of Seville, in Spain, and generally known by the name of Ibn Kharūf, possessed high abilities as a grammarian. The works which he composed on this subject afford testimony of his great talents and extensive information; such are his excellent commentary on Sibawayh's Kitāb and his able elucidation of Abu 'l-Qāsim al-Zajjāji's treatise, the Jumal<sup>1</sup>. The master under whom he completed his studies was a native of Spain, surnamed al-Khidabb<sup>2</sup> Ibn Ṭāhir. He died at Seville, A.H. 610 (A.C. 1213-4); some say A.H. 609. Ḥaḍramī means native of Ḥaḍramawt. He must not be confounded with another Ibn Kharrūf, who was a poet, and addressed an epistle to Bahā al-Dīn Ibn Shaddād, in which he alludes to the resemblance of the names. This epistle will be noticed in the life of the Ibn Shaddād,

<sup>1</sup> The ḥafiz Abu 'l-Qāsim 'Alī Ibn Munjib Ibn Sulaymān al-Šayrafī (الصيرفي) was a native of Egypt, and composed a history of the Wazīra, frequently cited by Ibn Kḥallikān. He must have written later than A.H. 507, since he mentions in his work that Abu 'l-'Arab was still alive in that year.

427 AL-RABA'Ī THE GRAMMARIAN

Abu 'l-Ḥasan 'Alī Ibn 'Isā Ibn al-Faraj Ibn Ṣāliḥ al-Raba'ī, al-Baghdādī, a native of Shirāz, but settled at Baghdād, and a grammarian of the first rank by his perfect knowledge of the science is author of a good commentary on Abū 'Alī 'l-Fārisī's 'Idāh (no. 155). He studied at Baghdād under al-Sīrāfī (no. 154), and then proceeded to Shirāz, where he passed twenty years under the tuition of Abū 'Alī 'l-Fārisī, after which he returned to the former city. Abū 'Alī once said: "Tell 'Alī al-Baghdādī that, if he were to travel from the East to the West, he would not meet with an abler grammarian than himself." He observed also, when his pupil was quitting him, that there did not remain a single point on which he would need to ask information. Al-Raba'ī composed a number of works on grammar one of which was a commentary on al-Jarmī's Abridgment (no. 223). The number of pupils who profited by his lessons was very great. Ibn al-Anbārī mentions him in the Ṭabaqāt al-Udubā. He was born, A.H. 328 (A.C. 939-40), and he died at Baghdād on the eve of Saturday, the 20th of Muḥarram, A.H. 420 (February, A.C. 1029) * Raba'ī means descended from Rabī'āh, but I do not know whether it be Rabī'āh, the son of Nizār,<sup>3</sup> who was his ancestor, or some other person of the name; for there were many Rabī'ahs whose descendants all bore the surname of Raba'ī.

1 See No. 342.

2 The autograph has الغلب; this word signifies stout, able bodied.

3 See Eichhorn's Monumenta, tab. I.

* 8 February.—Ed.

428 AL-FAṢĪHĪ

The grammarian Abu 'l-Ḥasan 'Alī Ibn Abī Zayd Muḥammad Ibn 'Alī al-Istirābādī, better known by the appellation of al-Faṣīhī, studied grammar with such success under 'Abd al-Qāhir al-Jurjānī, the author of the Lesser Jumāl<sup>1</sup>, that he became the most learned man of the age in that science. Having proceeded to Baghdād, he settled there and taught grammar, for some time, in the Niẓāmiyah College. He transcribed a great number of books on general literature, and was a most correct copyist. Amongst the numerous pupils who pursued the studies under him was Malik al-Nuḥāt Ibn Šāfi (no. 160) and some traditional information was delivered on his authority by the Ḥafīẓ al-Silafī (no. 43). 'Ī was sitting with him at Baghdād," says this ḥafīẓ, "and I questioned him on some points of grammar, to which he replied by citing the following verses which were composed by a grammarian :"

"Know that grammar is a disastrous study, and drives prosperity out of doors. Better than grammar and its professors is a slice of bread seasoned with olive oil."

Al-Faṣīhī died at Baghdād on Wednesday, the 13th of Dhu 'l-Ḥijjah, A.H. 516 (February, A.C. 1123).* He may have received the surname of Faṣīhī because (he made a particular study) of Tha'lab's work, the Faṣīhī (no. 42), but of this I have no certainty. Istirābādī means belonging to Istirābād, a village in the province of Māzandarān, situated between Sāriyah and Jurjān.

429 IBN AL-'AṢṢĀR

The philologist Abu 'l-Ḥasan 'Alī Ibn Abī 'l-Ḥusayn 'Abd al-Raḥīm Ibn al-Ḥasan Ibn 'Abd al-Malik Ibn Ibrāhīm al-Sulamī (a member of the tribe of Sulaym), surnamed Muhadh<sup>h</sup>hab al-Dīn, and generally known by the name of Ibn al-'Aṣṣār† (son of the oil-press man), was a native of Baghdād by birth and by residence, but his family belonged to the town of al-Raqqah (in Mesopotamia). He held a high reputation as an accomplished scholar, and he possessed (by heart) some of the rarest (pieces of ancient Arabic literature). His masters in that science were the Sharīf Abu 'l-Sa'ādāt Ibn al-Shajārī and Abū Maṣṣūr al-Jawālīqī<sup>1</sup> under whose tuition he obtained great proficiency. He then gave lessons for some time, after which he went to Egypt, where he met Abu Muḥammad Ibn Bari (no. 328) and al-Muwaffaq (Yūsuf) Ibn al-Khallāl, the secretary of state<sup>2</sup>. He knew by heart and understood perfectly the poems of al-Mutanabbī, and he explained them to numerous pupils in 'Irāq, Syria, and Egypt. A great quantity of books, treating of philology or containing poems by the Arabs of the desert, was transcribed by him, but faults are occasionally observable in these copies; notwithstanding all his care and attention. It is said that his genius was not of the brightest order, and that he evinced less talent as a grammarian than as a philologist. The style of penmanship was remarkable for elegance, and (books in) his handwriting are in great request and bear high prices. He was a curious collector of receipts and other scraps of information, and it was his custom to write them down in his books. I met with a number of persons who saw him and studied under him. He was born A.H. 508 (A.C. 1114-5), and he died at Baghdād, A.H. 576, on Sunday, the 3rd of Muḥarram (May, A.C. 1180)*, just as the afternoon prayer was ended. The next day, he was interred in the Shūnīzī cemetery, close to his father's grave.

<sup>1</sup> Al-Jurjānī composed also a celebrated grammar the Jumāl. He died A.H. 474 (A.C. 1078-9) or 474; not in 461 (1068-9). The Greater Jumāl was composed by Abu 'l-Qasim al-Zajjajī; No. 342.

* According to Mahler's calculation 13 Dhu 'l-Ḥijjah fell on Monday, 12 February. —Ed.

† Cairo edition gives al-Qaṣṣār (bleacher) in the body and supports autograph reading in the margin. —Ed.

430 SHUMAYM AL-HILLI

Abu 'l-Ḥasan 'Alī Ibn al-Ḥasan Ibn 'Antar Ibn Thābit al-Hillī (native of Hillah in 'Irāq), surnamed Muḥaddhab al-Dīn, and generally known by the appellation of Shumaym, was an eminent scholar, deeply versed in grammar, philology, and the poems of the desert Arabs; he composed also in verse with great elegance. His first studies were at Baghdād under Ibn al-Khashshāb (no. 325) and other eminent scholars of that period; he then visited Diyār Bakr and Syria, celebrating in his poems the praises of the great and obtaining gifts from them in return. He finally settled at Mosul. A number of works were written by him, and he drew up, out of his own poetry, a book in ten sections, which he named the Hamāsah, in imitation of Abū Tammām's compilation bearing the same title. He was possessed of great talents, but he had an evil tongue and was continually attacking the character of others, without acknowledging or respecting merit where it really existed. Abu 'l-Barakāt Ibn al-Mustawfī has given him a place in his History of Arbela, and commences his notice with a series of anecdotes respecting him, and which would imply that he had but little religion, that he neglected the prescribed prayers, impugned the sacred Qur'ān and laughed at the public. He gives also some fragments of his poetry, which certainly betray a malignant disposition. "He was once asked," says Ibn al-Mustawfī, "why he had obtained the surname of Shumaym<sup>1</sup>, and he returned this answer: 'At one time I used to eat every day a quantity of clay<sup>2</sup>, and, when I passed it, I would examine if it had any odour, but could perceive none. It was for this reason I received the name of Shumaym.' "He died at Mosul on the eve of Wednesday, the 28th of the latter Rabi', A. H. 601 (December, A. C. 1204)*, and was interred in the cemetery which is called after al-Mu'āfa Ibn 'Imrān<sup>3</sup>. The word shumaym is derived from the root of Shamm (to smell).

<sup>1</sup> See No. 344, note

<sup>2</sup> His life is given by Ibn Khallikān.

* 31 May.—Ed.

431 'ALAM AL-DĪN AL-SAKHĀWĪ

Abu 'l-Hasan 'Alī Ibn Muḥammad Ibn 'Abd al-Ṣamad Ibn 'Abd al-Aḥad Ibn al-Ghālīb al-Hamdānī a member of the tribe of 1 This word seems to signify little smaller.

2 Read طين in the printed text.

3 See No. 111, note on al-Mu'āfa.

* 22 December. --Ed.

Hamdān) al-Sakhāwī, surnamed 'Alam al-Dīn (beacon of religion), was a native of Egypt, a teacher of the Qur'ān-readings, and a grammarian. He studied at Cairo under the Shaykh Abū Muḥammad al-Qāsim al-Shāṭibī (whose life will be found farther on), and he acquired under his tuition a sound knowledge of the Qur'ān-readings, grammar, and philology; another of his masters there, was Abu 'l-Jawd Ghīyāth Ibn Fāris Ibn Makki<sup>1</sup>, a teacher of these readings. At Alexandria he took lessons from al-Silafi (no. 43) and Ibn 'Awf (no. 389, note), and at Old Cairo from al-Būṣīri<sup>2</sup> and Ibn Yāsin<sup>3</sup>. He then proceeded to Damascus, where he surpassed all the learned men who cultivated the sciences which were the subject of his own studies; and, with the rapid progress of his reputation, he acquired a most exalted place in public opinion. He composed a commentary, in four volumes, on al-Zamkhashari's Mufaṣṣal and another on the Shāṭibīyan Qaṣīdah, which poem he had studied under the author<sup>4</sup>. He left also some sermons Khutbāhs and poems. The highest respect was shown to him during his life, and when I was at Damascus, I saw the people crowding round him in the great mosque, for the purpose of reading the Qur'ān under his tuition, and they had to wait a considerable time till their turn came. I more than once saw him riding up to the

---

1 Abu 'l-Jawd Ghīyāth Ibn Fāris al-Lakhmī al-Mundhīrī (a member of the tribe of Lakhm and descended from the royal family of the Mundhīrites), was a native of Egypt, an eminent teacher of the Qur'ān-readings, a calculator of inheritance-shares, and a grammarian. He died A. H. 605 (A. C. 1208-9). (Ḥusn al-Maḥādharah).

2 The life of al-Būṣīri is given by Ibn Khallikān.

3 The imām Abu 'l-Ḥasan 'Alī Ibn 'Abd Allāh Ibn Yāsin, a member of the tribe of Kinānah, a native of 'Asqalon and an inhabitant of Egypt, was celebrated as a master of the Qur'ān-readings and as a grammarian. He studied the readings under Abu 'l-Jawd Ghīyāth (see note above), and grammar under Ibn Barī (No. 328). It was in the mosque called the Jāmi' al-'Atiq at Old Cairo, that Ibn Yāsin gave his lessons. He died in the month of Dhu 'l-Qā'dah, A. H. 636 (June, A. C. 1239). (Ḥusn al-Muḥādḍirah).

4 The Shāṭibīyah is a poem in which the different systems of Qur'ān-reading are set forth. The life of the author, al-Qāsim Ibn Firruh, is given by Ibn Khallikān.

Mountain of the Saints (Jabal al-Ṣālihiyyīn).<sup>1</sup> accompanied by two or three persons all reading their lessons to him at the same time, and each in a different part of the book, whilst he made his observations first to one and then to another. He continued in the assiduous discharge of his duty to the last, and he died on the eve of Sunday, the 12th of the latter Jumādā, A. H. 643 (November, A. C. 1245),* ; he had then passed his ninetieth year. When his death drew near, he recited these verses, composed by himself :

"They said that on to-morrow I should arrive at the grounds reserved by the tribe<sup>2</sup>; that the caravan would stop at their place of dwelling; and that all who obeyed them would receive a welcome to rejoice them. I replied: 'I am culpable towards them; what pretext can I dare to meet them?' They answered: 'Is it not their nature to show forgiveness, and especially to those who placed in them their hope?'"

I have since discovered that he was born A.H. 558 (A. C. 1163), at Sakhā. Sakhāwī means belonging to Sakhā, which is a village in Ḡharbiyah, a province of Egypt. Sakhāwī would be regular form, but all agree in employing the word Sakhāwī.

432 IBN AL-BAWWĀB THE KĀTIB

Abu 'l-Ḥasan 'Alī Ibn Hilāl, generally known by the appellation of Ibn Bawwāb, was a celebrated Kātib, possessing a skill in penmanship to which no person ever attained in ancient or modern times. It was Abū 'Alī Ibn Muqlah who first took the present system (of written characters) from the (style of) writing employed by the people of Kūfah, and brought it out under its actual form. He had therefore the merit of priority, and it may be added that 1 This mountain, which is also called Jabal al-Ṣālihiyah, lies two miles north of Damascus. It is about one thousand English feet above the level of the city.

2 See No. 55, note on Ḥima.

* 5 November.—Ed.

his handwriting was very elegant; but to Ibn al-Bawwāb pertains the honour of rendering the character more regular and simple, and of clothing it in grace and beauty<sup>1</sup>. [But it is said that the author of the written character (called) al-Mansūb<sup>2</sup> was not Abū 'Alī, but his brother Abū 'Abd Allāh al-Ḥasan, of whom mention is made in the life of Abū 'Alī: it will be found those of the persons whose names were Muḥammad. When Abū 'Ubayd al-Bakrī<sup>3</sup>, the native of Spain and the author of the works (which are so well known), cast his eyes on the handwriting of Ibn Muqlah, he recited this line:

"When a man feeds his eyes (muqlah), with the sight of Ibn Muqlah's handwriting, all the members of his body would like to be eyes."

It is agreed by all that Abu 'l-Ḥasan (Ibn al-Bawwāb) stood apart (in his superiority); it is his system which is yet followed<sup>4</sup>, but none have ever reached or pretended to reach his pitch of excellence, and yet there are people in the world who lay claim to (talents) which they do not possess. We may add, that for a person to maintain such a pretension is a thing which we never saw nor heard of; all agree that he surpassed competition and that he never had a rival. He was called also Ibn al-Sitrī (the son of the curtain-man), because his father was a bawwāb (porter or usher), whose duty it is to stay the curtain (sitr) which is drawn across the door-way (of the hall of audience). [His master in writing was Ibn Asad the celebrated kātib, whose names are Abū 'Abd Allāh

---

1 Throughout this article I shall indicate the author's later additions by placing between crotchets.

2 Some observations on the character called al-Khaṭṭ al-Mansūb will be found subjoined to the notice on al-Mubārak Ibn al-Mubārak. This notice from one of the notes which accompany the life of Abu 'l-Faḍā'il 'Alī Ibn al-Āmidī.

3 See No. 129, note on al-Bakrī.

4 Literally: It is one his loom they weave.

* The word is not used as a proper noun but in its literal sense 'ascribed to', and the sentence should run: The person to whom the fashioning of the written characters is ascribed was not Abū 'Alī.—Ed.

Muḥammad Ibn Asad Ibn 'Alī Ibn Sa'id al-Qāri (the Qur'ān-reader) al-Kātib (the penman) al-Bazzāz (the linen-merchant) al-Baḡhdādī (native of Baḡhdād). The traditional information which he possessed was received by him from the lips of Abū Bakr Aḥmad Ibn Sulaymān al-Najjād<sup>1</sup>, 'Alī Ibn Muḥammad Ibn al-Zubayr al-Kūfī, Ja'far al-Khuldī, 'Abd al-Mālik Ibn al-Ḥasan al-Saqāṭī, and others of the same standing; he was himself considered as a trustworthy (transmitter of such information). Muḥammad Ibn Asad died on Sunday, the 2nd of Muḥarram, A. H. 410 (May, A. C. 1019),* and was interred in the Shūnizī Cemetery. Ibn al-Bawwab died at Baḡhdād on Thursday, the second of the first Jumādā, A. H. 423 (April, A. C. 1032)†; some say, A. H. 413. He was interred near the grave of Aḥmad Ibn al-Ḥanbal. The two verses which follow were recited to me by one of our learned men, and he informed me at the same time they were composed as an elegy on Ibn al-Bawwab's death:

"Thy loss was felt by the writers of former times, and each successive day justifies their grief. The ink-bottles are therefore black with sorrow, and the pens are rent through affliction."

The idea contained in these verses is very fine. When I was at Aleppo, a jurisconsult asked me the meaning of the following

---

1 Abū Bakr Aḥmad Ibn Sulaymān, surnamed al-Najjād, was an eminent doctor of the sect of Ibn Ḥanbal and a native of Baḡhdād. He studied under a great number of masters distinguished for their learning, and then opened two classes in the Mosque of al-Manḡūr, in one of which he gave his opinions on points of law للنزاع, and in the other he made dictations (No. 370, note). These classes were held on Fridays, before the hour of prayer. He composed a great work on the Sunun or written collections of the Traditions, and another in which he discussed and defended the doctrines peculiar to his sect كتاب في الخلاف. He fasted during the whole course of the year, and at night he eat a single cake, a small morsel, of which he put aside: every Friday, he took no other food than seven of these morsels. His birth is placed in A. H. 253 (A. C. 867), and his death in the month of Dhū 'l-Ḥijjah, A. H. 347 (February—March A. C. 959). Al-Dḥahabī's (Tarikh al-Islām).

* 10 May—Ed.

† The second of the first Jumādā A. H. 423 fell on Sunday, 16 April and the same date in A. H. 413 fell on Thursday, 2 August A. C. 1022.—Ed.

verse, which is contained in a poem composed by a modern, wherein he describes a letter :

" 'Twas a letter like a meadow enamelled with flowers ; its lines were traced by the hand of Ibn Hilāl, and its contents taken from the lips of Ibn Hilāl."

I answered him that the poet's meaning was, that its writing equalled in beauty the penmanship of Ibn al-Bawwab, and that in elegance of style it resembled the epistles of al-Šābi. We have already mentioned (no. 14) that the latter was an Ibn Hilāl (son of Hilal). I then asked the jurisconsult what was rest of the piece, and he repeated it to me, as follows :

"When I received thy letter adorned with the jewels of lawful magic that of style— it seemed to me, like a mansion peopled with every excellence, and I contemplated it (with sadness) as I would a dwelling where my friends resided no longer. Tears trickled from my eyes ; I impressed repeated kisses on the paper, and asked of the characters tracked upon it an answer to my hopes<sup>1</sup>. I pondered over it<sup>2</sup> till I thought its words were the stars of night, or strings of pearls. 'Twas a letter like a meadow enamelled with flowers ; its lines were traced by the hand of Ibn Hilāl, and its contents taken from the lips of Ibn Hilāl."

Relative to the art of writing, (it is said) that Ismā'il (the patriarch) was the first who wrote in Arabic ; but what the learned hold to be the truth is, that Murāmir Ibn Marwah, a native of al-Anbār. was the first who did so. It is said that he belonged to the tribe of Murrah<sup>3</sup> And from al-Anbār the art of writing spread through the people. Al-Ašmā'ī states that it was related of the tribe of Quraysh that, on being asked whence they had received the art of writing, they answered : from Ḥirah. The same question, says he, was then addressed to the inhabitants of 1 Literally : "I asked of its traces to answer my question" an expression which, in Arabic, is just as applicable to a letter as to a deserted dwelling. See Introduction to Vol. I.

---

2 Literally : I hovered round it.

3 See Eichhorn's Monumenta Hist. Arab, tab. III.

Hīrah, and they replied : from al-Anbār. [It is related by Ibn al-Kalbī and al-Haytham Ibn 'Adī<sup>1</sup> that the person who introduced the art of writing from Hīrah to Hījāz was Harb the son of 'Umayyah, the son of 'Abd Shams, the son of 'Abd al-Manāf of the tribe of Quraysh. He had visited Hīrah and brought back with him this art to Makkah. The two ḥāfiẓ just mentioned relate also that Abū Sufyān, the son of Harb, was asked from whom his father had learned the art of writing, and he answered : "From Aslam Ibn Sidrah," and he (Harb) stated that he had addressed the same question to Aslam, and that he replied : "From its inventor, Murāmīr Ibn Murrah". It hence appears that this (art of Arabic) writing came into existence at but a very short time before Islamism. (The tribe of) Ḥimyar had a sort of writing called al-Musnad, the letters of which were separated, not joined together<sup>2</sup> ; they prevented the common people from learning it, and none dared to employ it without their permission. Then came the religion of Islāmism, and there was not, in all Yaman, a person who could not read nor write. The systems of writing among the nations of the east and west amount to twelve ; the Arabic, the Ḥimyarite, the Ionian (or Greek), the Persian, the Syrian, the Hebrew, the Roman, the Coptic, the Berber, the Andalusian<sup>3</sup>, the Indian, and the Chinese. Of these five are extinct, their usage having ceased, and the persons who knew them being no longer in existence; the Ḥimyarite, namely, and the Ionian, and the Coptic, and the Berber<sup>4</sup>, and the Andalusian. Three still exist in the countries where they are employed, but no one in the land of Islāmism is acquainted with them ; these are the Roman, the Indian and the Chinese ; the remaining four, namely the Arabic, the Persian, the Syrian, and the Hebrew, are employed in Islamic countries.]

1 The lives of these two ḥāfiẓ are given by Ibn Khallikān.

2 In this important passage the autograph manuscript concurs with the printed text.

3 Probably the Celiberian.

4 Read البر بوجه in the printed text.

433 SHAYKH AL-ISLĀM AL-HAKKĀRĪ

Abu 'l-Ḥasan 'Alī Ibn Aḥmad Ibn Yūsuf Ibn Ja'far Ibn 'Arafah al-Hakkārī, surnamed Shaykh al-Islām (the shaykh of Islāmism), drew his descent from 'Utbah the son of Abū Sufyān Ṣakhr Ibn Ḥarb Ibn Umayyah. He was a man of great virtue and had travelled through many countries for the purpose of gathering Traditions from the lips of shaykhs and other learned men. Having returned to his native place, he renounced the world and gained (by his character) the respect and confidence of the people. In one of his journeys he saw Abu 'l-'Alā al-Ma'arri and took lessons from him. When they separated, he was asked by one of his companions what he thought of that poet's conduct and religious belief; to which he replied that Abu 'l-'Alā was a Muslim.<sup>1</sup> I have been informed that a man in high rank said to al-Hakkārī; "Are you Shaykh al-Islām?" and that he replied: "No, but I am a shaykh in Islāmism". A number of his sons and grandchildren were jurisconsults or amirs, and rose to high favour in the service of different princes. He was born A.H. 409 (A.C. 1018-9), and he died on the 1st of Muḥarram, A. H. 486 (February, A.C. 1093*). Hakkārī means belonging to Kurdish tribe of Hakkār, which possesses numerous fortresses, castles, and villages in the country to the east of Moṣul.

434 ALI AL-HARAWĪ AL-SĀ'IH

The celebrated traveller<sup>2</sup> Abu 'l-Ḥasan 'Alī Ibn Abī Bakr 'Alī, surnamed al-Harawī because his family belonged to Herāt, was born at Moṣul and settled at length at Aleppo. He visited numerous regions, made frequent pilgrimages<sup>3</sup> and covered the face of the earth with his peregrinations. There was neither sea nor land, 1 See No. 46, note on Abu 'l-'Alā's Qur'ān.

2 The word here rendered by traveller is ṣā'ih, which signifies a rambler, a wanderer.

3 These pilgrimages were made to tombs of saints and other holy places.

* 1 February.—Ed.

plain nor mountain, to which access could be obtained, which he had not seen; and in every place to which he went, he wrote his name upon the walls, as I myself have observed in all the cities which I visited, and their number is certainly very great. To this he was indebted for his reputation, and his name as a traveller became proverbial. I saw two verses composed by one of our contemporaries, Ja'far Ibn Shams al-Khilāfah (no. 135), on a pertinacious writer of begging-poems, and containing an allusion to the circumstance just mentioned; they ran as follows:

"These lying sheets are in the house of every man, and though the rhyme may differ, the meaning is always the same. The earth, both hill and plain, is filled with them, as with the scribbings of the vagabond al-Harawī."

Al-Ḥasan was not, however, devoid of talent; and, by the skill which he possessed in natural magic<sup>1</sup>, he obtained the favour of the lord of Aleppo, al-Malik al-Zāhir, the son of the Sultān Ṣalāḥ al-Dīn. That prince lodged him in his palace, and having conceived a great regard for him, he founded a College outside Aleppo and placed it under the direction of his favourite. This establishment now encloses a mausoleum erected over the grave of al-Harawī. It contains a number of rooms filled with books, and an appropriate inscription has been placed by him on the door of each. I remarked that he had even written the following inscription on the door of the water-closet; Bayt al-Māl fī Bayt il-Mā',<sup>2</sup> I saw also in the mausoleum a branch of a tree hung at the head of his tomb; this branch or rod had naturally assumed the form of a hoop, (the ends being completely united) without the assistance of human art; it is a very curious object, and is said to have been discovered by him in one of his journeys. His last injunctions were that it should be suspended in that place to excite the astonishment of spectators. He composed the following works: Kitāb al-Ishārāt fī Ma'rifat-al-Ziyarāt (indications to make known the places of pilgrimage); Kitāb al-Khuṭab al-Harwiyah

1 By natural magic, or sīmyā as the Arabs call it, is meant legerdemain and phantasmagoria.

2 Literally: The public treasury in the water-closet. I acknowledge my inability to discover the wit of this inscription.

(book of Khutbahs, or sermons, by al-Harawī), etc. I saw two verses inscribed in a fair hand on the wall of the room in the college where he gave his lessons; they appear to have been written by some well-educated person, who had stopped there on his way to Egypt, and their merit induces me to insert them here :

"May the mercy of God be shown to him who offers up a prayer for the welfare of people who stopped here. on their way to Egypt. When they halted at this place, their cheeks were pale (with fatigue) but when the hour of departure drew near, they were red with weeping."

Al-Harawī died in the above-mentioned college between the 10th and the 20th of the month of Ramaḍān, A.H. 611 (January, A.C. 1215).* He was buried in the mausoleum of which we have spoken. Harawī means belonging to Herāt, which is one of the four capitals of Khurāsān; the others are Naysāpūr, Balkh, and Marw. This extensive kingdom contains a number of other great cities, but none of them equal to these. Herāt was built by Alexander Dhu 'l-Qarnayn on his expedition to the East.<sup>1</sup>

435 'IZZ AL-DĪN IBN AL-ATHĪR AL-JAZARĪ

Abu 'l-Ḥasan 'Alī Ibn Abu 'l-Karam Muḥammad Ibn Muḥammad Ibn 'Abd al-Karīm Ibn 'Abd al-Wāḥid al-Shaybānī (a member of the tribe of Shaybān), generally known by the appellation of Ibn al-Athīr al-Jazarī and surnamed 'Izz al-Dīn (majesty of religion), was born at al-Jazīrah, and his first years were spent in that place. Having accompanied his two brothers and his father to Moṣul, he took lessons in that city from the khāṭib Abu 'l-Faḍl 'Abd Allāh Ibn Aḥmad al-Ṭūsī (a native of Ṭūs) and from other eminent masters of that epoch. He went to Baghdād repeatedly, either as a pilgrim (to Makkah) or as an envoy from the governor of Moṣul : and, during these visits, he received lessons from Abu 'I-Qāsim Ya'ish Ibn Ṣadaqah the Shāfi'ite doctor, Abū Aḥmad 'Abd al-Waḥḥāb Ibn 'Alī the Ṣūfī, and other learned men. Having then proceeded to Syria and Jerusalem, he pursued his studies under different masters, after which he returned to Mosul, where he confined himself within doors, and devoted all his moments to study and to the composition of his works. His house then became a centre of union for the learned men of the city and for strangers. His knowledge of the Traditions and his acquaintance with that science in its various branches placed him in the first rank, and his learning as an historian of the ancients and moderns was not less extensive; he was perfectly familiar with the genealogy of the Arabs, their adventures, combats, and history; whilst his great work, the Kāmil, or complete, embracing the history of the world from the earliest period of the year 628 of the Hijrah, merits its reputation as one of the best productions of the kind. He composed also an abridgment, in three volumes, of Abu Sa'd ['Abd al-Karīm] al-Sam'ānī's Ansāb in which he points out the errors of that author and repairs his omissions. It is an extremely useful book and is now very common: but the original work, forming eight volumes, is so extremely rare that I never saw it but once, and that was at Aleppo; it has never reached Egypt, where its contents are only known by the abridgment. Another of Ibn al-Aṭhīr's works is the Akhbār al-Ṣaḥābah (history of the most eminent among the Companions of Muḥammad), in six volumes. On my arrival at Aleppo, towards the close of the year 626 (November, A.C. 1229), Ibn al-Aṭhīr was receiving the kindest attention and every mark of esteem and honour from the Ṭawāshī (eunuch) Shihāb al-Dīn Ṭughril, the atābek or guardian, of the prince of Aleppo, al-Malik al-'Aziz the son of al-Malik al-Zāhir, and was living with him as a guest. I then met him frequently, and found him to be a man of the highest accomplishments and the most excellent qualities, but extremely modest. I was his constant visitor, and, as a close intimacy had subsisted between him and my lamented father, he received me with the utmost regard and kindness. He afterwards made a journey to Damascus, A.H. 627 (A.C. 1229-30), and on his return to Aleppo in the following year, I continued to cultivate his society with unceasing assiduity, but, after a short stay, he removed to Moṣul. Ibn al-Aṭḥir was born on the 4th of the first Jumādā, A.H. 555 (May, A.C. 1160),* at Jazīrah Ibn 'Umar, the native place of his family; and he died at Moṣul, in the month of Shā'bān, A.H. 630 (May-June, A.C. 1233). I shall take occasion to speak again of his brothers Majd al-Dīn al-Mubārak and Diyā al-Dīn Naṣr Allāh. The Jazīrah, or isle above-mentioned, is generally considered to be the same which is called Jazīrat Ibni 'Umar (the isle of the son of 'Umar), but I do not know who this Ibn 'Umar was; some, it is true, say that it was so called after Yūsuf Ibn 'Umar al-Ṭhaqafī, the Amīr of the two 'Irāqs. I have since discovered the true reason, namely, this town was built by 'Abd al-'Azīz Ibn 'Umar, a native of Barqa'id in the province of Moṣul, and therefore called after him. In some historical works I find it named Jazīrat Ibnay 'Umar Aws wa Kāmil (the island of the two sons of 'Umar, Aws and Kāmil), but who these were I know not. I have since read in Ibn al-Mustawfī's History (of Arbela), where he gives the life of al-Mubārak, the brother of this Abu 'l-Ḥasan Ibn al-Aṭḥir, that he belonged to the island of Aws and Kāmil, the sons of 'Umar (Ibnay 'Umar) Ibn Aws al-Taghlibī<sup>1</sup>,

<sup>1</sup> Herāt appears to be the Aria of the Greeks. Alexander the Great founded a city there, which was called Alexandria after him.

* 13 and 23 January.—Ed.

---

1 See, no., 370.

436 AL-'AKAWWAK

Abu 'l-Ḥasan 'Alī Ibn Jabalah Ibn Muslim Ibn 'Abd al-Raḥmān, generally known by the appellation of al-'Akawwak, was a poet of eminent abilities. Al-Jāḥiẓ<sup>2</sup> declares that, for reciting poetry (extempore), he was the admirable of God's creatures, and that he never saw his equal among the Arabs of the desert or 1 Read الثغلي in the printed text.

2 The life of al-Jāḥiẓ is given in this work.

* 12 May.—Ed.

those of the towns. He belonged to the class of mawlās, and was born blind; his complexion was black and his skin spotted with leprosy. A well known piece of his is that which follows:

"For her who came in disguise to see me, and whom every object filled with apprehension, I would sacrifice my father's life. But that visitor was betrayed by her beauty; how could the night conceal the (refulgence of such a) rising moon? She awaited the moment when the spies forgot their duty; she watched the people at their evening conversations, till they yielded to sleep; and then she faced every danger to visit me; but no sooner had she offered the salutation of meeting, than she bid me farewell."

He composed a number of splendid eulogiums on Abū Dulaf al-Qāsim Ibn 'Isa al-'Ijlī<sup>1</sup> and on Abu Ghānim Ḥumayd Ibn 'Abd al-Ḥamīd al-Ṭūsī<sup>2</sup>. One of his finest qaṣīdahs on Abū Dulaf begins thus:

"He (the poet) repelled from his bosom the approaches of wanton folly; he turned from his errors, though pleasure was his occupation".

In that part of the poem where the eulogium is introduced, he says:

"Let Abū Dulaf be marching against the foe, or enjoying repose at home, his presense (is for us), the world. If Abū Dulaf turn away (from us) the world (and Fortune turn from us, to) follow in his steps. Every Arab upon earth, both the dwellers in the desert and those who sojourn in towns, must borrow from him their noble qualities to form therewith a raiment, on the day in which they enter the lists of glory."

It is a long poem of fifty-eight verses, and so beautiful that I should insert it here, did I not wish to avoid prolixity. Sharaf al-Dīn Ibn 'Unayn, a poet whose life shall be given in this work, and an excellent judge of poetry, was once asked which merited preference, the qaṣīdah of al-'Akawwak or the charming poem

1 His life will be found in this work.

2 See no. 117, note on Ḥamīd, where his name is incorrectly written Ḥamid. [The name has been corrected in this edition.—Ed].

composed by Abū Nuwās in the same rhyme and measure, and which begins thus :

"O thou who sufferest from the visits of adversity<sup>1</sup>, thou canst no longer pretend to the love of Laylā or of Samarah."

Ibn 'Unayn abstained from giving a direct answer to this question and merely said : "To judge between these two poems would require a person equal in talent to the poets who composed them." I read some observations written by Abū 'l-'Abbās al-Mubarrad on this qaṣīdah of Abū Nuwās, wherein he says, after inserting the piece ; "I do not think that any poet, either of the times before or after Islāmism, ever reached such a pitch of elegance and majesty, much less that he surpassed it." It is related that al-'Akawwak, after he had celebrated the noble qualities of Abū Dulaf in this poem, composed another in praise of Ḥumayd Ibn 'Abd al-Ḥamid, who said to him : "What is it possible for you now to say of me ? What merit do you leave for me to claim as mine ? You who have spoken of Abū Dulaf in these terms : The presence of Abū Dulaf is for us the world ; if Abū Dulaf turn away, the world follows in his steps !" To this the poet replied : "May God direct the Amir ! I can say of you something better than that." He then recited these verses :

"Ḥumayd and his vast beneficence are (for us) the world. If Ḥumayd turn away from us, adieu to the world !"

On hearing these lines, Ḥumayd smiled, but remained silent, whilst every person of the assembly who knew what good poetry was, declared them finer than those on Abū Dulaf. Ḥumayd then bestowed an ample reward on the author. The narration which follows is made by Ibn al-Mu'tazz in his Ṭabaqāt al-Shu'arā'<sup>2</sup> : "When al-Māmūn was told of this qaṣīdah, his wrath was excessive, and he ordered the poet to be sought for and brought before him. As al-'Akawwak was then residing on the mountain, they were unable to find him, and when the intelligence reached him, he fled to Mesopotamia. Written orders to arrest him being now dispatched in every direction, his apprehensions led him to fly from Mesopotamia, and he had got into the region called al-Shāmāt<sup>1</sup>, when he was discovered and taken prisoner. Having bound him in chains, they took him before al-Māmūn, who exclaimed, on seeing him: 'Son of a prostitute! it was you who said in a poem addressed to al-Qāsim Ibn 'Isā: 'Every Arab upon earth, etc.' He here repeated the two verses: 'You have thus placed me among those who must borrow from him their noble qualities and their titles to glory!' 'Commander of the faithful!' replied al-'Akawwak, 'you belong to a family with which no other can be put in comparison; God chose yours as His own from amongst the human race, and gave it the sacred book, and supreme authority, and a vast empire. But what I said was solely applied to those who were on an equality with al-Qasim Ibn 'Isā.'—'By Allāh!' exclaimed al-Māmūn, 'you made no exceptions, but included us in the number, however I shall not spill your blood on account of these lines, but I shall order your death for the impiety of your verses, in which you assimilate a vile and miserable creature to the Almighty and represent him as the partner of His power: you have said:

1 The autograph has ḥazīn.

2 See no., 316.

'The events of each day are accomplished under thy control, and fortune is directed by thee in her changes. A look of thine was never cast on mortal, but he received a lasting favour or a certain death<sup>2</sup>.'

"But it is God alone who can do so; pluck out his tongue by the root!" The order was immediately executed, and al-'Akawwak thus perished. This event took place at Baghdād, A. H. 213 (A. C. 828-9); he was born A. H. 160 (A. C. 776-7). It is said that he lost his sight by the small-pox at the age of seven years.

1 The author of the Kitāb al-'Iqd (see Ibn Khallikān, Vol. I) states that Shām, or Syria, is divided into five Shāmāt, or Syrias; the indication of these provinces is given by Ibn al-Wardī. See Excerptum ex Ibn al-Wardī, p. 176, in Koehler's Abulfedae Tabula Syriae.

2 One of the highest eulogiums which an Arabian poet could bestow on a patron was, that he did good to friends and evil to foes. The Muslims give similar characteristics to the Divinity; in the list of the ninety-nine holy names, or attributes, we find him styled نافع the useful, and ضار the hurtful.

but this is in contradiction with what has been stated previously."

Such are the terms in which Ibn al-Mu'tazz speaks respecting this qaṣīdah, and a similar account is also given by Abu 'l-Faraj in his Kitāb al-Aghānī. I met these two verses accompanied by another in Abū 'Abd Allāh Ibn al-Munajjim's Kitāb al-Bārī<sup>1</sup>, a work containing a history of the later poets, but he attributes them to Khalaf Ibn Marwān, a mawlā of 'Alī Ibn Rayḥāh; the third verse is as follows :

"When thou visitest with thy wrath, thy sword returns well pleased ; and when thou smilest, the eyes of (thy) riches melt into tears."

In one of his eulogiums on Ḥumayd, he says :

"Ḥumayd provides nourishment for all who inhabit the world, and they have thus become his family. It would seem as if his forefather Adam had enjoined him to feed the human race, and he therefore gives them food."

In another of his pieces he says :

"The Tigris quenches the people's thirst, and you, Abū Ghānim, furnish them with food. The people are the body, the (khalīf) Imām of the true direction is the head, and you are the eye of the head."

Ḥumayd died on the festival of the fast-breaking (Ist of Shawwāl). A. H. 210 (January, A. C. 826),* and his loss was deplored by our poet in a qaṣīdah, of which one of the verses was :

"We also have received that moral lesson which others received before us (in the death of great of good) but alas ! we have no room left for patience under grief."

Abu 'l-'Atāhiyah<sup>2</sup> also lamented the death of Ḥumayd in these lines :

"O Abū Ghānim ! vast was the court of thy (hospitable) dwelling, and numerous are the (grateful) visitors who now surround thy lofty tomb ! But a tomb frequented by visitors availeth not the person whose body lies mouldering within it."

1 The life of Abū 'Abd Allāh Hārūn Ibn al-Munajjim will be found in this work.

2 His life is given No. 91.

* 15 January.—Ed.

Numerous anecdotes are related of al-'Akawwak, but we must confine ourselves to the above. The word 'Akawwak' means a fat and short man, but stout. The date which we have here given of Ḥumayd al-Ṭūsi's death is that mentioned by al-Ṭabarī in his history, and I am strongly inclined to believe that he breathed his last at Famm al-Ṣalḥ, to which place he had accompanied al-Māmūn when that khalif went to consummate his marriage with Būrān (no. 117).

437 'ALĪ IBN AL-JAHM

Abu 'l-Ḥasan 'Alī Ibn Jāhm, a poet of well-deserved celebrity, drew his descent from Sāmāh Ibn Luwayyi of the tribe of Quraysh, and bore the surname of al-Sāmi for that reason. His genealogy is thus set forth by the Khaṭīb<sup>1</sup> in the History of Baghdād, when giving the life of al-Jāhm, Abu 'l-Ḥasan's father: 'Alī Ibn al-Jāhm Ibn Badr Ibn al-Jāhm Ibn Mas'ūd Ibn Asid Ibn Udhaynah Ibn Karrār<sup>2*</sup> Ibn Ka'b Ibn Jābir Ibn Mālik Ibn 'Utbah Ibn Jābir Ibn al-Ḥārith Ibn Qaṭan Ibn Mudlij<sup>3†</sup> Ibn Qaṭan Ibn Aḥram<sup>4‡</sup> Ibn Dhuhl Ibn 'Amr Ibn Mālik Ibn 'Ubaydah Ibn al-Ḥārith Ibn Sāmāh Ibn Luwayyi Ibn Ghālib. The same historian has an article on 'Alī, the son of al-Jāhm, in which he says: "His collected poetical works are well known; he was good poet, skilled in all branches of the art, and a favourite with (the khālif) Ja'far al-

1 See No. 33.

2 The autograph has كراز.

3 The autograph has مدليج.

4 Here the autograph has احرم.

* Cairo edition gives (كراز) Karrāz.—Ed.

† Cairo edition gives (خديج) Khudayj.—Ed.

‡ Cairo edition gives (احزم) Aḥzam.—Ed.

Mutawwakil ; he was not less conspicuous for his piety than for his talents." His enmity to 'Alī Ibn Abī Ṭālib and his ostentatious display of attachment to the Sunnite doctrines (may detract in some degree from his character). but, as a poet he certainly possessed a natural genius and great abilities, whilst his style and expression were remarkable for sweetness. He was one of those who passed (with al-Māmūn) from Khurāsān to 'Irāq but in the year 232 (A. C. 846-7), or, by another account, in 239, he was sent back again by al-Mutawwakil whom he had attacked in a satire. The Khālif wrote at the same time to Ṭāhir Ibn 'Abd Allāh Ibn Ṭāhir<sup>1</sup>, directing him to tie up 'Alī Ibn al-Jahm on a cross the moment he arrived, and keep him in that position for the space of a day. When 'Alī reached Shādhīyākh in the dependencies of Naysāpūr, he was imprisoned by Ṭāhir, and afterwards brought forth and exposed naked on a cross during an entire day. In allusion to this circumstance 'Alī pronounced the following verses :

"It was not a person of inferior merit or a man unknown whom they crucified on Monday morning at Shādhīyākh. They had their hearts, content in that exposition. but, thanks be to God ! their victim was a man of honour and noble soul<sup>2</sup>."

The piece contains many more verses, but it is too well known to require insertion here. The poet then returned to 'Irāq and proceeded from thence to Syria. Some time afterwards, (the Khālif) al-Musta'in received a letter from the master of the post-horse establishment at Aleppo, informing him that 'Alī Ibn al-Jahm had set out from that city for 'Irāq in company with some other persons, and that they had sustained a desperate conflict with some horsemen of the tribe of Kalb, by whom they were attacked on the way. When succour came up, 'Alī was found wounded and at his last gasp, but he was able to pronounce these words :

1 This Ṭāhir succeeded his father 'Abd Allāh, a governor of Khurāsān, in A. H. 230.

2 Such I believe to be the meaning of the verse, in which the words شرفا and تبحيلا must be substituted for شرفا and تبحيلا. I consider مل قلوبهم and مل مدورهم as equivalent to مل قلوبهم and مل مدورهم.

"Has fresh darkness been added to the night or has the morning been removed from its station! I thought of the people at Dujayl! but O, how far am I from Dujayl!"

It must be here remarked that his place of residence in Baghdād was in the Shāri' or street, of Dujayl. The above-mentioned letter was received in the month of Sha'bān, A. H. 249 (September-October, A. C. 863), and that suffices to mark the epoch of his death. When his body was stripped, a paper was found on it containing the following verses:

"May the mercy of God be on the stranger in a distant land! what a misfortune has he brought upon himself! He has left his friends, and neither he nor they shall again enjoy the pleasures of life."

A close friendship subsisted between him and Abū Tammām, and the latter addressed him some farewell lines beginning thus:

"It is to-day the departure on one whose acquaintance was an honour; and for to-morrow are reserved the tears which flow not now."

'Alī Ibn al-Jahm's collected poetical works from a small volume; they contain this fine thought:

"An affliction not to be equalled is the enmity of a man without honour or religion. He freely abandons you his own reputation, and attacks yours which you so carefully preserve."

These verses were directed by him against Marwān Ibn Abī Ḥafṣah<sup>2</sup>, who had composed on him the following epigram:

"Jahm Ibn Badr was surely not a poet, and yet this son of his pretends to make verses. It is true, my father was a neighbour to his mother; and when 'Alī claims to be a poet, he makes me suspect something."

This idea was taken from Kuthayyir, the lover of 'Azzah<sup>3</sup>, who, having one time recited some verses to the poet al-Farazdaq

1 Literally: Has the torrent carried off the morning.

2 See M. de Sacy's Chrestomathie, tom Vol. II, p. 518.

3 See No. 138.

by whom they were approved, was then addressed by him in these terms: "Tell me, Abū Ṣakhr! did your mother ever go to Baṣrah?" "No", replied Kuthayyir, "but my father did frequently!" When Ibn al-Jahm was in prison, he composed the well-known verses which begin thus:

"Thou art now in prison!" said they, but I answered: "The prison harms not my body; where is the sword which has not been confined in a scabbard?"

This is the best piece ever written on such a subject, and I would give it all here were it not so long. The lines which follow are also of his composition:

"O (cruel fair!) thou who rejoicest in the torments I endure! thou art as a king, acting like a tyrant because he has the power. Were it not for love, I should match thee (in haughtiness); but if ever I recover from that passion, thou shalt experience more than thou expectest!"

Sāmī means descended from Sāmāh, the son of Luma'i; many persons write this name Shāmī, but they are mistaken. Dujayl, diminutive form of the word Dijlah (Tigris), is the name given to a canal situated higher up the river than Baghdād. It derives its waters from the Tigris and branches off from it on the west bank, opposite to al-Qādisiyah, between Tikrit and Baghdād; a number of towns and villages are situated on its banks. It must not be confounded with the Dujayl (in the province) of al-Ahwāz, which also waters a number of towns and villages, but flows from the neighbourhood of Ispahān; this last was dug by Ardashīr Ibn Bābak Ibn Sāsān, the first of the (Sasanide) monarchs of Persia.

438 IBN AL-RŪMĪ

Abu 'l-Ḥasan 'Alī, surnamed Ibn al-Rūmī (the son of the Christian), was the son of al-'Abbās, the son of Jurayj, or of

---

1 It must be observed that Baṣrah was al-Farazdaq's native place.

Jurjis (Georgius) as some say, and a mawlā to 'Ubayd Allāh Ibn 'Isā Ibn Ja'far Ibn al-Manṣūr Ibn Muḥammad Ibn 'Alī Ibn 'Abd Allāh Ibn al-'Abbās Ibn 'Abd al-Muṭṭalib. This celebrated poet, whose verses are so admirable for beauty of expression and originality of thought, was a diver (it might be said) for novel ideas, bringing them forth from their secret recesses and producing them to the best advantage. Every thought which he treated was developed to the utmost, and not a shade of it was left by him unnoticed. His poems, which were transmitted down orally by al-Mutanabbī, who learned them from himself, were devoid of order till Abū Bakr al-Ṣūlī undertook the task of arranging them according to the letters in which they rhymed: and Abu 'l-Ṭayyib, the book-copyist of Ibn 'Abdūs<sup>1</sup>, collected them again from all the copies then existing, both those containing the poems arranged by the letter of the rhyme and those where they were given indiscriminately, and he augmented the whole by the addition of about one thousand verses. Ibn al-Rūmī composed not only long qaṣīdahs, but short pieces also of admirable beauty, and he has employed in some of them every tone which satire or praise can assume. It is thus that he says:

"Those generous men bestowed without rebuking, or, if they rebuked, they deferred not their gifts. How many there are, possessing great wealth yet avaricious; whilst others make presents, although obliged to borrow."

In the following lines he expresses a thought which, he says, had never occurred to any poet before him:

"Your counsels and your faces and your swords shine like stars when misfortune sheds darkness around. They are signals of guidance, and beacons to dispel the shades of night, when the results of our enterprises are merely objects of conjecture."

---

1 This Ibn 'Abdūs is probably the same who bore the surname of al-Jihghyārī. See (No. 359, note on Jihghyārī). The author of the Fihrist makes mention also of an 'Alī Ibn Muḥammad Ibn 'Abdūs, a grammarian and a native of Kūfāh, who composed some works on poetry, prosody, and grammar.

(Fihrist, fol. 120). A third Ibn 'Abdūs was a Qur'ān-reader (No. 11, note), and a fourth was concerned in Ibn al-Bḥalmāghānī's affair No. 183.

Another singular idea of his is expressed thus :

"When a man praises another to obtain his gifts and lengthens his eulogium his intentions are satirical. Had he not judged the water to be low in the well, he would not have taken so long a rope to draw it up."

In the following lines he blames the custom of dyeing the hair black; and, according to Abu 'l-Ḥasan Ja'far Ibn Muḥammad Ibn 'Alī al-Ḥamdānī, they contain an idea never expressed before :

"When a man's hair continues black, though his youth is worn out, that dark tint will be thought artificial. How then can an old man expect that the factitious blackness of his hair should be considered natural, or that he himself should be taken for a youth?"

He once asked a man of rank to render him service, and although he did not expect any good of him, his request was granted; on this occasion he expressed his feelings in these lines :

"I once asked a service of you, and you granted it generously, though I imagined that you would not. By this favour you impose on me the duty of gratitude, and that is more painful for me than to undergo a refusal from you. I never thought that, throughout all the vicissitudes of time, I should see a favour asked of a man like you. Though what I have received from you gives me pleasure, yet to think that it is on such men as you that hopes are to be placed, gives me pain."

These verses are attributed to Ibn Waki' al-Tinnisi (no. 396). To avoid of lengthening this article we shall merely state that his poetical works abound with beauties. His birth took place at Baghdād on a Wednesday morning after sunrise, which was the 2nd day of the month of Rajab, A. H. 221 (June A. C. 836):* the house in which he was born is situated in the place which bears the two names of al-'Aqīyah<sup>1</sup>, and the street of al-Khataliyah (Darb al-Khataliyah): this house lies opposite to the palace (Qasr) of 'Isa Ibn Ja'far, grandson of al-Manṣūr. In one of his journeys he composed these lines on Baghdād :

1 In the autograph this name is written العتقیة.

* 21 June.—Ed.

"In that city, youth and its passions were my consorts, and there I wore the rope of life in its newness. When I call up its image to my mind, I see therein the youthful beauties whom I once loved, and their slender waists gracefully bending<sup>1</sup>."

He died at Baghdād on Wednesday, the 28th of the first Jumādā, A. C. 283 (July, A. C. 896)*; some however placed his death in 284 or 276. He was interred in the cemetery at the Garden Gate (Bāb al-Bustān). The cause of his death is thus related: Al-Qasim Ibn 'Ubayd Allāh Ibn Sulaymān Ibn Wahb, the Wazīr of the Imām (khalif). Al-Mu'taḍid dreaded incurring the satirical attacks of Ibn al-Rūmī and the out-bursts of his malignant tongue; he therefore suborned (a person called) Ibn Firās<sup>2</sup>, who gave him a poisoned biscuit, whilst he was sitting in company with the wazīr. When Ibn al-Rūmī had eaten it, he perceived that he was poisoned, and rose to withdraw, on which the wazīr said to him: "Where are you going?" "To the place?" replied Ibn al-Rūmī, "where you sent me." "Well," observed the wazīr: "you will present my respects to my father." "I am not taking the road to hell;" retorted the poet. He then retired to his house and died some days afterwards. The physician who attended him administered medicines to counteract the effects of the poison, but it was reported that he employed by mistake a wrong drug. It is related by Ibrāhīm Ibn Muḥammad Niṣṭawayh (no. 11) that he saw Ibn al-Rūmī at the point of death and asked him how he was, and that the poet answered by reciting these verses:

"The physician has made mistake to my cost—in a mistake like that of the man who went down into the well for water and could not get up again. People will say it was a blunder of the doctor's, but doctor's blunders are strokes well aimed by fate."

The relation which follows was made by the poet Abū 'Uthmān al-Nājim: "I went to see Ibn al-Rūmī in his illness, and I

1 Literally: I see it, and over it waving the branches of youth.

2 The autograph has فراس.

* 14 July.—Ed.

found him at the last extremity; on rising to take leave of him, he said to me :

'Abū 'Uthmān ! you deserve the praises of your people, and your beneficence is readier for your friends than your reproaches. Behold thy brother and take thy fill of the sight ; for I am thinking that he shall not see you again, nor you him, once this day is past.'

The wazir Ibn 'Ubayd Allāh was a man greatly feared, and always displaying an excessive propensity to bloodshed ; high and low were in dread of him, for he never discovered a man to be rich without making him suffer for it. He died on the eve of Wednesday, the 10th of the latter Rabi', A H. 291 (March A.C. 904) in the Khalifate of al-Muktafi (Allāh), being then somewhat more than thirty years of age. The following verses were made on his death by 'Abd Allāh Ibn al-Ḥasan Ibn Sa'd:

"We tasted of joy on the evening of the wazir's death; and we shall continue to taste of it for three evenings longer<sup>1</sup>. May God grant no mercy to his bones and no blessing to his heir."

This wazir had a brother named Abū Muḥammad al-Ḥasan, whom he and his father outlived, and some verses (which we shall give lower down) were composed on this event by Abu 'l-Ḥārith al-Nawfalī, or rather by al-Bassāmī, a poet whose life will be found immediately after this. I have since read in al-Sam'ānī's Dhayl (supplement), where he gives the life of the chamberlain (al-Lawwāb), 'Alī Ibn Muqallad Ibn 'Abd Allāh Ibn Karāmah, that Abu 'l-Ḥārith al-Nawfalī said : "I detested al-Qāsim Ibn 'Ubayd Allāh for an injustice which he had done me, and, on the death of his brother al-Ḥasan, I composed these verses and placed them in the mouth of Ibn Bassām al-Bassāmī." Before this passage, al-Sam'ānī inserts these words : "Abū Bakr al-Ṣūlī<sup>2</sup>, who was so remarkable for his social talents, mentions that he had seen Abu 'l-Ḥārith and that he was a man of veracity." The verses are :

<sup>1</sup> It is possible that I may have mistaken the meaning of this verse.

<sup>2</sup> The life of Abū Bakr Muḥammad al-Ṣūlī will be found in this work.

"Say to the father of al-Qāsim, now suffering under his loss : 'Fortune has shown thee strange events ; thou lovest a son who was an ornament to the world, and another survives, filled with turpitude and vices. The life of this one is as bad as the death of that ; in neither case hast thou escaped misfortune.'"

The following verses were composed also on the same subject by a poet whom I have since discovered to be this same Abu 'l-Ḥārith :

"Speak to the father of al-Qāsim, now suffering, under his loss, and exclaim aloud : O thou who hast met a double misfortune ! thou hast lost a son who was an ornament, but turpitude survives (in the other), and what turpitude ! The life of this one is as the death of that : strike thy head with thy hands (in despair)."

439 AL-BASSAMĪ THE POET

Abu 'l-Ḥaṣan 'Alī Ibn Muḥammad Ibn Naṣr Ibn Maṣṣūr Ibn Bassām, generally known by the surname of al-Bassāmī, was a poet of great celebrity<sup>1</sup>. His mother Umāmah was daughter to

---

1 This Abu 'l-Ḥaṣan 'Alī Ibn Bassām is erroneously considered by Ḥājjī Khalīfāh as the author of the work entitled al-Dhakhīrah fi Maḥāsin Ahl al-Jazīrah ( the treasure, on the excellences of the people of the Island ); by which island is meant the Spanish peninsula. This mistake has not escaped the notice of M. de-Sacy : see his Anthologie Grammaticale, p. 445. It appears from some of the extracts given from the Dhakhīrah by Ibn Khalīkān and from the declaration of al-Maqqarī ( see MS. No. 794, fol. 104 ), that Abu 'l-Ḥaṣan 'Alī Ibn Bassām al-Shantarīnī native of Santurem, the author of the Dhakhīrah, lived in the sixth century of the Hijrah and that he was a contemporary of al-Faṭḥ Ibn Khāqān, the author of the Qalā'id al-'Iqān. M. de-Gayangos states, I know not on what authority, that ; Ibn Bassām died A.H. 542 (A. C. 1147-8). See his Muhammadan Dynasties in Spain, Vol. I, 370 ; where he announces also that he will treat more at length about him and his writings. I have made many but fruitless searches to find some account of him, and am much surprised at the silence of al-Maqqarī, Ibn Baḡkuwāl, Abu l-Maḥāsin Ibn Khāqān, 'Imād al-Dīn, and other authors, on the subject.

Ḥamdūn al-Nadīm.<sup>1</sup> His (poetry) was transmitted down orally by Abū Bakr al-Ṣūlī, Abū Sahl Ibn Ziyād, and others who had learned portions of it by heart. The elegance of his verses and the subtilty of his genius entitled him to an eminent rank amongst the poets, but he was particularly noted for the keenness of his tongue and his natural turn for satire: none indeed could escape him; princes and wazīrs, high and low, nay even his own father, brothers, and other members of the family had to suffer from his attacks. To his father he addressed the following lines:

"Were you to live the lives of twenty eagles, do you think I could die and let you survive? If I outlive you a single day, I shall show my grief by rending the bosom of thy purse."

In another of his pieces he says.

"When greyness cast a veil over my head, I abandoned the pursuit of vain amusements and of love. O for the days of my youth and their pleasures! O that the days of youth could be retrieved with money! Renounce all amorous follies, O my heart! and forget the passion which warmed thee; now, that grey hairs are come, thou art good for nothing! Cast a parting look on the world; the time for journeying forth approaches and the hour of farewell is come. Misfortunes keep guard over man; and, after his misfortunes, he leaves only a transient reputation behind."

He once asked the wazīr Ibn al-Marzubān<sup>2</sup> for the present of a horse, but was refused, on which he pronounced these lines:

"Your avarice refused me a vile broken-down horse, and you shall never see me ask for him again. You may say that you

---

1 "The kātib Ḥamdūn Ibn Ismā'il Ibn Dāwūd was the first of his family who followed the profession of a nadīm, or boon companion. His son Ahmad Ibn Ḥamdūn was an oral transmitter of poetry and historical narrations." (Fihrist, No. 874, fol. 195).

2 It appears from al-Makīn (Elmacīn) that Ibn al-Marzubān was chamberlain to the Khalīf al Mutawakkil. (See Historia Saracenica, p. 151).

reserve him for your own use, but that which you ride was never created by God to be reserved<sup>1</sup>."

The following verses were composed by him on the kātib Asad Ibn Jawhar :

"Curses light on Fortune ! she has brought strange things to pass ! and having effaced the last vestiges of polite learning and refined taste, she gives us *kātib*s whom I should send back to school, could I lay my hand on them. Behold an example of this in Asad Ibn Jahwar who assumes the air of an able kātib."

In another piece he says :

"When at Ṣarāt<sup>2</sup>, we purloined some nights (of pleasure) from the vigilance of adverse fortune, and they now serve as dates in the sad pages of our life<sup>3</sup> and as titles announcing future joys and hopes to be fulfilled."

His father Muḥammad Ibn Naṣr enjoyed a large fortune and lived in a style of princely magnificence<sup>4</sup> ; he was remarkable for his manly and generous character, the elegance of his person, the delicacy of his table, the splendour of his dress, and the richness of the furniture which embellished his place. It is related that the wazīr al-Qāsim Ibn 'Ubayd Allāh went one day to al-Mu'taḍid, whom he found playing at chess, and overheard him repeating this verse :

"The life of this one is as the death of that ; in neither case hast thou escaped misfortune."

(See no. 438). The khalif then raised his eyes, and perceiving, with some confusion, that al-Qāsim was present, he said to him : "O Qāsim ! cut Ibn Bassām's tongue off, so that it wound you

1 This is the more obvious meaning ; but another is intended, namely : nothing which God has created can remain pure if you touch it.

2 Al-Ṣarāt is the name of one of those canals, or rivers which united the Euphrates and Tigris.

3 Literally : As a date to the nights.

4 The autograph has السرو not السرور .

no more<sup>1</sup>." Al-Qāsim immediately hastened away to cut out the poet's tongue, al-Mu'taḍid, being informed of his intention, called him back and said: "Do him no harm, but cut his tongue off by showing him kindness and giving him some lucrative employment." In consequence of this order, al-Qāsim appointed him director of the post-horse establishment in al-'Awāsim and the Jund of Qinnisrīn, and receiver-general of the tolls arising from the bridges of these districts. Ibn Basām died in the month of Ṣafar, A. H. 302 (August-September, A. C. 914); some say, A. H. 303. He was then aged upwards of seventy. The praises of his grandfather Naṣr Ibn Maṣṣūr were celebrated by (the poet) Abū Tammām. Al-'Awāsim is a large district in Syria, and its capital is Antioch. Abu 'l-'Alā al-Ma'arrī mentions it in this verse:

"When Baghdād and its people ask concerning me, I ask concerning the people of al-'Awāsim."

The poet expressed himself thus because his native place, Ma'arrat al-Nu'mān, lay in the territory of al-'Awāsim. Al-Ṭabarī mentions in his history that, in the year 170 (A. C. 768-7), Hārūn al-Rashīd constituted all the (northern) frontier of Mesopotamia and Qinnisrīn into a separate district, under the name of al-'Awāsim (the protecting fortresses). When al-Mutawakkil destroyed the tomb of al-Ḥusayn, the son of 'Alī Ibn Abī Ṭālib, in A. H. 236 (A. C. 850-1), al-Bassāmī composed the following verses on the occasion:

"If the Umayyids impiously murdered the son of the Prophet's daughter, their descendants have committed as foul a deed—behold the tomb of al-Ḥusayn reduced to ruins! They regretted to have borne no share in his murder, and they therefore wreaked their hatred on his ashes."

This tomb, with the adjoining edifices and dependencies, was razed to the foundations by al-Mutawakkil, through detestation

---

1 Literally: Cut his tongue off from you. An anecdote similar to this is related of Muḥammad and al-'Abbās Ibn Mirdās.

for the memory of 'Alī and his sons al-Ḥasan and al-Ḥusayn; he even ordered the spot on which the tomb was erected to be sown with grain and irrigated, and no person was permitted to visit it. This is stated as a fact by historians, but whether it be true or not is known to God alone. Ibn Bassām composed some works, such as a history of 'Umar Ibn Abī Rabī'ah<sup>1</sup>, which is the fullest and most satisfactory treatise ever written on the subject; the History of al-Aḥwāṣ<sup>2</sup>; the Munāqaḍāt al-Shu'arā (contradictions of the poets); an edition of his own epistles, etc.

440 AL-QĀḌĪ AL-TANŪKHĪ

The qāḍī Abu 'l-Qāsim 'Alī al-Tanūkhī<sup>3</sup> was a native of Antioch and drew his descent from Quḍā'ah by the following line: his father Muḥammad was the son of Abu 'l-Fahm Dāwūd Ibn Ibrāhīm Ibn Tamīm Ibn Jābir Ibn Hānī Ibn Zayd Ibn 'Ubayd Ibn Mālīk Ibn Muriṭ Ibn Sarḥ Ibn Nizār Ibn 'Amr Ibn al-Ḥārith Ibn Ṣubḥ Ibn 'Amr Ibn al-Ḥārith—this last was one of the ancient kings of the tribe of Tanūkh—Ibn Fahm Ibn Taym Allāh Ibn Asad Ibn Wabrah Ibn Taghlib Ibn Hulwān Ibn 'Imrān Ibn al-Ḥāf Ibn Quḍā'ah. Abu 'l-Qāsim al-Tanūkhī was deeply learned in the doctrines of the Mu'tazilites and in astrology. Al-Tha'ālibī speaks of him in these terms: "He ranked among the men the most distinguished for their learning (in the law) and their acquaintance with general literature; his noble character and excellent qualities placed him in a class apart, and the following description, which I read in a chapter of the Ṣāḥib Ibn 'Abbād's works might be applied to him with justice: "If you desire it, I shall be (serious as) the rosary of a devotee; and, if you like, I shall be (sweet as) the

1 The life of 'Umar Ibn Abi Rabī'ah is given by Ibn Khallikān.

2 Al-Aḥwāṣ Ibn Ja'far, the chief of the tribes descended from Hawāzin, is principally known for the active part which he took in the celebrated combat of Shī'b Jablah. (See Rasmussen's Hist. Arab. ante-Islam, p. 71, and Fresnel's Première lettre sur l'histoire des Arabes avant l'Islamisme, p. 47).

3 It has been already observed by our author, No. 46. that Tanūkh was a general denomination for those tribes which had settled at Baḥrayn.

apple of Fātik<sup>1</sup>; if you require it, I shall be (grave as) the frock of a monk, or if you prefer it, I shall be (exhilarating as) the choicest wine of the drinker. He filled the place of qāḍi at Baṣrah and al-Aḥwāz for some years, and, on his removal from that office, he proceeded to the court of Sayf al-Dawlat Ibn Ḥamdān as a visitor and eulogist. That prince gave him an honourable reception, and having granted him a considerable sum for his support, he wrote to the court of Bagħdād requesting the Qāḍi's reinstatement. Abu 'l-Qāsim then obtained an increase of salary and high preferment; the wazīr al-Muhallabi and other powerful men of 'Irāq took him into favour and became the ardent partisans of one whom they considered as the standard of elegant taste and the sweetest flower of their convivial meetings. He was one of the band of qāḍis and jurisconsults who formed the Wazīr al-Muhallabi's social parties which met on two evenings of each week; all reserve was then discarded, and they freely indulged in the pleasures of the table and gave loose to gaiety. Such were the qāḍi Abu Bakr Ibn Quray'ah, Ibn Ma'rūf<sup>2</sup>, Abu 'l-Qāsim al-Tanūkhī and others, not one of whom but had a long grey beard; and this was also the case with al-Muhallabi himself. At these meetings, when once a perfect familiarity was established and sociability prevailed, their ears were gratified with the charms of music, and, yielding to the excitement of gaiety, they divested themselves of the robe of gravity to indulge in wine; then, as they passed through all the degrees of enjoyment, from hilarity to extravagance, a golden cup, weighing one thousand mithqāls<sup>3</sup>, and filled with the delicious liquor of Quṭrubbul<sup>4</sup> or of 'Ukbara<sup>5</sup>,

1 This is probably an allusion to an apple of amber on which the name of Fāik was engraved, and which had been presented to the poet al-Mutanabbi by the direction of that Amir. A celebrated poem, composed by al-Mutanabbi on this occasion, will be found in M. Grangeret de Lagrange's Anthologie arabe.

2 See No. 154. The life of Ibn Quray'ah is given by Ibn Khallikān.

3 The cup must therefore have weighed from six to seven pounds.

4 The village of Quṭrubbul, so celebrated for the excellence of its wine, lay between Bagħdād and 'Ukbara. It was much frequented by the people of the former city in their parties of pleasure and debauch.

5 See no. 324.

was placed in the hand of each; in these they dipped, or rather steeped their beards, till the contents were nearly all absorbed, and they then sprinkled each other by shaking off the drops. During this, they danced about in variegated dresses and in necklaces formed of white violets and the odoriferous seeds of the gum-acacia<sup>1</sup>. The next morning, their habitual gravity and guarded conduct were resumed with the emblems of their judicial functions and the reserved deportment of venerable doctors". Al-Tha'ālibi then gives numerous passages of his poetry, and from these we select the following:

"A liquor composed of sunbeams<sup>2</sup> is presented in a vase formed of the light of the day; or of air, were it not solid—or else of water, were it not devoid of fluidity. When the page who bears it round to the right or to the left, leans forward to pour forth its contents, he seems to be clothed in a jasmine (white) robe, with one single sleeve of (a red colour like) the pomegranate blossom."

"How highly should I prize thy beauty, did thy kindness towards me correspond to it! Thou art a full moon; but, alas! the sky in which thou risest is not the sky of love".

"Youth to which hoary age succeeds not, such is thy friendship; an evil for which there is no physician, such is thy hatred. A portion of every soul seems combined in thine, and thou art therefore a friend to every soul".

Al-Mas'ūdi states, in his Murūj al-Dhahab, that Abu 'l-Qāsim al-Tanūkhī composed a qaṣīdah in imitation of Ibn Durayd's Maqṣūrah and he then quotes some lines from it in praise of Tanūkh and Quḍā'ah, the tribe to which the author belonged. Another writer relates the following anecdote which he had received from Abu Muḥammad al-Ḥasan Ibn 'Askar a Ṣūfī, and a native of Wāsiṭ: "In the year 521 (A.C. 1127) I happened to be at Baghdād, and was sitting on the stone seat of the Abraz

1 This passage may perhaps have some other meaning, which I am unable to discover.

2 In this piece the poet intends to describe a large white vase containing red wine.

Gate for recreation, when three females came and sat down beside me. I immediately recited the following verse, meaning to apply it to them :

"Air, were it not solid ; water, were it not devoid of fluidity".

One of them then asked me if I knew the rest of the piece, and I replied that I knew that verse only. On this she said : 'If any one were to recite to you the lines which precede, and those which terminate the piece, what would you give that person?' I replied that I had nothing to give, but that I would kiss the person on the mouth. She then recited to me the verses already mentioned, but after the first she introduced these :

"When you consider it and its contents, you have before your eyes a white flower enclosing a fire. One is the extreme of whiteness, and the other of redness".

When I had got the verses by heart, she said in jesting : 'Where is your promise ?' meaning the kiss". The Khaṭīb states that Abu 'l-Qāsim al-Tanūkhī was born at Antioch on Sunday, the 25th of Dhu 'l-Hijjah, A. H. 278 (March, A. C. 892) ; that he went to Baghdād, where he learned Traditions and studied Ḥanafite jurisprudence, and that he died at Baṣrah on Tuesday, the 7th of the first Rabi', A. H. 342 (July, A. C. 953). He was interred the next morning in a mausoleum, situated in the street of al-Mirbad, which was bought for him<sup>1</sup>. Mention shall be made of his son al-Muḥassin in the Letter M. Both of them have left a diwān, or collection of poetry.

441 AL-NĀSHI 'L-AṢGHĀR

Abu 'l-Ḥasan 'Alī Ibn 'Abd Allāh Ibn Waṣīf al-Ḥallā, sur-named al-Nāshi al-Aṣghar (or the less), was a poet of merited celebrity for his talents, and the author of numerous qaṣidahs on the family of the Prophet<sup>2</sup>. He displayed also great abilities in scholastic theology, which science he had learned from Abu Sahl Ismā'il Ibn 'Alī Ibn Nūbakht, and he held an eminent rank among the Shi'ites. Numerous works were composed by him. His grandfather Waṣīf was a slave, and his father 'Abd Allāh a druggist. The surname of al-Ḥalla was given to him because he made trinkets (ḥ. lyah) of brass. Abu Bakr al-Khuwārazmi states that the following charming verses, composed by al-Nāshī al-Aṣghar, were recited to him at Aleppo by their author :

<sup>1</sup> The autograph has بشارع العربد .

"When I rebuked my friend (whom unrequited love had rendered) weary of the world<sup>1</sup>, I might as well have written on water. Had he even renounced his passion after my reprimand, that love which was at first a spontaneous movement would have still remained a duty<sup>2</sup>."

In the year 325 (A. D. 936-7) he went to Kūfah and taught his own poetry in the great mosque; al-Mutanabbi, who was then a boy, attended his lessons and took them down in writing. The following passage from one of al-Nāshī's qaṣīdah was written down by al-Mutanabbi under the author's dictation.

"As a secret thought is the point of his spear, it is always buried deep in the heart<sup>3</sup>. His sword is like the pact made with him at Ghadir Khumm<sup>4</sup>; the necks of mankind are formed to receive it<sup>5</sup>".

The same thought has been thus versified by al-Mutanabbi :

"In the tumult of battle the enemy's heads are as eyes, and thy sword then seems to have been formed out of 1 For الملوك read الملوك .

2 The poet means to say that the real merit of the lady would be acknowledged even on cool reflection.

3 Literally: It has no departure from the hearts. The verses are in praise of 'Alī Ibn Abi Tālib, as is proved by the first hemistich of the second verse, which is written thus in the autograph and in one of my own manuscripts: و صار له كبيعته بغيره

4 See no. 73. note festival of Ghadir Khumu.

5 In Arabic, the idea of being bound by a pact is expressed thus: They have placed the pact of the other party as a collar around their necks.

sleep<sup>1</sup>. Thy lances also are made of thoughts, for it is into the hearts alone that they enter".

Al-Nāshī had visited the court of Sayf al-Dawlat Ibn Ḥamdan at Aleppo, and that prince overwhelmed him with the marks of his generosity. When he decided on taking his departure, he addressed the following farewell lines to his patron :

"I bid farewell, but that reluctantly; and, forced by fate, I make a sacrifice to which I should never have willingly consented. I depart in grief, which is now the only companion of my soul; if indeed I can depart and not leave my soul behind. You removed from me a weight of misery in loading me with favours and with honours; and these we refer to God alone for retribution. May He protect you whose religion is protected by thy sword! May He conduct you to a garden of happy life, ever green and ever flourishing."

The lines which follow are attributed to him by al-Tha'ālībī, but in a subsequent part of this writer's work, he gives them as the production of Muḥammad Ibn al-Munajjim<sup>2</sup> :

"If you cannot attain the honours which are coveted by noble minds, cease your efforts and seek a foreign land. How often has a life of ease become irksome! and how often have fatigues and toils yielded repose"

This piece also is by al-Nāshī :

"If the feelings of a friend be alienated from me wrongfully<sup>3</sup>, I try to give him reasons to justify his conduct; I expostulate not, lest I should irritate him more. And I make him feel that my silence is a reproach sufficient. 'And if I am tormented by an

1 That is : Thy sword falls upon the foeman's head as naturally as sleep upon the eye.

2 Al-Tha'ālībī mentions at least four different persons bearing the name of Ibn al-Munajjim; they all composed verses and flourished, it would appear, in the time of Sayf al-Dawlat. They were distinguished by the additional surnames of Abu Muḥammad, Abu 'l-Faṭḥ, Abu 'l-Ḥasan Babek Ibn 'Alī, Abu 'l-Isa, and Hibat Allāh. Ibn Khallikān gives the lives of two others—a few pages farther on.

3 The autograph has تَجَنَّبَا .

ignorant pretender to knowledge, ever ready to assert the wrong for the right, I honour him with my silence, for silence often answers for an answer".

His poetry contains a number of fine thoughts. He died A. H. 366 (A. C. 976—7), but some say that he expired on Wednesday, the 5th of Şafar, A. H. 365 (October, A. C. 975), at Baghdād. His birth took place A. H. 271 (A. C. 884—5).

442 AL-ZĀHĪ THE POET.

Abu 'l-Qāsim 'Ali Ibn Ishāq Ibn Khālaf, generally known by the surname of al-Zāhī, was a celebrated poet and a native of Baghdād. He excelled in description, and his production abound with beauties. The Khaṭīb, speaks of him in the History of Baghdād, and, after mentioning that his poetry offers many fine examples of simile and other figures of rhetoric, he states his belief that his poetical composition are not numerous, and he then gives us to understand that he was a seller of cottons and kept a shop in the Grant of al-Rabī<sup>1</sup>. 'Amīd al-Dawlat Abū Sa'id Ibn 'Abd al-Rahīm<sup>2</sup> gives him a place in his Ṭabaqāt al-Shu'ara,

<sup>1</sup> see no. 223.

<sup>2</sup> According to Hājji Khalifah, in his biographical dictionary under the head of Ṭabaqāt al-Shu'ara, a work bearing this title was composed by the Wazīr Abu Sa'id Muḥammad Ibn al-Ḥusayn Ibn 'Abd al-Rahīm, who died A. H. 338. This date cannot be exact, for an extract from that Wazīr's work, quoted by Ibn Khallikān in the life of Ibn Nūbakht No. 447. proves that he wrote subsequently to A. H. 431. Abu 'l-Maḥāsīn is more satisfactory: he says in the Nujūm, under the year 439: "In this year died Abu Sa'id Muḥammad Ibn al-Ḥusayn Ibn 'Ali Ibn 'Abd al-Rahīm, Wazīr to Jalāl al-Dawlat Ibn Buwayh. Having lost heavy sums by the exactions of the Turkish troops, he was placed under the necessity of quitting Baghdād and seeking concealment in Jazīrah Ibn 'Umar, where he remained till his death, which occurred in the month of Dhu 'l-Qa'dah (April-May, A. C. 1048)." Ibn Khallikān writes his surname Abu Sa'id and as such I have printed it in the life of Bishr Ibn Ghayāth al-Marisi, where we find attributed to him another and says: "He was born on Monday, the 19th of Şafar, A. H. 318 (March, A. C. 930); he died at Baghdād on Wednesday, the 19th of the latter Jumāda, A. H. 352 (July, A. C. 963), and was buried in the cemetery of the Quraysh. His poetical works fill four volumes, and the greater part are in honour of the family of Muḥammad, or in praise of Sayf-al-Dawlat, the wazīr al-Muḥallabī, and other great men of the epoch". He adds that al-Zāhī composed pieces in all the various styles of poetry, and quotes the following lines as his:

"Thy aversion for my love has torn the veil of my passion, and my tears serve only to expose me more. I did not reject the control of prudence, till I saw the beauty of the ringlets which adorned thy cheeks. Yet I often before saw handsome faces, but, to my misfortune, my choice fell on thine".

In describing the violet, al-Zāhī employs the following comparison:

"Azure flowers from the garden, surpassing the sapphire in colour and borne on stems too feeble to support them<sup>1</sup>; they appear like the first flame given out by a match tipped with sulphur".

By the same:

"A wine so transparent in the cup that it resembles the light which dawns over the domain of man. It is so clear<sup>2</sup> and limpид in the glass that it appears not, and the vase which contains it seems to be empty".

The following is one of the beautiful passages offered by his poems:

"Fair ladies, the glances of whose eyes are such, that they seem to brandish swords and unsheath daggers. They accosted work, entitled (al-Nutaf wa 'l-Turaf). In all the other works I have examined, his surname is written Abu Sa'īd. For the turbulent conduct of the Turkish troops, under Jalāl al-Dawlat, see Abu 'l-Feda's Annals, year 423, and Wilken's edition of Mirkhond's History of the Buīdes, page 95.

(Continued from page 369)

1 Read in the printed text ضعفن.

2 The autograph has قت.

me one day in the recess of valley, and they deluded my heart, which was deluding itself with assumed insensibility. When they unveiled, they were full moons; when they drew their veil, they were crescents; when they moved with dignity, their waists were pliant wands; and when they turned their heads, they displayed the tender looks of the gazelle. From their necks encircled with pearls, their heads seemed to rise like stars; they were formed to do harm to our hearts<sup>1</sup>".

This mode of enumerating female charms has been often employed by poets, but was never given under so admirable a form as this. Al-Mutanabbi has said on the subject:

"In her aspect, a moon; in her movements, a branch of willow; in odour, ambergris; in looks, a gazelle".

And al-Tha'ālibi quotes the following description of a musician by a contemporary poet, which is in the same style:

"I devote my life for thee, O most charming of mortals and fittest object of a lover's attachment! Thy countenance is, by its beauty, the solace of our eyes; and thy voice, by its sweetness, the delight of our ears. When ladies asked me to describe thee, I told them the strangest tale: "It looks?" said I, "she is a gazelle, in song a nightingale, in countenance an anemone, and in graceful port a wand".

[By al-Zāhi:

"Who will apologize for me from the two cheeks of the moon (beloved) that exposed the heart to ruin. (The moon) taught (prompted me to write) poetry which hastened me towards ruin and offending the moon and then stopped."]*

To avoid lengthening this notice, we shall abstain from giving other examples of the same kind<sup>2</sup>.—"Zāhi," says as-Sam'āni, is a relative adjective derived from (Zāh) the name of a village in the dependencies of Naysāpūr, to which place a number of persons are indebted for their surname". He then adds: "But as for

1 Literally: As detriments to the heart's core.

2 Before this, in the Arabic text, a piece of two verses is inserted, which the author had added at a later period. They are not fit for translation.

* [ ] Omitted by de Slane.—Ed.

Abu 'l-Ḥasan* 'Alī Ibn Ishāq Ibn Khalaf al-Baghdādī, who was surnamed al-Zāhi, I cannot say whether he derived that appellation from the village of which we are speaking or not; all I know of him is, that he was a native of Baghdād and a good poet: "

443 IBN AL-MUNAJJIM AL-NADIM

Abū 'l-Ḥasan 'Alī Ibn Yahya Ibn Abi Maṣṣūr al-Munajjim was the boon companion (nadīm) of al-Mutawakkil and a member of his intimate society. On the death of his patron, he continued in the highest favour with the Khalifahs who succeeded; being permitted to sit in their presence when they gave audience from the throne, and enjoying their confidence to such a degree that they entrusted him with the knowledge of all their secret intentions and proceedings. The favour in which they held him, high as it was, continued without intermission to the last. Before his connection with the Khalifahs, he had placed himself under the patronage of Muḥammad Ibn Ishāq Ibn Ibrāhīm al-Muṣ'abī<sup>1</sup>; he then became acquainted with al-Faṭḥ Ibn Khāqān<sup>2</sup>, for whose use he formed a library consisting chiefly of philosophical treatises; and he augmented that Wazīr's collection of books manifold by the immense number of works which he had copied for the express purpose, and none of which existed therein before. He knew by heart and could repeat correctly a great quantity of ancient poems and historical narrations, but his skill lay principally in vocal music. (and the airs which he sung were) obtained by him before Ishāq Ibn Ibrāhīm al-Mawṣili (no. 84), with whom he had been personally acquainted. He is the author of some works, such as an account of the anteislamic and the Muslim poets, a life of Ishāq Ibn Ibrāhīm al-Mawṣili, a treatise on boiled wine<sup>3</sup>, etc.

<sup>1</sup> Muḥammad Ibn Ishāq al-Muṣ'abī was governor of the province of Fārs.

<sup>2</sup> His life is given by Ibn Khallikān,

<sup>3</sup> See, no. 316 note on must.

* In the beginning of the notice, the kunya is given Abu 'l-Qāsim—Ed.

That he had a talent for poetry is proved by the following verses of his on the ṭayf al-khiyāl<sup>1</sup>:

"Dearer to me, by Allāh! than my father, is that object which appeared to me in the darkness, like the smile of the glimmering morn. Its aspect increased my passion and filled my heart with flames. Who can cure a heart smitten and enamoured, which beats yet stronger the more I strive to calm it? The image of my beloved made me a visit (in my dream), but that has only served<sup>2</sup> to destroy my repose for ever".

Some other elegant passages in verse composed by the Nadīm are still extant. He lived long enough to pay his court to al-Mu'tamid, and he died in the latter part of that Khalīfah's reign. It was at Sarra-man-ra'a that he breathed his last, A. H. 275 (A. C. 888-9). He left a number of sons, all of them distinguished for their honourable character and convivial talents; notices of some of them will be found in this work under the proper heads.

444 IBN AL-MUNAJJIM THE POET

Abu 'l-Ḥasan 'Alī Ibn 'Abd Allāh Hārūn Ibn 'Alī Ibn Yaḥyā Ibn Abi Maṣṣūr al-Munajjim, the celebrated poet, belonged to a family which produced many elegant scholars, men of refined taste, whose agreeable qualities rendered them the companions of Khalīfahs and Wazīrs in their parties of pleasure. The Ṣāhib Ibn 'Abbād admitted him into his society, and composed the following verses in his honour:

"The descendants of al-Munajjim are gifted with a vivid intellect, and their literary talents are conspicuous in Persian and in Arabic. I persevered in praising them and extolling their merit, till I was accused for excessive partiality".

1 See vol. I, Introd.

2 I read ذ; for ار; in the second hemistich; the autograph has ذادنى; but the measure of the verse does not seem to allow this reading. [There is no deviation from the Rules of prosody if the autograph reading is maintained —Ed.]

Among the number of charming verses composed by Abu 'l-Ḥasan Ibn al-Munajjim are some which have been set to music. One of his pieces is as follows :

"Motives for affection subsist between thee and me ; and the relationship which we bear each other is that of love<sup>1</sup>. (Sighing for thee,) I blame time for its delay, and my reproaches shall long continue, unless they effect an amendment by which that delay may be annulled. O thou who refuseth me thy presence and thy letters ! tell me if I am to hope that this double privation may cease ? Were it not for the allurements of hope, a heart arrayed in the grab of suffering had been broken on thy account. But let us not despair of divine favour ; the separated are sometimes reunited, and the absent may perhaps return again."

He addressed the following lines to Ibn al-Khuwārazmī, who had hurt his foot by a fall :

"How could stumble hurt the man who, in affairs of importance, never made a false step but he recovered from it ? How could harm reach a foot which always trod in the path of honour<sup>2</sup> ?"

He composed a great deal of poetry, and numerous amusing anecdotes are told of him. His other works are, a treatise on the month of Ramaḍān, drawn up by him for the khalifah al-Rāḍī; the Kitāb al-Nirūz wa 'l-Mihrigān (book of the vernal and autumnal equinoxes); a refutation of al-Khalīl (Ibn Aḥmad's) system of prosody ; a work commencing with the genealogy of his own family, undertaken at the request of the wazīr al-Muḥallabī, but left unfinished ; an essay on the difference between the style of Ibrāḥīm Ibn al-Mahdī and that of Ishāq al-Mawṣilī in the art of vocal music ; the Kitāb al-Lafẓ al-Muḥīṭ, etc. (the comprehensive declaration, being a refutation of the assertions made by al-Laḳīṭ<sup>3</sup> ; this is an answer to Abu 'l-Faraj al-Ispahānī's work, entitled al-Farq wa 'l-Mi'yār bayn al-Awghād wa 'l-Ahrār (difference between the noble and rabble and appreciation of their relative worth). This Ibn al-Munajjim was son to the author of the Kitāb al-Bārī<sup>1</sup>, a work containing a choice of extracts from the productions of the later poets, and grandson to Abu 'l-Hasan Ibn al-Munajjim of whom an account has been given in the preceding article. His birth took place on the 9th of Ṣafar, A. H. 276 (June, A. C. 839); some say in 277; he died on Wednesday, the 16th of the latter Jumāda, A. H. 352 (July, A. C. 963). He persevered till the end of his life in the custom of wearing his hair dyed<sup>2</sup>.

1 This verse is not given in the autograph.

2 Literally : Which never trod but towards an honourable station.

3 The word Laḳīṭ signifies a foundling. It does not appear why this appellation should have been given to the author of the Kitāb-al-Aghānī.

445 ABU 'L-FATH AL-BUSTI

Abu 'l-Fath 'Ali Ibn Muḥammad al-Busti, a kātib and a poet of great celebrity, was the author of (the work entitled): al-Ṭarīqat al-Anīqah fī 'l-Tajnis<sup>3</sup>, al-Anīs al-Badī' al-Tāsīs (the pleasing path, designed as a treatise on paronomasia and as a delightful-companion by the solidity of the principles which it lays down)<sup>4</sup>. As specimen of the elegance which he attained (in expression and thought), we shall quote the following phrases: "He that does good to the man that wrongs him confounds the man that is jealous of him." "He who yields to his anger loses his civility." "The fashions of lords are lords of the fashions." A sign of your good fortune is your keeping within bounds." "Bribes are the means of

1 The life of Hārūn Ibn 'Ali al-Munajjim is given in this dictionary.

2 See no. 19, note on dyeing hair.

3 The autograph has في التجنيس .

4 I follow the authority of Abu 'l-Feda (see Annals, year 400) in taking Ṭarīqah, as here mentioned, for the title of a book, but must acknowledge having doubts on the subject, as no such work is noticed by Ḥājjī Khaliḥ. If it be really a title, some quibble is intended by the words Tajnis and Tāsīs one of which is a term of rhetoric and the other of prosody. It strikes me however that the whole passage may apply to the man himself, as it might be rendered thus: "A poet of great celebrity, was noted for the pleasing way in which he employed paronomasias (or alliteration), and was a delightful companion by the solidity of the principles which he laid down".

success". "The most foolish of men is he who is scornful to his brethren and presumptuous towards his sovereign." "The mind is a sun ; and the understanding its rays." "Fate mocks at wishes." Definition of temperance : "To be content with a strict sufficiency." "There is no mending a torn darn." We shall here give some striking passages from his poetry :

"When he flourishes his pen on going to use it, he makes you forget the bravest warrior that ever flourished a spear<sup>1</sup>. When he rests his fingers upon the paper, all the writers in the world confess themselves his slaves<sup>2</sup>.

Some men clothe themselves in silk, whilst a wretched body is concealed beneath. It is thus that people paint their cheeks when suffering from a tumour in the lungs.

When you try to amuse people in talking of past event and those which are to come, avoid repetitions, for their minds are placed in hostility to repetitions.<sup>3</sup>

Endure thy brother's temper, be it what it may ; you cannot hope to amend it. How could you expect to succeed, since his body contains four humours placed in it by nature ?"

[ By al-Busti, when authorities were angry with him and this is a fine expression : "Say to the Amir, may my Lord perpetuate his honour and bestow on him from His hidden blessing. I committed a crime, and those in power did not cease forgiving their servants when they committed crimes. I gather from eyes their movements, so you should gather from noble forgiveness its honour. He who expects forgiveness for his sins from Him Who is above him should forgive those who are under him."

By him also :

"Again when you discover fault in my words, my memory, eloquence and expression, do not assign it to me because my words are in conformity with the level of the understanding of the people. Thus he said in Zahr al-Ādāb Allāh knoweth the best" ].*

1 For قَالَ read عَلَّمَ. Both words are identic in signification.

2 As these verses abound in the figure of Arabic rhetoric called tajnis, or alliteration, their merit is lost in the translation.

3 In the original Arabic these verses offer another curious example of tajnis.

* [ ] Omitted by de Slane.—Ed.

That part of his poetry composed in the alliterative style called tajnis is very copious. He died at Bukhāra, A. H. 400 (A. C. 1109-10); some say A. H. 401. We have given the explanation of the word Busti (no. 198). I read, at the beginning of his collected poetical works, that he bore the names of Abu 'l-Faṭḥ 'Alī Ibn Muḥammad Ibn al-Ḥusayn Ibn Yūsuf Ibn Muḥammad Ibn 'Abd al-'Azīz, and this may, perhaps, have been the case.

446 AL-TIHĀMI THE POET

Abu 'l-Ḥasan 'Alī Ibn Muḥammad al-Tihāmi, a celebrated poet, is spoken of in these terms by Ibn Bassām in his Dhakḥīrah: "He was renowned for his abilities and possessed a cutting tongue; between him and all the varied modes of expression the path was free; his poetry indicated as clearly (the talents) which had fallen to his lot, as the coolness of the zephyr denotes the presence of the morn, and it disclosed his exalted station in science as plainly as the tear reveals the secret of love." His collected poetical works form a small volume, but the greater portion of the pieces is exquisite; one of his most graceful passages is contained in a long qasidah, composed in praise of the Wazīr Abu 'l-Qāsim Ibn al-Maghribī<sup>1</sup>, where he says:

"When the lips of the flowers on the hills and those of our (mortal) beauties were smiling, I asked my friend which were the fairest to the sight: 'I know not', said he; 'all of them are anthemis blossoms<sup>2</sup>.'"

A similar thought is expressed in the following lines, attributed to (Hibat Allāh) Ibn Sanā 'l-Mulk, a poet whose life will be found in this work.

---

1 See no. 187.

2 The flower of the anthemis being white, Arabic poets compare ladies' teeth to it.

"I hesitated, thinking the teeth (of my beloved) Sulayma to be anthemis buds, and taking these for teeth. I therefore kissed them all, to dispel my doubts: and every person who feels earnest (in such matters) would do the same."

In one of his eulogistic passages he has surpassed all competition, where he says:

"His gifts are ample; yet he thinks them small, though the copious rains of autumn are shamed (by their abundance). Compared with the beneficence which he sheds around, the swollen cloud would be called a vapour, and oceans, rivultes."

He composed a most beautiful elegy on the loss of his son, who died a boy; and I am only prevented from giving it here because people say that it brings ill luck; but as two of the verses, descriptive of envious men, contain an unusual (but elegant) idea; I shall insert them:

"I pity those who envy me, because hatred burns within their bosoms. They see God's kindness towards me, and thus their eyes are in paradise whilst their hearts are in hell".

In the same piece he thus expresses his contempt for the world:

"It is composed of turbid elements, yet you hope to find it free from dregs and lees! He who requires of time what is contrary to its nature, is as the man who seeks in water for a brand of fire. He who expects what is impossible, builds his hopes on the brink of a tottering sand-bank".

In this also he says:

"I reside in the vicinity of foes, but he (whom I have lost) sojourns near his Lord; how different that neighbourhood from mine! The parching heat which consumes my heart has changed my hair to grey, and this light colour is the flame of that inward fire".

The idea expressed in the last verse is taken from a piece by Abū Naṣr Sa'īd Ibn al-Shāh, where he says:

"Thy cheeks', said she, 'are darkened with hair, and that spoils the fairest faces'. I replied: 'Thou hast kindled a fire in my heart, and the smoke has settled on my cheeks.'"

The following verses belong to one of his long qaṣīdahs :

"How often have I warned you against the land of Ḥijāz, for its gazelles (maidens) are accustomed to make its lions (heroes) their prey. You wished to pursue the hinds<sup>1</sup> of Ḥijāz; but, unfavoured by fate, was you who became their prey".

One of his best-known pieces is this :

"In the company of noble-minded men there is always room for another; friendship, it is true, renders difficulties easy. A house may be too small for eight persons, yet friendship will make it hold a ninth".

A fine verse from one of his qaṣīdahs is the following :

"If Time, who is the father of mortals, treats you ill, reproach not then his children when they do the same."

"Al-Tihāmi arrived secretly in Egypt, with a great number of letters which he was bearing to the Banu Qurrah from Ḥassān Ibn Mufarrij<sup>2</sup> Ibn Dagħfal al-Badawi<sup>3</sup>; and being arrested, he represented himself as a member of the tribe of Tamim. On a closer examination, he was discovered to be al-Tihāmi the poet, and they cast him into the prison of Cairo called Khazānat al-Bunūd. This occurred on the 25th of the latter Rabī' A. H. 416 (June, A. C. 1025). On the 9th of the first Jumāda in the same year, he was put to death secretly, in the place where he was confined. He was of a tawny complexion". I extracted the foregoing passage from an historical work by a native of Egypt, in which he gives an account, day by day, of the events which passed in that country. I have seen only one volume of it, and do not know how many it consisted of. Some time after al-Tihāmi's death, he was seen in a dream<sup>1</sup> by one of his friends, who asked him how God had treated him? to which he replied: "He has pardoned me".—"For which of your deeds?" said the friend. "For having said in an elegy on the death of a little boy of mine:

1 For صيد منها read صيد لها .

2 I follow the orthography of the autograph.

3 The Arabic tribe of the Banu Qurrah inhabited the province of Barqah and took up arms for Abu Rakwa the Umayyide, when he attempted to expel the Fāṭimides from Egypt. See an account of this revolt in M. de Sacy's Exposé de l'histoire des Druzes, tom. I. p. cccxvii et se. It was their former hostility to al-Ḥākim which now induced Ḥassān Ibn Mufarrij, the chief of the tribe of Tayy, to court their alliance against that khallif's son al-Zāhir; al-Tihāmi was the secret agent in this affair which totally failed. Ḥassān had already revolted against al-Ḥākim some years before. See Druzes p. cccl.

'I reside in the vicinity of foes, but he sojourns near his Lord;
how different that neighbourhood from mine!'"

—Tihāmi is the relative adjective derived from Tihāmah, a name given to Makkah. It is for this reason that the blessed Prophet was surnamed al-Tihāmi. The same name is also given to the mountains and other regions which form the extensive province between Ḥijāz and the frontiers of Yaman. I do not know whether it was from the city or from the province that the poet took his surname.

447 IBN NŪBAKHT THE POET

Abu 'l-Ḥasan 'Alī Ibn Aḥmad Ibn Nūbakht, a good poet, but unkindly used by fortune, led a life of uninterrupted misery and privation, and died at Miṣr, in the month of Shā'bān, A. H. 416 (October, A. C. 1025). He was interred at the expense of the kātib and poet Walī al-Dawlat Abu Muḥammad Aḥmad Ibn 'Alī, surnamed Ibn Khayrān, who was recorder of the diplomas and commissions issued by al-Zāhir Ibn al-Ḥākim, sovereign of Egypt. He also left a small volume of poetry, in which are found these well-known lines:

"You listen to slanderers traducing me, and you hold me in such slight esteem that you contradict not their false reports. But were thy image to visit me in the sweetest of dreams and slander thee, I should even renounce sleep!"

[I say that one famous poet Abu 'Abd Allāh al-Ḥusayn Ibn al-Yamani, the author of the noted al-Risālah has put forth a similar idea; some of his verses are:

<sup>1</sup> See no. 19, note on dreams.

"I have been informed that persons slandering me came to thee to prejudice thy mind. The sorcery of the slanderers had its effect on thee, but in my case it is beating cold iron".

The origin of this idea is the verse of the famous poet 'Abd Allāh Ibn al-Dumaynat al-Khuth'ami in his qaṣīdah ending in B.]

I mention Ibn Khayrān here, without allotting him a separate article, because the date of his death is unknown to me, and in this work I confined my notice to persons the time of whose decease is ascertained.—I have since discovered an account of his life, with some extracts from his poetry, in the Ṭabaqāt al-Shu'ara of the Wazīr Abu Sa'id al-Dawlati: "He was a handsome young man," says this writer, "and intelligence of his death was brought to us in the month of Ramaḍān, A. H. 431 (May—June, A. C. 1040)." I became acquainted with that passage when at Cairo, towards the end of the year 674 (A. C. 1276).

448 ṢARĪ' AL-DILA

Abu 'l-Ḥasan 'Alī Ibn 'Abd al-Wāḥid, a jurisconsult of Baghdād and a poet of considerable reputation, was generally known by the appellations of Ṣarī' al-Dila (the slain by blandishments), Qatīl al-Ghawāshī (the victim of sudden misfortunes) and Dhu 'l-Raqā'atayn (the afflicted with double madness)<sup>2</sup>. Al-Rashīd Abu 'l-Ḥusayn Aḥmad Ibn al-Zubayr, the same whose life has been given (no. 64), names him in the Kitāb al-Jinān, and then says: "In poetry he trod the same path as Abu 'l-Raqā'maq (no. 53), and a humorous qaṣīdah was composed by him, the concluding verse of which is such that, if he had never made another on the same subject it would have sufficed to place him in the highest 1 See note on Ṭabaqāt al-Shu'ara, no. 442.

2 These were probably admired expressions which first occurred in his verses and were then applied to him by the public as surnames. For a similar reason the poet Muslim Ibn al-Walīd was surnamed the vanquished by fair. See no. 10 note on Muslim Ibn al-Walīd.

degree of eminence and obtain for him the palm of victory. It is the following :

'He who has missed acquiring either knowledge or riches is on level with dogs.'

"He came to Egypt, A. H. 412 (A. C. 1021-2), and celebrated the praises of (the khalifah) al-Zāhir li-I'zāz dīn Allāh." I read, in a copy of his collected poetical works, that his (Ṣarī' al-Dīlā's) names were Abu 'l-Ḥasan Muḥammad Ibn 'Abd al-Wāḥid al-Qaṣṣār al-Baṣrī (the fuller of Baṣrah); God best knows which of us is right! This poet died suddenly, A. H. 412 (A. C. 1021-2), of an obstruction of the windpipe, which took him at the house of the Sharīf al-Baṭṭā'ī. I am inclined to think that this occurred at Miṣr (Old Cairo) for I took the date of his death from the diary of which I have spoken in the life of al-Tihāmi (see no. 446). My opinion is confirmed also by Ibn al-Zubayr's statement that he came to Egypt in that very year. It was of him that Abu 'l-'Ala says in one of his poems :

"Thou wast called Ṣarī' (the vanquisher), but this word underwent the intensive permutation and assumed the form of fa'ilīl".

In the piece from which this line is taken, Abu 'l-'Ala excuses himself for not furnishing Ṣarī' al-Dīlā with wine and other requisites for a social party, but informs him that he has sent him a small sum to defray the expenses.

1 Al-Baṭṭā'īhi variant reading.

2 It must be remarked here that Ibn Khallikān is mistaken in supposing this verse to have been addressed to the poet Ṣarī' al-Dīlā, for it appears from the text of Abu 'l-'Ala's poem, and from the commentary, that the person to whom he wrote bore the surname of Ṣarī' al-Bayn. As for the verse itself, it contains an allusion which can be best understood by persons acquainted with the native system of Arabic grammar. The meaning is equivalent to this : "You were called the vanquisher (مَارِع ṣārī') because your amusing conversation vanquished the pains of absence (البين al-bayn) felt by disconsolate lovers. But that name assumed the intensive form, characterised, in grammar, by the type fa'il (فَاعِل), and it thus became ṣarī' (صَارِع the great vanquisher)." It must be observed that ṣarī' signifies both vanquisher and vanquished; Abu 'l-'Ala takes it here in the former meaning, but the commentary on his works informs us that it was a mere licence on his part, since the name Ṣarī' al-Bayn, when applied to this particular individual, means vanquished by (the pains of) absence.

449 ŞURR-DURR

The ra'is and kâtib<sup>1</sup> Abu Maşûr 'Ali Ibn al-Ḥasan Ibn 'Ali Ibn al-Faḍl, generally known by surname of Şurr-Durr, was one of the most eminent poets of his time. He combined in his composition excellence of expression with beauty of thought, and his verses bear the stamp of grace and brilliancy. His collected poetical works, form a small volume, and how exquisitely has he said in one of these qaṣīdahs :

"We ask how are the ferns of Najd<sup>2</sup>, but the willow of the sands<sup>3</sup> knows best what we mean. The mask is now thrown off, and we care no longer whether we name thee openly or designate thee by a surname<sup>4</sup>. Nay, were I to exclaim : O Sulayma ! people would tell me that I only mean Lubaynah. How dear to me is thy image, visiting my dreams and pouring forth illusions and false happiness from the cup of sleep. Throughout the night my eyelids were its steed ; why then should it complain to thee of fatigue and pain<sup>5</sup>. Thus, by night we seemed never to have parted, and by day never to have met".

In describing his grey hairs he says :

"I weep not the departure of my youth, but I weep because my appointed time draws near. Hair are the leaves of the human tree, and when they wither, the branches are soon dried up".

Speaking of a dark-complexioned girl, he has the following pretty thought :

1 From the titles of ra'is and kâtib I should infer that Şurr-Durr held a high place in the civil service.

2 The province of Najd is the Arcadia of the Arabic poets. As the nomadic Arabs employed a species of fern in covering their huts and closing the chinks, the word is often used by the poets to designate the dwellings of a friendly tribe and also those who reside in them.

3 The willow of the sands ; a slender-waisted Arab maiden living with her tribe in the desert.

4 Lovers made it a point of discretion not to tell who their mistress was.

5 "Cette image était censée venir de la part de la maîtresse pour avoir des nouvelles de l'amant". Notice on the Tayf al-Khiyâl, inserted by me in the Journal Asiatique for April, 1838.

"I loved her for her darkness and smoothness; the dark spot of my heart<sup>1</sup>, was an image of her colour. It was only to resemble her that the full moon ever consented to suffer an eclipse. It is in honour of her that the epochs of time are dated by nights<sup>2</sup>".

His father's avarice procured him the nickname of Şurr-Ba'r (bag of dung), but the son, having unexpectedly displayed a superior talent for poetry, received the surname of Şurr-Durr (bag of pearls). A poet of that age, and whose life we shall give, Abu Ja'far Mas'ūd al-Bayāḍī, attacked him in these lines:

"For his avarice your father was named Bag of Dung; but you ungratefully scatter abroad what he treasured up, and call it poetry."

I must say, however, that this satirist is unjust, for Şurr-Durr's poetry is charming; but an enemy cares not what he says: Şurr-Durr lost his life accidentally A. H. 465 (A. C. 1072-3); a pitfall for taking lions had been dug at a village on the road of Khurāsān, and into this he fell. He was born somewhat earlier than year 400 (A. C. 1009). We shall speak of him again in the life of the Wizir Fakhr al-Dawlat Muḥammad Ibn Jahir.

450 AL-BĀKHARZI

Abu 'l-Ḥasan 'Alī Ibn al-Ḥasan Ibn 'Alī Ibn Abi 'l-Ṭayyib al-Bākhārzi an illustrious poet, was the pearl of his age for talent and genius, and bore away the palm in prose and verse. When a young man, he studied the Shāfi'ite system of jurisprudence, and attended with assiduity the lectures of Abu Muḥammad al-Juwayni, the father of the Imām al-Ḥaramayn; he next cultivated the art of penmanship, and obtained occasional employment in the office of the secretary of state. He passed his life in an alternation of riches and poverty, and experienced surprising vicissitudes of 1 The Muslims suppose that there is a black spot or stain in the centre of the heart,—the sign, it seems, of original sin.

2 In Arabic dates it is not the day, but the night of the month which is assigned.

fortune in his travels and sojournings. His taste for literature having prevailed over his inclination for the law, he gained the reputation of an elegant scholar, and devoted his time to the double task of learning Traditions respecting the Prophet<sup>2</sup> and of composing verses. He drew up a continuation to al-Tha'ālibī's Yatimat al-Dahr, and entitled it Dumyat al-Qaṣr wa 'Uṣrat ahl il-'Aṣr (statue of the palace, and the essence extracted from our contemporaries). This work, which includes a great number (of poets), received a supplement, entitled Wishāḥ al-Dumyah (girdle of the statue), from the pen of Abū 'l-Ḥasan 'Alī Ibn Zayd al-Bayhaqī: it is thus that al-Sam'ānī gives the author's name in his treatise, the Dhayl, or Supplement<sup>1</sup>, but 'Imād al-Dīn, in his Khāridah, calls him Sharaf al-Dīn Abū 'l-Ḥasan 'Alī Ibn al-Ḥasan al-Bayhaqī. The latter writer gives also some extracts from his poems<sup>2</sup>. The diwān, or collection of al-Bākhārzi's poetical works, forms a large volume, and the majority of the pieces is very good. An original idea of his is the following:

"I complain of the wounds (inflicted on my heart) by those cheeks which are encircled by scorpions (ringlets)<sup>3</sup>. I, who have a father living, weep for the pearls of thy mouth; how then can it, which is an orphan an (exquisite object), be always smiling?"

Describing an intense frost, he says:

"How many have been the true believers who, torn by the claws of winter, envied the inhabitants of hell! Behold the water-fowls in their nestling-places, ready to prefer the heat of the fire and the spit! If you throw up into the air the drops which remain in your wine-cup, they will return to you hardened into beads of cornelian, O you that possess the two woods<sup>4</sup>! neglect them not, but let music strike up from one and flame from the other<sup>5</sup>."

1 See no. 310.

2 Ibn Khallikān quotes here two verses as a specimen. They both finish with the same word to which a different meaning is given in each case, but their profanity and indecency repel translation.

3 See vol. I. Introduction.

4 By the two woods he means firewood and a lute, which in Arabic is called the wood (al-'ūd); whence the European name.

5 Literally: Strike a wood and burn a wood (ḥarrik 'udan wa ḥarriq 'udan).

One of his pieces contains the following passage :

"O Thou Who hast disclosed the brightness of morning from the pearly teeth (of my beloved), and caused the night to dwell in her ringlets! Thou hast made me the slave of an idol formed by Thyself; by it Thou hast tempted me, and long hast Thou excited my sadness! No wonder that the fire of passion consumeth my heart; (hell—) fire is the meet desert of him who serveth idols."

Al-Bākhārzi was murdered at Bākhār, whilst engaged in a party of pleasure; this occurred in the month of Dhu 'l-Qa'dah A. H. 467 (June-July, A.C. 1075), and the crime remained unpunished.—Bākhār is the name of a tract of country near Naysāpūr, including a number of villages and grounds under cultivation; it has produced many eminent men.

451 IBN AFLAH THE POET

Abu 'l-Qāsim 'Alī Ibn Aflah al-'Absi, surnamed Jamāl al-Mulk (the beauty of the kingdom), was a poet of considerable reputation, fully justified by the elegance of his genius, the beauty of his eulogiums, and the number of his satires. He celebrated the praises not only of the khālifahs, but of the persons holding a subordinate rank; and having travelled to the different provinces of the empire, he visited the princes and the men in high station (obtaining solid tokens of their satisfaction in return for his panegyrics). I have seen the diwān, or collection, of his poetical works; it is a middle-sized volume, drawn up by himself and accompanied by an introduction and a postscript of his own composition. He there mentions the precise number which it contains of verses having the same rhyme, and the whole is digested with much care and attention. I extracted from it the following lines in which he addresses his beloved :

"O thou who knowest not the force of that love which torments me—who conceivest not my fruitless pains and sufferings!

Thou showest equal indifference towards the lover captivated by thy charms<sup>1</sup>, and him whose heart is free from thy power and without a wound. Had I known that thy character was such, I had not rejected my friend's advice when he warned me against thee. It was never my intention to forget thee, till forced thereto by the excess of thy cruelty".

On a girl who was far from being handsome :

"It was not because I disliked the handsome and preferred the ugly that I loved her with a passion so fantastic; but I was too jealous to love a fair one, seeing that all men loved the fair."

Ibn al-Mu'tazz (no. 316) has the following lines on a similar subject :

"My heart leans from this one to that one, and sees nothing to dislike; it is passionate for beauty, as it should be; but it pities her bereft of charms, and loves her<sup>2</sup>".

On a girl who was lame, by Ibn Aflah :

"How dearly I cherish her whom I perceive there wavering in her gait! what stiffness, yet what freedom in her movements<sup>3</sup>! Her beauty raises envy, and they say she halts; but handsome persons are always envied. She is a branch (of willow), and the beauty of a tender branch is in its bending".

The following lines were addressed by him to a great man whose porter had refused him admittance :

"I am grateful to your porter of refusing to admit me, and I leave to others whom he has repulsed the task of abusing him. For he has rendered me a service which merits my highest praise; he saved me from a rude reception and from your inordinate pride."

<sup>1</sup> The autograph has بكي instead of بل.

<sup>2</sup> Here the following passage has been inserted in the margin of the autograph; "And a verse of his which is currently known is the following, from one of his poems :

"On the day in which we parted at the tamarisks of Mina, our separation was without our will".

<sup>3</sup> Literally; And from her flexibility she is united and knotted.

One of his pieces contains the following passage :

"O Thou Who hast disclosed the brightness of morning from the pearly teeth (of my beloved), and caused the night to dwell in her ringlets! Thou hast made me the slave of an idol formed by Thyself; by it Thou hast tempted me, and long hast Thou excited my sadness! No wonder that the fire of passion consumeth my heart; (hell—) fire is the meet desert of him who serveth idols."

Al-Bākhārzi was murdered at Bākhār, whilst engaged in a party of pleasure; this occurred in the month of Dhu 'l-Qa'dah A. H. 467 (June-July, A.C. 1075), and the crime remained unpunished.—Bākhār is the name of a tract of country near Naysāpūr, including a number of villages and grounds under cultivation; it has produced many eminent men.

451 IBN AFLAH THE POET

Abu 'l-Qāsim 'Alī Ibn Aflah al-'Absi, surnamed Jamāl al-Mulk (the beauty of the kingdom), was a poet of considerable reputation, fully justified by the elegance of his genius, the beauty of his eulogiums, and the number of his satires. He celebrated the praises not only of the khalifas, but of the persons holding a subordinate rank; and having travelled to the different provinces of the empire, he visited the princes and the men in high station (obtaining solid tokens of their satisfaction in return for his panegyrics). I have seen the diwān, or collection, of his poetical works; it is a middle-sized volume, drawn up by himself and accompanied by an introduction and a postscript of his own composition. He there mentions the precise number which it contains of verses having the same rhyme, and the whole is digested with much care and attention. I extracted from it the following lines in which he addresses his beloved :

"O thou who knowest not the force of that love which torments me—who conceivest not my fruitless pains and sufferings!

Thou showest equal indifference towards the lover captivated by thy charms<sup>1</sup>, and him whose heart is free from thy power and without a wound. Had I known that thy character was such, I had not rejected my friend's advice when he warned me against thee. It was never my intention to forget thee, till forced thereto by the excess of thy cruelty".

On a girl who was far from being handsome :

"It was not because I disliked the handsome and preferred the ugly that I loved her with a passion so fantastic; but I was too jealous to love a fair one, seeing that all men loved the fair."

Ibn al-Mu'tazz (no. 316) has the following lines on a similar subject :

"My heart leans from this one to that one, and sees nothing to dislike; it is passionate for beauty, as it should be; but it pities her bereft of charms, and loves her<sup>2</sup>".

On a girl who was lame, by Ibn Aflah :

"How dearly I cherish her whom I perceive there wavering in her gait! what stiffness, yet what freedom in her movements<sup>3</sup>! Her beauty raises envy, and they say she halts; but handsome persons are always envied. She is a branch (of willow), and the beauty of a tender branch is in its bending".

The following lines were addressed by him to a great man whose porter had refused him admittance :

"I am grateful to your porter of refusing to admit me, and I leave to others whom he has repulsed the task of abusing him. For he has rendered me a service which merits my highest praise; he saved me from a rude reception and from your inordinate pride."

<sup>1</sup> The autograph has بكى instead of بل.

<sup>2</sup> Here the following passage has been inserted in the margin of the autograph; "And a verse of his which is currently known is the following, from one of his poems :

"On the day in which we parted at the tamarisks of Mina, our separation was without our will".

<sup>3</sup> Literally; And from her flexibility she is united and knotted.

His compositions abound with striking passages. He died at Baghdād on Thursday, the second of Sha'bān, A. H. 535 (March, A. C. 1141)*, aged sixty-four years, three months, and fourteen days. Some place his death a year, or two years later. He was interred on the west side (of the Tigris), in the Quraysh cemetery. 'Absī (عَبْسِي) means belonging to 'Abs: a number of tribes bear this name, and I know not to which of them Ibn Aflah belonged. This surname is sometimes confounded with that of 'Ansi (عَنْسِي), derived from 'Ans, which is also the name of a tribe.

452 IBN MUSHĪR AL-MAWṢILĪ

Abu 'l-Ḥasan 'Alī Ibn Abi 'l-Wafā Sa'd Ibn Abi 'l-Ḥasan 'Alī Ibn 'Abd al-Wāḥid Ibn 'Abd al-Qāḥir Ibn Aḥmad Ibn Mushīr al-Mawṣilī (native of Mosul), surnamed Muḥadhdhab al-Dīn, was an excellent poet and held a high rank under government, having successively filled the greater part of the places connected with the administration of Mosul. He composed panegyrics on the khalifahs, the princes, and the Amirs. I met with the collection of his poetical works forming two volumes, and in it he mentions that he was born at the town of 'Āmid. A fine passage from his poetry is the following, in which he describes a panther:

"When the sun was styled al-Ghazālah (the gazelle) he bribed this panther with a body<sup>1</sup> of the same colour as his light; and the roes of the desert gave him spots from the pupils of their eyes, to induce him to live in peace<sup>2</sup>, with them and spare their lives. And yet, quite as he is, they never appear in his sight without trembling."

The idea of these verses is taken from a qaṣidah composed by the amīr Abū 'Abd Allāh Muḥammad Ibn al-Sarrāj al-Ṣūrī, a contemporary poet. The passage to which we allude is the following:

1 The autograph has جسد.

2 Read يسلمها.

* 13 March.—Ed.

"His claws are rough, and he bears in his mouth and paws the qualities of the sword and the pliant spear. The night and the day rivalled in adorning him; they arrayed him in a garment spotted with eyes, and the sun, since the time he was named (the Gazelle, never appears in his sight without apprehension."

The following verses were addressed by Ibn Mushir to a person of rank :

"When you complain in anguish, all on earth complain, and the suffering is general from East to West; for you are a heart to the body of the epoch, and the body cannot be well when the heart is sick."

The following relation of a very singular coincidence is given by al-Sam'ānī on the authority of Abu 'l-Faṭḥ 'Abd al-Raḥmān Ibn Abi 'l-Ghanā'im Muḥammad Ibn Aḥmad Ibn 'Alī Ibn 'Abd al-Ghaffār, generally known by the name of Ibn al-Uḫwat al-Bay', who was an accomplished scholar and a kātib. "I saw in a dream." Said Abu 'l-Faṭḥ, "a person who recited these verses :

'And stranger still than my patience (under affliction) was to see the camel depart with thy well girthed litter, and able to support its burden; and I bear enclosed within my curbed ribs an ardent passion unabating, and an assumed patience completely broken.'

On awaking I made it my business to inquire respecting the author of these verses, but could find no person capable of giving me that information; it happened, however, that some years afterwards Abu 'l-Ḥasan Ibn Mushir stopped at my house as a guest, and one evening, our conversation fell on the subject of dreams. I then related to him the dream which I had, and repeated the verses; 'By Allāh!' exclaimed he, 'these verses belong to a piece of my composition.' He then proceeded to recite me this passage from one of his qaṣīdalis :

'When the tongue of tears declares the secret of love, the feelings enclosed within the bosom are concealed no longer. On the evening she bade me farewell, I knew not, by Allāh! wheather the doves of the valley were cooing with sorrow or with joy. I think of thee and reproach the active camels for our separation; I ask every wind which blows to tell me how thou art, and I bear enclosed within my curbed ribs an ardent passion unabating, and an assumed patience completely broken.'

"We were much struck with the coincidence, and the rest of our night was passed in literary discussions." Ibn Mushir died towards the end of the month of Šafar, A. H. 543 (July, A. C. 1148). The kātib 'Imād al-Dīn, however, mentions in his Khariḍah that his death occurred in the year 546.

453 IBN AL-SĀ'ĀTĪ

Abu 'l-Ḥasan 'Alī Ibn Rustum Ibn Hardūz, surnamed Bahā al-Dīn (splendour of religion), and generally known by the appellation of Ibn al-Sā'āttī<sup>1</sup>, was one of the leaders in the band of the modern poets. He left two diwāns, or collections of his poems, one in two volumes, filled with pieces of the highest excellence, and the other forming a small volume and entitled Muqaṭṭa'āt al-Nīl (the crossing places of the Nile). From the latter I extract the following passage :

"O the happy day and night we passed at Suyūṭ ! time, in its blind vicissitudes, will never again bring about the like. The night was in its youth, yet its head was hoary in the moonlight, the dew-drops were stung on the branches, like orient pearls, and fell to the ground when touched by the zephyr. The birds chanted ; the lake was their book, the breeze wrote the lines, and the cloud-drops pointed the letters."

The metaphor is here perfectly wrought out in every point. I shall now give another extract from the same work :

"We handed and a meadow clothing the rugged soil with herbage, and offering pasture to our eyes and to our souls. Reclining in the shade, I admired the beauties of the place, whilst the perfumes were borne around on the breath of the flowers, and my companion swore<sup>1</sup> that the (clear) sky was of amber, the (blooming) groves, of jewels, and the (smooth) meadow, of silk. The (red) anemonies smiled, and the (white) anthemis blossom wished to kiss them, although the narcissus was looking on. That seemed a cheek, this a mouth<sup>2</sup> striving to press it, and there were the eyes<sup>3</sup> always watching them."

<sup>1</sup> Ibn al-Sā'āttī signifies son of the clockmaker, or son of the dialist.

The poetry of Ibn al-Sā'atī abounds with charming ideas. I learned from his son, at Cairo, that he died in that city on Thursday, the 23rd of Ramaḍān, A. H. 604 (April, A. C. 1028)* at the age of fifty-one years, six months, and twelve days, and that he was buried at the foot of Mount Muqāṭṭam. I have read a note on him, in the handwriting of some learned shaykh, wherein the date of the death corresponds with that given here, but he says that he lived forty-eight years, seven months and twelve days, and that he was born at Damascus. God best knows which statement is true. Suyūf is a town in Upper Egypt Ṣa'id; some pronounce this name Uyūf.

454 ABU AL-'ĀMIDĪ THE QĀḌĪ

Abu 'l-Faḍā'il 'Alī Ibn Abi 'l-Muẓaffar Yūsuf Ibn Aḥmad Ibn Muḥammad Ibn 'Ubayd Allāh Ibn al-Ḥusayn Ibn Aḥmad Ibn Ja'far al-'Āmidī was born at Wāsiṭ of a family which came originally from 'Āmid and was noted, at the former place, for producing transmitters of traditional knowledge and men of piety and integrity. Having proceeded to Baghdād, he there devoted some time to the study of the Shāfi'ite system of jurisprudence under 1 Read يحنف .

2 The flower of the anthemis often compared to the mouth, because it is white, as the teeth are.

3 See the observations on the narcissus, in vol. I. Introd.

* This appears to be a misprint; the correct date is 10 April 1208 A. C.—Ed.

the tuition of the shaykh Abū Tālib al-Mubārak<sup>1</sup>, the disciple of 1 Abū Tālib al-Mubārak Ibn al-Mubārak al-Karḥī (a native of Karḥ) is generally known as the Disciple of Ibn al-Khall, under whose tuition he had studied the doctrines of the Shāfi'ite sect. He wrote so well that species of character which is called al-Khaṭṭ al-Mansūb, and of which mention is made in the life of Ibn al-Bawwāb, that he was considered to be a better penman than that celebrated kātib. It was particularly in the two sorts of hand called Tamār طومار and Thulūḥ ثلث that he fully displayed his talents; but he was so jealous of his skill that, in giving fatwās to persons who asked them with the hopes of thus obtaining specimens of his writing, he broke the point of the pen before using it. In A. H. 581 (A. D. 1185-16), he succeeded Abū 'l-Khayr al-Qazwīnī as professor at the Nizāmiyah college, and instructed numerous pupils in jurisprudence. It is said that when he commenced his career, he used to play on the lute, and considered such an amusement as blameless, but he afterwards renounced it, on perceiving that he had become proverbially known as a good lute-player. He then cultivated the art of penmanship till he surpassed Ibn al-Bawwāb, but having conceived a dislike for such an occupation, he devoted the rest of his days to study. He died in the month of Dhu 'l-Qa'dan A. H. 585 (December, A. D. 1189), aged eighty-two years.—Tabaqāt al-Shāfi'īn.

I shall now offer some observations suggested by the word of al-Khaṭṭ al-Mansūb which occur in this notice. That no uncertainty may remain on the point of their being here fused to designate a particular species of written character, I shall reproduce the original text :

وكتب الخط المنسوب الى ان قيل انه اكتب من ابن البواب

"And he wrote the mansūb writing till it was said of him that he surpassed Ibn al-Bawwāb in that art". In Ibn Khallikān's life of Ibn al-Bawwāb (no. 432), we read these lines :

وقيل ان صاحب الخط المنسوب ليس ابا علي المذكور

"And it is said that the author (or inventor) of the mansūb writing was not the Abū 'Alī above-mentioned. Al-Dhahabī says in his Tārīkh al-Islām, MS. No. 646, folio 141 verso; in his article on Ibn Muqlah.

محمد بن علي ابن الحسن ابن مقله ابو علي الوزير صاحب الخط المنسوب

"Abū 'Alī Muḥammad Ibn 'Alī Ibn al-Ḥasan Ibn Muqlah the Wazīr, the author of the mansūb writing".

In Abū 'l-Maḥāsīn's Nujūm, year 423, we find Ibn al-Bawwāb styled "the author of the excellent mansūb writing" صاحب الخط المنسوب النائق. He then adds : "He surpassed all his contemporaries in the mansūb writing, so that his
(Continued on page 393)

Ibn al-Khall<sup>1</sup>, and then under Abu 'l-Qāsim Ya'ish Ibn Ṣadaqah al-Furātī. He assisted the latter in the capacity of a Mu'id (repeater), and repeated, in his name, the lessons which he had renown spread east and west". He employs again the same term when speaking of Ibn Muqlah.

(Continued from page 392)

It appears from these passages that there existed a particular species of writing called, for what reason I cannot discover, al-Mansūb. Ibn Khallikān and other historians say that Ibn al-Bawwāb drew it from the style of writing used by the people of Kūfah, and the perfection to which he brought it is universally attested by them. But there is nothing in Ibn Khallikān's statement which can lead us to suppose that this improved character is the same as that which is now called nasī and generally employed in Arabic manuscripts. He says, it is true, that it is Abu 'l-Ḥasan Ibn al-Bawwāb's system which is still followed, or as the original text has it, it is on his loom they weave. i. e., they take him for a model. But it cannot be logically concluded from these words that the nashī did not exist before his time, or that later penmen took him for their model when writing in the nashī character; neither can it be deduced therefrom that the learned Muslims suppose the Kufic to have been in general use till the time of Ibn Muqlah. Wājjī Khallifāh says positively in his Biographical Dictionary, article علم الخط, that, under the Umayyids, the different styles of writing, or pens قلام, as they are called, had been already brought into existence. The passage will be found in the third volume of the edition of that work published by Professor Flugel.

I have insisted particularly on these point, because the Arabic scholars of Europe generally concluded from Ibn Khallikān's words that Ibn Muqlah invented the nashī, and that before his time (he died A. H. 328), the Kufic was the sole character employed. This opinion was completely overturned by the discovery which M. de Sacy made of some passports, in Arabic, drawn up in the second century of the Hijrah, and a letter dated A. H. 40; all written in what is called the nashī hand. The consequence was, that the authority of Ibn Khallikān and all other Arabic writers who speak of Ibn Muqlah's improvement appeared to have sustained a severe shock; whereas a more attentive examination of their words would have completely justified their statement. I think it necessary to add that the oriental scholars have generally given too great an extension to the signification of the word nashī. With them, the characters called Tuluḥ, Rihān Riqā, etc. are all nashī; but this is an error; the nashī being itself a particular character (particular in its dimension, not in its form!); and yet, on this very error, they have founded their reasonings when endeavouring to trace the variations which the Arabic written character has undergone.

1 The life of Ibn al-Khall is given by Ibn Khallikān.

received from him, to a class held in the Thiqatiyah College<sup>1</sup>, at the Gate of al-Azaj. He displayed great elegance of language in the discussion of doubtful points, and he knew by heart a considerable quantity of Traditions which he had learned from the lips of numerous teachers at Baghḍād and other cities. In the year 604, towards the end of the month of Ṣafar (September, A. C. 1207), he was appointed to the place of qāḍī at Wāsiṭ; he arrived there in the following month, and was then entrusted with the additional duty of controlling the administration of the cantons which form the dependencies of that city. He was skilful arithmetician and a good poet, having composed these charming verses, which are now so widely circulated:

“Admire that passionate lover! he recalls to mind the well protected park<sup>2</sup> and sighs aloud; he hears, the call of love and stops bewildered. The nightingales awaken the trouble of his heart, and his pains, now redoubled, drive all prudence from his mind.<sup>3</sup> An ardent passion excites his complaints; sadness moves him to tears: his old affections awake, but these were never dormant. His friends say that his fortitude has failed: but the very mountain of Yalamlam<sup>4</sup> would groan, or sink oppressed, under such a weight of love. Think not that compulsion will lead him to forget her: willingly he accepted the burden of love; how then could he cast it off against his will? O ‘Utbah, faultless in thy charms! be indulgent, be kind for thy lover’s sickness has reached its height. By thee the willow of the hill was taught to wave its branches with grace, when thy form, robed in beauty, first appeared before it. Thou hast lent thy tender glances to the gazelles of the desert, and therefore the fairest object to be seen is the eye of the antelope. Sick with the pains of love, bereft of sleep and confounded, I should never have outlived my nights, unless revived by the appearance of thy favour, deceitful as it

1 This college was founded by Thiqat al-Dawlat al-Anbārī. See no. 55. Note on Hima.

2 See no. 271.

3 In this verse we must read نشى in the first form.

4 The Maraṣid places Yalamlam at a two to three days’ journey from Ṭa’if.

was<sup>1</sup>. These four shall witness the sincerity of my attachment : tears melancholy, a mind deranged, and care, my constant visitor ; could Yadhbul feel this last, it could become like al-Suhā<sup>2</sup>, Some reproach me for loving thee, but I am not to be reclaimed ; others bid me forbear, but I heed them not. They tell thee that I desire thee for thy beauty ; how very strange ! and where is the beauty which is not an object of desire ? For thee I am the most loving of lovers ; none, I know, are like me (in sincerity) or like thee in beauty."

He has left other poems equally remarkable tenderness of sentiment. I have given the foregoing verses as his, because I found them attributed to him ; but am unable to verify the fact. I have discovered, however, in my rough notes, that a person called al-'Āmidī the poet died A. H. 551 (A. C. 1156-7), and that he was a contemporary of al-Ghazzī (no. 17), and al-Arrajānī (no. 62), but I am unable to determine his real name and partonymic so as to identify him. The author whom I copied merely says that he was a native of al-Nil, the village in 'Irāq so called, and that he died, aged upwards of ninety years. It is therefore possible that he may be the author of the piece inserted above, but it is equally possible that it may have been composed by him whose life is here given ; I am inclined, however, to adopt the former opinion, because Abu 'l-Faḍā'il Ibn al-'Āmidī, the qāḍī of Wāsiṭ was a jurisconsult, and the other is designated as a poet. Abu 'l-Faḍā'il was born at Wāsiṭ on the 25th of Dhu 'l-Hijjah, A. H. 559 (November, A. C. 1164)*, and he died in the same city on the eve of Mondy, the 3rd of the 1st Rabi', A. H. 608 (August, A. C. 1211).† The funeral prayer was said over him the next morning, and he was interred outside the city, near the graves of his father and family. We have already stated (no. 407) that 'Āmidī means belonging to 'Āmid.

1 The word وفا signifies resumption, hauteur and coquetry. It bears here last meaning.

2 Yadhbul is the name of a mountain in Najd, and al-Suhā that of a very small star in the Greater Bear.

* 13 November.—Ed.

† 15 August.—Ed.

455 'IMĀD AL-DAWLAT IBN BUWAYH

'Imād al-Dawlat (the column of the state) Abu 'l-Ḥasan 'Alī Ibn Buwayh Ibn Fannā<sup>k</sup>ḥuṣrū al-Daylamī was sovereign of Persia. The remainder of his genealogy has been already given<sup>1</sup>. This was the first of the Buwayh family who came to the throne. His father was a fisherman, and had no other means of support; he had two brothers, both younger than himself, Rukn al-Dawlat al-Ḥasan, father to 'Aḍud<sup>2</sup> al-Dawlat, and Mu'izz al-Dawlat. All of them reigned, but 'Imād al-Dawlat was the author of their fortune and their wide renown. Persian and Arabian 'Irāq, al-Ahwāz and the province of Fārs acknowledged their authority, and their administration was successfully devoted to the welfare of their subjects. After them, 'Aḍud al-Dawlat, the son of Rukn al-Dawlat exercised the supreme power, and, under him, the bounds of the empire formed by his predecessors received a wide extension. Were I not apprehensive of lengthening this article too much, I should relate how 'Imād al-Dawlat obtained the throne, and trace his history from the commencement<sup>3</sup>. Abū Muḥammad Ḥarūn Ibn al-'Abbās al-Māmūnī<sup>4</sup> says in his History: "Amongst the strange events which happened to 'Imād al-Dawlat and contributed

1 (See no. 71). I here give the genealogy of the Buwayh family after the autograph of Ibn K<sup>h</sup>allikān.

بويه بن فناخسرو بن تمام بن کوهی بن شیرزیل الاصغر
بن شیرکذه بن شیرزیل الاکبر بن شیران شاه بن شیرفنه بن
شستان شاه بن سسن فرو بن شیروزیل بن سسناذ بن بهرام
جورالملک بن یزد جرد الخ -

2 Here the autograph writes this word عضد. Hitherto in this translation, it has been transcribed 'Aḍud. Ibn K<sup>h</sup>allikān gives a notice on Rukn al-Dawlat; see no. 168.

3 What follows here was added by the author at a later period. In the autograph it is written in the margin.

4 Abū Muḥammad Ḥarūn Ibn al-'Abbās, surnamed al-Māmūnī because he drew his descent from the k<sup>h</sup>alīf al-Māmūn, was a native of Baḥ<sup>h</sup>dād, and died A. H. 573 (A. C. 1177—8). He is the author of a history of a ruler of K<sup>h</sup>urāsān, a work often cited by Ibn K<sup>h</sup>allikān; and a commentary on al-Ḥarīrī's Maqāmāt. (Al-Yāfi'i. Abu 'l-Maḥāsīn, in his Nujūm).

to the establishment of his authority was the following: When he took Shirāz, in the beginning of his reign, his followers assembled and required money from him, but he had not the means of satisfying their demands. Overcome with anxiety at the prospect of the speedy ruin with which his enterprizes were threatened, he remained alone in the council-chamber, that he might reflect upon his situation and devise some remedy for the danger. Having thrown himself on his back, he continued to ruminate over his misfortune, when he perceived a serpent come forth from a hole in the ceiling and creep into another. Fearing that it might drop down on him, he called in the tent pitchers and told them to bring a ladder and catch the reptile. On climbing up to look for the serpent, they discovered a room between the ceiling and the roof, and informed him of the circumstance. He ordered them to open it, and within was found a number of chests filled with money and merchandise to the amount of five hundred thousand dinārs. Elated at the sight of the money which had now been brought down to him, he distributed it to his soldiers and thus retrieved his affairs, which were on the brink of ruin. He then caused a dress to be cut for his own use, and having inquired for a skilful tailor to make it up, they told him of a person who had served the former governor of the town in that capacity. In pursuance of his orders, this man was brought to him; and the fellow, happening to be deaf, imagined that secret information had been lodged against him for retaining in his possession some property which his former master had confided to his care. Impressed with this belief, he swore, when spoken to by the prince, that he had only twelve chests in his house, and did not know what they contained. Surprised at such an answer, 'Imād al-Dawlat sent for the chests, which were discovered to be filled with money and dresses to an immense amount. These occurrences were most striking proofs of the good fortune which attended him, and from that moment his success was assured, and the foundations of his power solidly grounded". He died at Shirāz on Sunday, the 16th of the first Jumādā, A.H. 338 (Nov. A.C. 949)*

---

* 11 November—Ed.

some say A. H. 339<sup>1</sup>. He was buried at the seat of the empire. His reign lasted sixteen years, and his life fifty-seven. He left no issue. In his last illness, he received the visit of his brother Rukn al-Dawlat, and in consequence of the agreement which they then made, the province of Fārs was given to 'Aḡud al-Dawlat<sup>2</sup>;

456 SAYF AL-DAWLAT IBN ḤAMDĀN

Abu 'l-Ḥasan 'Alī, surnamed Sayf al-Dawlat (the sword of the empire), was the son of 'Abd Allāh Ibn Ḥamdān. The remainder of his genealogy having been already given in the life of his brother Nāṣir al-Dawlat (no. 167) it is needless to repeat it. Al-Tha'ālibī describes him thus in his Yatimah. "The son of Ḥamdān were princes whose faces were formed for beauty; whose tongues, for eloquence; whose hands, for liberality; and whose minds, for pre-eminence; Sayf al-Dawlat was renowned as their chief and the middle pearl of their necklace.<sup>3</sup> His court was the attraction of visitors, the point where (the sun of) beneficence rose, the qiblah to which the hopes (of the needy) were turned, the spot where the caravans discharged their loads (of travellers) the place of concourse for literary men, and the list where poets contended. It is said that never at the door of any other prince, except the khalifs, were assembled so many masters in the poetic art, stars of the age. But sovereignty is the mart to which such wares are brought as can be best disposed of there. Sayf al-Dawlat was an accomplished scholar, a poet, and a lover of good poetry, in which he took the greatest delight. A collection of ten thousand verses, selected from the panegyrics composed on him, was formed by the kātib Abū Muḥammad 'Abd Allāh Ibn Muḥammad al-Fayyāḍ<sup>1</sup> and by Abū 'l-Ḥasan 'Alī Ibn Muḥammad al-Shimshāṭī." The following admirable description of the rainbow is due to Sayf al-Dawlat; some, it is true, attribute it to Abū 'l-Saqr al-Qābiṣī, but al-Tha'ālībī declares it, in the Yatīmah, to be the production of this prince:

1 Here the autograph has the following additional note: And it is said that he commenced his reign in the latter Jumādā, A.H. 322 (May—June, A.D. 934)."

2 Fuller information on the Buwayhides will be obtained from the work entitled Geschichte der Dynastie Buieh nach Mirchond; Won F. Wilken, Berlin, 1835, 4 to; in Persian and German.

3 I translate literally. He means to say that the members of this family were like a necklace of pearls adorning the state, and that Sayf al-Dawlat was the middle or the largest pearl.

"I called the handsome cup bearer to pour me out the morning draught, and he arose with slumber on his eyelids. He passed round the wine-cup (which shone) like stars, some descending towards us, and others just drained off<sup>2</sup>. The hands of the southern breeze spread dark mantles over the sky, their trains sweeping the ground<sup>3</sup>, and embroidered by the rainbow with yellow upon red, joined to green, overlaid with white; like maidens who approach, arrayed in gowns of different colours, and each of which is shorter than the next."

This piece offers one of those princely comparisons which could hardly occur to a plebeian. The idea expressed in the last verse was afterwards borrowed by Abū 'Alī al-Faraj Ibn Muḥammad Ibn al-Ukhwat, a preceptor and a native of Baghdād, who thus describes a black horse having the forehead and legs white:

"He is arrayed in light and darkness, as in two mantles; one he has let down, and the other he wears tucked up".

This verse is attributed by some to 'Abd al-Ṣamad Ibn al-Mu'addal<sup>4</sup>.—Sayf al-Dawlat possessed a most beautiful slave-girl, the daughter of a Greek prince; and the jealousy of his other concubines was excited by the favour which she enjoyed and the

1 The author of the Yatīmah says that Ibn al-Fayyāḍ was Sayf al-Dawlat's favourite kātib, or secretary.

2 There is here a play upon words and a double meaning which cannot be rendered. The last word of the verse is written منقضى in the autograph.

3 He means the dark clouds the edges of which are dissolving into a trail of rain.

4 See no. 143, note on Abdassamad.

place which she held in his heart. They therefore resolved to avenge themselves on her by poison or other means. The prince was informed of their intentions, and being apprehensive for her safety, he removed her to a castle where she might be secure from danger, and pronounced these lines :

"Jealous eyes observed me on account of thee; I trembled and have never since been free from apprehension. I saw the enemy betray the excess of envy; dearest of all I possess! I therefore wished thee far away, our mutual love still subsisting. Thus absence is sometimes caused through fear of absence, and separation through dread of separation".

I have seen these identical verses in the collected poetical works of 'Abd al-Muhsin al-Şūrī (no. 381) and am unable to decide which of the two was the author of them. Sayf al-Dawlat says in another of his pieces :

"I kissed her in trembling, like the timorous bird taking a hurried drink. It saw water and desired it, but it feared the consequences of desire. It seized the moment and drew near, but found no pleasure in the draught".

It is related that, one day, being in company with his boon companions, and his own nephew Abū Farās (no. 146) among the number, he challenged them to compose a second couplet to a verse which he was about to recite them, but observed that the only person capable of doing it was his lordship, meaning Abū Farās. He then pronounced the following lines :

"You are mistress of my body and hast caused it to languish ; but how can you lawfully shed my blood ?"

Here Abū Farās recited extempore :

"She replied : 'If sovereign power be mine, my authority extends over every thing'".

Sayf al-Dawlat was so highly pleased with the impromptu, that he bestowed on the author a landed estate in the province of

---

1 The true reading is يا اقس. The false one is given in all the other manuscripts, and Dr. Carlyle had reproduced it in his Specimens of Arabian poetry, where he has inserted the same piece.

Manbaj, producing a yearly income of two thousand pieces of gold. Another of Sayf al-Dawlat's pieces is the following :

"She accused me wrongfully, for the crime was hers: she blamed me unjustly, but on her side lay the fault. When a master is weary of the slave who serves him, he finds him in fault where no fault existed. She turned from me disdainfully when mistress of my heart; why was she not cruel whilst my heart was still my own?"

The following distich, reproducing idea expressed in this last line, was recited to me by Ibrāhīm 'Aydmar, the ṣūfī dervish :

"In the valley ( where lovers meet ) they plighted us their faith, and yet, without crime or fault of ours, they broke their vows. They shunned me and reproached me, though I loved them; why did they not spurn me when my heart was still my own?"

It is related that Sayf al-Dawlat was one day giving audience in the city of Aleppo, and poets were reciting verses in his praise, when an Arab of the desert, in squalid attire, stepped forward and repeated these lines :

"Thou art the exalted, for this is Aleppo ! my means are spent, but I have reached my journey's end. This is the glory of all other cities, and thou, Amīr ! art the ornament whereby the Arabs surpass the rest of men. Fortune, thy slave, has wronged us; and to thee we have recourse against thy slave's injustice."

"By Allāh". exclaimed the prince, "thou hast done it admirably". He then ordered him a present of two hundred gold pieces.—Abu 'l-Qāsim 'Uthmān Ibn Muḥammad, a native of 'Irāq and Qāḍī of 'Ayn Zarbah<sup>1</sup>, relates as follows : I was at an audience given by Sayf al-Dawlat at Aleppo, when the Qāḍī Abū Naṣr Muḥammad Ibn Muḥammad al-Naysāpūrī (native of Naysāpūr) went up to him, and having drawn an empty purse, and a roll of paper out of his sleeve, he asked and obtained permission to recite a poem which was written on the paper. He then commenced his qaṣīdah, the first line of which was :

<sup>1</sup> 'Ayn Zarbah is situated to the north of the Gulf of Scanderun, in lat. 37° 10'.

'Thy wonted generosity is still the same; thy power is uncontrolled, and thy servant stands in need of one thousand pieces of silver'.

"When the poet had finished, Sayf al-Dawlat burst into a fit of laughter and ordered him a thousand pieces of gold, which were immediately put into the purse he had brought with him." Abū Bakr Muḥammad and Abū 'Uthmān Sa'īd, the sons of Hāshim, and generally known as (the two Khālīdites), were in high repute as poets. Abū Bakr was the elder. They went to the court of Sayf al-Dawlat, and having recited to him the panegyrics which they had composed, they were lodged by him and treated in a manner suitable to their desert. He one time sent them a present of a male and a female slave, each of them bearing a purse of money and a portmanteau filled with clothes of Egyptian workmanship. One of these poets recited to the prince, on this occasion, a long qaṣīdah, in which was this passage:

"Had thy wealth not been consecrated to deeds of beneficence, the gratitude of mortals had not been universal as it is. Thou hast bestowed on us a sun and a moon (of beauty) by whose lustre the darkness (of misfortune) which overshadowed us<sup>1</sup> has been enlightened. A fawn has come to us, in beauty a Joseph; and a gazelle in radiance a Balqīs<sup>2</sup>. Not content with bestowing two such gifts, thou hast sent us money; nay, the sum is large. The girl came bearing a purse, and on the boy's shoulder was a sack. Thou hast given us also clothes wrought with all the art of Miṣr and embellished by the workmanship of Tinnīs<sup>3</sup>. We thus possess, from thy generosity, meat, drink, clothing and a bedfellow."

On hearing these verses, Sayf al-Dawlat observed that they were very good, only that the last word was not fit to be uttered in the hearing of princes<sup>4</sup>. Numerous are the anecdotes related

1 The autograph, the other MSS, and the printed text have لدينا; but grammar and sense require لدينا.

2 For the loves of Joseph and Zulaykhā, and of king Solomon and Balqīs, I refer to D'Herbelot's Bibliothèque orientale.

3 "Plain cloaks, made of cloth dyed at Tinnīs, sold for one or two hundred pieces of gold. If embroidered in gold, their price might amount to one thousand pieces".—(Al-Idrīsī, in his Geography).

4 Mankūh the Arabic word, signifies inutil apta, congressui idonea.

of Sayf al-Dawlat with his poets, particularly al-Mutanabbī (no. 49) al-Sarī al-Raffā (no. 240), al-Nāmī (no. 50), al-Babbaghā (no. 366), al-Wẓwāl and others of that band, too numerous to be mentioned. He was born on Sunday the 17th of Dhu 'l-Hijjah, A. H. 303 (June, A. C. 916),* some say A. H. 301—and he expired at Aleppo on the sixth hour of Friday—others say the fourth—the 24th of the month of Şafar, A. H. 356 (February A. C. 967).† His body was transported to Mayyāfāriqīn and interred in the mausoleum erected over the grave of his mother, and situated within the city walls. He died of a retention of urine. The dust which settled on his clothes in his campaigns was shaken off and carefully collected by his orders; it was then formed into a brick about as large as the hand, and this, by his dying injunctions, was placed under his head in the tomb. It was in the year 333 (A. D. 944—5) that he got possession of Aleppo, having wrung it from the hands of Aḥmad Ibn Sa'id al-Kilābī, a partisan of al-Ikḥshīd<sup>2</sup>. I have read in the history of Aleppo, that the first of the Ḥamdān family who ruled in that city was al-Ḥusayn Ibn Sa'id, brother of Abū Farās (no. 146), who had gotten it into his possession in the month of Rajab, A. H. 332 (March, A. D. 944). (Al-Ḥusayn) was renowned for bravery, and it is of him that Ibn al-Munajjim<sup>3</sup> said:

“On seeing him advance, the foes exclaim: Are not those the fates which march under that man's standard?”

He died at Mosul on Monday, the 16th of the latter Jumādā, A. H. 338 (Dec. A. C. 949),‡ and was interred in the mosque which he had erected at al-Dayr al-A'la (the Upper Convent).

1 Abu'l-Faraj Muhammad Ibn Aḥmad al-Ḡhassānī al-Dimishqī (a native of Damascus), surnamed al-Wāwā, was one of Sayf al-Dawlat's companions. He sung with great taste and was a good poet. Numerous extracts from his pieces are given by al-Tha'ālībī in his Yatimah, but the date of his death is not mentioned.

2 The life of Muḥammad Ibn Tughj, surnamed al-Ikḥshīd is given by Ibn Khallikān.

3 See no. 441, note on Ibn al-Munajjim.

* 22 June.—Ed.

† 8 February.—Ed.

‡ 10 December.—Ed.

This I supposed to be the same as the Dayr Sa'id (Convent of Sa'id), outside Mosul, and so called after him; but I have since read in the Kitāb al-Diyarah (book of convents) that the latter was named after the Omayyide prince Sa'id Ibn 'Abd al-Malik Ibn Marwān. Sayf al-Dawlat, before taking Aleppo, was master of Wāsiṭ and that neighbourhood; he then underwent various vicissitudes and passed into Syria, where he got possession of Damascus and most of the cities in that country, and of Mesopotamia besides. His numerous campaigns against the Greeks are well known, and most of his battles have been celebrated by al-Mutanabbi in his qaṣīdahs. He was succeeded by his son Sa'd al-Dawlat (good fortune of the empire) Abu 'l-Ma'ālī Sharīf, who reigned a long time. This prince had an attack of cholera, which brought him to the brink of death. On the third day of his convalescence he had intercourse with one of his slave-girls, but the result was that he fell to the ground, having lost the power of his right side. The physician who was called in, ordered perfumes of aloes-wood and ambergris to be burned<sup>1</sup> near him, and this recovered him a little. He then asked to feel his pulse, and the patient held out his left hand. "It is the right which I want", said the doctor. "I have left it (in a state), replied the other, (that it is) no longer a right hand for me; it swore (to serve me) and deceived (me and I have therefore punished it)<sup>2</sup>". He expired on the eve of Sunday, the 25th of Ramaḍān, A. H. 381 (December, A. C. 991)*; aged forty years, six months, and ten days. He was succeeded by his son Abu 'l-Fadā'il Sa'd, the date of whose death I have not discovered<sup>3</sup>. With the termination of Abu 'l-Fadā'il's existence, the empire founded by Sayf al-Dawlat came also to an end.<sup>4</sup> Abū 'Alī Ibn al-Ukhwat,

1 Here the autograph has يشجر , but the true reading is certainly يسجر as in the printed text.

2 In reading this passage, I may perhaps have misunderstood the original Arabic.

3 He died in the month of Ṣafar, A. H. 392 (Dec—Jan., A. D. 1001-2). (Ibn al-'Adīm).

4 For the history of Sayf al-Dawlat, consult the extract from Ibn al-'Adīm, History of Aleppo, published by professor Freytag under the title of Selecta ex historia Halebi. Paris, 1819; in Arabic and Latin.

* 6 December.—Ed.

the person mentioned in this article, died on Friday, the 14th of the latter Jumādā A. H. 546 (September, A. C. 1151).* He was a good poet.

457 AL-ẒĀHIR AL-'UBAYDĪ

Abū Ḥāshim 'Alī ('Ubaydite or Fāḥimite) sovereign of Egypt and surnamed al-Ẓāhir li-I'zāz Dīn Illāh (the assister in exalting God's religion), was the son of al-Ḥākim Ibn al-'Azīz Ibn al-Mu'izz Ibn al-Manṣūr Ibn al-Qā'im Ibn al-Mahdī 'Ubayd Allāh. We have already noticed some of the princes of this dynasty. His reign commenced some time after the disappearance of his father, which event occurred on the 27th of Shawwāl, A. H. 411 (February, A. D. 1021),† as we shall state in his life. The people expected that he would appear again, but, on tracing his footsteps, they came to the conviction that he was gone for ever. On the Day of Sacrifice (the 10th of Dhū 'l-Ḥijjah),‡ in the same year, they placed his son al-Ẓāhir on the throne. The empire (of the Fāḥimites) was composed, at that time, of Egypt, Ifrīqiyah, and Ṣyria. Sālih Ibn Mirdās al-Kilābī (no. 271) then marched against Aleppo, which he besieged and wrested from the hands of Murtaḍā 'l-Dawlat Ibn Lulū al-Jarrāḥī, formerly a slave (ghulām) of Abu 'l-Faḍā'il Ibn Sharīf Ibn Sayf al-Dawlat al-Ḥamdānī (no. 456), and now governing that city as lieutenant to al-Ẓāhir. All the neighbouring country then submitted to Ibn Mirdās, and Ḥassān Ibn Mufarrij Ibn Dagħfal al-Badawī (chief of the Bedwin Arabs and) lord of Ramlah<sup>1</sup>, having conquered the greater part of Ṣyria, the power of al-Ẓāhir was humbled, and a number of events succeeded too long to relate. This prince took for Wazīr Najīb al-Dawlat (optimus Imperii) Abu 'l-Qāsim 'Alī Ibn Aḥmad al-Jarjārā'ī, him whose arms had been cut off at the elbows by 1 See no. 187, where his father's name is incorrectly written Mufrij.

* 28 September.—Ed.

† 13 February.—Ed.

‡ 27 March A. C. 1021.—Ed.

al-Hākim in the month of the latter Rabi', A. H. 404. This punishment was inflicted on him at the gate of Cairo called Bāb al-Qaṣr al-Baḥrī (the Castle Gate on the road to the river), after which he was carried home. He held at that time the direction of one of the government offices, but being discovered in speculation, he incurred the punishment just mentioned. In the year 409 (A. C. 1018—9), he was appointed director of the pension-office (Diwān al-Naṣṣāṭ), and, in A. H. 418, nominated Wazīr to al-Zāhir. Previously to this, he had held different posts under government, in Upper and Lower Egypt. When raised to the dignity of Wazīr, he authorised the Qāḍi Abū 'Abd Allāh al-Qudā'i, author of the book called al-Shihāb<sup>1</sup>, to write his 'alāmah'<sup>2</sup>. It consisted of these words: al-Ḥamdu lillāhi Shukran li Ni'matih (Praise be to God in gratitude for His bounty). Al-Jarjarā'i affected a rigid purity of conduct, strict integrity, and an extreme precaution in avoiding sin; to this Jāsūs al-Fulk<sup>3</sup> alluded in the following verse:

"Fool that thou art! listen and make answer! leave that feigned stupidity. Dost thou set thyself up for an honest man? Well! let us suppose thy words to be true, and tell us if it was for honesty and piety that thy arms were cut off at the elbows?"

Jarjarā'i means belonging to Jarjarayā, a village in 'Irāq. Al-Zāhir was born at Cairo, on Wednesday, the 10th of Ramaḍān, A. H. 395 (June, A. C. 1005);* he died towards the end of Saturday night, the 15th of Sha'bān, A. H. 427 (June, A. C. 1036),† I was told that he breathed his last in the Garden of the Strand (Bustan

1 The life of al-Qudā'i is given in this work.

2 The words forming the 'alāmah, or mark, were written on all official papers to validate them. At Tunis, when Ibn Khaldūn held the post of 'alāmah writer, the inscription consisted of these words: al-Ḥamdu lillāhi wa 'l-shukru lillāh (Praise be to God and thanks be to God).—(Autobiography of Ibn Khaldūn).

3 Jāsūs al-Fulk signifies the explorer of the sphere. It is certainly a surname, but I have not been able to discover any information respecting the person who bore it.

* 20 June.—Ed.

† احد means Sunday not Saturday, The former day fell on 13 June.—Ed.

al-Dakkah), situated in al-Maqs<sup>1</sup> at a place called the Strand (al-Dakkah)—Al-Jarjarā'i died on the 7th of Ramaḍān, A. H. 436 (March, A. D. 1045).* He held the wizarat under al-Ẓābir and al-Mustanṣir, that prince's son, for the space of seventeen years, eight months and eighteen days.

458 'ALĪ IBN MUNQIDH

Abu 'l-Ḥasan 'Alī Ibn Muqallad Ibn Naṣr Ibn Munqidh al-Kinānī, surnamed Sadīd al-Mulk (bene directus in imperio) and lord of the castle of Shayzar, was a brave, enterprising, resolute, and generous prince. He was the first of the Munqidh family who established his authority in that castle, having obtained possession of it in the following manner: Happening to dwell for some time at the bridge afterwards called Jisr bani Munqidh (bridge of the Munqidh family), in the neighbourhood of the castle, which was then in the hands of the Greeks, he conceived hopes of getting it into his power, and, having laid siege to it, the garrison surrendered on condition of receiving quarter. This occurred in the month of Rajab, A. H. 474 (Dec.—Jan. A. D. 1081--2). It continued in his possession and in that of his descendants till overturned by the earthquake of A. H. 552 (A. D. 1157), when all the members of the family, and other persons besides, perished in the ruins. It remained uninhabited till the end of the year, when it was occupied by Nūr al-Dīn Maḥmūd Ibn Zinkī, the sovereign of Syria. Bahā al-Dīn Shaddād states, in his life of Ṣalāḥ al-Dīn<sup>2</sup>, that on the 18th of Shawwāl, A. H. 565 (July, A. D. 1170).† Aleppo and many other cities suffered severely from an earthquake, but the reader must not suppose that this is a mistake, for these were really two different events; the

1 Maqs was a village near Cairo. See De Sacy's Chrestomathie, tom. I. p. 171.

2 See Schulten's Vita et res gesta Saladini, p. 36.

His edition of Bahā al-Dīn's text does not give the day of the month.

* 28 March.—Ed.

† 5 July.—Ed.

first is noticed (moreover) by Ibn al-Jawzi in his Shudhūr al-'Uqūd and by other historians. This Sadīd al-Mulk possessed such great influence that his favour was universally courted, and many of his descendants acquired renown as brave chieftains, generous patrons, and accomplished scholars. His own praises were celebrated by Ibn al-Khayyāṭ (no. 59), al-Khafājī<sup>1</sup>, and other poets. He composed some good verses himself, such, for instance, as those which he pronounced on having beaten one of his young slaves in a fit of anger:

"I used him harshly; but had my heart been masters of my hands, it would have chained them to my neck. When I punished him, my anger was assumed; how great the distance between the depth of affection and the height of passion<sup>2</sup>".

He was particularly noted for quickness of penetration, of which the following anecdote is related as an example: Before he had obtained possession of Shayzar, he made frequent visits to Aleppo, which was then under the rule of Tāj al-Mulūk Maḥmūd Ibn Šālīḥ Ibn Mirdās. An occurrence which excited his apprehensions obliged him to leave that city and proceed to Tripolis (in Syria), where the governor, Jalāl al-Mulk Ibn 'Ammār<sup>3</sup>, lodged him in his place. Maḥmūd Ibn Šālīḥ then directed his secretary Abū Naṣr Muḥammad Ibn al-Ḥusayn Ibn 'Alī al-Naḥḥās, a native of Aleppo, to write to Sadīd al-Mulk a kind and flattering letter, inviting him to return. The secretary, who was a friend to Sadīd al-Mulk, perceived that his master had some ill design: so, on writing out the letter as he was ordered, and finishing it with the usual formula, in (اِنْ) shā' Allāh (if God so pleaseth), he traced over the letter n of in the sign of duplication with the mark indicating the vowel a (thus, اِنْ inna). On receiving the letter, Sadīd al-Mulk presented it to Ibn 'Ammār, who was then sitting with some particular friends, and they all admired the elegance of its style and remarked the extreme desire which Maḥmūd manifested of enjoying his society. Sadīd al-Mulk here observed that he saw more in the letter than they did, and then wrote an appropriate answer to the secretary. In this reply one of the phrases was: I (ʿUṭ anā), your humble servant, who am grateful for your kindness; but under the first letter he put the mark indicating the vowel i, and over the second sign of duplication (thus, ʿUṭ innā). When Maḥmūd received it, the secretary remarked with pleasure this peculiarity and said to those with whom he was intimate: "I knew that what I wrote would not escape Saḍīd al-Mulk's attention, and he has answered in a way that quiets my uneasiness". By the word inna the secretary intended to remind his friend of this passage of the Qur'ān: Inn al-Mala Yā'tamirūnā. etc. (verily, the great men are deliberating concerning thee, to put thee to death)<sup>1</sup>; and by the word innā Saḍīd al-Mulk meant to answer: innā lan nadkhulaha abadan etc. (we will never enter therein whilst they stay in it)<sup>2</sup>. This was ever afterwards considered as a striking example of his sharpness and sagacity, and the anecdote is told in these very terms by 'Usāmah (no. 81), in the collection of notes addressed by him to al-Raṣhīd Ibn al-Zubayr (no. 64), and inserted in the life of Ibn al-Naḥḥās (the secretary above mentioned). Saḍīd al-Mulk Ibn Munqidh died A. H. 475 (A. D. 1082—3). We have already spoken of his grandson Usāmah, and shall notice his father in the letter M. The kātib 'Imād al-Dīn al-Ispahānī mentions them all with high commendation in his Kharīdah, and in his Kitāb al-Sayl wa 'l-Dhayl, he speaks of a person* who was crushed to death under the ruins of the castle of Shayzar, when it was overturned by an earthquake on Monday, the third of Rajab, A. H. 552 (August, A. D. 1157).† This confirms the date previously given).

1 See no. 381 note on Khafājī.

2 In this verse we must read من عزة for عزة.

3 See no. 266 note on Abū Ṭalīb.

459 AL-ŞULAYḤĪ

Abu 'l-Ḥasan 'Alī Ibn Muḥammad Ibn 'Alī al-Şulayḥī, the chief of the revolt in Yaman was the son of a qāḍī in that pro-

1 Qur'ān, sūrat 28 verse 19.

2 Qur'ān, sūrat 5, verse 27.

* [In the notice of Tāj al-Dawlat Muḥammad Ibn Sulṭān Ibn Abi 'l-Ḥasan 'Alī just mentioned] is a marginal addition in the autograph and the same has been overlooked by de Slane.—Ed.

† 11 August—Ed.

vince, who professed the Sunni doctrine and exercised the greatest influence over his own family and all the persons under his jurisdiction. This qāḍī's favour was assiduously courted by the (Fāṭimite) missionary 'Āmir Ibn 'Abd Allāh al-Zawwāhī*, who frequently rode to visit him on account of his power, virtue, and learning, and at length succeeded in gaining the confidence of the son, who had not as yet reached the age of puberty, but whose looks announced him to possess a spirit of a superior order. It is even said that the missionary had found the description of (Abu 'l-Ḥasan 'Alī) al-Ṣulayhī's person in a book called Kitāb al-Ṣuwar, which was one of the treasures transmitted down from ancient times<sup>2</sup>. He showed to the boy that passage of it wherein were indicated the events of his future life and the illustrious rank which he was destined to obtain; but this communication was a secret, of which the father and the family had no suspicion. 'Āmir died soon after, leaving al-Ṣulayhī the depository of his books and of his knowledge. 'Alī (al-Ṣulayhī's) mind received a deep impression from the words of the missionary, and having devoted himself to study, he mastered, by the acuteness of his intellect<sup>3</sup>, and even before the age of puberty, those sciences which, joined to the propitious aid of fortune, raised him to the summit of his utmost hopes. It was thus that he became a learned doctor in the system of jurisprudence which regulated the Imamite (Fāṭimite) empire, and that he obtained a deep insight into the science of allegorical interpretation as applied to the Qur'ān (tāwīl). He then passed fifteen years as a guide to the pilgrims on the road which passes

1 al-Zawwāhī الزواحي, as this name is written in the autograph, means native of al-Zawāhī, a town in Yaman.

2 In the account given by Ibn Khaldūn of the Ṣulayhī dynasty, MS. No. 2402 C, fol. 98, he designates this book as the Jafr (no. 383). Ḥājji Khalifah has the following unintelligible notice on the Ṣuwar in his Bibliographical Dictionary: Kitāb al-Ṣuwar (book of figures): Whether it ever existed or not; three discourses by Aristotle; and the first of the philosophers who explored the mysteries of the Ṣuwar (figures) was Afrāṭīn افراطين, who composed a book on the seven figures and their mysteries, and forty-eight figures containing one thousand and twelve of the fixed stars.

3 Read ذكيا in the Arabic text.

* The Cairo edition gives al-Rawwāhī.—Ed.

through al-Sarāt<sup>1</sup> and Ṭā'if; during this period, he often heard persons say to him: "We have been told that thou art to possess al-Yaman and become a man of note;" but these observations he received with dislike, and although a prediction to this effect had spread abroad and was continually repeated by men of all ranks, he always contradicted those who spoke to him on the subject. At length, in the year 429 (A.C. 1037-8), he commenced his revolt by occupying the summit of Maṣḥār<sup>2</sup>, one of the highest mountains in Yaman; having then with him sixty men, all of powerful families and possessing numerous connexions, whom he had bound by oath, at the fair of Makkah, in A.H. 428, to die in defence of his cause. This mountain was crowned by a lofty pinnacle of difficult access, on which no edifice had ever been erected; he took possession of it by night and before noon, the next day, he found himself surrounded and blockaded by twenty thousand swordsmen, all reviling him in the grossest terms and railing at his folly. They then offered him the alternative of coming down or being starved to death with his companions; but he replied that, in acting as he had done, his only motive was to protect his own friends and themselves from danger, as he apprehended that some other person would occupy a position so advantageous. "Therefore," said he, "if you allow me, I shall guard it; but if not, I shall go down to you." These words induced them to retire, and before a month was elapsed, he had built a strong-hold upon the mountain and strengthened it with fortifications. From that time his power gradually increased, and his efforts were employed in gaining partisans for al-Mustanşir, the sovereign of Egypt. He was obliged, however, to keep these proceedings a secret, through dread of Najāh, the lord of (the province of) Tihāmah, whose favour he was obliged to cultivate, and whose power he appeared to acknowledge, though secretly plotting his death. In this project he at length succeeded, having made him a present of a handsome female slave, by whom he was poisoned at al-Kadrā<sup>1</sup>, in A.H. 452 (A.C. 1060-1). The following year, he wrote to al-Mustanşir for permission to assert openly the (Fāṭimite) claims, and having obtained that prince's consent, he crossed and recrossed the province, taking castles and subduing the open country. Before the expiration of A.H. 555, he was master of all Yaman, hill and dale, and sea. An occurrence of this nature had never been witnessed before, either in the times which preceded Islamism or in those which followed : and (as an example of his good fortune, it may be related) that, one day, when preaching from the pulpit at al-Janad<sup>2</sup>, he said that, on the same day (of the next year), he should preach from the pulpit in 'Aden ; a city of which he had not yet obtained possession. A person who was present at the sermon and heard these words, exclaimed in derision : "O most adorable ! most holy<sup>3</sup> !" Al-Ṣulayhī ordered the man to be taken into custody, and on that day (of the next year) he preached at 'Aden. The same man was again present ; and now, after most extravagant professions of admiration, he took the convent and joined the sect, from the year 455 (A.C. 1063) his head-quarters were established at Ṣan'ā, where he caused a number of palaces to be erected. (In his next expeditions) he took with him their princes whom he had dethroned and lodged them near his own person, after having confided the command of their fortresses to other hands. Having sworn that no person should receive from the government of 1 Al-Kadrā lay at about fifty miles south west of Ṣan'ā, on the river of Ṣhehām. This streams falls into the Red Sea at a short distance to the north of Ḥudayyah.

---

1 It appears from the Marāṣid that this place was on the road from Ṣan'ā to Ṭā'if, and situated between Tihāmah and Najd.

2 This place is noticed by Ibn Khaldūn; he says in geographical notes on the province of Yaman, MS. No. 2402 C, fol. 163 verso: Ḥarrāz حَرَّاز is a territory in the country of the Ḥanḍān (tribe); it is also the name of a tribe, one of the Branches of which produced al-Sulayḥī. The fortress of Maṣār, where he made his first appearance, is situated in the territory of Ḥarrāz, as Nebuhr writes the name is placed on his map of Yaman in lat. 15° 5' N.—In Ibn Khallikān's autograph, Masār is written thus مَسَار, but the author of the Marāṣid writes it مَسَار, as in the printed text.

---

2 Al-Janad lies at about ten miles E. of Taaz (or Tiez). It is marked on the maps of Niebuhr and Berghaus, and is described by Abu 'l-Feda in his Geography.

3 These epithets are given to God alone.

Tihāmāh without previously weighing out one hundred thousand pieces of gold, that sum was paid down to him by his own wife Asmā, in the name of her brother As'ad Ibn Shihāb. "Where didst thou get this, mistress?" said he. "From God," she replied: "He bestoweth on him whom He chooseth and without taking reckoning<sup>1</sup>." Perceiving that the sum came from his own treasury, he smiled, and took it, saying: "Here is our money restored unto us; and we will provide food for our family and take care of our brother<sup>2</sup>." In the year 473 (A.C. 1080-1) al-Ṣulayhī resolved to make the pilgrimage, and taking with him his wife Asmā, the daughter of Shihāb, and those princes, who, he apprehended, might revolt against him, he appointed al-Malik al-Mukarram (the most honourable prince) Aḥmad, the son whom he had by her, to rule as his lieutenant. He then set out with two thousand horsemen, of whom one hundred and sixty were members of the Ṣulayhī family; and, on arriving at al-Mahjam<sup>3</sup>, he halted outside the town, at a farā called al-Duhaym*, or Bir Umm Ma'bd, and encamped with his troops around him and the (captive) princes near him. Suddenly the alarm was given that al-Ṣulayhī was murdered, and the people of escort hurried in trepidation to verify the fact. He had fallen by the hand of Sa'id al-Aḥwal (the squinter), son to the Najāh who had been poisoned by the slave girl. Sa'id had remained in concealment at Zabīd, but then went to his brother Jāyāsh at Dahlak, and informed him of al-Ṣulayhī's departure for Makkah: "Come," said he, "and let us stop him on the way and slay him." Jāyāsh immediately proceeded to Zabīd and set out from that city with his brother and seventy followers on foot and without arms, having no other weapons than palm-sticks, each of which was headed with an iron spike<sup>4</sup>. They avoided the main road and took that which follows the sea-shore; their distance from al-

1 Qur'ān, sūrat 2, verse 208.

2 Qur'ān, sūrat 12, verse 65.

3 Compare what follows with the relation of the same occurrences, given in no. 144.

4 "The rich have their sticks headed with silver; others fix iron spikes to them; and thus make a formidable weapon, which the Arabs handle with great dexterity". Burchkardt's Travels in Arabia, vol. II, page 243.

* M. de Slane give Ommad-Duhaim.—Ed.

Mahjam being then as much as an active man could accomplish in three days. Information of their departure was brought to al-Şulayhî, and he immediately sent against them five thousand Abyssinian spearmen who accompanied him on foot. This troop, however, mistook the way, and Sa'id with his companions came up to the bounds of the camp. As they had suffered from fatigue and want of provisions (so as to be hardly recognised), they were supposed to be some of the slaves who accompanied the army, but 'Abd Allāh, the brother of al-Şulayhî, perceived who they were, and cried out to him: "To horse, my lord! by Allāh! here comes that squinting rascal, Sa'id the son of Najāh!" Saying this, he mounted his own horse, but al-Şulayhî merely observed that he was not to die till he arrived at al-Duhaym and the Well (Bir) of Umm Ma'bad; thinking that Umm Ma'bad to be the female at whose tent the blessed Prophet had stopped when retiring from Makkah to Madīnah. On hearing his words, one of those who accompanied him said: "Defend then thy life! for, by Allāh! this is al-Duhaym and here is the Well of Umm Ma'bad". When al-Şulayhî heard these words, he remained thunderstruck, and losing all hopes of escape, he urined with affright. His head was cut off on the spot with his own sword, and his brother was slain also, with all the other persons of his family. This occurred on the 12th of Dhu'l-Qa'dah, A. H. 473 (April, A. C. 1081).* Sa'id then sent to the five thousand men who had been dispatched against him by al-Şulayhî, and informed them that their master was dead, but that he was one of themselves, and had only avenged his father's death. They immediately came up and placed themselves under his orders; with their assistance he attacked the troops of al-Şulayhî, and having slain some and made others prisoners, he put them to rout and pillaged their camp. Al-Şulayhî's head was then stuck on the top of his own state-umbrella, and this verse of the Qur'ān was chanted aloud: Say, O God! the possessor of the kingdom! Thou givest the kingdom unto whom Thou wilt: and Thou takest away the kingdom from whom Thou wilt. Thou exaltest whom Thou wilt, and Thou humblest whom Thou wilt. In

---

* 24 April.—Ed.

Thy hand is good, for Thou art Almighty<sup>1</sup>. Sa'id then returned to Zabid, and obtained as a spoil the empire, of which the possession had been so fatal to his father. He entered the city on the 16th of Dhu 'l-Qa'dah,* the same year, and, having established his authority in the province of Tihāmah, he continued to rule till A. H. 481 (A. C. 1088-9), when he lost his life in a conspiracy which had been got up by al-Ḥurrah, the widow of one of the Ṣulayḥites; but the relation of this event would lead us too far. When al-Ṣulayḥi's head was stuck on the top of his umbrella, the following lines were composed on the subject by the qāḍī al-'Uṭhmānī:

"In the morning, that umbrella was borne over him; but in the evening, it shaded a noble prince whose triumph it thus announced. If al-Ṣulayḥi's visage was hateful under it, his head was a pleasing object on it. Black serpents attacked the lions of al-Ṣharā<sup>2</sup>; woe to the lions from the blacks"!

Al-Ṣulayḥi himself composed some good verses such as these:

"I married our bright swords to their yellow-hafted spears; but, instead of sweetmeat scattered to the guests, we scattered their heads around. 'Tis thus with glory; none espouse it but at the cost of many lives'."

The following verses also are given as his by 'Imād al-Dīn, in the Khariḍah; but some say that they were merely put in his mouth by some other person who was the real author:

"More delightful to him than the striking of the lyre is the cry, before battle, of: 'Page! bridle and saddle the steeds'. I gallop them in the distant lands of Ḥaḍramawt, and their snorting is heard from 'Irāq to Manbaj<sup>3</sup>'."

1 Qur'ān, sūrat 3, verse 25. I give the entire verse, as Ibn Khallikān merely mentions the first words of it, with an etc.

2 The ferocity of lions which haunted al-Ṣharā is frequently alluded to in 'Arabic poetry. According to the Marāṣid, the mountain of al-Ṣharā is situated in the province of Tihāmah.

3 Here the autograph has زبيرها not زبيرها. — Manbaj is situated on the Euphrates, to the east of Aleppo.

* 28 April. — Ed.

I do not know whence the surname of Şulayhî is derived, but it seems to come in this case as in others from Şulayh, the proper name of a man. As for the places mentioned in this article, they are all in Yaman, and I wrote their names as I found them written, but had no means of verifying their orthography. The greater part of this notice is taken from the History of Yaman by 'Umārat al-Yamanī, a poet whose life shall be given in this work.

460 AL-'ĀDIL IBN AL-SALLĀR

Abu'l-Ḥasan 'Alī Ibn al-Sallār, surnamed al-Malik al-'Ādil Sayf al-Dīn (the just prince, the sword of religion), and generally known as Ibn al-Sallār, was Wazīr to al-Zāfir, the 'Ubaydite (Fāṭimite) sovereign of Egypt. I have found stated elsewhere that his name was Abū Maṣṣūr 'Alī Ibn Ishāq and I have read, in a history of Egypt, that he was of Kurdish origin and belonged to the tribe of Zarzārī<sup>1</sup>. Having been brought up in the Castle of Cairo, he successively occupied different posts under government, in Upper Egypt, and elsewhere, till he finally became Wazīr to al-Zāfir, in the month of Rajab, A. H. 543 (November-December, A. C. 1148). I have since found, in another work, that Al-Zāfir, in the commencement of his reign, chose for the Wazīr Najm al-Dīn (the star of religion) Abu 'l-Faṭḥ Salīm Ibn Muḥammad Ibn Maṣāl<sup>2</sup>, one of the great amīrs of the empire; but he, being vanquished by al-'Ādil Ibn al-Sallār, crossed over to Jizah on the eve of Tuesday, the 14 of Ramaḍān, A. H. 544 (January, A. C. 1150*), on learning, that his adversary was advancing from Alexandria, of which he was governor, with the intention of obtaining the Wazīrship. Ibn al-Sallār entered Cairo on the 15th of the same month, and having taken the direction of the state into his own hands, he received the titles of al-ʿĀdil (the just) and Amīr al-Juyūsh (commander of the troops). Ibn Maṣāl then collected a body of Maghribīns and other soldiers, but was defeated at a place to the south (of Cairo), called Dilāṣ<sup>1</sup>, by the troops which al-ʿĀdil sent against him. His head was cut off and brought into Cairo on the point of a lance, on Thursday, the 23rd of Dhu ʿl-Qaʿdah, (March)* in the same year. Al-ʿĀdil then remained in authority till he lost his life.—This account seems more correct than the foregoing.—Ibn Maṣāl was a native of Lukk, a village near Barqah, and in its dependencies. He and his father were horse-breakers and falconers, and it was by means of this profession that they obtained their advancement. Ibn Maṣāl held the place of Wazīr about fifty days.—Ibn al-Sallār was acute, courageous, and always inclined to favour men of talent and virtue. He erected a number of moaques at Cairo, and I saw one outside Bilbay which bears his name. He openly professed the *Sunni*te doctrines, in which he followed the sect of al-Shāfiʿi. When al-ʿĀdil was nominated governor of Alexandria, some time after the arrival of al-Ḥāfiẓ al-Silafī (no. 43) in that city, he treated the learned doctor with marked attention and honour. A college was then built by his orders, and the professorship therein entrusted to al-Silafī, by whose name it is still known. No other *Shāfiʿi*te college but that existed at Alexandria. These laudable points of character were unfortunately blemished by a violent spirit of injustice and cruelty; he punished severely the very slightest faults, and his tyranny may be conceived from the following relation: Previously to his appointment as wazīr, being then in the army, he went one day to al-Muwaffaq Abu ʿl-Karam Ibn Maʿṣūm, a native of Tinnīs, who was at that time secretary of war, and represented to him that, having been obliged to defray

<sup>1</sup> See M. Quaremère's Notice sur les curds in the Notices et Extraits, tom. XIII, page 315.

<sup>2</sup> In the autograph this name is written thus مصال.

* 16 January—Ed.

1 In the Etat des provinces et des villages de l'Egypte, subjoined to M. de Sacy's translation of 'Atd al-Laṭīf, the place there called Dalāṣ دلاص is indicated as belonging to the province of Bahnasah. See page 689 of that excellent work. We read in the Marāḡid: "Dilāṣ: an extensive province in the Ṣaʿīd of Egypt (Upper Egypt). Its city (which bear the same name) is counted as a dependance of the province of Bahnasah".

some extraordinary expenses which he had incurred during his administration in the province of al-Gharbiyah, he was now oppressed with debt. To this complaint and the long representations which he made, Abu 'l-Karam merely replied: "By Allāh! thy discourse entereth not my ear." This answer Ibn al-Sallar never forgave, and when elevated to the rank of wazir, he ordered strict search to be made for him. Abu 'l-Karam's apprehensions being thus awakened, he remained in concealment for some time; but the Wazir having caused a public proclamation to be made for his discovery: and threatening with death whoever might harbour him, he was expelled from the house where he had retired by the master of the dwelling, and he went forth dressed as a female, in a cloak and boots. Being soon recognized, he was arrested and taken before al-'Ādil, who ordered a board and a long nail to be brought in. The prisoner was then placed on his side with the board under his ear, and the nail was hammered into the other. At every cry the victim uttered, al-'Ādil exclaimed: "Doth my discourse yet enter thy ear or not?" The nail being at length driven out through the other ear, and into the board, it was riveted by bending the end. Some say that the body was then cut in halves by his directions.<sup>1</sup> (In the year 503) Bullārah the wife of Abu 'l-Futūh, the son of Yahyā, the son of Tamīm, the son of al-Mu'izz Ibn Bādīs<sup>2</sup>, arrived in Egypt with her son Abu 'l-Faḍl, 'Abbās, Ibn Abī 'l-Futūh, who was then a child; and al-'Ādil having married her at a later period, she dwelt with him for some time. 'Abbās had afterwards a son named Naṣr, who was brought up with his grandmother in the palace of al-'Ādil, and was treated by the latter with the utmost kindness and affection. At a later period, 'Abbās was sent by al-'Ādil to Syria, that he might serve in the holy war (against the Franks), and he was accompanied by Usāmah Ibn Munqidh, the amir whose life has been given (no. 81). On arriving at Bilbays to take the

1 In place of ثم the autograph has ثم that he then strangled him. This reading is too absurd to be admitted.

2 The lives of the three last are given in this work. In the life of Yahyā Ibn Tamīm, the occurrence here related is again noticed with additional particulars.

command of the army which was to march with him, the prince began to converse with Usāmah about the delightful climate of Egypt, and the beauty of the country which he was on the point of leaving, and that, for the sole purpose of encountering foes and suffering the hardships of a military life. On this, Usāmah suggested to him (it is said) that he might avoid all those inconveniences by killing al-'Ādil and taking the office of Wazīr on himself. It was then settled between them that his son Naṣr should do the deed when al-'Ādil was sleeping, for he dwelt with him and would not refuse to execute his father's orders. The result was, that Naṣr murdered him in his bed, on Thursday, the 6th of Muḥarram, A. H. 548 (April, A. C. 1153),* in the palace of the Wazīrat at Cairo. To relate the particulars of this event would be too long. Some say that al-'Ādil was killed on Saturday, the 11th of Muḥarram,† of that year.—Sallār the father of al-'Ādil was in the service of Suqmān Ibn Urtuq, the lord of Jerusalem<sup>1</sup>, when he was deprived of that city by al-Afḍal Amir al-Juyūsh as has been already mentioned (no 73). Al-Afḍal having found there a troop of Suqmān's soldiers, took them into his own service, and Sallār, [the father of al-'Ādil]‡ who was one of the number, having been attached to the person of his new master, mounted gradually into favour, and received from him the title of Sayf al-Dawlat (sword of the empire). His son al-'Ādil experienced also al-Afḍal's kindness, as he was placed by him among the boys of the chambers (Ṣubyān al-Ḥujar)<sup>2</sup>. By this term they designated a body of youth each of whom was provided with a horse and arms, and bound to execute, without hesitation, whatever order he might receive. This institution was similar to those of the Knights Templars (al-Dāwīyah) and Knights Hospitallers (al-Asbitār). When any of the youth distinguished himself by intelligence and courage, he was advanced to the rank of amīr (commander). Al-

1 See No. 73n. No. 77. No. 266.

2 Compare the note (37), page 156, vol. I. of M'de. Sacy's Chrestomathie, with what follows here.

* 4 April.—Ed.

† Saturday cannot fall on 11 Muḥarram. It fell on 1st, 8th and 15th.—Ed.

‡ Omitted by de Slane.—Ed.

'Ādil surpassed his companions in these qualities, and possessed moreover great resolution, respect for superiors, and prudence in abstaining from intrigues. This induced (the khalifs) al-Ḥāfiẓ (no. 382) to give him a command, and he appointed him governor of Alexandria. He was then known by the nickname of Rās al-Baġhl (mule-head), and his rise commenced from that period.—This Naṣr, son of 'Abbās, is the same who murdered al-Zāfir, sovereign of Egypt (no. 96).

461 AL-MALIK AL-AFDAL, THE SON OF ṢALĀḤ AL-DĪN

Abu 'l-Ḥasan 'Alī, the son to the Sultān Ṣalāḥ al-Dīn Yūsuf Ibn Ayyūb, and surnamed al-Malik al-Afdal (the most excellent prince) Nūr al-Dīn (the light of the faith) [made his studies at Alexandria under the Imām Ibn 'Awf al-Zuhri, and at Old Cairo under the learned grammarian Ibn Bārī.] In Syria also he received certificates of proficiency from Abu 'l-Ḥusayn Aḥmad Ibn Ḥamzah Ibn 'Alī al-Sulamī, Abū 'Abd Allāh Muḥammad Ibn 'Alī Ibn Ṣadaqah al-Ḥarrānī, and other masters, and in Egypt from Abu 'l-Qāsim Hibat Allāh Ibn 'Alī Ibn Mas'ūd, and Abū 'Abd Allāh Muḥammad Ibn Aḥmad Ibn Ḥāmid, and others. He wrote a fair hand and possessed many other accomplishments]. This prince was the eldest of Ṣalāḥ al-Dīn's sons, and his acknowledged successor. On the death of his father, al-Malik al-Afdal (the subject of this article) was then with him at Damascus, and took possession of that kingdom, whilst his brother al-Malik al-'Aziz obtained that of Egypt, as has been already mentioned (no. 389) and their brother al-Malik al-Zāhir continued to hold Aleppo. It would be too long to trace here the causes of the dissension which sprung up between al-Malik al-Afdal and his brother (al-Malik al-'Aziz) we shall merely state that it terminated by his losing Damascus, which was besieged and taken from him by his brother and his uncle al-Malik al-ʿĀdil<sup>1</sup>. He then removed to the city of Ṣarkhad, which they had granted him on his defeat, but he had resided there for a short time only, when his presence was required in Egypt, and that he might act as atābek<sup>2</sup> to the young prince al-Malik al-Manṣūr Muḥammad, who had succeeded to the government of that province on the death of his father al-Malik al-ʿAziz. He received this summons on the eve of Wednesday, the 29th of Ṣafar, A. H. 595 (January, A. D. 1199);* thirty-eight days after his brother's death. On his arrival, he walked by the side of the horse, whenever his nephew rode out; but a short time after, al-Malik al-Afḍal was then presented by him with the gift of some cities in the eastern part of the empire, but on proceeding thither, he was unable to obtain possession of any other except Sumaysāṭ, where he spent the remainder of his life. One of the finest passages from al-Qāḍi 'l-Fāḍl's pen is contained in a letter written during these events; he says: "The fathers of this illustrious house lived in concord, and they reigned; but the sons were disunited, and they perished! It is thus that, when a star descends towards the west, no means exist of bringing it back to the east, and when a rent appears in a garment, it must end by being torn in pieces! How can fate be stopped in its progress, when its issue is predestined? What mortal can contend against an adversary who has God on his side?" Al-Malik al-Afḍal was a man of talent and information, a good penman, and gifted with a noble mind; he favoured the learned and showed them profound respect. Some verses composed by him are still preserved, and amongst the pieces attributed to him is the following, which he is said to have addressed to the Imām (the khalif) al-Nāṣir, complaining of his uncle al-Malik al-ʿĀdil (Abū Bakr) and his nephew al-Malik al-ʿAziz (ʿUthmān), who had deprived him of Damascus:

1 See no. 389 and 328.

* From 'made' to 'accomplishments' not in the autograph,—Ed.

"My Lord! Abū Bakr and his companion ʿUthmān have wrested away the just rights of ʿAlī by the sword, And yet it was

1 The particulars will be found in M. Reinaud's Extraits des auteurs arabes relatifs aux croisades, page 378.

2 See No. 137.

* 30 December A. C. 1198.—Ed.

he whom his father had appointed to rule over them ; and whilst he ruled, all things went right. But they opposed him and broke the pact which bound them ; their guilt is mutual, and the law is clear<sup>1</sup>. Observe how misfortune accompanies this name ; an 'Alī has experienced from those of modern times the same treatment which ( the khalif ) 'Alī received in days of old".

The answer which he received from the Imām al-Nāṣir commenced with these verses :

"Thy letter has arrived, O son of Yūsuf ! declaring such love ( for us ) as proves thy unsullied origin. They deprived 'Alī of his rights, because none remained in Yathrub ( Madīnah ) to assist him when the Prophet was no more. But rejoice ; a day of reckoning awaits them, and thy assister will be the Imām Assister ( al-Nāṣir )."

Al-Malik al-Afḍal was born at Coiro, A. H. 566—some say 565—on the afternoon of the ' Īd al-Fiṭr <sup>2</sup> ( June A. C. 1171 ),* whilst his father was acting as Wazīr to the Egyptians. He died suddenly at Sumaysāṭ, in the month of Ṣafar, A. H. 622 (Feb.-March, A. C. 1225). His body was borne to Aleppo and interred in the mausoleum which bears his name and lies outside the city near the Maṣḥhad, or funeral chapel, of al-Harawī<sup>3</sup>.—Sumaysāṭ is a fortress of Syria, situated on the Syrian side of the Euphrates between Qal'at al-Rūm and Malaṭīyah. It touches the confines of Asia Minor ( Bilād al-Rūm ).

1 The law is, that he who usurps the property of another is bound to make restitution.

2 The ' Īd al-Fiṭr, or Festival of the breaking of the Fast, is held on the first day of the month of Ṣhawwāl.

3 This may perhaps be the Mausoleum erected over the grave of the traveller al-Ḥarawī. See No. 434. Kamāl al-Dīn Ibn al-'Adīm says, in his History of Aleppo, that al-Afḍal was buried beside his mother, in the turbah, or funeral chapel, south of the Maqām. A suburb called the Maqāmāt still exists close to Aleppo on the south-east side.

* 7 June, 1171 or 13 June 1170.—Ed.

462 * [ABU 'L-ḤASAN 'ALĪ IBN AL-FURĀT<sup>1</sup>

Abu 'l-Ḥasan 'Alī Ibn Muḥammad Ibn Mūsā Ibn al-Ḥasan Ibn al-Furāt acted three times as Wazīr to the Khalif al-Muqtadir bi-Allāh, the son of al-Mu'taḍid bi-Allāh. His first appointment was on the 8th of the first Rabi'—some say, the 23rd—A. H. 296 (December, A. C. 908)† and he remained in office till the 4th of Dhu 'l-Ḥijjah, A.H. 299 (July, A.C. 912)‡, when the Khalif arrested him and seized on all his riches with the property contained in his palace. From that time till he was reinstated, the produce of his estates (to the public treasury) amounted to seven millions of dinārs. It is said that he (was the author of his own misfortune, having) addressed a letter to the Arabs of the desert, inviting them to come and take Baghdād by surprise; but this accusation is by no means well established. His second appointment was on Monday, the 8th of Dhu 'l-Ḥijjah, A. H. 304 (June, A. C. 917),|| and, on this occasion, the Khalif arrayed him in seven pelisses of honour, and sent to his house three hundred thousand dirhams to (be distributed amongst) his pages, fifty mules to carry his baggage, twenty eunuchs, and furniture of all sorts. On that day, the quantity of wax-lights required for him was so great, that the price augmented by a carat of gold to each mann<sup>2</sup>; and, as the weather was excessively hot, forty thousand pounds weight of snow was used in cooling the liquors served to the company. He continued in place till Thursday, the 22nd of the first Jumādā,

---

1 This life is omitted in the autograph.

2 In Makkah the qarāt was the twenty-fourth part of the dīnār, or gold piece; but, in 'Irāq, it was the twentieth. The dīnār of that time may be valued at fourteen shillings, and the qarāt will be then equal to eight pence half penny. The mann is generally considered as equivalent to two pounds troy weight for which may be deduced that the price of wax-light augmented fourpence farthing a pound in consequence of the demand. This is by no means so great a rise in the price as the author would have us to suppose.

* This full notice is omitted in the autograph.—Ed.

† 5 or 20 December.—Ed.

‡ 22 July.—Ed.

|| 2 June.—Ed.

A.H. 306 (October, A.C. 918)*, when he was arrested and detained in prison; but was liberated on Thursday, the 23rd of the latter Rabi' A.H. 311 (August, A.C. 923)†, and again restored to his post. On the day of his release from confinement, he gave vent to his ill humour by exacting heavy sums from different persons, and he left free career to the rapacity and violence of his son Abu 'l-Muḥassin who immediately put to death Ḥāmid Ibn al-'Abbās, his father's predecessor in the Wazirship and indulged in his passion for bloodshed. On the 9th of the latter Rabi' A.H. 312 (July, A.H. 924),‡ the Khalif again caused Ibn al-Furāt to be arrested; but some say that this occurred on Tuesday, the 7th of the first Rabi'.§ He was then in possession of great wealth (upwards of ten millions of dīnārs), and his landed estates produced him a yearly revenue of one million of dīnārs, which sum he employed for his ordinary expenses. Abu Bakr al-Ṣulī, relates that, having one day recited to the Wazir a qaṣidah in his praise, he received from him six hundred dīnārs. Ibn al-Furāt was a kātib<sup>1</sup> of the highest capacity and information; the Khalif al-Mu'taḍid said (some time after his accession) to (his Wazir) 'Ubayd Allāh Ibn Sulaymān<sup>2</sup>: "I have received a kingdom in disorder, a country in ruin, and a treasury nearly empty; I therefore wish to be informed what may be the revenues of the state, so as to regulate the expenditure accordingly". 'Ubayd Allāh applied to a number of the *kātib*s for an answer to this demand, but they all required a month to draw one up. Abu 'l-Ḥasan Ibn al-Furāt and his brother al-'Abbās, who were at that time out of place and detained in prison, received intelligence of what was going forward, and, in the space of two days, they drew up the 1 Throughout this article, the word katib denotes a person employed in the civil service.

---

2 See no. 9, note (on al-Ṭabarī), and vol. II, no. 438.

* 29 October—Ed

† According to Eduard Mabler's calculation Thursday fell on 20 Rabi' al-'Akhar (7 August).—Ed.

‡ 15 July—Ed.

§ According to Mahler's calculation Tuesday fell on 9 Rabi' al-Awwal (15 June)—Ed.

answer and sent it in. As 'Ubayd Allāh knew that it would be impossible to conceal from the Khalif who were the authors of the document., he mentioned them to him with commendation, and they were taken into favour. Ibn al-Furāt had in his palace a room for the preparation of beverages (ḥujrah shārāb), to which persons of all classes sent their servant boys to bring home whatever sherbets, beer, and syrups they required. He pensioned five thousand persons chosen from among the learned, the pious, the persons of respectable family, and the poor; most of them received one hundred dinārs a month, and a few only five dinārs or intermediate sums. Al-Ṣūlī says: "And one meritorious part of his conduct, wherein no one had as yet set the example, was, that when papers were received by him containing accusations against any individual, one of his pages came into the ante-chamber and called out: 'Where is such a one, the informer (meaning the author of the paper)'? When people discovered this to be his regular custom, they abstained from all such secret accusations." One day, in a burst of anger, he ordered a hundred lashes of a whip to be inflicted on a man with whom he was displeased; he then sent word to give him fifty lashes only; and then he sent again to forbid the flogging and to give him twenty pieces of gold. This sum made the poor fellow amends for his fright. Al-Ṣūlī says that, on the Wazīr's recovery from an attack of sickness, he examined the letters and written applications which had accumulated during the interval, and (in the sitting) he perused one thousand letters and wrote his approval or negative on one thousand memorials. "We then said to each other", adds al-Ṣūlī: 'By Allah! let no one know of this, lest the evil eye of some jealous person light upon him'. I remarked", says the same narrator, "as a striking example of his courtly manners, that when he called for the Khalif's signet in order to seal any document, he stood up to receive it, denoting thereby his high respect for the Khalif's dignity. I saw him one day giving a public audience for the redress of grievances, and two men were in litigation about some shops in al-Karkh (the suburb of Baghdād), having come before him, he said to one of them: 'You presented me a memorial concerning these very shopr in the year 282.<sup>1</sup> He then added : 'Yet you are too young to have been the person.' 'It was my father,' replied the man. 'That is it', said the Wazir, 'and I wrote my decision on his memorial.' When he went out, he felt much displeased if persons walked on foot before him to testify their respect : 'I do not require such a thing of my servants,' he would exclaim ; 'why then should I require it from free born men who are under no obligation to me ?' This Abu 'l-Ḥasan Ibn al-Furāt and his son al-Muḥassin were put to death by Nāzūk, the commander of the police guards, on Monday, the 13th of the latter Rabi', A. H. 312 (July, A. C. 924)*. He was born on the 23rd of the latter Rabi', A. H. 241 (September, A. C. 855).† His son al-Muḥassin died at the age of thirty-three years. The following particularity is mentioned by the Ṣāḥib Ibn 'Abbād (see no. 93) "Abu 'l-Ḥasan, the son of Abū Bakr al-'Allāf, he who was so notorious for his immoderate appetite, recited to me the poems composed by his father on the cat (see no. 164), and told me that, by the cat, he meant al-Muḥassin ; not daring, during the disasters of the family, to lament his fate openly or pronounce his name." We shall here insert a most extraordinary anecdote : "Some time after al-Muḥassin's death, his wife wished to celebrate the circumcision of his son, and happening to see her husband in a dream, she mentioned to him that she should have such difficulty in providing for the expense of the ceremony ; on which he told her that he had deposited a sum of ten thousand dinārs in the hands of a person whom he named. When she awoke, she informed the family of the circumstance and they questioned the man, who acknowledged that he had the money, and brought it all to them immediately. Abu 'l-'Abbās Aḥmad Ibn Muḥammad Ibn al-Furāt the brother of Abu 'l-Ḥasan, was the most elegant penman of the age, and surpassed them also by his learning in the sciences and general literature. It was on him that the poet al-Buḥturī composed the qaṣīdah which begins thus (6) :

1 This date is false, Ibn al-Furāt first exercised the functions of Wazir in the year 296, as has been already said.

2 See the Diwān of al-Buḥturī, MS. No. 1392, fol. 102, where this poem is given.

• 19 July—Ed.

† 10 September—Ed.

"I passed the night displaying a feeling (of grief for thy absence) and concealing a feeling (of joy) for the presence of thy image, sent me by thyself (to console me in my dreams)".

Abu 'l-'Abbās died on the eve of Saturday, the 15th of Ramaḍān, A. H. 291 (August, A. C. 904)*. Another brother of his, Abu Khaṭṭāb Ja'far Ibn Muḥammad, was offered the place of Wazir, which, on his refusal, was given to his son Abu 'l-Faṭḥ al-Faḍl Ibn Ja'far, an able, kātib and generally known by the name of Ibn Ḥinzābah. His mother Ḥinzābah was a Greek slave. Al-Muqtadir bi-Allāh conferred the Wazirship on him, in A.H. 320, on Monday, the 20th of the latter Rabi' (May, A. C. 932)†; some say that he was invested with that dignity on the first of the month just mentioned. He remained in office till the 25th of Shawwāl, A. H. 320 (October, A. C. 932),‡ the day on which al-Muqtadir was murdered. Al-Qāhir bi-Allāh was then raised to the Khalifate, and as Abu 'l-Faṭḥ Ibn Ḥinzābah had retired to a place of concealment, the Wazirship was conferred on Muḥammad Ibn 'Alī Ibn Muqlah the kātib. Abu 'l-Faṭḥ was afterwards nominated director-general of the government offices under the same Khalif. Al-Qāhir was deposed and blinded with a hot iron on Wednesday, the 6th of the first Jumādā, A. H. 322 (April, A. C. 934)§. His successor al-Rāḍī bi-Allāh, the son of al-Muqtadir bi-Allāh, conferred the government of Syria on Abu 'l-Faṭḥ Ibn Ḥinzābah, who proceeded to his post, and was residing at Aleppo when the same Khalif chose him for wazir and signed the act of his nomination on Sunday, the 13th of Sha'bān, A. H. 325 (June, A. C. 937)|| A letter was then dispatched to him, by which he was directed to repair to the capital, and, on Thursday the 6th of Shawwāl, in the same year, he arrived at Baghdād. He remained there, however, but a short time, as he perceived that every thing was falling into confusion. Finding the Amīr Abū Bakr Muḥam-

* According to Eduard Mahler's calculation Saturday fell on 5 and 12 Ramaḍān (21, 28 July)—Ed.

† 7 May—Ed.

‡ 24 October—Ed.

§ 23 April—Ed.

|| 25 June—Ed.

mad Ibn Rā'iq master of the city,<sup>1</sup> he had a conference with him and was induced to return to Syria by the promise that the revenues of that province and of Egypt would be paid into his hands. He arrived there on the 13th of the first Rabi', A. H. 326 (January, A. C. 938),* and died at Ghazzah or at Ramlah. Letters were sent to Baghdad announcing this event, and in them it was stated that his death took place on Sunday, the 8th of the first Jumādā, A. H. 327 (March, A. C. 939).† He was born on the eve of Saturday, the 23rd of Sha'bān, A. H. 279 (November, A. C. 892).<sup>2†</sup> During his administration in Syria, all official documents were promulgated in his name. Of his son, Abu 'l-Faḍl, we have already spoken (no. 130), and given the dates of his birth and death. The facts contained in this article were extracted by me from different sources, such as the History of the Wazīrs by the Ṣāhib Ibn 'Abbād, the 'Uyūn al-Siyar (sources of history), by Muḥammad Ibn 'Abd al-Malik al-Ḥamadānī,<sup>3</sup> and the Kitāb al-Wuzarā (book of Wazīrs) by Abū 'Abd Allāh Muḥammad Ibn Aḥmad al-Fārisi. But none of those writers allude to the affair of 'Abd Allāh Ibn al-Mu'tazz, although it is closely connected with the history of Ibn al-Furāt; it is therefore necessary that some notice of this occurrence should be taken here; and, as the Chronicle of Abū Ja'far Ibn Jarīr al-Ṭabarī surpasses all other historical works in the authenticity of its statements, we shall merely copy what that author says under the head of Various Events in A. H. 296: "The leaders (of the troops and the kātibs (officers of the civil administration)) met for the purpose of deposing the Khalif al-Muqtadir, and, a discussion arising as to whom they should put in his place, they agreed unanimously to fix their choice on 'Abd Allāh Ibn al-Mu'tazz. After some contestation, he expressed his readiness to accede to their wishes, on condition that there should be neither bloodshed nor war. To this they

1 See Abu 'l-Feda's Annals, year 324 et. seq.

2 Here, in the Arabic text, for عشرين read ثمانين .

3 See no. 167.

* 18 January—Ed.

† 18 November—Ed.

replied that the sovereign power would pass into his hands without opposition, and that the soldiers, officers, and *kātib*s under their orders, were ready to acknowledge him. They then took the oath of fealty towards, him as Khalif. The persons at the head of this plot were Muḥammad Ibn Dāwūd Ibn al-Jarrāḥ<sup>1</sup> and Abu 'l-Muḥannā Aḥmad Ibn Ya'qūb the qāḍī, the former of whom induced a number of the general-officers to employ violent measures against al-Muqtadir and al-'Abbās Ibn al-Ḥasan"—this last was then acting as Wazīr to the Khalif. "Al-'Abbās Ibn al-Ḥasan was himself engaged in the conspiracy and had gained over a number of the generals to this project of dethroning al-Muqtadir and taking the oath of allegiance to 'Abd Allāh Ibn al-Mu'tazz; and when he found that his influence over al-Muqtadir was sufficiently established, he judged it time to execute his design, but, at that moment, the other conspirators fell upon him and slew him." Al-Ṭabarī means to say that they slew the Wazīr. "The perpetrators of this act were al-Ḥusayn Ibn Ḥamdān and Waṣīf Ibn Ṣawārtikīn. This occurred on Saturday, the 19th of the first Rabi',* and, on the next morning Sunday, the kātibs, generals, and qāḍis deposed al-Muqtadir at Baghdād and took the oath of fealty to 'Abd Allāh Ibn al-Mu'tazz, whom they then surnamed al-Rāḍī bi-Allāh (the pleasing by God's favour). The person who administered the oath to the generals in the name of Ibn al-Mu'tazz and called them forth successively, was Muḥammad Ibn Sa'id al-Azraq, kātib of the army (secretary-general of the war department). The same day, from morning till noon, al-Ḥusayn Ibn Ḥamdān had to sustain an obstinate combat against the pages of the palace.<sup>2</sup> On the same day, the assembly convened by Muḥammad Ibn Dāwūd for the purpose of taking the oath of fealty to Ibn al-Mu'tazz was dispersed by force. The manner in which this happened was, that the eunuch called Mūnis took

1 See No. 10, note on Muḥammad Ibn Dāwūd Ibn al-Jarrāḥ.

2 The pages of the Muslim grandees were slaves bought at a very early age and educated as the children of the family. They were especially instructed in warlike exercises, and usually lodged together in a separate establishment, where they lived under a discipline partly conventual and partly military.

‡ 17 December A. C. 908—Ed.

some of the pages of the palace in shadhawāts. "This word, with the people (of Baghdād), signifies botas" and mounted the Tigris with them. As they passed the house in which Ibn al-Mu'tazz and Muḥammad Ibn Dāwūd were, they raised an outcry against them and shot at them with arrows. The meeting was thus obliged to disperse; the soldiers, generals, and *kātib*s who were in the house took to flight, and Ibn al-Mu'tazz fled also. Some of those who had sworn him fidelity now went to al-Muqtadir, and made excuses for their conduct by stating that they had been forcibly prevented from joining him; others concealed themselves, but were sought after and put to death. The palaces belonging to Ibn Dāwūd were pillaged by the mob, and Ibn al-Mu'tazz was one of those made prisoners." Such is al-Ṭabarī's statement. We shall now give some facts which we have collected from various other sources: On that day, 'Abd Allāh Ibn al-Mu'tazz had chosen Muḥammad Ibn Dāwūd for Wazīr, and Abu 'l-Muthannā for qāḍī. On the failure of the enterprise, Ibn al-Mu'tazz was taken prisoner, and Ibn Dāwūd, who was one of the most accomplished men of his time and had composed a number of works, such as the Kitāb al-Waraqah (book of leaves), containing the lives of the poets, and the Kitāb al-Wuzarā (book of Wazīrs), retired to a place of concealment, and then discovered himself to Mūnis, the eunuch just mentioned; but Abu 'l-Ḥasan 'Alī Ibn al-Furāt was afraid of him and advised Mūnis to put him to death, which was done. His body was cast into a ditch near al-Māmūniyah;<sup>1</sup> but was afterwards carried home. He was executed in the latter Rabī' of that year; his birth took place in A. H. 243 (A. C. 857-8) on the very night in which Ibrāhīm Ibn al-'Abbās al-Ṣūlī expired. Al-Muqtadir was then reinstated in his former authority, and, as Wazīr al-'Abbās Ibn al-Ḥasan had been put to death on the day mentioned by al-Ṭabarī, he raised Abu 'l-Ḥasan 'Alī Ibn al-Furāt on the vacant post. One of the first proofs which the new Wazīr gave of his generous character was this:

---

1 "The quarter of Baghdād called al-Māmūniyah is of great length and breadth, and extends from the canal (or river) al-Mu'alla معلي to the gate of al-Az'aj". (Marāḥid al-Iṭṭilā').

Two large coffers were brought to him from the house of Ibn al-Mu'tazz, and he said to the bearers: "Do you know what is in them?" "Yes," they replied, "they contain lists of the names of such persons as took the oath of allegiance to him". "Open them not", he exclaimed; and then ordering a fire to be brought, he threw the coffers into it. When they were consumed, he said: "Had I opened them and read what was in them, I should have alienated from me the feelings of all the people, and given them cause of dreading me; but, by what I have done, their hearts will be calmed and their minds set at ease." We may state, as a circumstance connected with this biographical notice, that, when the Khalif al-Qāhir bi-Allāh was deposed and deprived of his sight, he was reduced to the necessity of going to the Mosque of al-Manṣūr at Baghdād and asking charity, mentioning at the same time who he was. On one of those occasions Ibn Abi Mūsā al-Hāshimī rose up and gave him one thousand pieces of silver. What a lesson is there for reflecting men! We have already given a notice on 'Abd Allāh Ibn al-Mu'tazz (no. 316), the subject which we have been just treating rendered some repetition necessary. What follows was copied by us from the Kitāb al-A'yān wa'l-Amāhīl (History of illustrious and remarkable men) by the ra'īs Abu 'l-Ḥasan Hilāl Ibn al-Muḥassin al-Ṣābī<sup>1</sup>: "The anecdote which we here insert is given in the words of the qāḍī Abu 'l-Ḥusayn 'Ubayd Allāh Ibn 'Abbās: A man who had been a long time out of employment, and had no means left for his support, forged a letter in the name of Abu 'l-Ḥasan Ibn al-Furāt and addressed to Ibn Zambūr al-Māridānī<sup>2</sup>, the 'āmil of Egypt, and strongly recommending the

1 His life will be found in this work.

2 Abū 'Alī al-Ḥusayn Ibn Aḥmad Ibn Rustam al-Māridānī, generally known by the name of Ibn Zambūr (not Abū Zambūr, as the manuscripts have throughout this article), was a kātib of great abilities, and had been employed by the Ṭūlūn family. He was afterwards presented by the Khalif al Muqtadir to Ibn-Furāt that his talents might be put to the proof, and this examination procured him the post of collector of the land-tax in Egypt. Having incurred at a later period the displeasure of the Khalif, he was summoned to Baghdād and fined in the sum of three million six hundred thousand pieces of gold. He then returned to Egypt with Mūnis the eunuch, and he died at Damascus, bearer to him, and requesting that he should be treated with the utmost favour and kindness. On arriving at Old Cairo, he presented this letter to Ibn Zanbūr, who conceived some doubts on the subject, as he perceived that the address was not drawn up in the usual form,<sup>1</sup> and that the complimentary salutation was longer than that to which his rank entitled him. He therefore gave directions that the man should be closely watched, and, having made him a small present, he detained him in the house with fair promises. He then wrote to Abu 'l-Ḥasan Ibn al-Furāt, stating that he had received a letter, which he enclosed, and requesting its authenticity to be confirmed. Ibn al-Furāt read the forged letter, and found in it that the bearer, mentioning his name, was a person of high respectability, to whom the writer had deep obligations, with other similar expressions usually employed in filling up letters of the kind. He then passed it to his kātibs, and informed them of the whole circumstance, expressing at the same time his astonishment at the man's audacity, and asking what was to be done with him. Some of them replied that he deserved to be flogged or imprisoned; others, that his thumb should be cut off, so as to prevent him from again committing such a crime, and discourage others from imitating him in matters of more importance. The opinion of those who were the most indulgent was, that Ibn Zanbūr should be informed of the circumstance, and receive orders to expel the fellow and frustrate his expectations. On this Ibn al-Furāt replied: 'How far removed you are from nobleness and goodness! how repulsive are such qualities to your nature! Here is a man who employs our mediation and endures the fatigues of a journey to Egypt, in hopes of furthering his welfare through our influence and of procuring through the favour of Almighty God, some advantage from himself by stating that he is connected with us; yet, according to the

(Continued on page 432)

---

(Continued from page 431)

A. H. 314 (A. C. 926-7). He taught some Traditions on the authority of Abū Ḥafṣ al-'Aṭṭār, and his own authority as a traditionist was cited by al-Dāraqutnī. (Al-Nufūm).

1 Here, in the Arabic text, I should prefer عن to على, but the manuscripts give the latter reading.

most indulgent among you, this man is to receive no better treatment than to have his favourable opinion of ourselves believed, and his efforts terminated in disappointment! By Allāh! that shall never be!' He then took a pen out of his ink-bottle and wrote these words on the forged letter: 'This is my letter, and I know not how you could have suspected the bearer or disappointed him; you cannot know all the persons who have served us or placed us under obligations. This man has rendered us services in the days of our disgrace, and what we consider a meet recompense for his deserts would far surpass that which we have granted him in recommending him to your patronage; aid him therefore in his pursuit, make him an ample donation and employ him in some lucrative occupation, so that he may return to us with (a fortune) sufficient to prove that his expectations were just and his reception honourable.' On that very day, he sent off the letter to Ibn Zanjūr. A great length of time then elapsed when, one day, a man of respectable appearance and elegantly dressed came into the presence of Abu 'l-Ḥasan Ibn al-Furāt, and, going up to him, offered up prayers for his welfare and extolled his virtues; he then burst into tears and kissed the ground before him. 'God's blessing be on thee! exclaimed Ibn al-Furāt, 'who art thou?' 'I am the author of the forged letter addressed to Ibn Zanjūr, and which was authenticated by thy generosity and kindness; may God reward thee!' Ibn al-Furāt smiled and said: 'How much didst thou gain by him?' 'The sum which I received from him and the subscriptions which he obtained for me from the agents and other persons under his jurisdiction, joined to the employment which he gave me, have produced me twenty thousand pieces of gold.' 'Praise be to God!' replied Ibn al-Furāt; attach thyself to our person, and we shall place thee in the situation whereby thy fortune be increased still more'. He then put his talents to the proof, and finding him an able kātib, he admitted into his service, and thus enabled him to acquire great wealth."]

1 In place of شديدا I am certain that we must read سديدا. It is true that the manuscripts give the former reading, but here, as in other places of this notice, they are evidently in the wrong.

463 'ALĪ BIN YŪNUS THE ASTRONOMER.

Abu 'l-Ḥasan 'Alī Ibn Abī Sa'īd 'Abd al-Raḥmān Ibn Aḥmad Ibn Yūnus Ibn 'Abd al-A'lā al-Ṣadafī,<sup>1</sup> a native of Egypt and a celebrated astronomer, is the author of the al-Zīj al-Ḥākīmī (the Hakimite tables), called also Zīj Ibn Yūnus, a large work, of which I have seen a copy in four volumes.<sup>2</sup> In this treatise he amply discusses the subject and indicates the application of the rules which are there given, whilst its correctness testifies the great care with which it was drawn up. I have seen many works containing astronomical tables, but never met with one so full as this. The author states that the person by whose orders he commenced it was al-'Aziz, the father of al-Ḥākīm and sovereign of Egypt: * [He made astronomy his particular study, but he was well versed in other sciences and displayed an eminent talent for poetry. His work is so highly esteemed for correctness, that, like the Zīj of Yaḥyā Ibn Abī Mansūr<sup>3</sup>, it is taken by the people of Egypt as their standard authority in calculating the position of the heavenly bodies. His moral character was so well established that in the

---

1 See no. 343.

2 An Analysis of the first volume of this work has been published, by M. Caussin pere, in the seventh volume of the Notices et Extraits. He has inserted therein the lives of Ibn Yūnus, of his father 'Abd al-Raḥmān the Egyptian historian, and his great-grandfather Yūnus Ibn 'Abd al-A'lā; all extracted from Ibn Kḥallikān's work and translated by himself. Some of the passages in these texts are incorrectly given and others wrongly rendered.

3 Read ابن ابی منصور. Yaḥyā Abī Manūr al-Māmūnī (client of the Khalīf al-Māmūn), an astronomer of great talent, acquired by his skill a high rank in the favour of the Khalīf al-Māmūn, and when that sovereign decided that observations should be made on the stars, he charged Yaḥyā and some others with the task, and directed them to ameliorate their instruments. They in consequence made observations at as-Ṣammāsiyah, near Baḡhdād, and Mount Qāsiyūn, near Damascus, in the year 215 (A. C. 830), 216, and 217, but the death of al-Māmūn in 218, put a stop to their operations. Yaḥyā died in the land of the Greeks (Bilād al-Rūm, or Asia Minor). He is the author of the astronomical tables called al-Zā'ij al-Mumtaḥin, and a work apparently astrological, entitled Kitāb-al-'Amal (كتاب العمل). (Tārīkh al-Ḥukamā).

* From 'He' to 'sight' not in the autograph; and he will be noticed in the letter 'n' omitted by de slane—Ed.

month of the first Jumādā, A. H. 380 (Jul.--Aug., A. C. 990), the qādī* Muḥammad Ibn al-Nu'mān<sup>1</sup> appointed him to act as 'qadi'<sup>2</sup>. He left an only son, whose stupidity was so great<sup>3</sup> that he sold to the soapmakers all of his father's books and works at so much a pound. 'Alī Ibn Yūnus spent his life in making astronomical observations and calculating nativities<sup>4</sup> wherein he displayed unequalled skill; he would even make long stations in order to get an observation of a star. The Amīr al-Mukhtār al-Musabbiḥi says: "I was told by Abu 'l-Ḥasan al-Ṭabarānī, the astronomer, that he went up with Ibn Yūnus to Mount Muqattam and made a station there, with the intention of taking an observation of the planet Venus; and that, on arriving he took off his cloak and turban, which he replaced by a woman's gown and

1 See no. 122, note on Muḥammad Ibn al-Nu'mān.

2 The 'adl (justice) is an officer exercising, with the authorisation of the qādī, the functions of witness to the bonds, deeds, and contracts entered into by individuals; they put their seal to these documents, and when a litigation arises afterwards between the contracting parties, their testimony is required. In all the large cities the 'adls have offices where they receive persons making contracts; and serve as witness to the whole proceeding, whether it be a verbal or written agreement. In the last case, it is the 'adl who draws up the deed. To be eligible to these functions a man must not only be well acquainted with the laws relative to conventions and obligations, and capable of writing them out in proper form, but he must also bear a high character for integrity, and be exempt even from the suspicion of corruption. It is one of the qādī's duties to keep a watchful eye over the conduct of these functionaries. The office of 'adl was established by Muḥammad himself; We read in the Qur'an, sūrat 2, verse 232: "O true believers! when you bind yourselves one to the other in a debt for a certain time, write it down, and let a writer write between you according to justice ('adl); and let not the writer refuse writing according to what God hath taught him."

3 This passage exists no longer in the autograph; it was certain on a fly-leaf, which has fallen out. Here, for <sup>مختل</sup>, I have not hesitation in reading <sup>مختل</sup>.

4 It must be recollected that, with the Muslims, astronomy and astrology are synonymous. Their most learned astronomers were also their most skilful astrologers. They felt, probably, that truth could not make its way unless protected by falsehood.

* The Cairo edition adds [Abū 'Abd Allāh] on the authority of one manuscript.

hood, both of a red colour ; he then produced a guitar, on which he commenced playing; whilst he kept perfumes burning before him : It was, says he, an astounding sight" ! ] The same writer says, in his History of Egypt : "Ibn Yūnus was a careless and absent man ; he would wind his turban-cloth round a high-peaked cap and place his cloak over that ; he was himself very tall, and when he rode out, the people used to laugh at him for his odd figure, his shabby appearance, and tattered dress. But, notwithstanding the strangeness of his aspect, he was singularly fortunate in his astrological predicions, and therein remaned without a rival." He was versed in a great variety of sciences, and played on the guitar, but merely as an amateur. The following is a passage from his poetry :

"When the breeze begins to blow, I charge it with a message from a passionate lover to the presence of his beloved. I would sacrifice my life for her, whose aspect gives life to our souls and whose presence perfumes and rejoices the world. I swear that since her departure, I left my wine-cup untouched ; it was absent from me, because she was absent. And what renews my passion is her image appearing in my dreams, approaching at midnight, unseen by jealous spies!"

He composed a great quantity of poetry. We have already spoken of his father ( no. 343 ), and we shall give a notice on his ( great ) grandfather in the letter Y. It is related that at one of al-Hākīm al-'Ubaydi the ( Faṭimite ) sovereign of Egypt's private parties, mention was made of Ibn Yūnus and his absence of mind, on which this prince mentioned the following circumstance : "He came into my presence one day with his heavy shoes in his hand, and after kissing the ground, he sat down and placed them by his side ; I saw both of them and him, for he was quite near me ; and when he thought of retiring, he kissed the ground, brought

---

1 See Introduction to 1st Vol. M. Caussin has given these verses in his notice, but imagines that the last related to some star or planet which was long watched for, but did not appear. It seems to me, however, that neither the grammatical construction of the verse nor the genius of Arabic poetry will allow this interpretation.

forward his shoes, put them on, and withdrew."<sup>1</sup> This anecdote seems given in a proof of his inattention and carelessness. Al-Musabbihī says that he died suddenly on Monday morning, the 3rd of Shawwāl, A. H. 399 (June A. C. 1009)*. The funeral service was said over him in the principal mosque of Old Cairo by the qāḍī Mālik Ibn Sa'īd Ibn Aḥmad Ibn Muḥammad Ibn Tawwāb, and he was buried in his own dwelling, situated in the quarter inhabited by the furriers.

464 'UMARAT AL-YAMĀNĪ THE JURISCONSULT.

The Jurisconsult (al-faqīh) Abū Muḥammad<sup>2</sup> 'Umārat Ibn Abi 'l-Ḥasan 'Alī Ibn Raydān Ibn Aḥmad al-Ḥakamī al-Yamanī, surnamed Najm al-Dīn (star of religion) bore a high reputation as a poet. I extracted the following particulars from one of his works. He drew his descent from Qaḥṭān through al-Ḥakam Ibn Sa'd al-'Ashīrah<sup>3</sup> of the tribe of Maḍhij, and was an inhabitant of a city situated in the province of Tihāmah in Yaman, and called Maṭṭān; it lies in the valley of Wasā' at eleven days' distance south of Makkah. This was the place of his birth and early youth. He attained the age of puberty in A. H. 529 (A. C. 1134-5), and, two years after, he proceeded to Zabīd, where he took up his residence and studied jurisprudence during four years in one of the colleges (which existed) there. In A. H. 549 (A. C. 1145-5), he made the pilgrimage, and was dispatched by Qāsim Ibn Hāshim Ibn Falitah<sup>4</sup> the sovereign of Makkah, as his envoy to Egypt.

1 Common politeness required that the shoes should have been left outside the door.

2 'Imād al-Dīn gives him the surname of Abū Ḥamzah.

3 See No. 49.

4 Ibn Khallikān has fallen into a mistake. This Amīr's name was Qāsim Ibn Abi Falitah. He became sovereign of Makkah on the death of his father Abū Falitah in A. H. 527 (A. C. 1132-3), and was murdered in A. H. 556 (A. D. 1161) by an assassin (ḥaḡhishīyah) who, according to common report, had been employed by al-'Āḍid, the sovereign of Egypt, to commit that deed.-- (Ibn Khaldūn; No. 2402 C, fol. 45 verso!).

* 30 May; not June vide Mahler's Almanac—Ed.

He entered the country in the month of the first Rabi', A.H. 550 (May, A. C. 1155) ; the reigning sovereign at that time was al-Fā'iz, the son of al-Zāfir, who had for Wazīr al-Šālih Ibn Ruzzik (no. 283). On his first presentation, he recited in the presence of both, his celebrated qaṣīdah rhyming in m, which we here give :

"Now, that my resolves are accomplished and my anxiety is past, let praises be given to the camels for the services they rendered. I shall not deny their right to my gratitude, and I reserve for them a recompense which will cause the ōridles (of horses) to envy the honour conferred on the halters (of camels). They brought the glorious term of a distant journey within my sight, so that I beheld the Imām of the nations in this age. They went forth at eve from the Ka'bah of al-Baṭḥā and the Ḥaram, to visit the Ka'bah of generosity and nobleness. Did the temple know, that on leaving it, I should only pass from one ḥaram (sanctuary) to another ?<sup>1</sup> They journeyed to the spot where the pavilion of the Khalīfate is reared aloft between the opposite qualities of mildness and severity. There the rank of Imām shines with holy light, to dissipate the hateful mists of ignorance and tyranny. There the prophetic spirit (of Muḥammad still survives and) shows us sign, declaring the two great truths of justice and wisdom.<sup>2</sup> There stand the trophies of noble deeds, to teach us how to praise the double grandeur of might and generosity. There the tongues of glorious exploits extol the double merit of manly acts and generous feelings. There the triumphant standard of true nobility is borne on high by the two lofty (feelings) of honour and just ambition. Confident of obtaining salvation and the reward of my sincerity in this oath, I swear by al-Fā'iz the pure, that he has protected religion, the world, mankind ! aided by his Wazīr al-Šālih, the dispeller of affliction, him who wears a raiment of honour woven by these skillful artisans, the swords and the pen. In his existence the times find that lustre which they wanted ; and through his beneficence, they who complained of want have disappeared.

1 See No. 6, note on Baṭḥā.

2 In this verse for باس read حكم .

His noble deeds have given him an empire which might furnish to the very Pleiads a prouder exaltation than their own. I see here such majestic dignity, that though awake, the aspect seems to me a dream. This is a day of my life which never entered into my hopes and to which my most ardent wishes never aspired. O that the stars would draw near to me ! I should form with them a necklace of eulogium ; for, in praising you, I deem words insufficient. Here also the wazirate offers<sup>1</sup> to the Khalifate its loyal counsels on which no suspicion was ever cast. I behold those marks of attachment which teach us that they are bound together, not by ties of blood, but by mutual esteem. A Khalif and his Wazir, whose justice extends a protecting shade over Islamism and the nations. Compared with their generosity, the Nile's increase is but a diminished stream ; and might not even the copious rains be considered as vanquished ?"

This qaṣīdah was highly admired by them, and procured a large donation for the author. He remained in Egypt, in the enjoyment of ease and honours, till the month of Shawwāl, A. H. 550 (December, A. C. 1155), when he returned to Makkah, and, in the month of Ṣafar, A. H. 551 (April, A. C. 1156), he proceeded from thence to Zabīd. That same year he made the pilgrimage, and was again sent as an envoy to Egypt by Qāsim, the sovereign of Makkah. He then settled at Cairo and never left it after. I have read, however, in the work designed by him as a history of Yaman, that he left his native place in the month of Shā'bān, A. H. 552. He belonged to the Shafite sect, and was zealously attached to the doctrines of the Sunnah ; as an accomplished scholar and a poet his talents were pre-eminent, and in society his conversation was most instructive. The Wazir as-Ṣāliḥ, his sons, and the rest of the family treated him with the very utmost favour, and although their religious opinions differed from his, they made him their constant companion on account of his social qualities. He composed a great number of eulogiums on al-Ṣāliḥ and his sons. We have already mentioned something of him in the lives of Shāwar and al-Ṣāliḥ ( No. 265 and No. 288 ), where we have noticed also the elegy which he wrote on the death of that Wazīr. A close intimacy subsisted between him and al-Kāmil, the son of Shāwar, but it was broken off by the latter when his father was raised to the Wazīrate. On this occasion, the poet addressed to him the following lines :

---

1 I read ألقى in the autograph.

"If fortune leave thee not in peace, make war against her ; and if your nearest friends serve thee not, remove to afar. Despite not the wiles of the feeble ; serpents have been sometimes killed by the envenomed sting of the scorpion. In days of old, a hoopoe shook the throne of Bilqīs,<sup>1</sup> and, before that, a rat destroyed the dike of Mārib.<sup>2</sup> Since life is the most precious of our riches, spend it not without necessity. The vicissitudes of night and day form a field of battle where the troops of misfortune assail us in unwonted ways. The faithlessness of youth afflicts me not ; I am accusstomed to this defect in all my companions. The young man's deceit lies in his promises and their fulfilment, and that of the sword is when its edge rebounds harmless of the foe".

In this poem is contained the following passage :

"Since my mouth is the mine from which those jewels are taken, preserve it from kissing the hands of charitable. I have seen men banquetting at thy house, whilst I had no other companions but the mourners. I withdrew when your excellency preferred them to me ; the lion scorns to let the foxes precede him. Tell me how they fill the place which I once held as thy preferred lieutenant ? Those were the nights in which I sung your praises to the company, who listened in respectful silence, and nodded their approbation".<sup>3</sup>

On the fall of the (Fāṭimite) dynasty and the establishment of the sultān Ṣalāḥ al-Dīn's authority, 'Umārah, who was still in the country, composed some poems in honour of that prince and of other members of the (Ayyūbite) family, all of which are still to be found in the collection of his poetical works. He

1 See Qur'ān, sūrat 27, and the notes of Sale in his translation.

2 See M. De Sacy's Memoire sur divers evenements de l'histoire des Arabes avant Mahmoet, in the Memoires de l'Academic des Inscriptions, tom. 48.

3 Literally : Their talk was a sign of the eyebrow.

addressed to Ṣalāḥ al-Dīn also a qaṣīdah, wherein he painted his situation and the misery to which he had been reduced. This piece, which he entitled : Shikāyat al-Mutaḏallim wa Nikāyat al-Muta'allim (complaint of the oppressed and pains of the afflicted) is embellished with all the graces of composition. He wrote also a long poem, rhyming in l, wherein he deplores the fate of the People of the Palace (the Fāṣimite family) on the ruin of their power ; like most of his pieces, it is beautifully written. He then embarked in some proceedings connected with a conspiracy got up by eight of the principal officers of the cit., who, being devoted partisans of the Egyptians (the *Fāṣimite*s), had conceived the design of restoring them to the throne. But the Sulṭān Ṣalāḥ al-Dīn discovered the plot and had them all strangled, including the jurisconsult. This execution took place at Cairo on Saturday, 2nd of Ramaḏān, A.H. 569 (April, A. C. 1174) ; * they had been arrested on Sunday, the 26th of Shā'bān of that year. 'Umārat al-Yamānī left a number of works, and, amongst them, a history of Yaman furnishing much important information, and a treatise called al-Nukat al-'Aṣriyah fī 'l-Akhlāq al-Wuzarā al-Miṣrīyah (contemporary anecdotes respecting the Wazīrs of Egypt).<sup>1</sup> The kāthib 'Imād al-Dīn al-Iṣpāhānī says of him in the Kharīdah ! "His body was exposed on a cross with those of the other persons who had been accused plotting against him" meaning against the sulṭān Ṣalāḥ al-Dīn and of inviting the Franks (the crusaders) by letter to come and assist in placing the son of al-'Āḏid on the throne.. But they had received among them a man belonging to the army, who was not a native of Egypt, and this person went to Ṣalāḥ al-Dīn and informed him of what was going on. The prince had them brought before him, and they sought not to deny the accusation, neither did they consider their conduct as a thing to be denied ; he therefore cut short the path of 'Umārah's life and replaced his flourishing existence by destruction. This affair was marked by some peculiar circum-

1 A copy of this work, apparently corrected by the author, is in the Bib. du Roi, ancient fonds No 810. He has inserted in it a number of his own poems, and he gives an account of his intercourse with the Wazīrs Shāwar and al-Ṣāliḥ.

* 6 April—Ed.

tances; the first, that he was accused of composing a qaṣīdah which contained this verse :

'This religion (Islāmism) took its origin with a man who aspired to be called the lord of nations'.

"It is impossible that this verse was attributed to him falsely, but nevertheless the jurisconsults of Egypt declared that he merited death, and they turned Ṣalāḥ al-Dīn to make an example of him. The second, that he was engaged in an affair in which failure is never pardoned, neither is any respect shown to a literary man, were he even the star of learning in the heavens of poetry and prose.<sup>1</sup> The third, that he had satirised an amīr who counted this as one of his crimes; so destruction came upon him whilst in the midst of his sins". Towards the end of the same article, he says : "A strange thing it was that 'Umārah, who had refused to attach himself to the doctrines of these people (the Fāṭimites) when they yet held their station, should have been so completely blinded by fate as to wish to take their part and restore them to power; an undertaking which cost him his life". Here the writer alludes to some verses which were addressed by al-Ṣāliḥ Ibn Ruzzik to 'Umārah, pressing him to become a Shī'ite. They are given by 'Imād al-Dīn in the same page where he makes this observation<sup>2</sup>. Madhḥijī means descended from Madhḥij : the real name of Madhḥij was Mālik, the son of Udud Ibn Yaṣḥjub; he was so denominated because he was born at a red hill in Yaman called Madhḥij, but other reasons have also been given.

465 'UMAR IBN ABĪ RABĪ'AH.

Abu 'l-Khaṭṭāb 'Umar Ibn 'Abd Allāh Ibn Abī Rabī'ah Ibn al-Mughayrah Ibn 'Abd Allāh Ibn 'Umar Ibn Maḥzūm Ibn

1 As the style of 'Imād al-Dīn is more remarkable for sounding phrases than for sense, it cannot be expected that he should be more intelligible in English than in Arabic.

2 See MS. No. 1444, for 261 verso. Al-Ṣāliḥ offered him a large sum to induce him to become a Shī'ite.

Yaqazah Ibn Murrah al-Makhzūmī, the best poet ever produced by the tribe of Quraysh, is celebrated for his amatory pieces, repartees, adventures, and disorderly life; of these, some stories are told which are well known.<sup>1</sup> The person whom he courted in his verses was al-Thurayyā, the daughter of 'Alī Ibn 'Abd Allāh Ibn al-Ḥarith Ibn Umayyah al-Aṣghar (the less)<sup>2</sup> Ibn 'Abd Shams Ibn 'Abd Manāf, a member of the Omayyide family. Al-Suhayli says, in his al-Rawḍ al-Unuf<sup>3</sup> that she was the daughter of 'Abd Allāh, without mentioning 'Alī; he then adds: "Qutaylah, the daughter of al-Naḍr, was her grandmother, being the wife of al-Ḥarith Ibn Umayyah and mother of 'Abd Allāh, the father of al-Thurayyā". This Qutaylah was the same who, after the battle of Badr, recited to the Prophet<sup>ﷺ</sup> the verses rhyming in k when he had put to death her father al-Naḍr Ibn al-Ḥarith Ibn 'Alqamah Ibn Kaladah Ibn 'Abd Manāf Ibn 'Abd al-Dār Ibn Quṣayyi, surnamed al-'Abdarī (after his ancestor 'Abd al-Dār). Some say that al-Naḍr was her brother. Amongst the verses which she recited were these:

"O Muḥammad, son of the noblest of her race by a generous sire! it had not harmed thee to pardon; the hero, though roused to anger, sometimes pardons. Al-Naḍr would have been thy best mediator, hadst thou left him (alive); and he was the worthiest of liberty, were captives to be set free."

On this the Prophet<sup>ﷺ</sup> said: "Had I heard her verses before I put him to death, I should not have done so". This al-Naḍr bore a violent enmity to the Prophet<sup>ﷺ</sup>, but, being made prisoner at the battle of Badr and taken to Madīnah, Muḥammad<sup>ﷺ</sup> ordered 'Alī the son of Abū Ṭālib, or according to another account, al-Miqdād Ibn al-Aswad, to execute him. He was put to death in cold blood, and in Muḥammad's presence, at al-Ṣafrā, a place

1 See Kosegarten's Alli Ispahanensis Liber Cantilenarum, towards the beginning of the work.

2 This Umayyah was designated as the less, to distinguish him from a brother of the same name; It was from the latter that the Omayyides drew their descent.—(See Ibn Khaldūn MS. No. 3003, 2, fol. 127, and Eichhorn's Monumenta, pp. 85, 86.)

3 See No. 346.

between Madīnah and Badr. Al-Thurayyā was renowned for her beauty, and became the wife of Suhayl Ibn 'Abd al-Raḥmān Ibn 'Awf al-Zuhri, by whom she was taken to Egypt. It was on this occasion that 'Umar Ibn Abi Rabi'ah composed the following verses in allusion to the well-known stars Suhayl (Canopus) and al-Thurayyā (the Pleiads), and which have since become proverbial:

"O thou who joinest in marriage al-Thurayyā and Suhayl, tell me, I pray Thee, how can they ever meet? The former rises in the north-east, and the latter in the south-east!"

It was from this al-Thurayyā and her sister 'Āyishah that al-Gharidh, the celebrated singer<sup>1</sup> and the ṣāhib of Ma'bad<sup>2</sup> received

1 Le véritable nom de ce chanteur était Abdelmelik; le sobriquet de Gharidh lui avait été donné à cause de la fraîcheur de son teint. II était affranchi des sœurs Coraychites appelées collectivement El-abalat العيلات et qui étaient 'Hourayya amante d'Omar-ibn-abi-rabia, Roudhayya روضيا, Courayba قريبة et Oumm-Othmān, filles d'Abdullah, fils de Harith, fils d'Ommeyya-el-Asghar. Gharidh était Mekkois; d'abord tailleur, puis serviteur d'Ibn Souraydj, chez lequel ses maîtresses l'avaient placé. II apprit les airs d'Ibn Souraydj qui en fut jaloux et l'éloigna de lui. Gharidh devint son rival et l'égal dans le chant des complaintes funèbres نوح, ce qui porta Ibn Souraydj à abandonner ce genre. Le prénom de Gharidh était Abouyezid; II était non seulement chanteur très-distingué, mais encore bon compositeur et instrumentiste habile. II jouait du luth et du tambour de basque. II avait en outre une figure charmante et un esprit des plus agréables. Nafi, fils d'Al-cama, étant gouverneur de la Mekke pour le calife Welid, fils d'Abdelmelik. Gharidh, par crainte de cet officier, qui était animé contre lui de sentiments très-malveillants, quitta la Mekke et se réfugia dans le Yemen. II y passa quelque temps et y mourut, sous le califat de Souleyman, fils d'AbdelMelik. (A. Caussin de Perceval).

2 The word ṣāhib signifies friend, companion, master, pupil. Its meaning here is doubtful, as may be seen by the following note:—Gharidh n'a été ni le maître ni l'élève de Mabad. II ne paraît pas non plus qu'il ait été son ami. L'expression الغريض صاحب مباد pourrait signifier Gharidh rival de Mabad, mais il semble que ce serait faire trop d'honneur à Gharidh, qui est généralement regardé comme très-inférieur à Mabad. Peut-être le sens de cette expression est-il simplement Gharidh eut une aventure avec Mabad. Je n'ai recueilli qu'une seule anecdote dans laquelle Gharidh figure avec Mabad. On la trouvera dans la courte notice qui suit:

(Continued on page 445)

his liberty. The real name of al-Gharid was 'Abd al-Malik and his surname Abu Zayd; al-Gharid and al-Ighrid are names given

(Continued from page 444)

Abou Abbad Mabel, fils de Wahb, d'autres disent de Corr, Medinois, chanteur et compositeur fameux, etait, suivant les uns, affranchi de Moawia, fils d'Abou Sofyan; suivant les autres, affranchi de la famille de Wabissa, branche des Benou Makhzoum. Son Pere etait noir, lui-meme etait mulatre, grand de taille et louche. Sa voix etait superbe, il possedait a fond l'art musical. C'etait le prince des chanteurs de Medine. Il etait eleve des Saib Kbathir سايب خاثر, de Dejemile, et de Cachit le Persien قشيط الفارسي, affranchi d' Abdallah, fils de Djafar. Un poete a dit de Mabel :

اجاد طويس و انسرجي بعده وما قصبات السبق الالمعد

"Thouways et apres lui Ibn Suraydj ont ete d'habiles artistes, mais la palme du talent appartient a Mabel."

On raconte qu'Ibn Souraydj et Gharidh, qui tous deux avaient une grande reputation a la Mekke, se mirent un jour en route pour Medine, dans l'intention d'y montrer leur talent de chanteurs, et d'y recueillir les dons des amateurs de musique. En arrivant au lieu appele le lavoir المغسل, ils virent un jeune homme portant a la main un filet pour la chasse aux oiseaux, qui passa devant eux en chantant les vers de' Abu Catifa :

"Le chateau, les palmiers et le terroir de Djemma qui les separe, sont plus agreable a mon coeur que les portes de Dijroun," etc.

Surpris de la beaute de l'air et du charme de la voix du jeune homme, ils l'accosterent et le prierent de repeter sa chanson. Mabel, car c'etait lui, les satisfit, et continua son chemin. Ibn Suraydj et Gharidh resterent stupefaits. "Que dis tu de cela?" demanda Gharidh a son compagnon.—"Si un jeune chasseur de Medine, repondit Ibn Suraydj, a pu nous frapper ainsi d'etonnement, que devons-nous attendre des artistes de cette ville? Pour moi, je retourne a la Mekke."—"Et moi aussi," ajouta Gharidh. En effet, tous deux reprirent le chemin de la Mekke. Pendant la premiere moitie de la carriere de Mabel, son temoignage etait demis en justice a Medine, malgre sa profession de chanteur, a cause de la regularite de sa conduite. Mais lorsqu'il eut ete a la cour du calife Wailid fils de Yazid, et que faisant partie de la societe de ce prince, il se fut rendu le compagnon des ses plaisirs, son temoignage ne fut plus recu. Frappe d'une hemiplegie quelque temps avant sa mort, Mabel avait perdu la voix. Il mourut a Damas sous le regne de Welid fils de Yezid, dans le palais meme de ce calife. Lorsqu'on emporta son cercueil, Sellaman el-Coss, chanteuse esclave du defunt calife Yezid, tenait un brancard et chantait ces vers d' El-Ahwas sur un air que Mabel lui avait enseigne lui-meme.

قد لعمرى بت ليلي كفى الداء الوجيع

(Continued on page 446)

to the flower-bud of the date-tree. And he was so called for his fair complexion or for its freshness. The following verses are by 'Umar Ibn Abī Rabi'ah :

"Greet the image of my beloved, come to visit me when slumber prostrated the nocturnal conversers. It approached, in a dream, under the shades of night ; being unwilling to visit me by day I exclaimed : 'Why am I treated so cruelly ? Before this, I used to hear her and see her.' The vision replied : 'I am as thou hast known me, but the favour thou demandest is too precious to be granted'".

He was born on the night in which 'Umar Ibn al-Khaṭṭāb was murdered ; this was the eve of Wednesday, the 25th of Dhu 'l-Hijjah, A. H. 23 (November, A. C. 640).* He lost his life in A. H. 93 (A. D. 711-2), at the age of seventy ; being then embarked on a naval expedition against the infidels, in which they destroyed his ship by fire. Al-Haytham Ibn 'Adī states that he died A. H. 93, aged eighty years. His father 'Abd Allāh lost his life in Sijistān, A. H. 78 (A. C. 697-8)<sup>2</sup>. When it was mentioned in the presence of al-Ḥasan al-Baṣrī ( no. 150 ), that 'Umar Ibn Rabi'ah came into the world on the night in which 'Umar Ibn al-Khaṭṭāb fell by the hand of a murderer, he exclaimed : "What worth was removed from the world on that night, and what worthlessness was brought into it !" The poet's grandfather, Abū Rabi'ah, bore the surname of Dhu 'l-Rumḥayn ( the bearer of the two lances ); his real name was 'Umar or Ḥudhayfah, but some say that he had

(Continued from page 445)

"J'ai passé la nuit dans la souffrance," etc.

Le calife Welid et son frère Et-Ghamr, vetus seulement d'une tunique et d'un manteau, marchaint devant le cercueil et le precederent ainsi jusqu'a ce qu'il fut sorti du palais —(A. Caussin de Perceval).

1 Literally : The necklace takes up the wearer too much for it to be lent ; i.e. the wearer is too fond of the necklace to lend it. This proverbial expression is quoted by al-Maydānī. See professor Freytag's Meldant Proverbia, tom. I p. 682.

2 The Arabs made an expedition into Khurāsān that year. See Price's Retrospect, Vol. I p. 454.

* The date should be 26 corresponding to 3 November not 25 since four days should be subtracted from 30 and the remainder is 26.—Ed.

only a surname. His father 'Abd Allāh was the uterine brother of Abū Jahl Ibn Hishām al-Makhzūmī<sup>1</sup>; their mother's name was Asmā, the daughter of Mukharribah<sup>2</sup>, of the tribe of Makhzūm, or, by another account, of the tribe of Nahshal; 'Abd Allāh and Abū Jahl were also cousins, their fathers, Abū Rabī'ah and Hishām, being the sons of al-Maghayrah Ibn 'Abd Allāh.

466 'UMAR IBN SHABBAH.

Abū Zayd 'Umar Ibn Shabbah Ibn 'Abīdah Ibn Zayd al-Numayrī, a man of extensive information and a transmitter of historical relations, anecdotes, and pieces of verse, was a native of Baṣrah. Shabbah was merely the surname of his father, whose real name was Zayd; some also say that his great-grandfather was called Rāyīṭah<sup>3</sup>, not Zayd. 'Umar Ibn Shabbah composed a history of Baṣrah. He taught Qur'ān reading with the authorisation of his master Jabalah Ibn Mālik, who had himself been authorised to teach by al-Mufaḍḍal<sup>4</sup>, who had received his own licence from 'Āṣim Ibn Abī 'l-Najūd<sup>5</sup>. He attended the lectures wherein Maḥbūb Ibn al-Ḥasan<sup>6</sup> indicated the words of the Qur'ān which may be pronounced in different manners, and he transmitted pieces of literature with the authorisation of his teachers 'Abd al-Wahhāb al-Thaqafī<sup>7</sup> and 'Umar Ibn

1 This was the same person by whose advice the Meccans pronounced the sentence of death against Muḥammad; he fell at the battle of Badr.

2 Read مغربه .

3 The autograph has رابطہ .*

4 Some account of al-Mufaḍḍal is given by Ibn [K]hallikān in the life of his son Muḥammad.

5 See his life, No. 294.

6 The autograph has ابن الحسن .

7 'Abd al-Wahhāb Ibn 'Abd al-Ḥamīd al-Thaqafī (a member of the tribe of Thaqif) and native of Baṣrah, transmitted traditional information from Ayyūb al-Sikhtiyānī, Ja'far al-Ṣādiq, Sa'id al-Jarīrī, and many others. His own
(Continued on page 448)

* 'Asqalānī also supports it vide. Tahdhīb al-Tahdhīb Vol. VII, p. 460 no. 767.—Ed.

'Alī.<sup>1</sup> Qur'ān reading was taught on his authority by his pupils 'Abd Allāh Ibn 'Umar al-Warrāq, and Aḥmad Ibn Faraj, and pieces of traditional literature were communicated by him to Abū Muḥammad Ibn al-Jārūd. Abū Ḥātim al-Rāzi<sup>2</sup> being questioned concerning his merits (as a transmitter of traditional learning), declared him worthy of the highest confidence. The ḥāfiẓ Ibn Mājah, author of the Sunan<sup>3</sup>, and some others gave traditional information on his authority. We have quoted him in the life of al-'Abbās Ibn al-Aḥnaf (no. 297). He was born on Sunday, the 1st of Rajab, A. H. 173 (November, A. C. 789),* and he died at Sarr man Ra'ā on Monday the 23rd some say Thursday the 25th—of the latter Jumāda, A. H. 262 (March, A. C. 876).† According to another statement, he died in the year 263.—Numayrī means descended from Numayr Ibn 'Āmir Ibn Ṣa'ṣa'ah, the progenitor of a great Arabian tribe; many learned men and other persons have sprung from that tribe, and therefore bore this surname.

(Continued from page 447)

authority was cited by al-Ṣhāfi'i, Aḥmad Ibn Ḥanbal, Ibn al-Maḍīnī, Yahyā Ibn Ma'in and some others. Ibn Ma'in declared him deserving of the highest confidence as a Traditionist. Towards the end of his life he went deranged, and he died A.H. 194 (A.C. 809-10) —(Ibn al-Aṭhīr. Al-Dhahabī).

1 'Umar Ibn 'Alī Ibn 'Aṭā, a native of Baṣrah and a mawla to the tribe of Thaqif, gave Traditions on the authority of al-Thawrī, Ḥajjāj Ibn Arṭab, and others. His own authority was cited by Ibn Ḥanbal, Qutaybah Ibn Sa'id, and some others. He died A.H. 190 (A.C. 805-6).—(Al-Dhahabī).

2 The ḥāfiẓ Abū Ḥālim Muḥammad Ibn Idrīs Ibn al-Munḍhir Ibn Dāwūd surnamed al-Rāzi because he was a native of Ray, and al-Ḥanẓalī because he was mawla to the tribe of Ḥanẓalah or because he lived in the street of al-Ḥanẓalah in Ray, was an excellent judge of the authenticity of Traditions and held himself the highest rank as a Traditionist. In the pursuit of this branch of knowledge, he travelled to Kūrasān, the two 'Irāqs, Hijāz, Yaman, Syria, and Egypt. He died at Ray in the month of Ṣha'bān, A. H. 277 (Nov.-Dec. A.C. 890).—(Nujūm).

3 His life will be found in this work.

* 22 November.—Ed.

† The dates should be 24 and 26, according to Mahler's calculation Monday fell on 25 corresponding to 26 March and Thursday on 29 March.—Ed.

467 AL-KHIRAQĪ.

Abu 'l-Qāsim 'Umar Ibn Abi 'Alī al-Ḥusayn Ibn 'Abd Allāh Ibn Aḥmad al-Khiraqī was an eminent jurisconsult of the Ḥanbalite sect. He composed a great number of works in illustration of the doctrines professed by the followers of Aḥmad Ibn Ḥanbal. One of these treatises is a Mukhtaṣir (compendium), which still serves as a text book for young students belonging to that sect; when he set out for Damascus from Baghdād, in consequence of the maledictions which were pronounced in the latter city against some of the early Muslims (al-Salaf),<sup>1</sup> he left this book behind him, and it was burned during his absence.<sup>2</sup> He died at Damascus, A. H. 334 (A. C. 945-6). His father also was distinguished for his abilities, and transmitted traditional information received by him from many teachers. Khiraqī means a seller of rags (khiraq) and clothes.

1 This was in A. H. 321 (A. C. 933). We learn from Abu 'l-Fedā that 'Alī Ibn Balīk, having conspired with Mūnis the eunuch to depose the Khalīf al-Qāhir and place a son of al-Muktafi on the throne, was arrested with his accomplice and put to death in that year. But what Abu 'l-Fedā has neglected to mention, was the means taken by Ibn Balīk to effect his design. He began by exciting a sedition in Baghdād, and the fact is noticed by al-Dhahabī MS. No. 646, fol. 101) in these terms: "In this year troubles broke out because 'Alī Ibn Balīk and his secretary (katīb) al-Ḥasan Ibn Hārūn decided on having the memory of Mu'āwiyah publicly cursed from the pulpits. This produced a riot at Baghdād, and Ibn Balīk gave orders to arrest the chief of the Ḥanbalites, Abū Muḥammad al-Barbahārī, but this doctor retired to a place of concealment. A number of his followers were then banished to Baṣrah. In the meanwhile al-Qāhir took secret arrangements against Mūnis and Ibn Muqlah", etc. The Ḥanbalites of Baghdād were at that time notorious for their bigotry and turbulence, as may be learned from the Annals of Abu 'l-Fedā, years 310, 317, 323, etc. From Ibn Balīk's first proceedings it would appear that he meant to rally the Shī'ites to his cause, as with them the memory of Mu'āwiyah was held in detestation. It must be recollected also that the Qarma's (see no. 182) were then extremely powerful. What may serve also to confirm my conjecture is, that the Khalīf, on the execution of his enemies, caused the following inscription to be placed on the coinage after his name: المنتقم من اعداء دين الله (the avenger of God's religion on its foes). Al-Dhahabī fol. 102.

2 As Ibn Khallikān speaks of this work as still existing, I conclude that al-Khiraqī wrote it over again.

468 'UMAR IBN DHARR.

Abū Dharr 'Umar Ibn Dharr, surnamed al-Ḥamdānī, was a native of Kūfah, a jurisconsult, and a narrator of historical anecdotes preserved by tradition.<sup>1</sup> His descent from Ḥamdān is thus set forth by Ibn al-Kalbī in his Jamharat al-Nisab: 'Abd Allāh, the father of Dharr and the grandfather of 'Umar, was the son of Zurārah Ibn Mu'āwiyah Ibn Munabbah Ibn Ghālib Ibn Waqsh Ibn Qāsim Ibn Mawhabah Ibn Du'ām Ibn Mālik Ibn Mu'āwiyah Ibn Ṣa'b Ibn Dūmān Ibn Bakīl Ibn Jusham Ibn Mālik (this Mālik is the same person who is surnamed al-Khārib)* Ibn 'Abd Allāh Ibn Kathīr Ibn Mālik Ibn Jusham Ibn Ḥāshid Ibn Jusham Ibn Khiyawān† Ibn Nawf Ibn Ḥamdān<sup>2</sup>. The sanctity of 'Umar Ibn Dharr's life and the fervour of his devotional exercise obtained for him the highest respect. He gave Traditions on the authority of 'Aṭā' and Mujāhid,<sup>4</sup> and his own authority for Traditions was cited by Wakī'<sup>5</sup> and the people of 'Irāq. The conduct of his son Dharr towards him was marked by the deepest affection<sup>6</sup> and dutiful reverence; when he was on the point of death, his father went into the room and said: . "My dear son! in thy death I shall suffer no loss, for the only one of whom I stand in need is God". When he expired, the father prayed over him, and buried him, and pronounced these words over the grave: "God is my witness, O Dharr! that my weeping on thy account prevents me from weeping for thy loss; for I know not

1 For القاضى in the printed text, read القاضى. All the manuscripts which I have examined, the autograph excepted give the former reading.

2 Read همدان in the printed text. The other errors in the genealogy as there given, are corrected in the translation. The incorrectness of most Arabic manuscripts, particularly in proper names, renders faults of this kind unavoidable.

3 See no. 394.

4 See no. 243 note on Ibn Jubayr.

5 See no. 149 note on wakī'.

6 Here again the manuscript copies and the printed text are at faults: for البر له we must read البركة.

* M. de slane gives al-Khārib and Cairo edition gives al-Hāriq.—Ed.

† M. de slane gives Ḥaiwān.—Ed.

what thou hast said (to thy Lord) and what has been said to thee. Almighty God ! I forgive him every remissness in his duty towards me ; let me then be responsible for every act wherein he may have been remiss in his duty towards Thee ; let the recompence which I may merit be bestowed on him and grant an increase of Thy bounty unto me, Thy earnest suppliant." A person once said to him : "How did thy son show his duty to thee ?" to which he replied : "When we walked together by day, he always kept behind me, and when we walked together by night, he always went before me, and he never mounted on the roof of a house whilst I was under it." Many other anecdotes of a similar kind are related of him. 'Umar Ibn Dharr was held to be a partisan of the doctrines professed by the Murjites.<sup>1</sup> He died A. H. 156 (A. C. 772-3); some say A. H. 155. Hamdāni, a word which means descended from Hamdān<sup>2</sup> must not be confounded with Hamadānī (native of the city of Hamadān). Dharr, the father of 'Umar, was also a juriconsult.

469 AL-THAMĀNĪNĪ.

Abu 'l-Qāsim 'Umar Ibn Thābit al-Thamānīnī, surnamed also al-Dharīr (or the blind, because he suffered from that infirmity). was a professor of grammar, and well acquainted with the rules of that science. He composed a full, elegant, and excellent commentary on Ibn Jinni's (no. 387) Luma',<sup>3</sup> and a great number of pupils studied with profit under his tuition. As a grammarian he possessed great talent, and had Abu 'l-Fatḥ Ibn Jinnī for master; he gave lessons in that science to the sharīf Abū Ma'nmar Yaḥyā Ibn Muḥammad Ṭabāṭabā al-Ḥusaynī. He composed also a commentary on Ibn Jinni's Taṣrīf (grammatical

1 For the doctrines of the Murjites, or Morgians, see Sale's preliminary discourse to the Qur'ān, and Dr. Cureton's Shahristānī, page 103.

2 The tribe of Hamdān inhabited Yaman and drew their descent from Kahlān.

3 See no. 387.

inflexions<sup>1</sup>. A great rivalry subsisted between him and Abu 'l-Qāsim Ibn Barhān; they both gave public lessons at al-Karkh, the suburb of Baghdād; the course of the latter was frequented by persons of rank and respectability, whilst that of al-Thamānīnī was only attended by persons of the lower class. He died in the month of Dhu 'l-Qa'dab, A. H. 442 (March-April, A. C. 1051). Thamānīnī means belonging to Thamānīn, which is a town in the neighbourhood of Jazīrah Ibn 'Umar and close to Mount Jūdī (Arārāt). It was the first town built after the deluge, and it was called Thamānīn (eighty), from the number of persons who came with Noah out of the ark. This town has produced many remarkable men. The sharīf Ibn Ṭabāṭabā died in the month of Ramaḍān, A. H. 478 (Dec.—Jan. A. C. 1085-6).

470 IBN AL-BAZRĪ.

Abu 'l-Qāsim 'Umar Ibn Muḥammad Ibn Aḥmad Ibn 'Ikrimah, surnamed al-Jazarī and generally known by the appellation of Ibn al-Bazrī, was a jurisconsult of the Shafite sect, and the most eminent doctor and mufī of the town of Jazīrah Ibn 'Umar<sup>2</sup> (from which place he drew his surname). His first studies in the law were made in Jazīrah Ibn 'Umar under the Shaykh Abu 'l-Ghanā'im Muḥammad Ibn al-Faraj Ibn Manṣūr Ibn Ibrāhīm Ibn al-Ḥasan al-Sulamī al-Fāriqī (a member of the tribe of Sulaym and a native of Mayyūfariqln), who had settled

1 The Arabic text is corrupted here, and no means exist of rectifying it, as the fly-leaf on which the passage was written in the autograph MS. has disappeared. The text of the printed edition, if literally translated, would signify, "He commented the Kitāb al-Luma' on Ibn Jinnī's Taḡrīf."* This is not very clear, and the reading of one of my MSS., which for Kitāb al-Luma' has Kitāb al-Mulūk, does not render the sense more intelligible, as the work called Mulūk al-Mufīd is, according too Ḥājjī Khalīfah, a production of al-Thamānīnī himself. The true reading is perhaps كتاب الملوك في التصريف , و منف كتاب الملوك , "And be composed on the Taḡrīf a work entitled Kitāb al-Mulūk."

2 See no. 435.

* Kitāb al-Luma' was the title of Ibn Jinnī's work on Taḡrīf (inflection).—Ed.

in that town. He then proceeded to Baghdād, and continued his studies under al-Kiyā al-Harrāsī (no. 405) and Hujjat al-Islām Abū Hāmid al-Ghazzālī<sup>1</sup>; he attended also the lectures of the latter and of his brother Aḥmad al-Ghazzālī and became the pupil of al-Shāshī, the author of the Kitāb al-Mustaẓhirī<sup>2</sup>. He acquired also much information in the society of many other learned men whom he frequented. Having returned to Jazīrah, he opened a public course of instruction which attracted students from distant countries, all anxious to receive his lessons and acquire a knowledge of the system in which he had digested the doctrines of the sect. He composed a commentary on Abū Ishāq al-Shīrāzī's Muḥadḍḥab<sup>3</sup>, in which he explained the obscurities and the uncommon words occurring in that treatise, and fixed besides the pronunciation of the proper names of those persons who are mentioned in it. To this work, which is simple compendium, he gave the title of al-Asāmī wa 'l-'Ilal min Kitāb al-Muḥadḍḥab (the names and obscurities occurring in the Kitāb al-Muḥadḍḥab). In learning and piety he held a high rank, and was said to have been better acquainted than any other ḥāfiẓ then living with the doctrines of al-Shāfi'ī. His attention was chiefly directed to the study of those points wherein the Shafite sect differs from others, and the number of persons who enjoyed the benefit of his tuition was very great. (As a doctor) he bore the surnames of Zayn al-Dīn Jamāl al-Islām (ornament of religion, beauty of Islamism). He was born A. H. 471 (A. C. 1078-9), and he died on the 2nd of the first Rabi', some say of the latter, A. H. 560 (January, A. C. 1165)* at al-Jazīrah.<sup>4</sup> Although his disciples were numerous, he did not leave his like in the world. His master, Abu 'I-Ghanā'im al-Fāriqī died A. H. 483 (A. C. 1090-10). It was under Ibn al-Bazrī that the doctor 'Isā Ibn Muḥammad al-Hakkārī<sup>5</sup> made

1 The life of Abū Hāmid al-Ghazzālī will be found farther on.

2 The life of Abū Bakr Muḥammad Ibn Aḥmad al-Shāshī, the author of the Mustaẓhirī, is given by Ibn Khallikān.

3 See no. 5.

4 By al-Jazīrah is here meant Jazīrah Ibn 'Umar.

5 The life of Ibn al-Hakkārī will be found in this work.

* 17 January or 16 February—Ed.

his studies. Bazrī means a maker and seller of Bazr; bazr is the name given in that country to the oil extracted from linseed, and which is used by them in their lamps.

471 SHIHĀB AL-DĪN AL-SUHRAWARDĪ.

Abū Ḥaṣṣ 'Umar, the son of Muḥammad, the son of 'Ammūyah (whose true name was 'Abd Allāh), al-Bakrī al-Suhrawardī, surnamed Shihāb al-Dīn (flambeau of the faith), was a doctor of the Shafīte sect. As we have given the remainder of his genealogy up to Abū Bakr, in the life of his uncle, Abū 'l-Najīb 'Abd al-Qāhir (see no. 368), we are dispensed from repeating it here. Shihāb al-Dīn was a pious and holy shaykh, most assiduous in his spiritual exercises and the practice of devotion. He successfully guided a great number of Ṣūfis in their efforts to obtain perfection, and directed them during the periods of their retirement into solitude; indeed, towards the close of his life, he remained without an equal. He studied under his uncle, Abū 'l-Najīb from whom he learned Ṣūfism and preaching; another of his masters was the shaykh Abū Muḥammad 'Abd al-Qādir Ibn Abi Ṣāliḥ al-Jilī (no. 378 note), and he went down to Baṣrah for the purpose of seeing the shaykh Abū Muḥammad Ibn 'Abd. He met also with some other shaykhs, and acquired a considerable share of information in the sciences of jurisprudence and controversy. He then gave lessons in literature, and held, during some years, regular assemblies, at which he preached. When he became shaykh of the shaykhs (grand-master of the Ṣūfis), at Baghdād, he continued the same practice, and his exhortations had a most impressive effect. He was certainly blessed with the Divine grace. A person who attended his assemblies related to me that Shihāb al-Dīn, one day, recited to him these words from the chair:

"Pour not out the draught (of Divine love) for me alone; Thou (O Lord) hast not accustomed me to withhold it from my companions. Thou art (truly) the Generous, and it suits not generosity that the cup, circulating (round the board), should pass by the other guests."

On hearing these words, the whole assembly was seized with an ecstacy of Divine love, and a great number of the persons present cut off their hair, and turned (from the world to God.) He composed some fine works, the most celebrated of which is his 'Awārif al-Ma'ārif (the (Divine) gifts), consisting in the different degrees of (spiritual) knowledge.'<sup>1</sup> He is also the author of some poetry, and one of his pieces is the following<sup>2</sup> :

"The dreariness of the (lover's solitary) nights was dispelled, and his turn of union (with the beloved) drew near; and my union with thee made those jealous, who used to pity me formerly when suffering from thy aversion. I swear by the truth of Thy existence, that since Thou art now present, I care not for any of my former disappointments. Thou camest to me who was deprived of life, and small was the price for which Thou didst obtain me<sup>3</sup>. The hearts (of men) are unable to conceive Thee; but, O, the delicious source whereof I am allowed to drink (I avow that) all which is forbidden to mortals is forbidden also to me; but how sweet in my bosom is the love I bear Thee. Love for Thee has drenched me very bones; what then have I to do with that which is not love? Bitter thirst oppresseth not the destitute when near him are sources of the purest water."

I saw a number of those who attended his assemblies and who sat with him in private, whilst he directed them, as is customary with the Šūfīs, in the path of spiritual life. they gave me an account of the strange sensations which then came over them, and of the extraordinary ecstasies which they experienced. He once arrived at Arbela as an envoy from the August Diwān<sup>4</sup>,

1 This is one of the most celebrated works on Šūfism. An excellent copy of it is preserved in the Bio, du Roi ancien fonds, No. 375.

2 These verses have a mystic import; the beloved is God.

3 The poet means to say that he was dead by sin, and that he became the servant or slave of God by renouncing the world.

4 The government of the Khalifate at Baghdād was generally designated at time by the title of the August Diwān (al-Diwan al-'Aziz).

and he held regular assemblies there, at which he preached; but I had not the advantage of seeing him, as I was then too young. He performed the pilgrimage very often, and on some of these occasions he made a temporary residence in the neighbourhood of the sacred Temple. The shaykhs of that age, who were masters of the path<sup>1</sup>, used to write to him from the countries where they resided, addressing him questions drawn up in the manners of fatwās (or consultations on points of law, in which they asked his opinion on circumstances which concerned them. I was told that one of them wrote to him as follows. "My lord! if I cease to work, I shall remain in idleness; and if I work, I am filled with self-satisfaction; which is best?" To this al-Suhrawardī wrote, in reply: "Work: and ask of Almighty God to pardon thy self-satisfaction." Numerous anecdotes of this kind are told of him. He has inserted some charming verses in the 'Awārif al-Ma'ārif, from which we select the following:

"I perceive in thee (O, valley), a perfume which I know not, and I suspect that (my beloved) Lamyā has swept over thee with her train<sup>2</sup>."

And again:

"If I contemplate you, I am all eyes; and if I think of you, I am all heart."

By his studies under his uncel Abu 'l-Najīb he attained great proficiency. He was born at Suhraward, towards the latter end of Rajab, or the beginning of Sha'bān (which of the two is doubtful), A. H. 539 (Jan-Feb, A. C. 1145); and he died at Baghdād, on the first of Muḥarram, A. H. 632 (Sept. A. C. 1234),* He was interred the next morning in the Wardiyah cemetery<sup>3</sup>.

---

1 See no. 111, note on 'Man of the path.'

2 The merit of this verse consists in its mystic signification. The shaykh perceived a young novice in Sūfism manifesting an unwonted degree of excitement; and he supposed that the Divinity had passed near him.

3 Wardiyah signifies rosary, rose-garden; it was the cemetery of the Sūfis.

* 26 September—Ed.

472 THE ḤĀFİZ IBN DIḤYAH.

The ḥāfīz Abu 'l-Khaṭṭāb 'Umar Ibn al-Ḥasan Ibn Diḥyah, a member of the tribe of Kalb, and surnamed Dhu 'l-Nasabayn (the professor of the double pedigree), was a native of Valencia, in Spain. His genealogy, as I found it written by himself, with the indication of the proper pronounciation of the names, runs as follows: 'Umar Ibn al-Ḥasan Ibn 'Alī Ibn Muḥammad al-Jumayyī* Ibn Farḥ Ibn Khalaf Ibn Qūmis (pronounced also Qawmis) Ibn Mazlāl Ibn Mallāl Ibn Badr Ibn Aḥmad Ibn Diḥyah (pronounced also Daḥyah) Ibn Khalifah Ibn Farwah al-Kalbī: Diḥyah al-Kalbī was one of Muḥammad's companions<sup>1</sup>. He mentioned also that his mother, Amat al-Raḥmān, was the daughter of Abū 'Abd Allāh Ibn Abi 'l-Bassām Mūsā Ibn 'Abd Allāh Ibn al-Ḥusayn Ibn Ja'far Ibn 'Alī Ibn Muḥammad Ibn 'Alī Ibn Mūsā Ibn Ja'far Ibn Muḥammad Ibn 'Alī Ibn al-Ḥusayn Ibn 'Alī Ibn Abi Ṭālib. It was for this reason that he signed himself the possessor of the double pedigree, being, descended from Diḥyah and al-Ḥusayn. Alluding also to the same circumstance, he wrote himself down as Sibṭ Abi 'l-Bassām (the grandson by the female line of Abu 'l-Bassām). Abu 'l-Khaṭṭāb 'Umar Ibn Diḥyah was a man eminent for his learning and illustrious by his talents, a perfect master of the Traditions relative to the Prophet<sup>2</sup>, and of the sciences connected with them, skilled in grammar and philology, and well acquainted with the narrations of the battle-days of the ancient Arabs, and with their poems. Having made the collecting of Traditions his chief pursuit, he visited most of the Muslim cities in Spain for the purpose of meeting their men of learning and their teachers, after which he crossed the water and entered Morocco, where he became acquainted with the persons of talent who resided in that city. He then proceeded to the province of Ifriqiyah, and thence to Egypt. From that country he travelled to Syria, the East (Mesopotamia), and 'Irāq. At Baghdād he received Traditions from some of Ibn al-Ḥaṣīn's disciples, and at Wāsiṭ he heard others from the lips of Abū 'l-Faṭḥ Muḥammad Ibn Aḥmad al-Maydānī. He then visited Persian 'Irāq, Khurāsān with its neighbouring provinces, and Māzandarān, for the sole purpose of collecting Traditions and obtaining them from the great masters in that branch of knowledge whom he met there. During this period, he gave lessons to others, and communicated to them his own information. When at Iṣpahān he heard Abū Ja'far al-Ṣaydalānī teach Traditions, and, at Naysāpūr, he received some from Maṣṭūr Ibn 'Abd al-Mun'im al-Farāwī. In the year 604 (A. C. 1207-8) he arrived at Arbela, on his way to Khurāsān, and perceiving the extreme zeal displayed by the lord of that city, al-Malik al-Mu'azzam Muẓaffar al-Dīn, the son of Zayn al-Dīn, in his preparations for celebrating the festival of the Prophet's birth, he composed for that prince, the work entitled Kitāb al-Tanwīr fī Mawlid al-Sirāj al-Munīr (the book of Illumination, treating of the birth-day of the enlightening Flambeau). In the letter under the head of Kūkubūrī, we shall give a description of this solemnity. In the month of the latter Jumādā, A. H. 626 (May, A. C. 1229) we heard Ibn Dihyah read this work to al-Malik al-Mu'azzam, in six sittings. It concluded with a long poem, the first verse of which was :

1 Diḥyah Ibn Khalifah al-Kalbī was Muḥammad's envoy to Heraclius. Abu 'l-Fedā's Annals, year 7.

* M. de slane has used the word 'Ibn' between Muḥammad and al-Jumayyī which is against the autograph reading. The Cairo edition supports our version.—Ed.

"Were it not for our enemies, those base informers, people had never suspected (that we were in love)."

There is a circumstance connected with this poem which we have noticed in the life of Ibn Mammātī,<sup>1</sup> and to this we refer the reader. When he finished his Kitāb-al-Tanwīr, al-Malik al-Mu'azzam made him a gift of one thousand pieces of gold. A number of other works were composed by him. He was born on the first of Dhu'l-Qa'dah, A. H. 544 (March, A. C. 1150)*; and he died at Cairo, on Tuesday, the 14th of the first Rabi', A. H. 633 (November, A. C. 1235)†. He was interred at the foot of Mount <sup>1</sup> See no. 88. Ibn Dihyah's surname is there incorrectly given; it must be pronounced Dhu 'l-Nasabayn.

* 2 March,—Ed.

† 27 November,—Ed.

Muqattam, as I have been informed by his son; I was told also, by his brother's son, that he had his uncle more than once say that he was born on the first of Dhu'l-Qa'dah, A. H. 546 (February, A. C. 1152*). Balansi means belonging to Balansiya (Valencia) which is a city in the east of Spain. Abū 'Amr 'Uthmān Ibn al-Ḥasan, Ibn Dihya's elder brother, was well acquainted with the phraseology of the Desert Arabs, which he knew by heart and taught publicly. When the sultān al-Malik al-Kāmil removed Abū 'l-Khaṭṭāb Ibn Dihyah from his professorship in the Dār al-Ḥadīth (or college of Traditions), which that prince had founded at Cairo, Abū 'Amr, the brother, was installed in the vacant place, and he continued to hold it till his death. He died at Cairo, on Tuesday, the 13th of the first, Jumādā, A. H. 634 (January, A. C. 1237),† and was interred at the foot of Mount Muqattam. He left some epistles in which he employed obsolete expressions.

473 ABU 'ALĪ AL-SHALAWBINĪ.

Abū 'Alī 'Umar Ibn Muḥammad (Ibn 'Umar) Ibn 'Abd Allāh, surnamed al-Shalawbinī, was a member of the tribe of Azd, and a native of Seville, in Spain. He held the first rank as a grammarian, and possessed in an extraordinary degree the faculty of recalling to mind the various rules of that science. I met a number of his pupils, all of them men of talent, and they unanimously declared that the shaykh Abū 'Alī al-Shalawbinī was in no degree inferior to the shaykh Abū 'Alī 'l-Fārisī. The terms in which they spoke of him were commendatory in the highest degree; but they observed that, with all his talent, he neglected his personal appearance, and was subject to absence of mind. Of this they related as an example, that as he was one day on the bank of river, with some sheets of a book in his hand, he let one of them fall into water; and as it floated off so that he could not reach it with his hands, he took another of the sheets to pull it near him; so that both sheets were spoiled. Other similar anecdotes are related in proof of his absence of mind. He composed a large and a small commentary on al-Juzūlī's Prolegomena,<sup>1</sup> and a work on grammar, entitled al-Tawṭīyah (the beating out of the track). He resided at Seville, but pupils of his were occasionally arriving amongst us and informing us of his proceedings. On the whole, he really was, as they styled him, the last of the grammarians. He was born at Seville, A. H. 562 (A. C. 1166-7), and he died in the same city, in the month of the latter Rabi', some say of Šafar, A. H. 645 (August, A. C. 1247). Šhalawbīnī is derived from al-Šhalawbīn, which is a word of the Spanish language, and means, it is said, the white and red.<sup>2</sup>

---

* 9 February.—Ed.

† 13 January.—Ed.

474 IBN ṬABARZAD.

Abū Ḥaṣṣ 'Umar Ibn Abī Bakr Muḥammad Ibn Mu'ammār Ibn Aḥmad Ibn Yaḥyā Ibn Ḥasan, surnamed al-Muwaddib (the preceptor), Muwaffaq al-Dīn (aided in religion by God's favour), and generally known by the name of Ibn Ṭabarzad, was a Traditionist of great celebrity, and a native of Baghdād. He inhabited that quarter of that city, on the west bank of the Tigris, which is called Dār al-Qazz, and he was sometimes styled, for that reason, al-Dāraqazzi. The Traditions which he had received by oral transmission were remarkable as coming from the highest authorities, and, as he travelled through various countries teaching (them) to others, he became the link which connected the rising generation of Traditionists with the past; he filled the earth with

1 The life of al-Juzūlī will be found in this work.

2 Abu 'l-Feda says, in his Geography, that Šhalawbīn means belonging to Šhalawbīniyah (Salobrenna), a fortress near Granada. He adds that those persons are mistaken who derive it from a word signifying red in the language spoken by the (Christian) inhabitants of Spain. He here certainly alludes to the statement made by Ibn Kḥallikān in this passage.

the certificates which he gave to those who heard him deliver Traditions, and with the licences to teach, which he had granted to his disciples. He lived to so advanced an age that he remained without a rival, and his conduct was uniformly marked by piety and virtue. He was born in the month of Dhu 'l-Hijjah, A.H. 516 (February, A. C. 1123), and he died at Baghdād on the afternoon of Tuesday, the 9th of Rajab, A. H. 507 (December, A. C. 1210)*. The next morning he was interred in the cemetery at the Harb Gate.—Ṭabarazad is the name of a sort of sugar (sugarcandy).

475 AL-SHARAF IBN AL-FĀRIḌ

Abū Ḥafṣ, surnamed also Abu 'l-Qāsim, 'Umar Ibn Abi 'l-Hasan 'Alī Ibn Murshid Ibn 'Alī, generally known by the appellation of Ibn al-Fāriḍ and distinguished by the honorary title of al-Sharaf<sup>1</sup> drew his descent from a family which inhabited Ḥamāt, but he himself was born in Egypt, which was also the country of his residence, and that of his death. In his poetical works, of which the collection forms a thin volume, he displays a cast of style and thought which charms the reader by the grace and beauty, whilst their whole tenour is in accordance with the mystic ideas of the Ṣūfis<sup>2</sup>. He has composed also a qaṣīdah of about six hundred verses, wherein he sets forth the doctrines and adopts the technical language of that sect. With what elegance has he said, in one of his long poem.

"How welcome the favour which I never deserved : these words of one announcing deliverance after despair : 'To thee

---

1 Al-Sharaf is the equivalent of Sharaf al-Dīn (nobleness of religion). In surnames formed of the word al-Dīn preceded by a noun or an adjective, al-Dīn may be suppressed. In this case, the article is generally added to the preceding word. See M. de Sacy's Chrestomathie, tom. I. p. 448.

2 Literally : He follows the direction of the path of the faqīrs.

* 27 December,—Ed.

I bear good tidings, therefore cast off thy covering ! thou art remembered there (above) notwithstanding thy imperfections.<sup>1</sup> "

In another of his qaṣīdahs he says :

"I am always envied on account of (the favours I receive from) thee ; put not then an end to my watchfulness by the speedy visit of thy image fleeting (towards me whilst I sleep)<sup>2</sup>. Ask the stars of the night if sleep has ever visited my eyelids ! and how could it visit a person with whom it is not acquainted ?"

He says again in the same piece.

"Whilst the admirers of his beauty are extolling it in every style of description, time is spent out, and yet some of his charms remain to be described<sup>3</sup>."

He has left also some distichs, mawāliyyās<sup>4</sup> and enigmas<sup>5</sup>, I am told that he was most holy and virtuous man, and that he led a life of continual self-abnegation. During some time, motives of devotion kept him a resident at Makkah : may God increase it in honour ! He was a most pleasing companion, and the charms of his society were highly extolled. I have been informed by one of his disciples, that, one day, whilst he was alone, he happened to sing the following verse, composed by al-Ḥarīrī, the author of the Maqāmāt :

"Who is he who never wrought evil, and who possessed excellent qualities only ?"

1 The piece from which these lines are taken has been published by M. Grangeret de Lagrange in his anthologie arabe. Respecting these verses, a curious anecdote is related by the commentator, and will be found page 130 of M. de Lagrange's work.

2 He means to say : I always keep awake in expectation of thy visits ; oblige me not to forego my watchfulness, for then, in my dreams, I should see thy image only, sent by thyself to visit me, and not see thyself. See my Introduction to vol. I. For the meaning of the very obscure verses cited by Ibn Khallikān in this article, I have consulted Ibn al-Fāriḍ's commentators and chosen the most probable of the various interpretations which they give.

3 It is almost unnecessary to observe that, in all these verses, the beloved is the divinity.

4 See vol. I. Introduction.

5 Some of the enigmas are given by M. de Sacy in his Chrestomathie, and others by M. Grangeret de Lagrange in his Anthologie arabe.

And he heard a voice repeat these words, but could not discover by whom they were uttered :

"Muḥammad, the director ; upon whom Gabriel descended."

Some of his disciples recited to me the following mawāliyā of his, composed on a youth who followed the trade of a butcher ; it is very igneniously done ; and I have not seen it in the collection of his works<sup>1</sup>.

"I said to a butcher : I love you, yet you cut me to pieces and slay me. That, replied he, is my trade, and yet you blame me ! He then bent towards me and kissed my foot to subjugate me ; he wanted to kill me, and blew me (enchanted me) that he might skin me."

I have transcribed it according to their system (of pronunciation), as they have totally neglected the motions (final vowels) and the rules of orthography ; any more, they have committed faults of pronunciation ; or rather, the greater part of it is faulty : the reader is therefore requested to withhold his blame<sup>2</sup>. Ibn al-Fāriḍ relates that he composed the following verses in his sleep :

"I swear by the reality of my love for thee and by the respect due to (me for my) dignified patience (under suffering), that my eyes never looked on any but thee, and that I never felt love for any other friend !"

This poet was born at Cairo on the 4th of Dhū 'l-Qa'dah, A. H. 576 (March, A.C. 1181)* and he died in the same city, on Tuesday, the 2nd of the first Jumādā, A. H. 632 (January, A. C. 1235)†. The next morning, he was interred at the foot of Mount

1 Were it not for the curiosity of these verses, which are vulgar in Arabic, I should have abstained from translating them.

2 Ibn Khallikān writes : تشرحنى و ير بختنى where I have printed تشرحنى and ير بختنى which last words give the true reading قلتو is for قلت ; لجزا' , or , as he writes it لجرر . , is for لجزار ; مل is for مال , and بس for باس .

* 22 March, —Ed.

† 23 January, —Ed.

Muqaṭṭam. Al-Fāriḍ is the name given to the person who draws up contracts (furūd) for women in their dealing, with men<sup>1</sup>.

476 TAQĪ AL-DĪN 'UMAR, PRINCE OF ḤAMĀT.

Abū Sa'īd 'Umar, the son of Nūr al-Dawlat Shāhanshāh (no. 273), was lord of Ḥamāt, and bore the surnames of al-Malik al-Muzaḥḥar (the victorious prince), Taqī al-Dīn (pious in religion). His father, Shāhanshāh, was brother to the Sultān Ṣalāh al-Dīn. Taqī al-Dīn 'Umar was brave and intrepid, successful in his wars, victorious in his engagements, renowned for his conflicts with the Franks<sup>2</sup>, and his glorious deeds in battle are signalized by history. In all the various works of piety, he displayed every excellence, and of these we need only mention one: the founding of the college at Old Cairo, which bears the name of Manāzil al-'Izz<sup>3</sup>, and which is said to have been previously his own place of residence. For the support of this establishment, he erected a large property into a waqf<sup>4</sup>. The city and province of al-Fayyūm were held by him in fief, and he founded there two colleges, one for the *Shāfi*tes, and the other for *Mālik*ites: on these also he

1 Fāriḍ is therefore the active participle of the verb faraḍa, and must be pronounced with an i, not with an a, as Ibn Khalikān states in his autograph; most probably through inattention. Indeed, the form فاعل as participle of adjective does not exist in Arabic, as I can discover, and we find in the notice on Ibn al-Fāriḍ, prefixed to the commentary on his works, some verses in which his name al-Fāriḍ is made to rhyme with al-'Āriḍ, al-Ġhamiḍ, and others active participles. For further information respecting Ibn al-Fāriḍ, see M. de Sacy's Chrestomathie, tom. II., M. Grangeret de Lagrange's Anthologie arabe, and the Catalogus MSS. orient. Bible. Bodl.

2 In the printed text read دوائمه. Taqī al-Dīn particularly signalized himself at the battle of Tiberias in A. H. 583, when the Christian army was almost exterminated.

3 The place called Manāzil al-'Irz was built on the bank of the Nile by the mother of the *ḫ*alīf al-'Azīz bi-Allāh, and served the Fatimide *ḫ*alīfs as a place of recreation (nuzḥah). (Al-Maqrīzī's Ḫitāṭ.)

4 See no. 21 note on waqf settled large waqfs. Another college was erected by him in the city of Edessa. He was also sovereign of the Eastern provinces (Mesopotamia). In his conduct towards the learned (in the law), the Şūfis (faqīrs), and the men of holy life, he manifested great beneficence. He acted at one period as viceroy of Egypt, during the absence of his uncle Şalāḥ al-Dīn; the circumstance which led to his appointment was the following: Al-Malik al-ʿĀdil held the government of Egypt as lieutenant to his brother, Şalḥ al-Dīn; but, in the month of Rajab, A. H. 579 (Oct. - Nov., A. C. 1183), that prince, who was then besieging al-Karak<sup>1</sup>, required his presence with that of the troops under his orders, and Taqī al-Dīn, being sent to Egypt to replace him, arrived there towards the middle of the month of Şhaʿbān. He was afterwards recalled to Syria by Şalāḥ al-Dīn, who appointed his own son al-Malik al-ʿAziz (no. 398) to the viceroyalty of Egypt. Taqī al-Dīn's feelings were so deeply hurt at his proceedings that he resolved to go forth into Maghrib and conquer that country; but this project was strongly opposed by his friends, and he finally acceded to the request of his uncle, Şalāḥ al-Dīn, who had invited him to come and serve under him. The Sulṭān went forth as far as Marj al-Şuffar<sup>2</sup> to receive him, and they met there on the 23rd of Şhaʿbān, A. H. 582 (Nov., A. C. 1186).* Şalāḥ al-Dīn derived great pleasure from the sight of his nephew, and bestowed on him the city of Ḥamāt. Taqī al-Dīn proceeded thither, and, reached afterwards into the province of Khilāt, with the intention of taking the castle of Manāzgird. The siege had continued for some time, when he died on Friday, the 19th of Ramaḍān, A. H. 587 (October, A. C. 1191)†. This statement has been contradicted, however, by persons who declare that he died at a place between Khilāt and Mayyāfāriqīn. His body was transported to Ḥamāt for interment. His son, al-Malik al-Manşūr (the victorious prince) Nāşir al-Dīn (the champion of the faith) Abu 'l-Ma'ālī Muḥammad

1 See M. Riensud's Extraits relatifs aux Croisades, pp. 187 and 189.

2 Marj al-Şuffar lies a short distance from Damascus.

* 8 November—Ed.

† 11 October—Ed.

was appointed his successor. This prince died at Ḥamāt, on Monday, the 22nd of Dhu 'l-Qa'dah, A. H. 617 (January, A.C. 1221).<sup>1*</sup>

477 ABU ISHĀQ AL-SABĪ'I.

Abu Ishāq 'Amr† Ibn 'Abd Allāh Ibn Aḥmad Ibn Dhi Yaḥmud Ibn al-Sabī', surnamed al-Sabī'i, was a member of the tribe of Ḥamdān, a native of Kūfah, and one of the principal Tābi'is, having seen 'Alī, Ibn 'Abbās, Ibn 'Umar, and others of the Prophet's companions. Traditions were handed down on his authority by al-A'mash (no. 259), Shu'bah (no. 207 note, on Shu'bah), al-Thawri (no. 254), and others; and a great quantity of traditional information was communicated by him to his disciples. He was born three years before the Khalif 'Uthmān's death<sup>2</sup>, and he died A. H. 127 (A. C. 744-5); and others say 128 or 129; but Yaḥya Ibn Ma'in<sup>3</sup> and al-Madā'ini<sup>4</sup> mention that his death took place A. H. 132. Sabī'i means descended from Sabī', who himself drew his origin from the tribe of Ḥamdān. Abū Ishāq al-Sabī'i relates as follows: "My father held me up that I might see 'Alī Ibn Abi Ṭālib preach, and (I perceived that) his hair and his beard were white."<sup>4</sup>

478 'AMR IBN 'UBAYD

Abū 'Uthmān 'Amr Ibn 'Ubayd Ibn Bāb, a celebrated ascetic and a scholastic theologian, was a mawlā to the Banū 'Aqīl, a

1 This Muḥammad was the paternal grandfather of the geographer and historian, Abu 'l-Fedā.

2 'Uthmān was murdered in the month of Dhu 'l-Hijjah, A. H. 35 (June, A. C. 656).

3 His life is given by Ibn Khallikān.

4 See no. 183 note on al-Madā'ini.

* 16 January—Ed.

† M. de Slane gives 'Umar, Cairo edition also follows him,—Ed.

family which drew its descent from 'Arādah Ibn Yarbū' Ibn Mālik. His father Bāb was one of the prisoners taken at Kabul<sup>1</sup>, a place situated in the mountains of Sind. His father acted as lieutenant<sup>2</sup> to the (successive) chiefs of the police guards at Baṣrah, and the people used to say, when they saw his son 'Amr with him: "There goes Best-of-men, the son of Worst-of-men!" on which the father would reply: "You speak truly; this is Abraham, and I am 'Āzar<sup>3</sup>. On being told that his son frequented the society of al-Ḥasan al-Baṣrī (no. 148), and that some good might therefore come of him, he exclaimed: "What good can come of my son? his mother was a captive fraudulently purloined from the common-wealth<sup>4</sup>, and it is I who am his father." 'Amr was the chief of Motazilite sect in that age; we shall relate, in the life of Wāṣil Ibn 'Aṭā, the motive which induced him to secede, and the reason why his followers were named Motazilites (seceders). 'Amr was of a light complexion, a middle size, and marked between the eyes with a callosity produced by his frequent prostrations in prayer. Al-Ḥasan al-Baṣrī was once asked his opinion respecting him,

---

1 The autograph has كابل (Kābil) but I suspect كابل (Kābul) is meant.

The passage is written in the margin of that manuscript, and in Ibn Khallikān's own hand.

2 Read يخلف .

3 According to the Muslim doctrine, Abraham's father bore the name of 'Āzar. He and all his people adored idols, and for this he was reprehended by his son, who said to him: Verily, I perceive that thou and thy people are in a manifest error. (Qur'ān, sūrat 6, verse 74). The father of 'Amr Ibn 'Ubayd seems to have alluded to these words, and thus told indirectly his townsmen that they were all reprobates.

4 According to the Muslim law, the booty and slaves carried from an enemy's country must be delivered up by the soldiers to the chief. The spoil and prisoners are then shared amongst all the persons in the army after the reservation of the quint, or fifth of the whole, for the use of the poor. The booty obtained even by the smallest detachment of the army must not be reserved by the captors; the law requires imperiously that it should be joined to the general mass. It is not therefore to be wondered at, if the captors sometimes concealed their prisoners and spoil for their own advantage. 'Amr Ibn 'Ubayd's mother had been embezzled in this manner, and his father imagined that no good could come to property so ill gotten.

and he replied in these terms : "You question me concerning a man who seems to have been educated by angels, and brought up by the prophets ; if he rises to perform a task, his mind is impressed therewith when he sits down ; and when he sits down with a resolution, he rises, with the same ; if he be ordered to do a work, he is the most assiduous of men therein ; and if he be prohibited from anything, he is the most strict of men in abstaining therefrom ; I never saw an exterior so similar to the interior as his ; nor an interior so similar to the exterior." Before Abū Ja'far al-Manşūr's elevation to the khalīfate, 'Amr Ibn 'Ubayd had been his companion and intimate friend, and many anecdotes are related of their sittings and conversations : when al-Manşūr came to the throne, 'Amr went one day into his presence, and was told by him to draw near and sit down, after which the khalīf asked to hear an exhortation from him. 'Amr acceded to his request, and addressed him an admonition, in which he said, amongst other things : "The power which thou now wieldest, had it remained in the hands of thy predecessors, had never come unto thee ; be warned then of that night which shall give birth to a day never more to be followed by another night." When he rose to depart al-Manşūr said : "We have ordered thee ten thousand pieces of silver." "I stand not in need thereof;" replied 'Amr. "By Allāh ! thou shalt take it," exclaimed the khalīf. "By Allāh ! I shall not take it ;" answered the other. On this al-Manşūr's son, al-Mahdī, who happened to be present, said to 'Amr : "The Commander of the faithful swears that a thing shall be done ; and yet thou art bold enough to swear that it shall not !" "Who is this youth ?" said 'Amr, turning to al-Manşūr. "He is the declared successor to the khalīfate, my son al-Mahdī," replied the prince. "Thou hast clothed him in raiment," said 'Amr, "which is not the raiment of the righteous, and thou hast given him a name which he deserveth not<sup>1</sup>, and thou hast smoothed for him a path wherein the more profit the less the heed." He then turned towards al-Mahdī, and addressed him thus : "Yes, I do so, O son of my brother ! when thy father maketh an oath,

1 Mahdī is the passive participle of the verb ahda (to direct), and signifies, when used as a surname, the well-directed, or the well-guided.

thy uncle causes him to perjure ; for thy father is abler to pay the expiation of broken oaths than is thy uncle<sup>1</sup>." Al-Manşūr then asked him if there was any thing which he might require, and 'Amr made answer : "Send not for me, but wait till I come to thee." "In that case," said al-Manşūr, "thou wilt never meet me." "That," replied 'Amr, "is precisely what I desire." He then withdrew, and al-Manşūr kept his eyes fixed upon him and said ;

"All of you walk with stealthy steps ; all of you are in pursuit of prey ; all, except 'Amr Ibn 'Ubayd !"

'Amr composed some epistles ; and sermons ; he drew up also an explanation of the Qur'ān, in the words of al-Ḥasan al-Baṣrī ; a refutation of the Qadarite sect ; long discourse on the doctrine of justice and the profession of God's unity<sup>2</sup> ; with other treatises besides. When his last hour drew near, he said to a friend : "Death has come unto me, and I am not prepared to receive it." He then exclaimed: "Thou knowest, O Almighty God ! that whenever two things were presented to my choice, one of them pleasing to Thee and the other to myself, I always preferred Thy pleasure to my own satisfaction ; have therefore mercy on me !" His birth took place A. H. 80 (A. C. 699-700), and he died A. H. 144 (A. C. 761-2), ; others say 142 or 143, or 148. He expired at a place called al-Marrān, on his return from<sup>3</sup> Makkah. Al-Manşūr composed the following elegy on his death :

"May God's blessing be on thee who art reposing in the tomb by which I passed, at Marrān ! a tomb containing an orthodox believer, who placed his faith in God and served him from conviction. Did time ever spare the life of a saint, he would have spared us that of 'Amr Abū 'Uthmān."

That a khalif should thus lament the death of a person beneath him in rank is a circumstance unparalleled. Marrān is a place between Makkah and Baṣrah, at two days' journey from the 1 See no. 24 note on 'adl.

2 These were the chief points of the Motazelite doctrine.

3 Read ٤ in the printed text.

former city. There also was interred Tamīm Ibn Murr, that the name of his grandfather Bāb (باب) is sometimes incorrectly written Nāb (ناب).

479 SIBAWAYH.

Abū Bishr 'Amr Ibn 'Uthmān Ibn Qanbar surnamed Sibawayh, a mawla to the family of Hārith Ibn Ka'b or (according to another statement) to the family of al-Rabi' Ibn Zayd al-Hārithī--was a learned grammarian, and surpassed in this science every person of former and latter times : as for his Kitāb, or Book, composed by him on that subject, it has never had its equal. Speaking of this work one day, al-Jāhiz said : "Never was the like of such a book written on grammar, and the books of other men have drawn their substance from it." He said another time : "Having formed the design of visiting Muḥammad Ibn 'Abd al-Malik al-Zayyāt, the wazīr of al-Mu'taṣim, I considered what present I should offer him, and could find none more precious than the Kitāb of Sibawayh. On my arrival, I said to him : 'I have not been able to find any thing to offer you equal to this book ; I bought it after the demise of al-Farrā', at the sale of his property. 'By Allāh !' exclaimed the wazīr, 'you could not present me with anything more pleasing to me.' " I read (however, another account of this interview) in a historical work, where it is stated that al-Jāhiz, on arriving at the wazīr's with the book of Sibawayh, informed him of the circumstance before offering it. On this Ibn al-Zayyāt said to him : "Did you think that our libraries were without this book ?" and al-Jāhiz replied ; "I did not think so ; but this copy is in the handwriting of al-Farrā' ; it had been collated by al-Kisā'i<sup>2</sup>, and corrected by 'Amr Ibn Baḥr ;" meaning himself. "It is the best and most precious copy in existence ;" said the wazīr. Al-Jāhiz then produced, it, and Ibn al-Zayyāt

1 The life of al-Farrā' will be found in this work.

2 See no. 408.

manifested such joy in receiving it as proved how highly he appreciated the gift. Sibawayh acquired his grammatical information from al-Khalil Ibn Aḥmad (no. 208), 'Isā Ibn 'Umar, Yūnus Ibn Ḥabīb<sup>1</sup>, and others : and learned philology from Abu 'l-Khaṭṭāb, surnamed al-Akhfash al-Akbar<sup>2</sup>, and other masters. Ibn al-Naṭṭāḥ<sup>3</sup> relates that, being one day with al-Khalil Ibn Aḥmad, Sibawayh came in ; on which al-Khalil said : "Welcome to a visitor whose company is never tiresome !" And Abū 'Amr al-Makhzūmī, who had often sat in al-Khalil's society, remarked that he never heard him say the same thing to any other person but Sibawayh. At the time in which al-Kisā'i was preceptor to al-Amin, the son of Hārūn al-Rashīd, Sibawayh happened to arrive at Baghdād from Baṣrah, and they were both brought together : in this meeting, they had a discussion of which it would be too long to give the particulars : Al-Kisā'i pretended that the Arabs of the desert would say : I thought that the wasp stung more severely than the bee, and behold ! it was (fa idhā hua iyyāha).<sup>4</sup> Sibawayh here observed that the example was not as al-Kisā'i gave it, and that it should be fa idhā hua hiya (et ecce ! illud est illa res). After a long dispute on this point, they agreed to refer it to a genuine Arab of the desert, speaking a language unmixed with that used by the towns-people. Al-Amin, who was extremely partial to al-Kisā'i, because he had been his preceptor

1 The lives of 'Isā Ibn 'Umar and Yūnus Ibn Ḥabīb are given in this work.

2 See no. 412.

3 Abū Wā'il Bakr Ibn an-Naṭṭāḥ Ibn Ḥimār al-Ḥanafī was distinguished as a poet in the reign of Hārūn al-Rashīd. He settled at Baghdād and frequented the society of Abū 'l-'Atāhiyah and his companions. Abū 'l-'Atāhiyah composed an elegy on his death. (The Khaṭīb's abridged History of Baghdād ; MS. No. 634, fol. 78).

4 Literally ; Et ecce (fuit) illud illam (rem). The question was, whether in Arabic the particle idhā governs the subject in the nominative and the predicate in the accusative, or not. It is certain that both terms are governed by it (as the Arabs say) in the nominative. The anecdote is related more fully by Ibn Hiṣhām, and M. de Sacy has extracted it from the work of the latter author and inserted it in his Anthologie Grammaticale, page 199 at seq. He gives there also an extract from Sibawayh's celebrated Kitāb.

caused an Arab to be brought in, and questioned him on the subject but the reply was in accordance with Sibawayh's assertion. On this, he told the Arab that they wished him to give the phrase as al-Kisā'i had done, but the man observed that, in such a case, he could not master his own tongue, which would certainly pronounce the right expression notwithstanding his effort to the contrary. They then proposed to him that a person should say : "Sibawayh said so and so, and al-Kisā'i said so and so ; which of them is right ?" and that to this he should answer : "Al-Kisā'i is right." "That," said the Arab, "is a thing which can be done." A meeting was then held at which all the principal grammarians were assembled, and, the Arab being brought in, the question was presented to him in that form. He immediately answered ; "Al-Kisā'i is right, and it is thus the Arabs of the desert say it." Sibawayh perceived by this that they had all conspired against him through partiality for al-Kisā'i and he left Baghdād, filled with indignation at the treatment he had received. He then proceeded to the province of Fārs and died at a village near Shīrāz, called al-Bayḍā, in the year 180 (A. C. 796-7) ; some say 177. He was then aged between forty and fifty. Ibn Qānī<sup>2</sup> states that he died at Baṣrah, A. H. 161, or according to another account, in 188 ; whilst the ḥāfiẓ Abu 'l-Faraj Ibn al-Jawzī places his death in A. H. 194, at the age of thirty-two years, and in the town of Sāwah<sup>2</sup> ; but the Khaṭīb declares, in his History of Baghdād, on the authority of Ibn Durayd, that Sibawayh died at Shīrāz, and that his tomb is there. Some say that it was his birth which took place at al-Bayḍā, not his death. Abū Sa'īd al-Ṭuwāl mentions that he saw inscribed on the tomb of Sibawayh the following verses by Ibn Yazīd al-'Adawī :

"The friends are departed whose visits thou didst receive so often ; far from the place of meeting are they now ! they have retired and abandoned thee for ever ! They have left thee desolate in the wilderness : they soothed thee not, neither did they dispel thy care. The decree of fate has been accomplished, and now thy

1 See no. 149 note on Ibn Qānī'.

2 Sāwah lay betwix Ray and Hamadān.

sole possession is a tomb, but thy friends have turned away and left thee."

Mention being made of Sibawayh in the presence of Mu'āwiyah Ibn Bkr al-'Ulaymī, he said: "I saw him when he was a young man; and I was told that at that time, none possessed a more complete acquaintance than he with the information which had been transmitted by at-Khalil Ibn Aḥmad. I heard him discourse, and argue points of grammar; he had an impediment in his speech, and when I (afterwards) looked over his book, I perceived that his pen expressed his ideas better than his tongue." "Sibawayh was a boy," said Abu Zayd<sup>1</sup> al-Anṣārī, "when he attended my lectures; he wore at that time two locks of hair which hung down over his shoulders; and whenever you hear him say: 'I learned from a person in whose knowledge of pure Arabic I have great confidence, "you must know that he means me." Sibawayh used frequently to recite the following verse:

"When a man recovers from illness, he thinks he is safe; but he bears within himself the malady of which he is to die."

In Ṣibawayh the last letter is an h (•); it is a Persian surname, and means scent of the apple. It is thus that Arabic scholars pronounced this word and others of a similar form, such as Niṣṭawayh, Amrawayh, etc; but the Persians say Sibūyah, being averse to terminating the name with the word wayh (alas!) because it is used in lamentations. Ibrāhīm al-Ḥarbi<sup>2</sup> says; He was called Sibawayh because he had cheeks like apples and was extremely handsome."

480 ABŪ 'AMR IBN AL-'ALĀ.

Abū 'Amr Ibn al-'Alā, a member of the tribe of Māzin which is a branch of that of Tamīm, and a native of Baṣrah, was one of the seven great Qur'ān readers. His father al-'Alā, was the son of 'Ammār Ibn al-'Uryān Ibn 'Abd Allāh Ibn al-Ḥusayn. I found among my rough notes, and in my own handwriting his genealogy set forth thus: "Abū 'Amr Ibn al-'Alā Ibn 'Ammār Ibn 'Abd Allāh Ibn al-Ḥusayn Ibn al-Ḥārith Ibn Julhum Ibn Khuzā'i Ibn Māzin Ibn Mālik Ibn 'Amr Ibn Tamīm; some say that Julhum was the son of Ḥujr Ibn Khuzā'i, and that his real name was al-'Uryān." Abū 'Amr was the most learned of men in the sacred Qur'ān, the Arabic language, and poetry; as a grammarian, he ranked in the fourth generation from 'Alī Ibn Abī Ṭālib<sup>1</sup>. It is related by al-Aṣma'ī that he heard Abū 'Amr say: "I know more grammar than al-A'maṣh (no. 259) ever did; and were my grammatical information put down in writing, he would not be able to lift it." He said also: "I proposed to Abū 'Amr one thousand grammatical queries, and he furnished me with one thousand examples decisive of these questions." Abū 'Amr already held a high rank among his contemporaries in the lifetime of al-Ḥasan al-Baṣrī (no. 148), and Abū 'Ubaydah<sup>2</sup> declared him the most learned of men in philology, grammar, poetry, and the Qur'ān. The books containing the expressions which he had written down from the lips of the purest speakers among the Arabs of the desert nearly filled one of his rooms up to the ceiling, but when he took to reading (the Qur'ān), that is, when he commenced the practice of devotion, he threw them all away, and, when he returned to the study of his old science, he possessed nothing on it except what he had learned by heart. The greater part of his (philological) information was derived from Arabs who were already living before the promulgation of Islamism. Al-Aṣma'ī said: "I frequented Abū 'Amr's sittings for ten years, and during that time I never heard him quote a single verse of those composed subsequently to the promulgation of Islamism, in support (of his philological and grammatical doctrines)." He said, another time: "It was of Abū 'Amr Ibn al-'Alā that al-Farazdaq said:

1 The manuscripts are wrong here; we must read أبو زيد . see no. 245 .

2 See no. 19 note on al-Ḥarbi.

1 It was 'Alī Ibn Abī Ṭālib who laid down the first principles of Arabic grammar. See no. 285 note on Arabic Grammar.

2 His life is given in this work.

"I ceased not opening and shutting doors (in search of knowledge), till I went to Abu 'l-'Alā Ibn 'Ammār."

It is certain that the ordinary surname Abū 'Amr was his real name, although some pretend that he was called Zabbān, and others mention other names. He drew his descent from Khuzā'i Ibn Māzin, and, according to one of the traditional accounts of his genealogy, he was the son of al-'Alā Ibn 'Ammār Ibn 'Abd Allāh Ibn al-Ḥuṣayn Ibn al-Ḥārith Ibn Julhum Ibn Khuzā'i Ibn Māzin Ibn Mālik Ibn 'Amr Ibn Tamīm; but some say that Julhum was son of Ḥujr Ibn al-Khuzā'i: God best knows the truth! The following anecdote was related by Abū 'Amr: "Al-Ḥājjāj Ibn Yūsuf al-Ṭaḡafī had caused search to be made for my father, who, in consequence, fled to Yaman, we were overtaken by a person who recited this verse:

'Often our hearts reject a thing which would have brought deliverance (farjah) like the undoing of bonds.'

"My father then asked him: 'What news?, and he answered; 'Al-Ḥājjāj is dead.' But I was more delighted to hear the word farjah (with which I was not acquainted before) than to hear of the death of al-Ḥājjāj. My father then said: 'Let us turn our camels towards Baṣrah.'" "I asked Abū 'Amr," said Abū 'Ubaydah, "what age he was at that time? and he replied: 'I had then strangled (i. e., outlived) more than twenty years!'" Farjah signifies the separation between two things; and furjah, the separation between two mountains. The passage which follows is taken from the Ṭabaqāt al-Nuḥāt, or classified list of the grammarians<sup>1</sup>: "Al-Aṣma'i relates that Abū 'Amr Ibn al-'Ala said, in speaking of these words of the Prophet's: A person causing miscarriage must redeem his crime by bestowing a male or a female slave (fi 'l-janīn ghurratun 'abdun aw amatun)<sup>2</sup>, that, unless the Prophet had meant to express some idea by the word ghurrah (al-bedo), he would have said: Fi 'l-janīn 'abdun aw amatun<sup>3</sup>; but he really did mean the 1 Ḥājjī Khalīfah notices a number of works bearing this title. I suspect that it was the one by al-Mubarrad from which the following extract is taken.

2 The Arabic words translated literally would run thus: Pro faetu, albedo servi aut uncillae (detur).

3 Literally: Pro faetu, servus aut ancilla.

white colour, and that none but a white male or female slave should be received as the price of redemption; forbidding thus the accepting of a black male or female slave for that object!'' This is a strange opinion, and I am unable to say whether it concords or not with that of any of the mujtahid Imāms<sup>1</sup>; I give it here merely on account of its singularity. In the same book we read that al-Aṣma'i said; "I asked Abū 'Amr Ibn al-'Alā if the Arabs of the desert made any distinction between the fourth and the second form of the verb rahaba (to fear), and he replied: 'The two are not equivalent.' I then said: 'The second form must mean to frighten greatly, and the fourth to make fear enter the heart'<sup>2</sup>; on which he observed that the person who knew the difference died thirty years before."<sup>3</sup> Ibn Munādhīr<sup>4</sup> said: I asked Abū 'Amr Ibn al-'Alā till what period of life a man should continue acquiring learning? And he made answer: 'It befits him to do so as long as his life lasts.'" Abū 'Amr states that he received the following relation from Qatādah al-Sadūsī<sup>5</sup>: When the first copy of the Qur'ān was written out and presented to (the khalif) 'Uthmān Ibn 'Affān, he said: 'There are faults of language in it, and let the Arabs of the desert rectify them with their tongues.'<sup>6</sup>' It was Abū 'Amr's (pious) custom not to pronounce a single verse from the beginning of the month of Ramaḍān to the end of it. He spent every day a penny for anew (and therefore a pure) pitcher to drink out of that day, and another penny for a nosegay; when he had done with the pitcher, he gave

1 See Introduction.

2 The second form of the verb rahab رهب does not signify to frighten, and al-Aṣma'i seems merely to have intended to obtain Abu 'l-'Alā's opinion on the subject, by hazarding a conjectural signification.

3 He probably alludes to al-Ḥajjāj Ibn Yūsuf (no. 144), who died A. H. 95, and was considered as one of the most elegant and correct speakers of the age. Abu 'l-'Alā abstains from uttering his name, to avoid the necessity of saying after it, Raḍīya Allāh 'anhu (May God show favour to him), which formula is always pronounced when the name of a deceased Muslim is mentioned, 4 See no. 127 note on Ibn Munādhīr.

5 His life will be found in this work.

6 That is: Let them pronounce the word right, but not attempt to correct it in the written copy.

it to his family, and every evening he would order his maid to dry the nosegay and throw the fragments of the flowers into the water-skins (to perfume them). Yūnus Ibn Ḥabīb, the grammarian, relates as follows: "I heard Abū 'Amr Ibn al-'Alā say: "I never interpolated the poems of the desert Arabs but with one single verse, and that was:

'She rejected me, yet nothing displeased her, of all the effects of time, except my grey beard and bald head.'

" 'And this verse is still extant in a celebrated poem, composed by al-A'shā.' "1 Abu 'Ubaydah relates as follows: Abū 'Amr Ibn al-'Alā went to Sulaymān Ibn 'Alī, the uncle of al-Saffāh, and this prince asked him a question to which Abū 'Amr answered, stating the truth; Sulaymān was by no means pleased with his frankness, and Abū 'Amr being vexed at this, left the room, reciting these lines as he went out:

'I disdain to humble myself before princes, even though they honour me and place me near them; when I spoke truth to them, I had to dread their anger, and had I told them lies, I should have pleased them.' "

The following anecdote was related by 'Alī Ibn Muḥammad Ibn Sulaymān al-Nawfalī: I heard my father say to Abū 'Amr Ibn al-'Alā. Tell me of the work you composed on that subject which you call arabism; does it contain all the language of the desert Arabs? ' Abū 'Amr answered that it did not, and my father then said: 'How do you manage when the Arabs furnish you with examples contrary to your own rules?' To this Abū 'Amr replied: 'I follow the majority of the cases and call the rest dialects.' "

The anecdote related of Abū 'Amr are very numerous. He was born at Makkah, A. H. 70 (A. C. 689-90); some say A. H. 65; and he died at Kūfah, A. H. 154 (A. C. 770-1); other accounts, however, place his death in A. H. 159, and 157, and 156. He had gone to Syria to solicit the benevolence of the governor of Damascus, 'Abd al-Wahhāb, the son of Ibrāhīm the imām<sup>2</sup>, and he expired on his return to Kūfah. Ibn Qutaybah asserts, however, that he died on his way to Syria, but in this he is pronounced to be mistaken; and a certain transmitter of traditional knowledge declares that he saw Abū Amr's tomb at Kūfah, having these words inscribed on it: "This is the tomb of Abū 'Amr Ibn al-'Ala. When his last hour drew near, he experienced a succession of fainting fits; and as he was recovering from one of them, he perceived his son Bishr shedding tears, on which he said: 'Why do you weep, now that eighty-four years have passed over me?'" The following elegiac lines were composed on his death by 'Abd Allāh Ibn al-Muqaffa':<sup>1</sup>

1 See M. de Sacy's Chrestomathie, vol. II, page 471.

2 Further notice is taken of 'Abd al-Wahhāb at the end of this article.

*["We have lost Abū 'Amr, and none like him survives! O how the strokes of misfortune stun him who is afflicted!] Thou hast departed and left a void among us which we can never hope to see filled up; but thy loss procures us one advantage every new misfortune will find us insensible to affliction."

Some say, however, that this elegy was composed by him on Yaḥyā Ibn Ziyād Ibn 'Ubayd Allāh Ibn 'Abd Allāh Ibn 'Abd al-Madān<sup>2</sup> al-Hārithī al-Kūfī, a poet of celebrity and a maternal cousin of al-Ṣaffāḥ, the first Abbaside khalīf. Others again mention that Ibn al-Muqaffa' composed it on 'Abd al-Karīm Ibn Abi 'l-'Awjā,<sup>3</sup> but the first opinion is that generally held. These verses have been also attributed to Muḥammad, the son of 'Abd Allāh Ibn al-Muqaffa'. I shall now observe that if this elegy was made on Abū 'Amr Ibn al-'Alā, it could not have been composed by 'Abd Allāh Ibn al-Muqaffa', for he died before Abū 'Amr; but it is possible that it was written by his son, and it is generally believed to refer to Abū 'Amr. Although Abū 'Amr be merely a surname, I have placed Abū 'Amr Ibn al-'Ala's life under this letter for the reason already stated in the life of Abū Bakr Ibn 'Abd al-Raḥmān (no. 114), and to that article I shall therefore refer the reader. As for the 'Abd al-Wahhāb of whom mention

1 See no. 183.

2 It appears from the Qāmūs that al-Madān was the name of an idol. See also Pocock's specimen, second edition, page 104.

3 The autograph has العوجا.

* From 'we' to 'afflicted' not in the autograph—Ed.

has been made in this notice, we may here state that he was the son of the Ibrāhīm, generally denominated al-Imām, whose name occurs in the life of his father Muḥammad Ibn 'Alī Ibn 'Abd Allāh Ibn al-'Abbās'. 'Abd al-Wahhāb was the governor of Syria in the name of his uncle al-Manṣūr, but this prince felt so apprehensive of his ulterior projects that when he lay at the point of death near the Well of Maymūn, at the gate of Makkah, he said to his chamberlain al-Rabī' Ibn Yūnus (no. 223): "The only person (whose intentions) I fear is the governor of Syria, 'Abd al-Wahhāb, the son of Ibrāhīm the Imām"! He then raised his hands towards heaven and exclaimed: "Almighty God! deliver me from 'Abd al-Wahhāb"! "When al-Manṣūr expired," said al-Rabī' Ibn Yūnus, "I lowered his body into the grave, and I had just placed the tombstone over it, when I heard a voice from the interior of it pronounce these words: 'Abd al-Wahhāb is dead, and the prayer is fulfilled.' I was struck with terror at this occurrence, and six or seven days afterwards, intelligence was brought of 'Abd al-Wahhāb's death." It is Ibn Badrān who relates this anecdote in his commentary on the qaṣīdah of Ibn 'Abdūn, which begins with these words:

"After (inflicting) the reality (of misfortune), time still torments (us) with the traces of it."

He introduces the story when explaining the following verse:

"Time struck with dread each Māmūn (tutus) and Mūtamin (securus), and it betrayed each Manṣūr (victor) and Muntaṣir (adjutus)<sup>2</sup>."

481 AL-JĀḤIẒ.

Abū 'Uthmān 'Amr Ibn Baḥr Ibn Maḥbūb al-Kinānī al-Laythī, generally known by the surname of al-Jāḥiẓ and a native of <sup>1</sup> See also no. 347.

<sup>2</sup> The Māmūn here mentioned is the khalīf. His brother Mūtamin was designed as his successor by al-Raḡhā, but this nomination al-Māmūn set aside on the death of al-Amīn. Manṣūr was the second Abbaside khalīf, and Muntaṣir was the son and successor of al-Mutawakkil.

[The figure of speech employed in this verse is. ايها تناسب.]

Baṣrah, was a man celebrated for his learning and author of numerous works on every branch of science. He composed a discourse on the fundamentals of religion, and an offset of the Mu'tazilite sect was called al-Jāhīziyyah after him. He had been a disciple of Abū Ishāq Ibrāhīm Ibn Sayyār al-Balkhī, surnamed al-Nazzām,<sup>1</sup> and was maternal uncle to Yamūt Ibn al-Muzarra', a person whose life we shall give. One of his finest and most instructive works is the Kitāb al-Ḥaywān (book of animals), as it contains every sort of curious information. The same may be said of his Kitāb al-Bayān wa'l-Tabyīn, (distinction and exposition).<sup>2</sup> His productions are extremely numerous, and his talents are fully recognised; but he was deformed in person, and the prominence of his eyes, which seemed to be starting out of his head, procured him the surnames of al-Jāhīz (the starrer) and al-Ḥadaqi (goggle-eye). Amongst the anecdotes concerning him, is the following, related by himself: "I was mentioned to al-Mutawakkil as a proper person to instruct one of his sons; but, on seeing me, he disliked my looks and dismissed me with a present of ten thousand dirhams. On leaving the palace, I met with Muḥammad Ibn Ibrāhīm,<sup>3</sup> who was on the point of returning to Madīnat al-Ṣalām (Baghdād), and he proposed to me that I should accompany him in his barge. I should remark that we were then at Sarra man Ra'ā. I embarked with him, and, on reaching the mouth of the canal al-Qāṭūl,<sup>4</sup> a curtained tent was 1 See no. 84 note on Sayyār.

2 The autograph has التبيين; the later MSS, and Hājjī Khalīfah give the same reading as the printed text.

3 Muḥammad Ibn Ibrāhīm Ibn Muṣ'ab was governor of the province of Fārs. In A. H. 236 (A. C. 850-1) his nephew Muḥammad Ibn Ishāq Ibn Ibrāhīm, made a complaint against him to al-Mutawakkil, and obtained permission to treat him as he pleased. Ibn Ishāq immediately proceeded to Fārs and removed his uncle from the government, which he conferred on his cousin al-Ḥusayn Ibn Ismā'il Ibn Ibrāhīm Ibn Muṣ'ab. He then placed his uncle in confinement and let him die of thirst. (Ibn al-Aṭhīr).

4 The Qāṭūl, a canal on the east side of the Tigris branched off from it two parasangs lower down than Sarra man ra'ā. It passed through Jarjarā'l and then returned into the Tigris.

set up and he called for music, on which a female lute-player commenced singing an air, of which the words were :

'Our days are passed in quarrels and reproaches ; our time is spent in anger. Can it be that such an affliction is peculiar to me alone, or is it common to every lover ?'

She then stopped, and he told a female-guitar-player to begin. The words she sung were :

'Show pity to true lovers ! I see no one to assist them ; how often do they part ! how often are they severed ! how often do they separate ! how great must be their patience !'

Here the lute-player said to her :

'And then what must they do ?'

To which the other female answered :

' 'Tis this they have to do'

She then struck her hand through the curtain, and, coming out at the rent she thus made, she appeared to us like a half-moon<sup>1</sup> and threw herself into the water. A young page who was standing behind Muḥammad, with a fly-flap in his hand, and who resembled her in beauty, went over to the place where she fell in, and saw her borne away under the water, on which he recited this verse :

(' 'Tis thou who drownest me<sup>2</sup> after meeting with thy fate ! ) O that thou couldst know it !'

He then sprung in after her, and the rowers having turned the barge round, perceived them sinking and clasped in each other's arms. They were never seen after. Muḥammad was greatly shocked at the circumstance, but he at length said to me : 'O Abū 'Amr ! tell me some story which may diminish my grief for the death of that unfortunate couple, or else I shall send thee to join them !' I immediately recollected an occurrence which happened to Yazīd Ibn 'Abd al-Malik, and I related as follows : The Khalif Yazīd Ibn 'Abd al-Malik was holding a public sitting for the redressing of grievances, and amongst the memorials which passed under his examination, he found one containing these words : 'If it be the pleasure of the Commander of the faithful, he will have such and such a slave-girl of his brought out to me, so that she may sing me three airs.' On reading this note, Yazid was seized with anger, and he sent out a person with orders to bring in the writer's head, but he then dispatched another messenger after the first, with directions to bring in the individual himself. When the man appeared before him, the khalif addressed him thus: 'What induced thee to do what thou hast done?' 'My confidence in thy mildness,' replied the man, 'and my trust in thy indulgence.' Here the prince ordered all the assembly to withdraw, not excepting the members of the Omayyide family, and the girl was brought in with a lute in her hand. The youth then said to her: 'Sing these words:

1 Al-Jāhīz means to say that he saw her in profile only.

2 The autograph alone gives the right reading, which is غرقنى .

'Gently, O Fāṭimah! moderate thy disdain! if thou hast resolved to sever our attachment, yet be gentle.'<sup>1</sup>

When she had sung it, Yazid said to him: 'Speak': and the other said: 'Sing:

'The lightning gleamed in the direction of Najd, and I said: O lightning! I am too much engaged to watch thee.'<sup>2</sup>

And she sung it. Yazid then said to him: 'Speak;' and he said: 'Order me a pint of wine;' and it was brought to him. He had hardly drunk it off, when he sprung up, and, having climbed to the top of the dome under which Yazid was sitting, he threw himself down and dashed out his brains. 'We belong to God', exclaimed Yazid (horror-struck), 'and unto Him we must rereturn! See that madman! he was silly enough to think that if I brought out my slave-girl to him, I should take her back again into my own possession. Pages! lead her out and bear her to his family, if he have a family; and if not, sell her and let the price be distributed as alms in his name.' They immediately departed with her for the man's family, but, on crossing the court of the palace, she saw an excavation prepared for preserving the rain-waters, on which she burst from their hands, and recited this line:

1 This verse belongs to the Mu'allaqah of 'Imra al-Qays.

2 See no. 191, note on Ṭuḥrā's verse on lightning.

'Those that die of love, let them die thus; there is no good in love without death.'

And throwing herself head foremost into the cistern she died on the spot. Muḥammad received some distraction from this narration, and he made me a large present." The following anecdote is related by Abu 'l-Qāsim al-Sīrāfi: "We went to the assembly held by the lord Wazīr Abu 'l-Faḍl Ibn al-'Amīd, and, the name of al-Jāḥiẓ happening to be mentioned, a person present depreciated his abilities and spoke of him slightly. The Wazīr made no observation, and, when the man had retired, I said to him: 'My lord! Why did you not reply to that fellow, you are accustomed to refute the assertions of persons like him?' To this the Wazīr replied: 'I thought any reply less effectual than leaving him in his ignorance; had I argued with him and brought proofs against him, he would then have commenced reading the works of al-Jāḥiẓ, and that, Abu 'l-Qāsim! would have made a man of him; for they teach us to reason first, and instruct us in literature next; and I did not think that fellow worthy of such an advantage.'" Towards the close of his life, al-Jāḥiẓ had an attack of palsy, and one of his sides was so much inflamed, that he had to rub it with sandal-ointment and camphor, whilst the latter was so cold and benumbed, that, were it seized with pincers, it had been insensible. During his illness he used to say: "Maladies of a contrary nature have conspired against my body; if I eat any thing cold, it seizes on my feet, and if I eat any thing hot, it seizes on my head." He would say again: "My left side is paralysed to such a degree that, if it were torn with pincers, I should not be aware of it; and my right side is so affected with gout, that if a fly walked on it, it would give me pain. I am afflicted also with gravel, which prevents me from passing urine; but what bears hardest on me is the weight of ninety-six years." He would then repeat the verse:

"Didst thou, who art an aged man, hope to be as thou wast in the days of thy youth? Thou deceivest thyself; a threadbare garment is not like one that is new."

The following anecdote was related by a member of the Barmak family: "Having been appointed governor of Sind, I remained there for a considerable time, till I learned that I had been removed from office. Having gained thirty thousand dīnārs during my administration, and fearing, if my successor arrived suddenly, that he would learn where the money was deposited and try to seize it, I had it melted down into ten thousand plum (-shaped masses), each of them weighing three mithqāls<sup>1</sup>. My successor arrived soon after, on which I took ship and arrived at Baṣrah. Being informed that al-Jāḥiẓ was in that city, laid up with the palsy, I felt desirous of seeing him before he died; and I therefore went to find him. On arriving at his house, which was but a small one, I knocked at the door, and a female slave of a tawny complexion came out and asked me what I wanted. 'I am from a foreign country,' said I, 'and wish to have the pleasure of seeing the shaykh.' She then went to inform him of my desire, and I heard him utter these words: 'Say to him: What would you have with a body bent to one side, a mouth driveling, and a complexion faded?' On this I told the girl that I should insist on seeing him, and he said, on being informed of my determination: 'This is some man passing through Baṣrah, who, hearing that I was unwell, has said to himself: I should like to get a sight of him before he dies, so that I may say: I have seen al-Jāḥiẓ.' He then consented to receive me, and, on entering his room, I saluted him. He answered me most politely, and said: 'Who are you? may God exalt you.' I informed him of my name and family, on which he replied: 'May God have mercy on your ancestors and forefathers, the generous and beneficent! their days were as gardens in the path of time, and many were those whom they restored to prosperity! May the Divine favour and blessing be upon them!' In return, I offered up an invocation for his own welfare, and said: 'I request of you to recite me some of your poetry, on which he pronounced the following verses:

'Though now some have outstripped me, how often in former times did I advance leisurely, and yet outstrip all rivals. But here is time with its vicissitudes ruining what was firm and renewing what was ruined.'

---

1 It appears from this that the dīnār of that time weighed a mithqāl.

I then rose up to retire, but, as I was entering the court of the house, he called out : 'Tell me, sir ! did you ever see a palsied man derive advantage from plums ?'—'No,' said I.—'I ask you the question,' replied he, 'because plums such as you have would do me good ; send some to me !' I told him that I would, and left the house, wondering in myself how he could have discovered a secret which I had concealed so carefully. I then sent him one hundred of those plums."—Abu 'l-Ḥasan al-Barmaki said : "Al-Jāḥiẓ recited to me these lines :

'We had once friends, but they are now departed and passed away ; they were not suffered to live for ever ! They all passed about the cup of death ; the friend is dead, and so is the foe.' "

Al-Jāḥiẓ died at Baṣrah in the month of Muḥarram, A. H. 255 (Dec.-Jan., A. C. 868-9) : aged upwards of ninety years.—Laythī means descended from Layth Ibn Bakr Ibn 'Abd Manāt Ibn Kinānah Ibn Khuzaymah.

482 'AMR IBN MAS'ADAH.

Abu 'l-Faḍl 'Amr Ibn Mas'adah Ibn Sa'id Ibn Ṣūl, the kātib, was one of al-Māmūn's wazīrs. The Khāṭib (no. 33) mentions, in his History of Baghdād, that he was an uncle's son to Ibrāhīm Ibn al-'Abbās al-Ṣūlī (no. 10). As a kātib, 'Amr Ibn Mas'adah acquired great distinction by an elegant style, pregnant with meaning and concise, clear in purport and precise in thought. when al-Faḍl Ibn Sahl, the brother of al-Ḥasan Ibn Sahl, held the post of wazīr under al-Māmūn, he acquired such predominant influence that no one could find means of speaking to that prince ; but, when he was put to death, the persons who were afterwards wazīrs obtained the opportunities of offering their respects to their sovereign. These were Aḥmad Ibn Abī Khālīd al-Aḥwal (no. 8 note), 'Amr Ibn Mas'adah and Abu 'Abbād'. Al-Māmūn ordered him, one day, to write to one of the provincial agents a letter of recommendation for a person whom he wished to be well received, and the following note was drawn up by him in consequence : "This, my letter to thee, is that of a person relying on him to whom he writes, and interested for him in whose favour he writes. So, between (my) reliance (on thee) and (my) interest (for him), the bearer will not lose his pains. Adieu !" Some say that this note was composed by al-Ḥasan Ibn Wahb, but the general and, at the same time, the right opinion is, that Ibn Mas'adah was the author. The following anecdote was related by 'Amr Ibn Mas'adah : 'I was writing answers to memorials in the presence of Ja'far Ibn Yaḥyā the Barmakide, when one of the pages presented him a paper containing a request for an increase of salary. He handed the letter to me, telling me to answer it, and I wrote as follows : 'Small and lasting (pensions) are better than large and transitory (ones).' Having perused it, he clapped on the back and said :— 'What a wazīr is contained in your skin !' "The style of 'Amr Ibn Mas'adah was replete with fine ideas. He died A. H. 217 (A. C. 832-3) at a place called Adhanah, but al-Jihshiyārī (no. 359 note) states, in his book of wazīrs, that he died in the month of the latter Rabi', A. H. 215 (June, A. C. 830).— On his death, al-Māmūn received a memorial in which it was stated that he had left a fortune of eighty millions of dirhams<sup>1</sup> (and that he must have therefore defrauded the state), but the khalif wrote on the back of it : "This is but little for one who was attached to our service so long ; may his sons enjoy, with the blessing of God, what he has left, and may He guide them its management." Al-Mas'ūdī mentions, in his Murūj al-Dhahab, that, when Ibn Mas'adah died, (the government) made an inventory of his property, which had never been the case with any other wazīr.— Adhanah is the name of a town on the coast of Syria, near Ṭarsūs ; its castle was erected A. H. 144 (A. C. 761-62).— Having written thus far, I discovered a very elegant epistle of his, addressed to a person of high rank who was greatly displeased at his mother's contracting a second marriage ; on perusing it, he felt quite consoled, and was delivered from his affliction. It is a beautiful a production that I am induced to insert it here: "Praise be to God Who hath removed from us the veil of passion, and guided us to the concealing of our disgrace! Who, by declaring certain things lawful, has confounded our jealous pride, and forbidden us to hinder mothers from marrying again, as He hath forbidden us to bury daughters alive! thus reducing disconsolate minds from haughtiness—haughtiness such as that which prevailed in pagan times. He then held out an ample recompense to him who awaits with resignation the accomplishment of His decree, and promised a vast treasure to him who bears with patience the trials which He sends him. May He Who hath opened thy heart to piety, increased thy patience under afflictions, and inspired thee with resignation to His will and submission to His judgments, grant thee to enjoy the blessing of that grace by which He disposed thee to fulfil thy duty to a parent, one who has the highest of claims upon thee. May He, Whose glory should ever be extolled, grant that His mortification of thy pride and this grief which thou strivest to suppress, be counted as titles to an increase of recompense and to an augmentation of treasure (in the world to come). To thy present anger at her conduct may He join thy future sorrow at her burial, so that the stroke of affliction may be complete and thy reward perfect! May God permit that the bitterness which thy Lordship felt at her marriage be united to the patience with which thou shalt endure her loss; and may He soon replace, for thy sake, this nuptial couch by the bier; May God Whose glory should ever be extolled grant that the satisfaction thou mayest feel at her death be unattended by His displeasure, and that the gifts which He may bestow thee on taking her to Himself be unmingled with future probations! the judgments of God—may His glory be exalted and His name hallowed!—hold their course, in spite of human will but He, may He be exalted! chooseth for His servants, the true believers, that which is best for them in this transitory world and more lasting for them in the other life. May God, in talking her to Himself chose what is best for her and most profitable, and make the tomb her fit abode. Adieu!" This letter is attributed by some to al-Faql Ibn al-'Amid, whose life we shall give later ; and it recalls to my mind two verses which were composed by the Ṣāḥib Ibn 'Abbad ( no. 93 ) on a person who got a new husband for his mother ; they are as follows :

1 Abū 'Abd Allāh Thābit Ibn Yaḥyā al-Rāẓī, surnamed Ibn 'Abbād, was one of al-Māmūn's wazīrs. As a Kātib he displayed the highest abilities, but was very precipitate and passionate. (MS. No. 895, fol. 202).

---

1 About two millions of pounds sterling.

"I blamed him for allowing his mother to marry, but he answered : 'I have done a thing lawful.'—'True,' I replied ; 'what you have done is lawful, but you have given away the cracked pitcher<sup>1</sup>.'"

'Amr Ibn Mas'adah wrote to one of his friends the following letter of recommendation in favour of a person to whom he was greatly attached : "The bearer of my letter to you is Sālim. Adieu !" In this he alluded to a verse wherein a poet says :

"They withhold me from Sālim and I repel them ; his very skin is sālim (in safety) between my eyes and my nose."

That is : (this person is so dear to me that, if it were possible), I should place him in that spot. The following lines were given, by Muḥammad Ibn Dāwūd Ibn al-Jarrāḥ<sup>2</sup> as having been composed by Muḥammad al-Baydaq al-Naṣībī on 'Amr Ibn Mas'adah, who had been complaining of his health :

"'Abu 'l-Faḍl,' said they, 'is ill.'—I answered : 'I would lay down my life to save him from every danger. O that I had his illness ; he the reward of those who suffer, and I no reward whatever !'"

Ibrāhīm Ibn al-'Abbās al-Ṣūlī having fallen into distress for want of employment, 'Amr Ibn Mas'adah, who was his friend, sent him a sum of money. Ibrāhīm then wrote to him these lines :

"Till the end of my life I shall be thankful to 'Amr for kindness so freely granted and yet so great ! He is one who never refuses money to his friend, and never utters a complaint at his failings. He saw my poverty, though I essayed to conceal it ; and it hurt his eyes till it was removed."

---

1 The original text may also signify concedisti diffissionem vetulae ; but this is so poor a quibble, that I suspect allusion is made to some proverbial saying, with which I am not acquainted.

2 See no. 10, note on Muḥammad Ibn Dāwūd Ibn al-Jarrāḥ.

The following anecdote is given by Aḥmad Ibn Yūsuf al-Kātib<sup>1</sup>: "I one day went in where al-Māmūn was, and found him with a letter in his hand. He kept looking at it for a long time, and I remained observing him. He then said: 'O Aḥmad! I perceive that my conduct maketh thee reflect!' 'It is true,' I replied, 'and may God avert from the Commander of the faithful every cause of trouble and protect him against every danger!' He answered; 'There is nothing in the letter to trouble me, but I found in it a passage which struck me by its similarity to an observation which I heard (the khalif) al-Rashīd make; speaking of eloquence, he defined it to be: distance from prolixity, closeness to the thought intended and the expressing of it in few words. I did not think it possible for any person to attain such a degree of perfection, till I read this letter!' He then handed it to me, saying: 'It is addressed to me from 'Amr Ibn Mas'adah' I read it and its contents were these: 'From the under-signed to the Commander of the faithful. Those of his generals and troops who are under me show such obedience as that of brave men whose stipends are withheld. By this, they are disorganised and ruined;' When I had perused the letter he said: 'The admiration which it excited in me induced me to give orders that the troops under his command should receive a donation equal to seven month' pay. And I am considering how to recompense a writer in a manner befitting one who holds such a rank in his profession!'"

483 IBN BĀNAH

'Amr Ibn Muḥammad Ibn Sulaymān Ibn Rashīd, generally known by the appellation of Ibn Bānah, was a mawla to Yūsuf Ibn 'Umar al-Thaqafī and a singer of the very highest talent. Abu 'l-Faraj al-Ispahānī mentions him in the Kitāb al-Aghānī and says: "His father was the head of one of the government offices and held a distinguished rank among the *kātib*s. He (himself) was an excellent singer and a good poet. He left a work on Aghānī, or popular songs. His haguhtiness and pride were excessive, and although afflicted with leprosy, the khalifs included him in the number of their boon companions and singers." He died A. H. 278 (A. C. 891-2) at Sarra man ra'ā. The khalif al-Muta-wakkil admitted him into his closest intimacy and familiarity. Ibn Bānah learned his art from Ishāq Ibn Ibrāhīm al-Mawṣilī (no. 84) and other eminent masters. The work which he composed on singing is sufficient proof of his abilities. Baghdād was the place of his residence, but he occasionally visited Sarra man ra'ā. His mother, Bānah, was the daughter of Rūh, the secretary to Salamah al-Waṣīf. In the life of Ṭāhir Ibn al-Ḥusayn (no. 288) we have given two satirical lines of his, directed against the prince.

1 See no. 117, note on Aḥmad Ibn Yūsuf.

484 IBN AL-MŪṢALĀYĀ.

The Kātib Abu Sa'd al-'Alā Ibn al-Ḥasan Ibn Wabb Ibn al-Mūṣalāyā, surnamed Amin al-Dawlat (the trusty servant of the state), was a native of Baghdād and Munṣhī (drawer up of state papers) to the khalifate. He had been originally a Christian, but made his profession of Islamism to the khalif al-Muqtadi bi-Allāh and proved himself a sincere convert. He composed a number of elegant epistles and good poems, which have been collected and form two volumes, one of prose and one of verse. His talents were of the highest order. In the year 432 (A. C. 1040-1) he entered into the service of the khalif al-Qā'im, as writer in the chancery office. Some time before his death, he lost his sight. He died on the 19th of the first Jumādā, A. H. 497 (February, A. C. 1104*). He had a sister's son, called Abu Naṣr Hibat Allāh Ibn Ṣāhib al-Ḳhayr al-Ḥasan Ibn 'Alī, and surnamed Tāj al-Ruwasā (crown of the chiefs), who was a Kātib and a man of abilities, possessing a knowledge of the belles letters and a talent for eloquence. He also wrote a beautiful hand, and composed some good epistles which bear a high reputation and have been collected into a volume. He died at Baghdād, after a five days' illness, on the eve of Monday, the 11th of the first Jumādā, A. H. 498 (January, A. C. 1135*), aged seventy years; and was interred at the Abrez Gate. He became a Muslim at the same time as his uncle, this occurred, A. H. 484 (A. C. 1091-2). Mūṣalāyā is a name used among Christians<sup>1</sup>.

* 18 February.—Ed.

485 IBN AL-SAWĀDĪ.

Abu 'l-Faraj al-'Alā Ibn 'Alī Ibn Muḥammad Ibn 'Alī Ibn Aḥmad Ibn 'Abd Allāh, a native of Wāsiṭ and surnamed Ibn al-Sawādī, was a Kātib and a poet. In the art of verse he displayed a great natural talent, combined with a subtle wit and some of licentiousness of humour. His family was one of the first in the city, and had been noted for producing able *Kātib*s and men of talent. In one of his pieces which are all very fine, he says :

"I complain to thee of thy own disdain, and, blinded by love, I imagine thou wilt grant me justice. I avoid thee, lest it should be seen that thou avoidest me; for then my jealous foes would receive some satisfaction."

This idea is borrowed from another poet, who says :

"I strive to conceal the love I bear you from those who might reproach (me with folly); I should not wish them to see what pains you cause me, for that would give them satisfaction."

I met this last verse before I knew those of Ibn al-Sawādī, and, being pleased with the idea, I versified it in the following couplet :

---

<sup>1</sup> Mūṣalāyā or Mūsaloīyo signifies in Syriac native of Mosul.

* 29 January,—Ed.

"( Fair maid, ) wand of the sands ! thy stature is pliant ; the days of thy kindness, are, for me, days of rejoicing. If I conceal my grief when shunned by thee, 'tis done to prevent my envious rivals from exulting."

'Imād al-Dīn mentions, in the Kharīdah, that Ibn al-Sawādī recited to him the following line of his own composing :

"I swear by the (sacred victims) contained in the Muṣallā<sup>1</sup> and those within the ample valley of Minā<sup>2</sup>, that for thee my heart yearns with love !"

There are three verses in all, but, as I think this the best, I abstain from giving the others. Abu 'l-Qāsim Hibat Allah Ibn al-Faḍl, surnamed Ibn al-Qaṭṭān, a person whose life we shall give, directed against the qāḍī al-quḍāt al-Zaynabī<sup>3</sup> a satirical poem, rhyming in k and beginning thus :

"Brother ! the condition (of my existence) is too strong (to be resisted) ; I cannot refrain from exposing vice."

It is a long poem, consisting of one hundred and eighteen verses, and, having been transmitted orally from one person to another, it obtained great publicity. When al-Zaynabī heard it, he sent for Ibn al-Faḍl and clapped him into prison after boxing his ears. The poet subsequently recovered his liberty, and it happened that, towards the same period, Ibn al-Sawādī arrived at Baghdād and recited a panegyric on the qāḍī in his presence. As

1 The meaning of this word is explained in 262 note on Muḥalla.

2 Minā is the name of the valley near Makkah where the pilgrims offer up sacrifice.

3 Abū Ṭālib al-Ḥusayn Ibn Muḥammad Ibn 'Alī Ibn al-Ḥasan al-Zaynabī, an eminent imām, the chief doctor and principal qāḍī of the Ḥanifite sect at Baḥdād, was born A. H. 420 (A. C. 1029). Having studied the Qur'ān, the Traditions and jurisprudence, he became mufti, professor, and chief of the sect. He received the honorary title of Nūr al-Hudā (light of the direction), and was frequently employed by the Khalīf as his envoy to the neighbouring princes. He had also the posts of naqīb, or chief, of the descendants of 'Alī and of those of al-'Abbās. He died on the 21st of Ṣafar, A. H. 512 (June, A. C. 1118),* and was interred in the funeral chapel of Abū Ḥanīfah, (Nujūm).

* 30 May—Ed.

the recompense which he expected did not make its appearance, he went frequently to the qāḍī's assemblies, but could obtain nothing. He then met Ibn al-Faḍl and acquainted him with the circumstance, adding that he intended going down to Wāsiṭ, his native place, and composing a satire on him. On this Ibn al-Faḍl wrote to Abu 'l-Faḥḥ, a friend of al-Zaynabī's, a piece of verse in which was the following passage :

"Abu 'l-Faḥḥ ! when the heart boils, satire abounds. Rhymes will then assail the victim, and Satan himself will back them. Beware of the verses, rhyming in k of one who is going down the river and whose ears you and your friends can never hope to box."

These verses came to al-Zaynabī's knowledge, and he immediately sent a present to Ibn al-Sawādī and calmed him. This poet was born at Wāsiṭ on the eve of Wednesday, the 15th of the first Rabi' A. H. 482 (May, A. C. 1089)*, and he died at the same place, A. H. 556 (A. C. 1161).—Sawādī means belonging to the Sawād (or cultivated plains) of 'Irāq. This region was so called because the Arabs of the desert, when they first saw the verdure of the trees, exclaimed : "What is that sawād (dark thing) ?" and this ever afterwards continued to be its name.

486 THE QĀḌĪ 'IYĀḌ.

The qāḍī Abu 'l-Faḍl 'Iyāḍ Ibn Mūsā Ibn Iyāḍ Ibn 'Amr† Ibn Mūsā Ibn 'Iyāḍ Ibn Muḥammad Ibn Mūsā Ibn 'Iyāḍ al-Yaḥṣubī was a native of Ceuta (al-Sibtī) and the first authority of his time in the Traditions, the sciences connected with the, grammar, philology, and the sayings, feats and genealogies of the Arabs of the desert. He wrote some highly instructive works, such as the Ikmāl, or Completion, being an elucidation of the commentary composed by al-Māzarī on Muslim's collection of the Traditions, and entitled by him al-Mu'lim<sup>1</sup>. Another of his productions the Mashāriq al-Anwār (orient-points of the lights), contains an explanation of the obscure terms occurring in three Ṣaḥiḥs; namely, the Muwattaʿa (of Mālik), the collection of al-Bukhārī and that of Muslim; it is a most instructive book. He wrote also a complete commentary on Umm Zara's Tradition<sup>1</sup>, and, in another work, entitled al-Tanbihāt (indications), he compiled much curious and useful information. In short, we may say that all his productions are excellent. Ibn Bashkuwāl (no. 204) speaks of him in these terms in the Ṣilat; "He came to Spain in pursuit of learning, and received lessons at Cordova from a number of masters;— he collected a great quantity of Traditions, and, in this task, he devoted much pains and care to the obtaining of them in a correct form. All the various branches of science<sup>2</sup> were objects of his study, and his acuteness, perspicacity, and intelligence were most remarkable. During a long period he acted as qāḍī in his native town"—Ibn Bashkuwāl means Ceuta... "and discharged the duties of his place to general satisfaction. From thence he passed to the qāḍiship of Granada, but this post he did not long hold." The Qāḍī 'Iyāḍ composed some good poetry, of which we may quote these verses, given as his by his son Abū 'Abd Allāh Muḥammad, qāḍī of Denia: "My father recited to me," said he, "the following lines descriptive of the khāmāt, or green stalks of corn, when shaken by the wind, with the anemony blossoms appearing among them:

<sup>1</sup> The life of al-Māzarī will be found in this work.

* 13 June—Ed.

† The Cairo edition gives 'Umar,—Ed.

'Behold the green stalks of the corn-field bending to the gale; they resemble a green swardron<sup>3</sup> put to rout, and the red anemonies represent the wounds.' "

His son gave also the following verses as his:

1 Hajjī Khalifah notices this work, but does not seem to have been acquainted with it, as he merely copies Ibn Khallikān's words. I have been unable to discover who the woman called Umm Zara' was.

2 Read الفنن in the printed text.

3 Or a dark squadron. When Muḥammad took Makkah, he had a boy-guard so denominated, according to the author of the Sīrat al-Rasūl, from the green or dark colour of their armour. These two adjectives were nearly synonymous with the ancient Arabs;—see no. 485 of this volume.

"Since I saw thee for the last time, God knows that I am as a bird whose wings disappoint his efforts. Were I able, I would cross the sea to meet thee, for thy absence causeth my death<sup>1</sup>."

I met with an epistle addressed to him by Ibn al-'Arif (no. 67), and was tempted to insert it here, but found it too long. The qāḍī 'Iyād was born at Ceuta on the 15th of Shābān, A. H. 476 (December, A. C. 1083)*, and he died at Morocco on Friday, the 7th of the latter Jumādā—others say, in Ramaḍān A. H. 544 (October, A. C. 1149)†. He was interred within the city near the Ilān Gate. The place of qāḍī at Granada was conferred upon him in the year 532 (A. C. 1137-38)<sup>2</sup>. His son Abū 'Abd Allāh Muḥammad, died A. H. 575 (A. C. 1179-80). Yaḥsubī, pronounced also Yaḥṣabī and Yaḥṣibi, means descended from Yaḥsub (or Yaḥṣab or else Yaḥṣib Ibn Mālik, the progenitor of a Ḥimyarite tribe. Ceuta (Sibta) is a well-known town in Maghrib. Granada (Gharnāṭah) is a city of Spain.

487 'ISĀ IBN 'UMAR AL-THAQAFI.

Abu 'Amr 'Isā Ibn 'Umar al-Thaqafī (a member of tribe Thaqif) was a grammarian and a native of Baṣrah. Some say that he was a mawlā to khalīf Ibn al-Walīd (who belonged to the tribe of Quraysh), but that he afterwards settled among the tribe of Thaqif, for which reason he obtained that patronymic. He had a habit of employing pompous terms and unusual words in ordinary discourse and (even) in his reading of his Qur'ān<sup>3</sup>.

1 The only thing remarkable in these two verses is the artifice of the rhyme, which is janāḥayni in both.

2 The MS. of the Bib. du Roi, No. 1377, ancien fonds, contains the first part of a treatise on the qāḍī 'Iyād, his professors, literary productions, etc. It is an excessively prolix work; the author, Aḥmad Ibn Muḥammad al-Maqqarī was nephew to compiler of the history of Spain, extracts of which have been translated and published by M. de Gayangos.

3 Such licences were permitted in early times. See no. 480 of this volume.

* 28 December,—Ed.

† 14 October.

A close intimacy subsisted between him and Abū 'Amr Ibn al-'Alā (no. 480), and some of their epistles with a portion of their (sittings, or private) literary discussions, are still preserved. He learned the reading of the Qur'ān from 'Abd Allāh Ibn Abī Ishāq by repeating it aloud under his tuition, and he acquired his knowledge of the various readings of the sacred text from 'Abd Allāh Ibn Kathīr (no. 305) and Ibn Muḥayṣin* ; he took also lessons from al-Ḥasan al-Baṣrī (no. 148), and some curious anecdotes are related of the mode in which he read certain passages of the Qur'ān so as to adapt them to the rules of grammar. The readings of the Qur'ān were transmitted down to him orally by Aḥmad Ibn Mūsā al-Lūlū'i<sup>2</sup>, Hārūn Ibn Mūsā the grammarian<sup>3</sup>, al-Khalīl Ibn Aḥmad (no. 206) Sahl Ibn Yūsuf, and 'Ubayd Ibn 'Aqīl. He taught grammar to Sībawayh (no. 479), and is the author of the work on that subject, entitled al-Jāmi' (the collector). It is said that Sībawayh took this book, and having developed its contents, he inserted in it the observations made by al-Khalīl (Ibn Aḥmad) and others; when he had terminated the investigation of the various grammatical points and interpolated these observations, the work was attributed to him, and it is the same which is still known under the title of the Kitāb, or Book of Sībawayh. In proof of the truth of this statement, an anecdote

1 Ibn Muḥayṣin a mawlā to the tribe of Saḥm and a native of Makkah was the principal Qur'ān-reader of his time in that city. His authority as a traditionist is well established. He died at Makkah, A. H. 123 (A. C. 740-1). Some say that his real name was 'Abd al-Raḥmān, others, Muḥammad Ibn 'Abd al-Raḥmān. (Ṭabaqāt al-Qurra, MS. No. 742, fol. 21).

2 Aḥmad Ibn Mūsā Ibn Abi Maryam al-Lūlū'i, a member of the tribe of Khuzā'ah, was a teacher of the Qur'ān-readings and the Traditions. Ṭab. al-Qurra, fol. 43. The date of his death is not mentioned.

3 Abū 'Abd Allāh Hārūn Ibn Mūsā Ibn Ṣharīk, a member of the tribe of Taḡlib and a native of Damascus, was chief of the teachers of the Qur'ān-readings in that city, and was generally designated by the name of Hārūn al-Aḥḥafash. In the pursuit of knowledge he visited various countries and received Traditions from numerous masters. He composed some works on the readings and on grammar, and died in the month of Ṣafar, A. H. 292 (Dec.—Jan. A. C. 904-5), aged ninety-two years Ṭab al-Qurra, fol. 67).

* The name is not legible in the autograph, Cairo edition gives Ibn Muḥayṣin.—Ed.

may be inserted here: When Sibawayh left 'Isā Ibn 'Umar and went to attend the lessons of al-Khalil Ibn Aḥmad, he was questioned by the latter concerning 'Isā's works, and his reply was: "He composed upwards of seventy treatises on grammar, which were all collected by a rich amateur and were accidentally destroyed, when in his possession. None of them remain in existence, except two; the Ikṁāl (completion), which is now in Fārs, in the hands of such a one, and the Jāmi' that which I am now studying and on the obscurities of which I am consulting you." Al-Khalil here reflected for some time with down-cast eyes, and then, looking up, he exclaimed: "May God have mercy on 'Isā!" and recited the following lines:

"All the science of grammar is lost, except the portion which 'Isā Ibn 'Umar discovered to the world. There is the Ikṁāl and here the Jāmi'; they are a sun and a moon to enlighten mankind."

Al-Khalil himself received (some grammatical information) from him, and it is said, that whilst Abu 'l-Aswad al-Du'ālī had treated of the fā'il and maf'ūl (the agent and patient) only, 'Isā Ibn 'Umar composed a book on grammar, founding his rules on the accordance of the majority of examples; that he had divided it into chapters, drawn it up in a regular form, and styled idioms the exceptions offered by the examples which were in minority. He used also to attack the Arabs of the desert (in their productions), and point out the faults into which the most famous of them, such as al-Nābighah and others, had fallen. The anecdote which follows is related by al-Aṣma'i: 'Isā Ibn 'Umar said to 'Amr Ibn al-'Alā: "I speak more correctly than Ma'add Ibn 'Adnān ever did!" On this Abū 'Amr said to him: "You are going too far; how would you recite this verse:

'Formerly they concealed their faces with a veil, but to-day, when they appear (badāna) to the spectators—

Would you say badāna or badīna?" "I should say badīna," said 'Isā. "Then you are wrong," replied the other; "the verb

1 See no. 222 note on Arabic prosody.

badā, with the aorist yabdū, signifies to commence a thing<sup>1</sup>; the right reading is badūnā” It was Abū ‘Amr’s design to lead him into the mistake, for, in this case, the Arabs of the desert neither say badāna nor badīna but badūna. An example of his pompous language is thus given by al-Jawharī in his Ṣaḥāḥ: ‘Isā Ibn ‘Umar fell off his ass and the people gathered round him, on which he said: ma lakum? takākātum ‘alayya takākuwakum ‘alā dhi jinnatin! infranqī’ū ‘ammī; which means; ma lakum? tajamma’tum ‘alayya tajammu’akum ‘alā majnūn! inkashifū ‘anni (what is the matter with you? you gather round me as you would round a madman! be off and leave me).” “I find this story told differently in a collection of anecdotes, where it is said that, being troubled with asthma, he fell down in the street one day, and the people gathered round him, saying: “He has the falling-sickness;” and some began to recite passages of the Qur’ān (to conjure the evil spirit out of him), whilst others prayed for protection against the genii. When he recovered from his swoon and saw the crowd about him, he pronounced the above words and one of the spectators said: “The spirit which possesses him is speaking Indian.” It is related also that ‘Umar Ibn Hubayrah al-Fazārī, the governor of Persian and Arabian ‘Irāq, having inflicted on him the punishment of whipping, the only words he said were: wallahi! in kanat illa uṭhayyāban fī usayfā’in qabaḍaha ‘ashshārūka (by Allāh it was only some trifles of clothes in small baskets, and your tithe collectors have taken them). Numerous anecdotes of a similar nature are told of him. He died A. H. 149 (A. C. 766-7). Some say that it was Yūsuf Ibn ‘Umar, another governor of the two ‘Irāqs, who had him punished. The reason of this was, that, on taking possession of his government as successor to Khālīd Ibn ‘Abd Allāh al-Qasrī (no. 202), he persecuted all his predecessor’s friends, and one of them having confided some property to ‘Isā, he received information of the circumstance and dispatched a written order to his lieutenant at Baṣrah, directing him to put ‘Isā Ibn ‘Umar in chains and send him to him. The lieutenant called in a black-

---

1 It must be observed that badāna, the reading approved of by ‘Isā, is derivation from the verb badā (to commence.)

smith and ordered him to rivet the fetters; this operation being performed, he said to the prisoner: "You have nothing to fear; the amīr merely wants you to instruct his son." "And what then is the meaning of the fetters?" said 'Isā; which words passed into a proverb at Baṣrah, When brought before Yūsuf and questioned concerning the deposit, he denied it, on which the amīr ordered him to be flogged; and, on feeling the effects of the first strokes, he pronounced the words above mentioned.

488 ABŪ MŪSĀ 'ISĀ AL-JUZŪLĪ.

Abū Mūsā 'Isā Ibn 'Abd al-'Azīz Ibn Yalalbakht Ibn 'Isā Ibn Yūmārili al-Juzūlī al-Yazdaktanī was a grammarian of the highest eminence, skilled in the subtilities of the science, and well acquainted with its difficulties and exceptional points. He composed on this subject a muqaddamah or introduction which he entitled al-Qānūn (the canon), and wherein he conveyed information of the most curious kind. Though extremely concise, it contains a great quantity of grammatical matter, and this particularity distinguishes it from all previous works on the same subject. It has drawn the attention of many learned men, some of whom composed commentaries to explain it, and others made collections of examples to illustrate its rules; but all their labours are not sufficient to render the book intelligible, and those grammarians who have not read it under the tuition of a person well qualified to point out and explain its peculiar difficulties<sup>1</sup> acknowledge their inability to seize the meaning of the writer: the fact being that it is all enigmas and obscure allusions. I even heard a grammarian of great note say: "I do not understand this introduction, but it does not therefore result that I have no knowledge of grammar." In a word, it is a most original production. I have been informed that he made dictations<sup>2</sup> on grammar, but that they were never published. I saw also a work of his, containing an abridgment of the commentary intitled al-Faṣr, which Ibn Jinnl (no. 387) composed on al-Mutanabbī's poems. It is stated that he had also some knowledge of logic. Having made a journey to Egypt, he studied under the tuition of Ibn Bāri' (no. 328), whose authority he cites in some passages of the Muqaddamah; and a modern author says: "Al-Juzūli read the Jumal under Ibn Bāri' and consulted him on various points connected with the different sections of (Sibawayh's) Kitāb (no. 479) and obtained satisfactory answers. These questions having given rise to discussions among the other pupils, some useful remarks were elicited which al-Juzūli wrote down in a separate book. These materials served to form the Muqaddamah an obscure work, abounding in difficulties full of subtle meaning, and indicating the principles of grammar by ingenious allusions. This treatise, with its signification, he taught to his scholars." He then adds: "I have been told that, when he was asked if he had composed that work himself, he replied in the negative; being prohibited by his strictly religious sentiments from claiming as his own the results of a discussion which were in fact the offspring of many minds. It was even said by his master Ibn Bāri' that, although the work went under his name because he had drawn it up, he could not possibly claim it as his own." Al-Juzūli then returned to Maghrib after performing the pilgrimage, and took up his residence at Bijāyah (Bougia), where he remained for some time, giving lessons to numerous pupils, with some of whom I was afterwards acquainted and he died at Morocco (Marrākush), A. H. 610 (A. C. 1213-4). Such is the date given me by various persons, but I since met with an account of his life, by Abū 'Abd Allāh Ibn al-Abbār al-Qudā'i,<sup>1</sup>

<sup>1</sup> Literally: Who have not read it under a Muwaqqif. The verb waqqafa, of which this is the active participle means to cause a person to notice and comprehend.

<sup>2</sup> See no. 370.

---

1 The ḥāfiẓ Abū 'Abd Allāh Muḥammad Ibn 'Abd Allāh Ibn Abi Bakr al-Qudā'i, surnamed Ibn al-Abbār, the author of the Takmilah, or completion of Ibn Baṣṭakūwāl's Ṣilat, was a native of Valentia in Spain, and secretary to different princes of the Ḥafṣide dynasty. He was put to death by order of al-Mustanṣir, the sovereign of Tūnis, in the month of Muḥarram, A. H. 658 (Dec.-Jan. A. C. 1259-60). Ibn Khaldūn given an account of this event in his History of the Berbers, a work which the writer is now publishing for the French government.

wherein it is stated that his death occurred in A. H. 606 or 607. Yalalbukht and Yūmārill are Berber names. Juzūli means belonging to Juzūlah or Kuzūlah,<sup>1</sup> a tribe of the Berbers. Yazdaktanl means belonging to Yazdaktan a branch of the tribe of Juzūlah. I have since found the following passage among my rough notes: al-Juzūli filled the place of khaṭīb, or preacher, at the principal mosque of Morocco. The tribe of Juzūlah is nomadic, and inhabits the plains of Sūs, in the farthest extremity of Maghrib. As a teacher of the Qur'ān-readings, grammar, and philology he held the highest rank, and he gave public lessons in the great mosque. He wrote a large volume as a commentary on his Muqaddamah, containing much curious and instructive matter. One of his scholars relates that he went to him with the intention of reading over Abū 'Amr's (no. 480) edition, or reading, of the Qur'ān under his tuition, and that a person present asked him if he wanted to take lessons in grammar from the master? He replied that he did not, and another asked him the same question and obtained a similar answer; then the shaykh said to him: "Answer them thus:" and recited these verses:

"I did not come to you for grammar, and have no wish to learn it. Leave Zayd to mind his business, and let him go wherever he likes. What have I to do with a man who is always beating his neighbours."<sup>2</sup>

He died at Haskūrah<sup>3</sup> a canton in the kingdom of Morocco.

489 AL-FĀ'IZ AL-'UBAYDĪ.

Abu 'l-Qāsim 'Isā, surnamed al-Fā'iz, was the son of of al-Zāfir Ibn al-Hāfiẓ Ibn Muḥammad Ibn al-Mustanṣir Ibn al-Hākim

1 The true pronunciation of this name is Guzūlah, with a hard G.

2 This is an allusion to the well-known grammatical example: ḡaraba Zaidun 'Amran (verberavit Zaidus Amrum.)

3 Read بہسکورہ in the printed text. All the secondary MSS. which I have consulted write this name wrong.

* Egyptian edition gives مكونه which is different from autograph reading.

Ibn al-'Azīz Ibn al-Mu'izz Ibn al-Manṣūr Ibn al-Qā'im Ibn al-Mahdi. We have already spoken of his father and other members of the family, and related how his father was murdered by Naṣr Ibn 'Abbās (no. 96), the same person who took away the life of al-'Ādil Ibn al-Sallār (no. 460), and, in our notice on the latter, we have indicated Naṣr's origin. On the morning which succeeded to the night of al-Zāfir's death, 'Abbās went to the Castle to pay his respects as usual, without appearing to have any knowledge of what had occurred and asked to see the prince. The people of the Castle were not yet aware of his death, for he had gone out secretly, as has been mentioned in the article to which we have just referred. As none of them knew that he had left the Castle, the eunuchs went in to ask his permission for 'Abbās to enter, but they found him not. They then proceeded to the hall of the ḥaram, but were informed that he had not passed the night there. In short, they sought for him in every part of the Castle where he might be expected to be found, but they could discover no sign of him, and they acquired the conviction that he had disappeared. 'Abbās then ordered the two brothers of al-Zāfir, Jibril and Yūsuf, the father of al-'Āḍid (no. 96-329), to be brought forth and addressed them thus: "You two have murdered our imām, and it is from you alone that we can learn where he is." They replied with great earnestness and perfect truth that they were innocent, but 'Abbās, put them to death on the spot, with the hope of thus diverting every suspicion from himself and his son. He then sent for al-Fā'iz, the son of al-Zāfir, a child of about five years old—some say, only two—and having seated him on his shoulder, he took his station in the palace-yard and gave orders that the amirs should be introduced. When they had entered, he said to them: "Here is the son of your master; his uncles have murdered his father, and I put them to death, as you may perceive. What is essential now is, that the authority of this infant should be fully recognised." To this they replied: "We hear and we obey!" and they uttered one single shout, so loud that the child was stunned by it and urined on 'Abbās's shoulder. They then gave him the surname of al-Fā'iz (the successful) and sent him back to his mother; but that shout had troubled his reason, and ever after, he suffered from constant attacks of falling-sickness and trembling fits. 'Abbās now proceeded to his own palace and, taking the direction of the state into his own hands, he ruled with uncontrolled authority. The secret of al-Zāfir's murder was discovered, however, by the people of the Castle, and they secretly plotted the death of 'Abbās and his son Naṣr. They wrote also to al-Ṣāliḥ Ibn Ruzzik the Armenian (no. 283) who was then governor of Munyah Ibn Khaṣīb in Upper Egypt, asking his assistance for themselves and their master, and encouraging him to revolt against 'Abbās. They cut off their hair (as a sign of mourning) and sent it to him in the letter, which was coloured in black (for the same reason). On reading the contents, al-Ṣāliḥ communicated them to the soldiers who were about him, and consulted with them on the subject. Having obtained their promise to support him, he drew over to his cause a troop of nomadic Arabs, and they all marched in a body towards Cairo, dressed in black (mourning). On their approach, the amlrs, soldiers, and Negro troops went forth from the city to join him, and 'Abbās, finding himself totally abandoned, left Cairo without a moment's delay, and fled with a portion of his riches. He was accompanied in his flight by his son Naṣr, the assassin of al-Zāfir, and by Usāmah Ibn Munqidh (no. 81) who, it is said, had given them the counsel of murdering their sovereign. Of this we have already spoken in the life of Ibn al-Sallār, but it is God only Who knoweth things hidden! They set out with a small band of followers, and took the road which leads to Syria through Aylah.<sup>1</sup> It was on the 14th of the first Rabi', A. H. 549 (May, A. C. 1154),* and they left Cairo, and Ibn Ruzzik entered the city without meeting any resistance. His first act was to dismount at the palace where 'Abbās made his residence, and which then bore the designation of the dār or palace of al-Māmūn al-Baṭā'iḥi,<sup>2</sup> but

1 'Aylah, or 'Aqabāt 'Aylah, is the fortress situated at the extremity of the eastern bifurcation of the Red Sea.

2 Abū 'Abd Allāh Muḥammad Ibn Mukhtār Ibn Bābak Baṭā'iḥi, surnamed al-Māmūn, was elected wazīr by the amirs of Egypt on the death of al-Afdal Shāhan-shāh. He was arrested and put to death by the Fāṭimite Khalīf al-ʿAmir, A. H. 519 (A. C. 1125-6). It was for al-Baṭā'iḥi that Abū Bakr al-Turtūshī composed his Sirāj al-Mulūk. (Nujūm. Ḥusn al-Muḥāḍarah).

* 29 May,—Ed.

which now serves as a Ḥanifite college and bears the name of al-Madrasah al-Suyūfiyah<sup>1</sup>, Having then sent for the little eunuch who had been with al-Ẓāfir when he was murdered, he told him to show where the body was interred. The eunuch pointed out the spot and, on tearing up the pavement which had been placed over it, they brought forth the corpse of al-Ẓāfir and those of the persons who had accompanied him and had been slain at the same time. The bodies were carried out, and people cut off their hair (in sign of mourning), whilst Cairo was filled with grief and lamentation. Al-Ṣāliḥ Ibn Ruzzīk, accompanied by all the persons in the city, walked on foot before the bier to the funeral chapel appropriated to the family, and which was a conspicuous object within the precincts of the Castle. He then took charge of the child al-Fā'iz and administered the state in his name. The sister of al-Ẓāfir wrote to the Franks at 'Asqalān,<sup>2</sup> offering a large sum of money in case they arrested 'Abbās. This induced them to sally forth to meet him, and in the combat which ensued, he lost his life, with his treasures, and his son was taken prisoner. Some of their companions escaped to Syria and, amongst the number, Ibn Munqidh. The Franks then placed Naṣr, the son of 'Abbās, in an iron cage and sent him under escort to Cairo, where the promised reward was immediately paid into the hands of their envoy. Naṣr being then delivered up, was deprived of his nose and ears, paraded through the city, and finally attached to a cross at the Zawilah Gate. The body was taken down and burnt on the day of 'Āshurah (10th of Muḥarram) A. H. 551 (March, A. C. 1156),* This, though rather a long relation, is only a summary of what passed. Naṣr, the son of 'Abbās, was taken into the Castle of Cairo on the 27th of the first Rabī', A. H. 550,† and he was brought out on Monday, the 26th of the latter Rabī'‡ of the same year. In the interval, his right hand had been cut

1 See no. 96 note on Suyūfiyah college.

2 The relation which follows agrees in many points with that of William of Tyre (l. xviii, c. 9).

* 5 March.—Ed.

† 30 May A. C. 1155,—Ed.

‡ 27 June A. C. 1155,—Ed.

off and his body torn with pincers. Some say, however, that he was brought out to be exposed on Friday, the eighth of the month. As for al-Fā'iz, he did not reign long; his birth took place on Friday the 21st of Muḥarram, A. H. 544 (June, A. C. 1149); * he was raised to the throne on the death of his father (in Muḥarram A. H. 549), and he died on the eve of Friday, the 17th of Rajab, A. H. 555 (July, A. C. 1160).† He had for successor al-Āḍid, of whom we have already spoken (no. 329) and who was the last prince of the dynasty.

490 AL-MALIK AL-MU'AZZAM IBN AL-ĀDIL.

Al-Malik al-Mu'azzam (the mighty prince) Sharaf al-Dīn (the nobleness of religion) 'Isā, the son of al-Malik al-Ādil (the just prince) Sayf al-Dīn (the sword of religion) Abū Bakr, the son of Ayyūb, was a sovereign of Damascus, highly respected for his lofty spirit, resolution, courage, and abilities, and in whom every man of talent found a patron and a friend. He was the first of the Ayyūbite family who professed the principles of the Ḥanīfite sect; to this doctrine he displayed a devoted attachment, and, in its study, he made no inconsiderable progress: the example which he thus set was followed by his children. Having set out from al-Karak to perform the pilgrimage to Makkah, on the 11th of Dhu 'l-Qa'dah, A. H. 611 (A. C. 1215),‡ he took for his conveyance the ordinary camels used by travellers, and followed the road to al-'Ulā' and Tabūk, with a band of chosen friends. This was the year in which he took Ṣarkhad from Ibn Qarājā and conferred it on his mamlūk 'Izz al-Dīn Aybak (afterwards) known by the title of Lord Ṣarkhad. Aybak held this place till A. H. 644 (A. C. 1246-7), when al-Malik al-Ṣāliḥ Najm al-Dīn Ayyūb, the son of

1 'Al-'Ula, a village in the canton of Wādī 'l-Qurā, is nearer to Madīnah than Diyār Ṭhamūd (the country of Ṭhamūd)." Marāʾid)

* 30 May.—Ed.

† 22 July.—Ed.

‡ 14 March.—Ed.

al-Malik al-Kāmil, wrested it from him and sent him to Cairo, where he was imprisoned in the palace of Ṣuwāb al-Ṭawāshī (the eunuch). Al-Malik al-Mu'azzam was a friend to literature, and a number of eminent poets celebrated his merit in their poems; the belles letters were cultivated by him as an amateur, and I have heard some pieces of verse which were stated to be his, but, as I neglected writing them down, I have forgotten them. It is said that he promised a gift of one hundred pieces of gold and a robe of honour to every person who got by heart al-Zamakhshārī's treatise (on grammar) the Mufaṣṣal, and this induced numbers to commit it to memory. I even met individuals at Damascus who were said to have learned it from this motive. It is related also that at the period of his death, there were some who had finished the book, and others who had got to the middle according to the time at which they had begun it. I never heard of any other person's having done so honourable an act. His principality was very large, extending from Emessa to al-'Arīsh (on the Egyptian frontier), and including all the (Syrian) coast then possessed by the Muslims, the Ghawr (or valley of the Jordan), Palestine, Jerusalem, al-Karak, al-Shawbak, Ṣarkhad, and other places. His birth took place, A. H. 578 (A. C. 1182-) but Ṣibt Ibn al-Jawzī<sup>1</sup> says in his Historical work, the Mir'āt al-Zamān: "Al-Malik al-Mu'azzam was born, A. H. 576, at Cairo, and his (half-) brother al-Ashraf Musā came into the world on the night before; he died on the eve of the first day of Dhu 'l-Hijjah, A. H. 624 (November, A. C. 1227)."* Another author states, however, that his death happened at Damascus, on the eighth hour of Friday, the 30th of Dhu 'l-Qa'dah, A. H. 624. His body was interred in the castle of that city, but, on the eve of Tuesday, the first of Muharram A. H. 627 (November, A. C. 1229),* it was removed to the College at Mount Ṣālihiyah,<sup>2</sup> which contains the tombs of some of his brothers and other members of the family. This college was founded by himself and therefore bore the designation of the Mu'azzamiyah. He used frequently to recite this passage:

1 See no. 183, note on Shams al-Din.

2 See no. 431 note.

* 12 November,—Ed.

"The mole on the rosy cheek of that slender waisted nymph adorns her with an excess of beauty.<sup>1</sup> She darkened her eyes with antimony though already dark of themselves, and I exclaimed; 'She gives us to drink of the sword, and has poisoned the draught.'"

This idea is similar to that which Ibn Ḥamdis al-Ṣaqqālī (no. 371) has expressed in the following line:

"To increase the darkness of her eyes, she applied antimony around them; poisoning the dart of which the point was already mortal."

May God have mercy upon this prince; he was so noble and so intelligent! Some anecdotes were related to me of what passed between him and Ibn 'Unayn,<sup>2</sup> wherein the penetration of the prince and the pertinency of his replies appeared to great advantage: one of them was, that Ibn 'Unayn, being unwell, wrote to him these lines:

"Look on me with the eye of a master ever beneficent; hasten to relieve me or I perish. Me and what I want, you require not; but gain my gratitude and a just eulogium."

Al-Mu'azzam immediately took a purse of three hundred pieces of gold and went in to visit him, and saying: "Here is the gift (ṣilat) and I am the visiter ('ā'id)."<sup>3</sup> Had this expression occurred to an able professional grammarian, to one who had

---

1 In this line there is a play upon the words خال and عم, the first of which signifies a mole and a maternal uncle, and the second to cover over, and a paternal uncle.

2 The life of Ibn 'Unayn is given in this work.

3 These words contain a very good quibble on two technical terms of grammar. To render it intelligible, let us take the Latin phrase homo quem vidi, and put it into Arabic. It would then become al-rajul alladhi ratuhu, literally, homo que vidi-m, where the m represents the m of quem. This construction is necessary in the Semitic languages because the relative pronoun is indeclinable. In such cases the relative is called the ṣilah, and the pronoun employed to mark its case is the 'ā'id. It may be seen from this that the 'ā'id must be accompanied by a ṣilah. Al-Mu'azzam avails himself of the double meaning of these terms to tell Ibn 'Unayn that visits and gifts go together.

passed his life in grammatical studies, it would have appeared surprisingly remarkable, coming even from him; how much more so then, when uttered by this prince! Numerous other anecdotes are told of him, too long to relate, but this may give an idea of the rest. He was succeeded by his son al-Malik al-Nāṣir (the assisting prince) Ṣalāḥ al-Dīn (excellence of religion) Dāwūd. This prince died on the 27th of the first Jumāda, A. H. 656 (May, A. C. 1258),* at a village called al-Buwayḍā, situated close to the gate of Damascus, and he was interred near his father. His birth took place at Damascus, on Saturday, the 17th of the first Jumāda, A. H. 603 (December, A. C. 1206).† 'Izz al-Dīn Aybak, the lord of Ṣarkhad, died in his prison at Cairo towards the beginning of the first Jumādā, A. H. 646 (August, A. C. 1248). He was interred outside the gate called Bāb al-Naṣr, in the college of Ṣhams al-Dawlat, and I attended his funeral service. His body was afterwards removed to a mausoleum in the college which he had erected on (the hill called) al-Sharaf al-A'lā (the loftiest pinnacle), outside Damascus, and which looks down on the Great Green Hippodrome.

491 'ISĀ AL-HAKKĀRĪ THE JURISCONSULT.

The faqih (jurisconsult) Abū Muḥammad 'Isā Ibn Muḥammad al-Hakkārī, surnamed Diyā al-Dīn (light of the faith), was one of the most influential amirs under Ṣalāḥ al-Dīn, highly respected for his rank and honoured (with the sovereign's) confidence for the justness of his views and the soundness of his advice. His genealogy, as follows here, was dictated to me by his nephew's son: 'Isā Ibn Muḥammad Ibn 'Isā Ibn Muḥammad Ibn Aḥmad Ibn Yūsuf Ibn al-Qāsim Ibn 'Isā Ibn Muḥammad Ibn al-Qāsim Ibn Muḥammad Ibn al-Ḥasan Ibn Zayd Ibn al-Ḥasan Ibn 'Alī Ibn

* 1 June.—Ed.

† 20 December, but the day according to Mahler's calculation was Wednesday. In the autograph it is not very legible but appears to be 27 Jumādā al-Ūlā (30 December) when the day also tallies.—Ed.

Abi Tālib. He began his career by studying jurisprudence at the Zajjājiyah College in Aleppo; <sup>1</sup> he then became imām to Asad al-Dīn Shirkūh, the uncle of Ṣalāh al-Dīn, and used to say the five prescribed prayers with him every day. When the amīr Asad al-Dīn proceeded to Egypt and obtained the Wazirship of that country (no. 272), 'Isā accompanied him, and, on his death, he concerted a plan with the eunuch Bahā al-Dīn Qarāqūsh<sup>2</sup> for raising Ṣalāh al-Dīn to the vacant post. The consummate address with which they conducted this intrigue was completely successful, but it would be too long to relate the particulars. Ṣalāh al-Dīn, being thus invested with authority, felt grateful to 'Isā for the service he had rendered, and, from that time, he placed the utmost reliance on him as a counsellor, and never rejected his advice. 'Isā continued to treat him with great familiarity, and spoke to him in terms so unceremonious that no other would have dared to use them. He was the means of doing much good, and numbers profited by the influence he derived from his rank; his favour continued with interruption till the last, and he died at the Camp (al-Mukhāyyam) near al-Kharrūbah, on the morning of Tuesday, the 9th of Dhu 'l-Qa'dah, A. H. 585 (December, A. C. 1189.* His body was borne to Jerusalem and interred outside the city. He used to wear the military dress with the turban of a jurisconsult, thus combining the two costumes; and I saw his brother, the amīr Majd al-Dīn Abū Ḥafṣ 'Umar, attired in a similar manner. Al-Kharrūbah is the name of a place near Acro ('Akkā). Majd al-Dīn 'Umar was born in Rajab, A. H. 560 (May-June, A. C. 1165), and he died at Cairo on the 23rd of Dhu 'l-Hijjah, A. H. 636 (July, A. C. 1239),† He was interred at the foot of Mount Muqāṭṭam, and I attended his funeral service.

492 FAKHR AL-DĪN 'ISĀ IBN MAWDŪD LORD OF TIKRĪT

Abū 'l-Manṣūr 'Isā Ibn Mawdūd Ibn 'Alī Ibn 'Abd al-Malik Ibn Shu'ayb, surnamed Fakhr al-Dīn (glory of religion), and lord

<sup>1</sup> See no. 99.

<sup>2</sup> His life is given by our author.

* 19 December,—Ed.

† 27 July,—Ed.

of the city of Tikrit, belonged to one of the Turcoman tribes settled in Syria. He possessed considerable talents, and left a dīwān of good poetry, spirited epistles, and tender couplets. As a specimen of his verses we may quote the following.

"The ringdove on the acacia branch, cooing plaintively in the darkness—driven from home by the hands of absence, and far removed from its family—now settled at the Zawrā of 'Irāq (Baghdād) whilst its callow brood remain fatigued at 'Uṣfān<sup>1</sup>—sighting for them when the sun sheds abroad his rays—lamenting and complaining during the hour of night—shaken in its afflicted heart by that recollection, and revealing the passion it concealed—the sufferings of that dove are less intense than mine, when the lightning-flash (announcing the blessings of rain) or the (perfumed) breath of the zephyr recall (your country, my friends ! or) yourselves to my remembrance."

A passage of a similar cast is the following, taken from one of his epistles : "(Imagine) a straggling flock of gazelles in the wide expanse of a desert<sup>2</sup> where the foot of man never trod, into which no fire-created demon ever entered,<sup>3</sup> and which the breath of noon gifted with the parching sighs of burning heat ;—a flock sinking under fatigue and overcome by the proximity of destruction ; after three nights of emulous speed they reach the pool they sought, emaciated by hardship and almost within the grasp of death ; they find the water clear, its surface rippling beneath the unsteady tread of the zephyr, and agitated by streamlets<sup>4</sup> gushing

1 "'Uṣfān is situated between al-Juhfah and Makkah ; or, it is said, between Makkah and Madīnah, at two days' journey from the former place ; some say that it is a large village, thirty-six miles from Makkah on the frontier of Tihāmah". (Marāṣid).

2 In the original Arabic this passage commences with a negative, and the scene is suspended till the reader comes to the second of the verses with which the phrase concludes. The effect is excellent in Arabic, but could not possibly be reproduced in English. It was therefore necessary in the translation to make a slight alteration in the form of the passages.

3 See Qurān, sūrat 55, verse 14, and read جان in the printed text.

4 Literally : manes ; waterfalls being compared to the manes of white horses from a heavenly source ; but they perceive no path whereby to reach that spot and take repeated draughts ;

'They eye it askance,<sup>1</sup> impelled by the pains of thirst to make a desperate (spring). (Well, my friends !) thirst such as theirs is not more ardent than mine for your presence, since that time wherein my heart was accustomed to your saluations.'

My wish and prayer are therefore addressed to Him Who prescribed duties to man,—Him the Lord of whatever moves and whatever remains fixed, that He to realise my hopes and replace our separation by mutual proximity ! It is He Who hearkeneth to the call (of the afflicted)."

The following is one of his dubayts<sup>2</sup> or couplets :

"Thou art mistress to grant or to refuse thy love ; O thou whose waving ringlets<sup>3</sup> revive my hopes. They say thou art a gazelle ; I answer : Mistake not ! where could the inhabitant of the desert procure ear-rings ?"

Ibn Mawdūd left many very elegant pieces in prose and verse. He was born in the city of Ḥamāt, and was murdered by his brothers in the Castle of Tikrit, A. H. 584 (A. C. 1188-9) ; the following year in the month of Shawwāl, one of them, named al-Yās, delivered up this place to the khalif al-Nāṣir. It will be perceived, in perusing the life of Muẓaffar al-Dīn Kükubürī, lord of Arbela, that Tikrit was one of the possessions of his father Zayn al-Dīn. The latter had a page called Tabar (a word written by some with the ordinary ت (t) and by others with the accented one (ṭ), on whom he conferred the government of al-'Imādiyyah, another of his possessions, and afterwards sent him to Tikrit. Zayn al-Dīn, having attained an advanced age and formed the resolution of removing to Arbela (see the life of his son Muẓaffar al-Dīn), ceded all the cities under his authority to Quṭb al-Dīn Mawdūd, the sovereign of Mosul ; but Tabar refused to deliver up Tikrit, and sent to Mawdūd informing him of his intention to

1 Read in the printed text خوازرآ .

2 The autograph has دو بیتمايه .

3 Literally ; O thou whose gracefully-formed 'idhār is my desire. See vol. I, Introduction.

hold it, and, as it was absolutely necessary for him (Mawdūd) to have a lieutenant in that place, that he was the man. Mawdūd, not daring to resist his pretensions lest he should deliver Tikrit to the khalif, passed over his conduct in silence and confirmed him in his post. On Tabar's refusal to let Tikrit out of his possession, Zayn al-Dīn was frequently heard to exclaim: "May God bring thee to shame, O Tabar! as thou hast brought me to shame before Qutb al-Dīn." Tabar held the fortress till his death, and left an only daughter, who became the wife of his brother's son, 'Isā Ibn Mawdūd, the subject of this notice. 'Isā obtained possession of Tikrit through this marriage, and he afterwards took a second wife, Maṭariyah,* by whom he had two sons, Shams al-Dīn, and Fakhr al-Dīn. Maṭariyah subsequently sought, by a (matrimonial) alliance, to secure the succession to her own offspring, and having married her son Shams al-Dīn to a daughter of Ḥasan Ibn Qifjāq<sup>1</sup> the amīr of the Turcomans, she requested of him a troop of fifty horsemen, to remain with them in Tikrit and guard that fortress. When news of this arrangement came to the knowledge of 'Isā Ibn Mawdūd's brothers, who were twelve in number, they attacked him and strangled him. Tikrit then fell into their power, but dissensions having arisen among them, the leading brother sold it to the imām (khalif) al-Nāṣir li-Dīn Allāh. Tikrit is a large town with a strong castle; it is situated on the Tigris, at about thirty parasangs above Baghdād, and on the same side of the river as Mosul. Tikrit was so called after Tikrit the daughter of Wā'il and sister to Bakr Ibn Wā'il. The castle itself was built by Sāpūr Ibn Ardashīr Ibn Bābak, the second prince of that Persian dynasty (the Sasanides).

493 AL-ḤĀJIRI AL-IRBILI.

Abū Yahyā, surnamed also Abu 'l-Faḍl, 'Isā Ibn Sinjar Ibn Bahrām Ibn Jibril Ibn Khumārtikin Ibn Ṭāshṭikin al-Irbili (native

1 Read قنجاق in the Arabic text.

* The name is not legible in the autograph. The Cairo edition gives Muṭribah. (a stinging girl) which may be a common noun, since in Egyptian edition subsequently al- (definite article) is also prefixed,—Ed.

of Arbela), generally known by the name of al-Ḥājirī and surnamed Ḥusām al-Dīn (sword of the faith) was a soldier of the regular troops (jundi), as his father before him. He left a diwān of poetry, principally in the sentimental style, and offering beautiful thoughts. This collection consists of poems, couplets (dubayt), and mawāliyyās<sup>1</sup>; three species of composition wherein he displayed great talent; this is a circumstance which is seldom observed, as the person who excels in one of them generally fails in the others. He wrote also some pieces of the kind called kāna wa kānu,<sup>2</sup> and these he occasionally turned with great elegance. He was an acquaintance of mine and recited to me a great deal of his poetry; I shall give here the following passage of his, containing a very good thought:

"That youth swore by every oath that, as long as time should endure, he would keep me company. He shunned me afterwards, and the 'idhār (dark hair) shaded his cheeks: 'Behold?' said I, 'how blackness covers the face of the liar!'"

He recited to me also the following lines:

"You have there a mole seated on a throne of anemony (a rosy cheek), which has sent thy ringlets as messengers to order mankind to love thee<sup>3</sup>."

A piece of his composition which he recited to me, descriptive of a mole, contained this verse:

"That cheek had not borne a mole, were it not designed to resemble the anemony flower.<sup>4</sup>

On the same subject:

"Behold that maid with the slender waist; her hair and her forehead shed darkness and light upon mankind. Blame not the mole upon her cheek; all anemonies have a black spot."

1 See vol. I, Introduction.

2 See Freytag's Darstellung der Arabischen Verskunst, p. 461.

3 In this verse, the word كاسر here rendered by messengers, bears also the meaning of propendula (coma). It is a mere quibble, but pleasing enough in Arabic.

4 The petals of the anemony are red and parts of fructification black.

Similar to this are the following lines by Ibn Waki' al-Tinnisi (no. 163) :

"The anemomy, on seeing the beauties of her face, wished to imitate them all ; it thus borrowed its redness from her cheek and its blackness from her mole."

Al-Ḥājiri recited to me the greater part of his couplets, and amongst others, the following, which he told me was one of the last things he composed, and that he was better satisfied with it than with any other piece of the kind which he had ever produced :

"A copious shower shed new life over the grounds (of the tribe of my beloved) ; O, how joyful was that year (Regions of) 'Alwah ! I shall never think of the days I passed in thy (happy valley) without complaining of the cruelty of later days."

I had a brother named Diyā al-Dīn (light of religion) 'Isā, and a close friendship subsisted between him and al-Ḥājiri. In the year 619 (A.C. 1222-3), whilst he was at Arbela, the latter wrote him the following lines from Mosul :

"O thou whose presence is my sole desire ! God well knows that our separation has left nought but a lingering spark of life ! Send then a letter and console therein the friends who may lament me, for I shall probably die before it arrives."

His collected poetical works are so well known and so generally read that it is an unnecessary task to lengthen this article by inserting more passages than we have already given. When I left Arbela towards the end of the month of Ramaḍān, A. H. 626 (August, A.C. 1229), he was detained a prisoner in the citadel there, for reasons too long to relate ; he had been confined, first in the fortress of Khufṭidakān, and then removed to Arbela. He composed some poems on his imprisonment, one of them commencing thus :

"Chains and a narrow prison causes my sufferings ; and often is the hair turned gray by anxious thoughts.

This poem contains the following passage :

"O lightning-flash ! if you approach the mansions of Arbela, and when your brightness is dimmed by the lustre of that proximity, offer there the salutation of an outcast whose sighs still follow closely in the train of love. Say to it for me: 'O beloved city! thou for whose welfare I would die! thy imprisoned son is the most ardent of thy lovers! By Allāh! never did the evening zephyr fleet towards the land of Najd, but I was always drowned in tears. How shall we meet, since frowning walls and bolted doors prevent us?"

The following lines also were composed by him when in prison:

"O my friends! what voice pronounces our separation! what misfortune has befallen us to tear us asunder? O, may time never more afflict us with the grief of parting!—that grief which already rent my inmost heart! Absent from you, I was ill at ease in the wide world; how now must I be, shut up in a narrow prison?"

I have been informed that, subsequently to this, he obtained his liberty and, having entered into the service of al-Malik al-Mu'azzam Muẓaffar al-Dīn, the sovereign of Arbela, he rose highly in his favour and adopted the dress of the Sūfīs. On the death of his patron (A. H. 630) left Arbela, but afterwards returned when it was in the possession of Shams al-Dīn Abu 'l-Faḍā'il Bātikīn, lieutenant of the Commander of the faithful [al-Mustanṣir bi-Allāh.*] During a long period he made it his constant residence, but, one day in the forenoon, as he went out, he was poignarded by an assassin who, for some time previously, had been in pursuit of him. When in the agonies of death, with his bowels protruding from the wound, he penned the following lines to Bātikīn:

"To thee, ruler of the land, I address my complaints; behold me in a state of terror which leaves not a member of body in repose! If a miserable wretch (laqīṭa) plunder me of my camels, in whose heart but thine can I hope to find a Māzin<sup>1</sup>? How strange that a man cannot walk without dread, although protected by the sanctuary of the Khalifate !”

<sup>1</sup> This is an allusion to a well known line of an ancient poet, given in the Ḥamāsah p. 4, and of which the meaning is: Had I been related to al-Māzin, the sons of al-Laḳī'a, of the tribe of Dhuhl Ibn Shaybān, had not carried off my camels."

* The name is omitted by de Slane.—Ed.

He expired the same, day, Thursday, the 2nd of Shawwāl, A. H. 632 (June, A. C. 1235)*, and was interred in the cemetery at the Hippodrome Gate (Bāb al-Maydān). He was then aged about fifty years.—Bātikīn was an Armenion by birth, and had been a mamlūk to the khalif al-Nāṣir's mother. When the Tartars took Arbela in their first invasion, towards the end of the year 634 (A. C. 1237), he returned to Baghdād, he died there on Wednesday, the 23rd of Shawwāl, A. H. 640 (April, A. C. 1243)†. His body was interred in the Shūnīzī cemetery.—Ḥājirī means native of Ḥājir; this was a village in Hijāz, but is now in ruins.—Al-Ḥājirī himself did not really belong to this place, but, as he made frequent mention of it in his poems, he obtained that particular surname; Arbela was however the native place of his family, the city in which he himself was born and had passed his youth. Notwithstanding this, the appellation of al-Ḥājirī prevailed, and became at length for him as a proper name. In allusion to this, he composed the following couplet :

“Had I been spared the pains of separation whilst I loved thee, my tears each night had not resembled a gushing spring. Were it not for thee, my mouth had never pronounced the name of Najd<sup>1</sup>; how far, how very far am I from Ḥājir !”

He again makes a similar declaration in a passage of a charming poem, which begins thus : “O the pretty dark eyes of that gazelle, the brunette” and of which the last verse is : “O thou little maid of Arbela, the unfortunate Ḥājirī is captivated by thy love.” Ibn al-Mustawfī mentions, in his History of Arbela, that Qurayyah Jibrīl, a place in that city, takes its name from the Jibrīl above mentioned.—Khuftīdakūn is a well-known fortress in

---

1 Najd, as has been already observed, was the arcadia of the Arabian poets.

* 21 June.—Ed.

† 15 April.—Ed.

the town of Arbela, it is called the Khufīdakān of Šārim al-Dīn, to distinguish it from the Khufīdakān of Abu 'Alī.

494 T̤UWAYS THE SINGER.

Abu 'l-Faraj al-Iṣṣpāhānī says, in his Kitāb al-Aghānī, that the real name of T̤uways was 'Isā Ibn 'Abd Allāh, and that he bore the surname of Abū 'Abd al-Mun'im till the Mukhannath<sup>2</sup> changed it into 'Abd al-Na'im (the slave of pleasure). He was a Mawlā to the Makh̤zūm family, and bore the surname of T̤uways. Ibn Qutaybah says, in his Kitāb al-Ma'ārif, in the article where he speaks of 'Āmir Ibn 'Abd Allāh, the companion of Muḥammad. "One of those who were mawlās to the Kurayz family was T̤uways, mawlā of 'Arwā, the daughter of Kurayz, her who was mother to 'Uthman Ibn 'Affān. His name was al-Mālik and his surname Abū 'Abd al-Na'im." Al-Jawharī says, in his Ṣaḥāḥ: "His real name was T̤awūs (peacock); but, when he became a Mukhannath, they changed it into T̤uways (little peacock), and he received also the name of al-Na'im." Such, as the reader may perceive, is the difference in the statements respecting his name; but it is generally said that 'Isā was his real name, in as much as it is a point on which the majority of the learned are agreed. T̤uways attained so high a reputation as a singer that his talent became proverbial; and it is to him a certain poet alludes in the following verse wherein he praises Ma'bad (see no. 465 note):

1 Khufīdakān: two large castles in the dependencies of Arbela; one situated on a hill by the road leading to Marāghah and called Khufīdakān al-Zarzari; the other, on the road to to Shahrazūr and called Khufīdakān Sarḥān; the latter is the larger and stronger of the two." (Marāṣid) It appears from this and from the words of Ibn Khallikān that those castles bore different names at different times.

2 The word Mukhannath signifies hermaphrodite, but it bears also the meanings of fool, an effeminate person, impotent, and muliebria patiens. I refer to what Reiske says on the subject in his notes on Abu 'l-Fedā; see Annales, tom. I adnot. hist. No. 200;

"Tuways sang, and after him al-Surayjī; but Ma'bad alone deserved the palm."

A long account of him is given in the Kirāb al-Aghānī. In the proverb, more inauspicious than Tuways, he is the person meant and the reason was this: he came into the world on the day of the Prophet's death; he was weaned the same day on which Abū Bakr died; he was circumcised on the day in which 'Umar Ibn al-Khaṭṭāb was assassinated—some say that he attained the age of puberty on that day—he got married on the day in which 'Uthmān was slain; and he became a father on the day in which 'Alī Ibn Abī Ṭālib, was murdered—some say, the day in which al-Ḥasan, the son of 'Alī, died. This was certainly a singular series of coincidences. He was extremely tall, awkward in his movement, and squinted. He resided at Madīnah, but afterwards removed to al-Suwaydā, a place at the distance of two 'days' journey from that city and on the road to Syria; he continued to dwell there till his death, which happened in A. H. 92

---

I Ce Souraydjī est le meme qu' Ibn Soruaydj, chanteur et compositeur d'un grand merite. II s'appelait Obayd et son prenom etait Abou Yahyā. II etait affranchi, on ne sait pas au juste de quelle famille et son pere etait Turc. II avait l'habitude de se voiler le visage Iorsqu'il chantait, afin de cacher aa laideur. Ce fut lui qui premier chanta a la Mekke des chansons arabes en s'accompagnant lui-meme avec un luth fait a la maniere des luths persans. II etait ne en cette ville sous le califat d'Omar fils de Kḥattab et il commença a chanter sous Othman. II etait d'abord simple nayeh (pleureur de morts, ou chanteur d'elegies funebres). Il abandonna ensuite ce genre dans lequel il avait trouve un egal en son eleve Gharidh, et se livra exclusivement au chant des autres poesies. Entre autres traits qui montrent la puissance de son talent, on cite celui-ci: Un jour etant assis aupres du jardin d'Ibn Amir, aumoment ou le cortege des pelerins defilait, il se mit a chanter. Le cortege s'arreta a l'instant; les pelerins montaient les uns sur autres pour l'approcher et l'entendre. II en resulta une affreuse confusion. Enfin un homme perçant la foule, dit a Ibn Soruaydj Crains Dieu et laisse continuer la marche. Ibn Souraydj cessa de chanter et s'en alla. Aussitot les pelerins reprirent leurs rangs et la colonne se remit en marche. Ibn Souraydj mourut d'elephantiasis a la Mekke. les uns disent sous le regne de 'Iscḥam fils d'Abdelmelik, a l'age d'environ 85 ans; suivant quelques autres, sous le califat de Souleyman fils d'Abdelmalik, selon d'autres, a la fin du regne de Welid fils d'Abdelmelik. (A. Caussin de Perceval.)

(A. C. 710-11), being then eighty-two years of age. Some state that he died at Madinah. Ya'qūb* al-Ḥamawī mentions, in his Muṣṭarīk, that Ṭuways the Mukhannath was interred at Suqya 'l-Jazl, but he does not indicate the situation of this place.—“Ṭuways,” says al-Jawharī, in the Ṣaḥāḥ, is the “diminutive of Tāwūs (peacock); and is regularly formed after the suppression of the redundant letters in the primitive word.” Mention is made of him by Abū Hilāl al-'Askarī<sup>2</sup> in his work, the Kitāb al-Awā'il

495 SAYF AL-DĪN ḠHĀZĪ IBN ZINKĪ.

Sayf al-Dīn (the sword of the faith) Ḡhāzī, the son of 'Imād al-Dīn Zinkī, (no. 229), the son of 'Āq Sunqur was sovereign of Mosul. We have already mentioned that his father Zinkī was murdered whilst beginning the castle of Ja'bar. Alp Arsilān, the son of the Sultān Maḥmūd, and surnamed al-Khafāji the Saljuq was there with him. On Zinkī's death, the chief men of the empire assembled, and with them the wazīr Jamāl al-Dīn Muḥammad Iṣpahānī, surnamed al-Jawād (the generous), and the qāḍī Kamāl al-Dīn Abū 'l-Faḍl Muḥammad al-Shahruzūrī, persons of whom notice will be again taken in another part of this work. They then proceeded to the tent of Alp Arsilān, and addressed him thus: “Zinkī was thy servant (ghulām), and we also thy servants, and all the country is thine.” By these words they calmed the general agitation, and the army separated in two divisions, one of which marched off for Syria, under the orders of Nūr al-Dīn Maḥmūd, son to 'Imād al-Dīn Zinkī<sup>1</sup>; and the other, being joined by the troops of Mosul and Diyār Rabī'ah, proceeded with Alp Arsilān towards Mosul. On their arrival at Sinjār Alp Arsilān suspected treason and took to flight, but was overtaken by a troop of soldiers and brought back. When they arrived at Mosul, presents were distributed to them by Sayf al-Dīn Ghāzī, who had been residing till then at Shahrūzūr, which place he held as a fief from the Saljūq Sultān Mas'ūd. (We shall give the life of this prince). As soon as Ghāzī was established at Mosul, he caused Alp Arsilān to be arrested, and sent him to a fortress where he remained a prisoner. Having thus become master of Mosul, and recovered the portion of Diyār Bakr which had been possessed by his father, he gave a regular organisation to his empire. As for his brother, Nūr al-Dīn Maḥmūd, a prince of whom we shall again have occasion to speak, he obtained possession of Aleppo and the neighbouring parts of Syria, but Damascus at that time was in the power of neither. Ghāzī was animated with the spirit of piety and virtue; he loved learning and learned men, and he built a college at Mosul, now known by the name of al-'Atīqah (the Old). His reign was but short, and he expired on the 29th of the latter Jumādā, A. H. 544 (November, A. C. 1149)*, aged about forty years. He was interred in the college of which we have just spoken. His brother Qutb al-Dīn Mawdūd, a prince whose life we shall give, succeeded to the vacant throne.

1 His life is given by Ibn Khallikān.

2 Abū Hilāl al-Ḥasan Ibn 'Abd Allāh Ibn Sahl Ibn Mihrān al-'Askarī, a learned philologist, studied under Abū Aḥmad al-'Askarī (see no. 156). He composed the following works; a commentary on the Qur'ān in five volumes; the Awā'il (origins), the Kitāb al-Ṣan'atayn (book of the two arts), on prose and verse; the Amthāl, (proverbs); a commentary on the Ḥamāsah (see Ḥājji Khalīfah). He left also a Dīwān of poetry. In his conduct he was most exemplary. He died subsequently to A. H. 400 (A. C. 1009). (Al-Suyūṭī de Inter-pretibus Corani; ed. Meursinge. Lugd Bat. 1839). Ḥājji Khalīfah places his death in 395 (A. C. 1004-5). (See Flügel's Hājji Khalīfah, tom. I, p. 490).

* Cairo edition gives Yāqūt the surname of Ya'qūb.—Ed.

496 GhĀZĪ IBN MAWDŪD.

Sayf al-Dīn (the sword of the faith) Ghāzī, the son of Qutb al-Dīn Mawdūd<sup>2</sup>, the son of Zinkī (no. 229), the son of 'Āq-Sunqur, and sovereign of Mosul, was a brother's son of the

1 The life of this Mawdūd is given by Ibn Khallikān.

2 The life of Maḥmūd will be found in this work.

* 3 November.—Ed.

prince whose life has just been given. He succeeded to the empire on the death of his father Mawdūd. His son, Sanjar Shāh, ruled at Jazīrat Ibn 'Umar. When his father died (A. H. 562), the intelligence reached Nūr al-Dīn at Tall Bāshir, who set out the same night for Mosul. He reached al-Raqqah in the month of Muḥarrama, A. H. 566 (Sept.-Oct., A. C. 1170), and having taken possession of that city, he proceeded to Naṣībīn and occupied it towards the end of the same month; he then reduced Sinjār, in the month of the latter Rabi', and marched from thence towards Mosul. Having led his army across the ford at Balad, a village near Mosul, he continued to advance, and finally established his camp opposite the city. Not wishing to reduce it by force, he acquainted Sayf al-Dīn, who was his brother's son, with his real intentions, and, a peace having been concluded between them, he made his entry into Mosul on the 13th of the first Jumādā (Jan., A. C. 1171)*; having then confirmed the reigning sovereign in the possession of the throne, he received his daughter in marriage, and gave up Sinjār to his own brother, 'Imād al-Dīn Zinkī, the same prince of whom mention has been already made in the life of his grandfather, 'Imād al-Dīn Zinkī. On leaving Mosul, he returned to Syria, and entered Aleppo in the month of Shābān of the same year (April-May). On the death of Nūr al-Dīn (the Sultān) Ṣalāḥ al-Dīn obtained possession of Damascus, and afterwards laid siege to Aleppo. Sayf al-Dīn then sent an army (against him) under the command of his own brother, 'Izz al-Dīn Mas'ūd, a prince whose life will be found in this work, and the two parties came to an engagement at Qurūn, near Ḥamāt. The particulars of this action will be given in our biography of Mas'ūd. 'Izz al-Dīn Mas'ūd having been defeated, Sayf al-Dīn marched out in person, and the two armies drew up at Tall al-Sultān, a village between Aleppo and Ḥamāt. This was on Thursday morning, the 10th of Shawwāl, A. H. 571 (April, A. C. 1176)†. 'Imād al-Dīn al-Iṣpahānī states in his work entitled al-Barq al-Shāmi, as also Ibn Shaddād, in his History of Ṣalāḥ al-Dīn<sup>1</sup>, that the left wing of that prince's army was broken by Muẓaffar al-Dīn, son of Zayn al-Dīn<sup>2</sup> who commanded Sayf ad-dīn's right wing; then Ṣalāḥ al-Dīn charged at the head of his troops, and routed the army of Sayf al-Dīn who returned to Aleppo and proceeded afterwards to Mosul. The Muẓaffar al-Dīn of whom we have spoken was sovereign of Arbela, and his life will be found in this work—Ghāzī continued in possession of his empire, but, being attacked by a chronical disorder, he died on Sunday, the 3rd of Ṣafar, A. H. 576 (June, A. C. 1180)*, after a reign of ten years and some months. He was succeeded by his brother 'Izz al-Dīn Mas'ūd.—The malady which afflicted him was a lingering consumption, and he died at the age of about thirty years.

---

* 22 January.—Ed.

† 22 April.—Ed.

497 AL-MALIK AL-ZĀHIR, SOVEREIGN OF ALEPPO.

Abu 'l-Faṭḥ Ghāzī, surnamed also Abū Maṣṣūr, and entitled al-Malik al-Zāhir (the protecting prince) Ghiyāth al-Dīn (aid to the faith), was a son of the Sulṭān Ṣalāḥ al-Dīn Yūsuf Ibn Ayyūb, and sovereign of Aleppo. The character of this prince procured him general respect; he was resolute, vigilant, studious of the welfare of his subjects, well acquainted with the proceedings of (contemporary) princes, animated with a lofty spirit, skilful in the administration and government of the empire, diffusing justice throughout the land, fond of the learned, and generous to poets. His father granted him the kingdom of Aleppo in the year 582 (A. C. 1186-7), on the abdication of his (al-Zāhir's) uncle, al-Malik al-'Ādil<sup>2</sup>, who, as is well known, accepted another post. From amongst the curious anecdotes told of his quick apprehension, the following may be cited as an example: Having taken his seat one day to review his troops, the (members of the) war office, who were in

1 See Schulten's Vita et res gestae Saladini, p. 43.

2 The lives of all these persons will be found in this work.

3 His life will be found in this work.

* 29 June.—Ed.

their place before him, questioned each soldier successively as he came up, and inscribed his name in the register. One of them being asked what he was called, kissed the ground in reply. None of the clerks understood his meaning, and when they repeated the question, al-Malik al-Zāhir, who had immediately perceived the motive of his conduct, said : "His name is Ghāzi ;" and this was really the case : the soldier having abstained through respect, from pronouncing a name similar to that of the Sulṭān. Numerous stories of this kind are related of him, but it is needless to lengthen our article by repeating them. He was at Cairo, on the 16th of Ramaḍān, A. H. 568 (May, A. C. 1173)*, in the eighth year of his father's reign in Egypt ; and he died at the castle of Aleppo, on the eve of 23rd of the latter Jumādā, A. H. 613 (October, A. C. 1216)†. He was interred in the castle, but the Ṭuwāshī (eunuch) Shihāb al-Dīn Ṭughril the atābek (tutor) of his son, al-Malik al-'Azīz, having founded a college at the foot of the castle and erected in it a funeral chapel, caused the body of al-Zāhir to be removed thither. It is a singular coincidence that the very day and very month in which he died were the same in which he made his entry into Aleppo as sovereign in the year 585. The poet Abu 'l-Wafā Sharaf al-Dīn Rājiḥ<sup>1</sup> Ibn Ismā'il Ibn Abi 'l-Qāsim al-Asadi al-Ḥillī has displayed no inferior talent in the following qaṣīdāh, wherein he laments al-Malik al-Zāhir's death, and celebrates the praises of his two sons, the Sulṭān Muḥammad al-Malik al-'Azīz ( the mighty prince ) and ( Aḥmad ) al-Malik al-Ṣāliḥ ( the virtuous prince ), the sovereign of 'Ayn Tāb<sup>2</sup> :

"Ask of the fate, provided it hearken to him that summons it, whom it has clutched in its beak and its talons ? Reproach it, I implore thee, with the calamities it inflicts, even though it turn away the ear from him who reproaches it. May God protect me ! how often, in my amazement, have I turned my eyes towards the

---

1 Read راجح . Further notice is taken of this poet at the end of this article.

2 'Ayn Tāb lies at three days's journey to the north of Aleppo.

* 30 April,—Ed.

† 7 October,—Ed.

sky of glory of which all the stars have set ! What has happened to me ? The light of al-Shahbā (Aleppo) is, for me, changed into impenetrable darkness ! Is it then true that the sacred person of the warrior al-Ghāzī the assister (Ghiyāth), the son of Yūsuf, has not been respected, and that his splendid retinue is frustrated of his presence ?—Alas ! 'tis too true ! the sun of our eulogiums is eclipsed ; the heavens of glorious deeds have been rolled up, and the paths of prosperity are straitened. Who can tell me about that mountain (of glory) ? did its foundations sink ? or did its side yield to the stroke of death ? Yes ! that mountain, firm as it was, has been shaken ; and its shoulders have trembled before the storms of fate. That ocean of (beneficence), once overflowing, and whose waves dashed to earth's remotest bounds, is now dried up ! Blasted be the hand of fate ! what a spiteful sword did it wield against such glory ! broken be the blade of that sword ! Though the rain drops of Ghiyāth al-Dīn's beneficence be now withheld, its showers were once shed over every land. How can the man who lived in hope and now finds his effort fruitless—how can he feel pleasure in life after the loss of Ibn Yūsuf ? His desires have obtained no success ; his camels have not halted in a land of bounty ; their pasture was the parsimonious gift of a frowning year<sup>1</sup> and his (empty) saddlebag is dissatisfied with its owner. He is gone, the prince, who placed mankind under the shadow of his justice, and secured them from the treacherous strings of fate<sup>2</sup>. How many haughty fortresses have been violated by his sword ! how many the unprotected whom his squadrons have defended ! I now see the throne of the empire vacant ; is there one among you to tell me where is its master ? If any ask me wherefore flow my tears, my heart may give him answer with its sighs. How many wounds cover (our) faithful hearts, consumed, alas ! with burning grief whilst the female mourners are lamenting ! Has he yielded before the points of his spears were broken ?—before the edges of his swords were blunted in the combat ? before his warriors

---

1 Read معبس حقه .

2 Literally: Who secured them from fate of which the scorpions crawl.

recoiled from the shock of death ? before his war-horses were overwhelmed by the ranks of the foe ? Was no vengeance taken in a day of dreadful battle, where his steeds might be seen dashing through the clouds of dust ? O thou who hast clothed me in an ample robe of grief ! would it be right in me to let consolation strip it off ? I served thee faithfully whilst the garden of thy glory covered me with its shade—whilst the lake of thy generosity offered its limpid draughts. Thou badest me draw near and sit in a place of honour, because I spoke thy praises ; yet these were acted by thy virtues and could apply to thee alone. (But now, when I seek thy wonted presence) why does the permission tarry ? I who was never of those whom the usher repelled from the palace-door ! On the day we lost thee, the sun withheld his light ; and yet, that day no eclipse obscured his disk. How could the sword of thy resolution be thus blunted ? How could the steed of generosity have stumbled whilst thou were its rider. O Ghiyāth ! who will shed kindness upon the orphans, when showers quench<sup>1</sup> no longer the thirsty years ? Who will now uphold the princes for whom thou wert a protecting shade in every vicissitude of fortune. O thou who hast abandoned me ! behold me now offer peace to my enemy ; when he injures me in earnest, I must take it as a jest. May the grey<sup>2</sup> clouds of morning water thy grave ; may the copious rains of evening descend upon it ! Though the light of thy flambeau be quenched, yet long did its rays dispel the darkness of night. But now, in the Mighty prince<sup>3</sup> Muḥammad, we find what we were expecting—a morning dawn to guide us—a hero in whom the lofty pride and dignity of his fathers fail not ; who subdues every adversary. But he who had his father for guide in noble enterprises, cannot but reach the object of his efforts. And al-Ṣāliḥ promotes the welfare of his subjects ; he is for them a guardian whose salary shall not be withheld. To behold true kings, let mortals look on Aḥmad and Muḥammad ; all other princes will then appear contemptible. They have attained the goal of honour which Ghāzi the son of Yūsuf already reached, and the

1 Read ينقع , and, two verses higher up, read كاف .

2 Read الغمر .

3 This is an allusion to the prince's surname.

glory which he acquired did not fade in their possession. Were it not for them, the horizon of the world had been darkened from east to west on the death of Ghāzī. Despite of Fortune, their territories shall be protected by lances the points of which bear death to lions. How many misfortunes whose first stroke was painful, and which yet ended in a joy! O ye two propitious moons which have dispelled the darkness (of affliction), so that the last of its flying bands turned not back towards the earth; shall thy father's slave and eulogist remain in Aleppo, or must his camels depart with their burden? We have lost al-Ghiyāth; but if you will, you can assist a man wounded by the arrows which misfortune aimed against him. I am now as if I had never stood before him, addressing him (on each success) with loud congratulations, whilst his gifts smiled in the faces of my hopes. May you both enjoy the rank you have attained, and may you be preserved till you reach the highest station in an exalted empire!"

This qaṣīdah, so remarkable for its elegance, contains some passages borrowed from the elegy composed by 'Umārat al-Yamāni on the death of al-Ṣāliḥ Ibn Ruzzīk, and of which we have already quoted a portion (no. 283). It would seem that our poet had taken the piece for his model; the measure is certainly the same, and although the penultimate letter in which it rhymes is different, the waṣl, or final letter, is the same. He must probably have read 'Umārah's poem and composed his own in imitation of it.—On the death of al-Malik al-Zāhir, the supreme authority and the sovereignty of Aleppo devolved to his son, Abu 'l-Muẓaffar Muḥammad, surnamed al-Malik al-'Aziz (the mighty prince) Ghiyāth al-Dīn (aid to the faith). This prince was born at Aleppo, on Thursday the 5th of Dhu 'l-Hijjah, A. H. 610 (April, A. C. 1214)*, and he died in that city on Wednesday, the fourth of the first Rabi', A. H. 634 (November, A. C. 1236†. I was at Aleppo when his death took place. He was interred in the castle, and his son, Abu 'l-Muẓaffar Yūsuf, surnamed al-Malik al-Nāṣir (the helping prince) Ṣalāḥ al-Dīn

* 17 April,—Ed.

† 5 November,—Ed.

(the weal of religion), was raised to the throne. This prince's kingdom acquired great extension, as he obtained possession of a number of towns in Mesopotamia after the death of the Khuwārazmites, towards the latter end of the year 641 and the commencement of 642<sup>1</sup>. In that campaign his army was commanded by al-Malik al-Manṣūr, lord of Emessa. He then obtained possession of Damascus and the province of Syria, on Sunday, 17th of the latter Rabi', A. H. 648 (July, A. C. 1250*). His birth took place in the castle of Aleppo, on the 12th of Ramaḍān, A. H. 627 (August, A. C. 1230†). When the Tartars came against him and obtained possession of Syria, he went forth from Damascus, in the month of Ṣafar, A. H. 658 (Jan.-Feb., A. C. 1260), and lost his life near Marāghah, in the province of Adh̄arbā'iyyān, on the 23rd of Shawwāl (October) of that year‡: so, at least, it has been stated. His history is well known<sup>2</sup>.—His uncle Aḥmad the son of al-Malik al-Zāhir, lord of 'Ayn Tāb. and surnamed al-Malik al-Ṣāliḥ (the virtuous prince) Ṣalāḥ al-Dīn (weal of religion), died at that place in the month of Sha'bān, A. H. 651 (October, A. C. 1253). He was born at Aleppo, in the month of Ṣafar, A. H. 600 (Oct.-Nov., A. C. 1203).—Although al-'Aziz was younger than his brother al-Ṣāliḥ, they chose him for sovereign, because his mother, Ṣafīyyah Khātūn, was daughter to al-Malik al-'Adil Ibn Ayyūb; they were decided in their preference by the fact of his descent from such a grandfather, and of his possessing (such powerful) maternal uncles, whilst al-Ṣāliḥ's mother was only a concubine.—Al-Sharaf (Sharaf al-Dīn) al-Ḥilli (native of Hillah), one of the most celebrated poets of that time, died at Damascus on the eve of the 27th day of Sha'bān, A. H. 627 (July, A. C. 1230§). He was interred outside the city, near the mosque of al-Nārinj, which edifice is situated to the east of Muṣalla of 1 See Abu 'l-Feda's Annals and M. Reinaud's Extraits, page 444.

2 See, in the index to Deguignes's Histoire generale des Huns, the name: Iousouf (naser).

* 17 July,—Ed.

† 1 August,—Ed.

‡ 1 October,—Ed.

§ 12 July,—Ed.

the Festival. He was born in the middle of the month of the latter Rabi' A. H. 570 (November, A. C. 1174).

498 DHU 'L-RUMMAH

Abu 'l-Hārith Ghaylān Ibn 'Uqbah Ibn Buhaysh<sup>1</sup> Ibn Mas'ūd Ibn Hārithah Ibn 'Amr Ibn Rabi'ah Ibn Sā'idah Ibn Ka'b Ibn 'Awf Ibn Rabi'ah Ibn Milkān Ibn 'Adi Ibn 'Abd Manāt Ibn Udd Ibn Ṭābikhah Ibn al-Yās Ibn Muḍar Ibn Nizār Ibn Ma'add Ibn 'Adnān, generally known by the surname of Dhu 'l-Rumma, was a poet of the first rank and enjoyed great celebrity. It is related that, as he was reciting his verses in the camel-market, he said to al-Farazdaq, who stopped to hear him: "Well, Abū Firās! what dost thou think of that which thou hast heard?" and that al-Farazdaq replied: "What thou hast uttered is really admirable." "Why then," said the other, "is my name not mentioned with those of the first-rate poets?"—"Thou hast been prevented from attaining their eminence," answered al-Farazdaq, "by the lamentations over dunghills, and thy descriptions of the excrements of cattle and their pinfolds<sup>2</sup>."—He was one of the celebrated Arabian lovers and his mistress Mayyah was the daughter of Muqātil Ibn Ṭalabah Ibn Qays Ibn 'Āṣim al-Minqari. This Qays Ibn 'Āṣim was the same who went to the Prophet with the deputies of the tribe of Tamim; The Prophet received him honourably and said: "Thou art the lord of the people of the hair (tents)<sup>3</sup>."—"But Abū 'Ubayd<sup>4</sup> al-Bakrī calls her Mayyah, the daughter of 'Āṣim Ibn Ṭalaba Ibn Qays Ibn 'Āṣim—Dhu 'l-Rumma of tent extolled her beauty in his poems, and it is to this couple of lovers

1 The autograph has هش.

2 Al-Farazdaq's observation will be perfectly comprehensible to any person who has read the opening lines of an Arabic qasidah composed in the first ages of that literature. See the Introduction to vol. I.

3 The people of the hair-tents, the Bedwine Arabs.

4 Read عبد. See no. 130.

that Abū Tammām (no. 143) alludes in one of his qaṣīdahs, where he says :

"Mayyah's cottage inhabited by herself, with Ghaylān lurking about it, was not more fair, by its hills, than the cottage of my mistress though it be now deserted."

Ibn Qutaybah (no. 306) relates as follows in his Ṭabaqāt al-Shu'arā : "Abū ʿĪrār al-Ghanawī said<sup>1</sup> : 'I saw Mayyah and, behold she had with her children of her own !'—'Describe her ;' said I.—'Her face and cheeks were long,' said he, 'her nose was aquiline and her countenance still exhibited traces of beauty !' 'Did she repeat to thee any of Dhū 'l-Rummah's verses ?'—She did."—For a long time Mayyah had been hearing the verses of Dhū 'l-Rummah but had never yet seen him ; she therefore vowed to sacrifice a camel the very day she cast her eyes upon him. But when she did see him, she found him an ugly swarthy man, whilst she herself possessed great beauty : "O, how ugly ;" she exclaimed, "how horrid !" and to this Dhū 'l-Rummah replied by the following lines :

"On Mayyah's face is a varnish of beauty, but be assured her dress conceals her ugliness. Knowest thou not that the taste of water is bad, and yet its colour is clear and pure ? How completely thrown away was that poetry so long continued and which ended in Mayyah's praise ! but then I could not control my heart."

Amongst the verses of his which have become quite popular, are the following on Mayyah :

The breezes, blowing from the quarter of Mayyah's people, agitate my heart with a passion which draws tears from my eyes ; but every soul loves the spot where its mistress dwells."

Dhū 'l-Rummah celebrated also the charms of Kharqā ; a member of the tribe of Bakkā<sup>2</sup> Ibn 'Āmir Ibn Ṣa'ṣa'ah, The cause of his praising her beauty was, that, being on a journey, he passed near some Bedwin Arabs, and lo ! Kharqā came forth from a tent. And he looked at her, and she left an impression on his heart. He therefore tore his water-skins and, approaching her that he might taste of her discourse, he said : "I am a man (mounted) on the back of travel, and my water-skins have been torn ; so mend them for me,"—"By Allāh !" she exclaimed, "a very pretty occupation for me who am the Kharqā."—The Kharqā is a female who is allowed to do no work on account of the fondness which her family bear her.—From that time Dhu 'l-Rumma extolled her beauty and called her Kharqā, and it is she whom he means in the following verses, which are extremely emphatic :

1 It is chronologically impossible that this conversation could have taken place between Abū ʿĪrār and Ibn Qutaybah. The latter must be supposed to speak here, not in his own name, but in that of the person who related to him the anecdote.

2 Bakkā'i was the surname of Rabī'ah Ibn 'Āmir. I have since discovered the origin of this surname in al-Maydānī, and it is really, as Ibn Khallikān states (no. 232) too improper to be mentioned. See Freytag's Meldani, vol. I, p. 404, No. 176.

"Kharqā's two water-skins, worn and weak in the seams, which the water-carrier wishes to pour out, but finds not therein a single drop<sup>1</sup>, are even more retentive of their contents than thy eyes are of their tears, as often as thou thinkest of a vernal cottage or of a station where a tribe sojourns."

Al-Mufaḍḍal al-Ḍubbi<sup>2</sup> related as follows ; "As I was going on the pilgrimage I stopped with a desert Arab, and he said to me one day : 'Wouldst thou like me to show the Kharqā, the beloved of Dhu 'l-Rumma ?' 'If thou doest that,' said I, 'thou wilt cure me (of all my pains).' We then proceeded together to find her, and he made me turn off the road for about a mile, till we came to some tents covered with hair cloth. He then asked at a tent to open for him and, on its opening, there came out to us a female, tall, hussānah and in the force of age."—A hussānah woman is one greater in beauty than the (simple) ḥasnā, or handsome. "I then saluted, and sat down, and we conversed for a time, when she said to me : 'Didst thou ever make the pilgrimage ?'—'More than once,' said I.—'And what then has hindered thee from visiting me ? dost thou not know that I am one of the objects to be visited during the pilgrimage ?'—'And how is that ?'—'Hast thou never heard what thy uncle Dhu 'l-Rumma said :

1 Literally : Which the water-carrier pours out, but is not wetted.

2 This philologist is noticed by Ibn Khallikān.

'To complete the pilgrimage, the caravan should stop at Kharaqā's (abode) whilst she is laying aside her veil.'

Dhu 'l-Rumma composed numerous eulogiums on Bilāl Ibn Abī Burdah (no. 295), and it is of him he speaks in the following line addressed to camel Ṣaydaḥ.

"When thou reachest Bilāl the son of Abū Mūsā, the butcher may wield his axe to disjoint thy limbs."

This idea was taken by him from a verse of a poem addressed by al-Shammākh<sup>1</sup> to 'Arābat al-Awsī<sup>2</sup>, and in which he says to his camel :

"When thou hast borne me and my baggage to 'Arābah be choked with thy heart's blood !"

After him came Abū Nūwās, who in his poem on al-Amīn Muḥammad, the son of Hārūn al-Rashīd, revealed the real nature of the thought and set it forth clearly saying :

"When the camels bear us to Muḥammad, let their backs be for ever interdicted to riders !"

A learned man, whose name I do not at present recollect, expressed himself thus, on reading the verse of Abū Nuwās : "By Allāh ! this is the very thought about which the Arabs were always turning, but could not hit it : al-Shammākh expressed it thus, and Dhu 'l-Rumma thus"—here he quoted the lines above mentioned—"But none of them set it forth in its true light except Abū Nuwās, and he there attained the height of beauty. The origin of this idea is to be found in the words addressed by the Anṣārian female who had been imprisoned at Makkah and succeeded in making her escape on a camel and joining the Prophet. When she reached him, she said : "O messenger of God ! I vowed that, if I escaped on this camel I would sacrifice it."

1 Chammakh fils de Dhirar de la tribu de Dhobyān, est un poète qui a vécu dans le paganisme et l'islamisme. Son véritable nom était Makal مقل , Il est un de ceux qui ont satirisé leur propre tribu et leurs hōtes. Il excellait à faire la description des ânes. Le calife Weliid fils d'Abd el-Malik disait à ce sujet : Chammakh connaît et peint si bien les ânes qu'il faut croire qu'il en compte quelqu'un parmi ses ancêtres. A. C. de Perceval.

2 'Arābat al-Awsī was probably one of the Prophet's companions.

And the Prophet replied : 'It is a bad recompense thou makest it.' The thought of which we are speaking is equivalent to the following : 'I have no need of travelling to any other than thee, for thou hast satisfied my wants and made me rich.' But al-Shammākh promised to his camel that she should be sacrificed, and Dhu 'l-Rummah makes a similar vow ; but Abū Nuwās declares that the back of his shall never be profaned by a rider, and he grants rest to the animal after the fatigues of its travels ; this is the best expression of the sentiment, for he does good to the camel in return for the service which it rendered by bearing him to the person whose qualities he means to laud."—"Dhu 'l-Rummah had three brothers, Hishām, Awfā, and Mas'ūd ; Awfā died first, and Dhu 'l-Rummah followed, and Mas'ūd lamented their death in the following lines."—Such are the words of Ibn Qutaybah, but the author of the Ḥamāsah gives a different account of the verses in the elegiac section of his work<sup>1</sup> :

"The loss of Ghaylān suspended my grief for Awfā's death, although my eyes were already filled with tears. My latter afflictions did not make me forget Awfā, but a wound on a part already wounded is the most painful of any."

These verses are merely an extract from Mas'ūd's piece. It is to the same Mas'ūd that Abū Tammām alludes in a poem where he says :

"Did even Mas'ūd water their ruined dwellings with torrents from his eyes, I should not be one of Mas'ūd's ( men )."

Speaking of this verse Abu 'l-Qāsim al-'Āmidī<sup>2</sup> says in his Muwāzanah : Mas'ūd was brother to Dhu 'l-Rummah, and he used to blame him for his (composing) lamentations on ruined dwellings (in the desert) ; this led Dhu 'l-Rummah to speak of him in these terms ;

---

1 The author of the Ḥamāsah says that this elegy was made on the deaths of Dhu 'l-Rummah and Awfā Ibn Dalham, a different person from Dhu 'l-Rummah's brother. See Ḥamāsah, page 368, where the piece is given with a commentary.

2 See no. 143

'—On the evening when the tear-drop trickled down my cheek and Mas'ūd said: Is it over a (deserted) dwelling that thou weepest when the pains of love excite thy tears? and yet thou art a man whom our people consider as a sage.'

Abū Tammām means to say (in the verse before these) that if Mas'ūd abandoned his opinion and became a weeper over ruins, he would not be (one of) his. Now as Mas'ūd really held the opinion (that lamenting over ruins was absurd), Abū Tammām's threat of renouncing him is expressed with the utmost energy; indeed it is analogous to the following: If Ḥātim were avaricious or al-Samaw'al faithless, I should not be one of theirs<sup>1</sup>, and this is a certainly much more energetic than to say: If the miser were avaricious, and if the traitor were faithless, I should not be one of theirs." Such is the meaning of al-'Āmidī's observations, but he expressed them in other terms.—The anecdotes told of Dhū 'l-Rummaḥ are very numerous but we prefer being brief. He died A. H. 117 (A. C. 735-6). On the approach of death he said: "I have reached my fortieth year." He then recited this verse: "O thou who art to take away my soul when it must appear for judgment! O pardoner of sins! keep me far from the fires of hell."

He was called Dhū 'l-Rummaḥ for having said of a tent-peg: "A stake fastened to a piece of an old rope (rummaḥ) which had been used as a halter<sup>2</sup>." Rummaḥ means a worn-out rope, and the same word, but pronounced rimmaḥ, signifies a mouldering bone. Abū 'Amr Ibn al-'Alā said (no. 480): "Poetry finished with Dhū 'l-Rummaḥ and rajjaz<sup>3</sup> with Rū'bah Ibn al-'Ajjāj." It was here observed to him that Rū'bah was still living, on which he answered: "It is true, but his talent for poetry is worn out like his clothes and gone like his faculty for tasting, and for enjoying sexual pleasure." They then said to him: "And these, our later poets (what thinkest thou of them)?" To which he replied: "They are patchers and botchers, and a burden to all but themselves."

1 Ḥātim's name was proverbial for the generosity of his conduct, and the fidelity of al-Samaw'al was not less celebrated. See Rasmussen's Addimenta, page 14.

2 The surname Dhū 'l-Rummaḥ means old-ropeman.

3 See no. 222,

He said again: "Poetry began with Imra' al-Qays and ended with Dhu 'l-Rummah." * [It was related by Abū 'Amr Ibn al-'Alā that Jarīr (no. 127) said: "Had Dhu 'l-Rummah kept silent from the time he recited his qaṣīdah which begins thus: 'Why flow these tears from thy eyes?' he would have been the greatest poet among men."—Abū 'Amr relates also that he heard Dhu 'l-Rummah say: "When a traveller stops at our tent, we ask him which he prefers, new milk or buttermilk? and if he answers: 'Buttermilk'; we say: whose slave art thou? but if he answers: 'New milk' we say. 'Who art thou?'—"Dhu 'l-Rummah's verses", said Abū 'Amr, "are like the sugar-plums scattered at a marriage feast; disappear quickly: or they are like the dung of gazelles; at first, it has an odour but it soon becomes mere dung." We shall now close our observations by the summary remark that he was one of the most illustrious among the poets of his age, and one of the most able versifiers of his time.—Muḥammad Ibn Ja'far Ibn Sahl al-Kharā'ī<sup>1</sup> states, in his I'tilāl al-Qulūb (distractions for the heart) that Muḥammad Ibn Salamah al-Ḍubbi<sup>2</sup> retated as follows: "I made the pilgrimage, and, on my return, I went towards a certain watering-place; and I saw a house at distance from the road. I then halted in the court of it and said: 'May I get down?' And the lady of the house answered: 'Get down.'—'May I go in?' said I; and she replied: 'Come in.' And lo! there was a maiden fairer than the sun, and I sat down to converse with her, and (words like) pearls were scattered from her lips. Whilst we were thus engaged, an old woman, with a coarse cloak wrapped round her loins and another thrown over her shoulder, came in from (another apartment) and said: 'O 'Abd Allāh (servant of God)! why sittest thou here with this gazelle of Najd<sup>3</sup>, from whose toils thou canst not escape, and whose possessions thou canst not hope for?' On this the maiden said to her: 'Dear grandmother, let him beguile his feelings to the degree which Dhu 'l-Rummah describes where he says:

1 See no.130 note on Kharā'ī.

2 His life will be found in this work.

3 The province of Najd, in Arabia, was the Arcadia of the Arabic poets.

* [From] "it" to end not in the autograph,—Ed.

"And though thou beguilest my hopes, and that but for a short hour, yet that short hour will suffice me!"

"I passed my day thus, and when I retired, my heart was inflamed with love!."]

---

*We have now completed Volume one ; and Volume two will begin with the letter F, if A'lāh be He Exalted will.

All praises be to Allāh and may Allāh bless the best of all that He has created, Muḥammad, his family and his companions.

†I finished it on Friday after prayers, 4 Rabi' al-Awwal A. H. 655 in Cairo, the protected city.

---

1 Literally : In my heart were as if live coals of ghadā wood, owing to my love for her.—The charcoal of the ghadā tree is frequently mentioned by the poets as retaining its fire a great length of time.

* de Siane's translation does not contain this important statement by the author. It is difficult to explain why he had omitted it.

† Corresponding at 23 March A. C. 1257.

A photostat copy of the last page of Vol. I of the autograph. For the author's statement about Vol. II see four lines from the bottom.

INDEX

A

- Ādharbā'ijān, 527
 al-'Ādīd al-'Ubaydi, 219, 437n, 441, 502, 505
 al-'Ādil Ibn al- Sallār, 416, 502
 'Āmid 388, 391
 Āmidi, 395n
 Āmidi, Abu al-Qāsim, 532, 533
 'Āmedi, Sayf al-Dīn, 284, 286
 'Āmir Ibn Ša'qa'h, 448
 'Āmir al-'Ubaydi, 217, 217n
 'Āmir al-Zawāhi, 410
 'Amir Ibn 'Abd Allāh, 517
 al-'Āmir 'Ubaydi, 217, 503n
 Āmul, 181, 182
 Āq Sunqur, 112, 519
 'Āqim Ibn Yūnus al-'Ijli, 131
 'Āyishah (Umm al-Mūminin), 241
 'Āyishah Bint Ṭalḥah, 242, 245n
 Āzar, 467, 467n
 Abbādān, 56
 al-'Abbās, 79
 'Abbās, 502, 503, 504
 'Abbās Ibn 'Abd al-Murṭalib, 132n, 178, 258, 259, 260, 260n, 267, 267n, 492n al-'Abbās Ibn al-Aḥnaf, 19, 20n, 21, 22, 63, 274, 448 al-'Abbās Ibn al-Ḥasan, 429, 430
 'Abbās Ibn al-Māmūn, 71
 al-'Abbās Ibn Mirdās, 362n
 'Abbāsids, 3, 70, 71n
 'Abd al-'Āqim al-Mundhiri, 283, 304, 304n
 'Abd al-'Azīz Ibn 'Umar, 346
 'Abd al-Ghāfir al-Fārisi, 118, 185, 188n, 189, 206, 277
 'Abd al-Ghani, 292, 299
 'Abd al-Ḥamid, 233, 237, 240n, 241n, 242n, 247
 'Abd al-Ḥamid Kātib, 210, 213
 'Abd al-Jabbār Ibn 'Abd al-Rahmān, 212
 'Abd al-Karīm al-Qushayri, 207
 'Abd al-Karīm Ibn Abī 'l-'Awja, 478
 Abdallah, fils de Djafar, 444
 'Abd Allāh Ibn Abi Ishāq, 496
 'Abd Allāh Ibn Aḥmad Ibn al-Haytham, 381
 'Abd Allāh Ibn 'Ali 'Abbāsīd, 136
 'Abd Allāh Ibn 'Amr Ibn al-'Āṣi, 253, 253n
 'Abd Allāh Ibn Hārith, 253
 'Abd Allah Ibn al-Ḥasan ibn Sa'd, 358
 'Abd Allāh Ibn Hudayr, 152, 152n
 'Abd Allāh Ibn Khulayd, 67
 'Abd Allāh Ibn Katīr of Quraysh, 391
 'Abd Allāh Ibn al-Mubārak, 28, 30, 31, 114
 'Abd Allāh Ibn Muḥammad Ibn 'Anī-mūyah, 185
 'Abd Allāh Ibn Ṭabāṭaba, 105, 105n
 'Abd Allāh Ibn Tāhir, 70, 71, 71n, 72, 73, 74, 74n, 75, 75n, 77, 77
 'Abd Allāh Ibn 'Umar, 24, 25, 26, 27, 252, 255
 'Abd Allāh Ibn 'Umar al-Warrāq, 448
 'Abd Allāh Ibn 'Utbah, 104
 'Abd Allāh Ibn Waṣīf, 367
 'Abd Allāh Ibn al-Zubayr, 25, 26, 26n, 76, 241, 244, 245, 248, 264n
 'Abd Allāh al-Sulayāi, 414
 'Abd al-Laṭīf, 10
 'Abd al-Majid (Iḥāfiḡ), 98
 'Abd al-Malik (Caliph), 17, 26, 76n, 82, 149, 150, 244, 245, 257, 264, 265
 'Abd al-Malik al-Saqāṭi, 339
 'Abd al-Malik Ibn 'Umayr, 113, 149,

- 150
 'Abd Manāf, 178
 'Abd al-Muḥaymin al-Ḥaḍrami, 12
 'Abd al-Muḥsin Ibn Ḥalabūn, 213, 215, 217
 'Aḍd al-Mūmin al-Kūmi, 220, 220n, 221, 222
 'Abd al-Muṭṭalib, 178, 267
 'Abd al-Muḥsin al-Ṣūri, 400
 'Abd al-Qādir al-Jilī, 208, 208n, 209n, 240, 454
 'Abd al-Qādir al-Shahrzūri, 240
 'Abd al-Qāhir al-Jurjāni, 91, 333
 'Abd al-Qāhir Abu 'l-Najīb, 454
 'Abd al-Raḥmān Ibn 'Abd Allāh, 157
 'Abd al-Raḥmān Ibn 'Abd al-Ḥakam, 32
 'Abd al-Raḥmān Ibn Abi Layla, 113
 'Abd al-Raḥmān Ibn al-Qāsim, 33
 'Abd al-Raḥmān al-Sha'bi, 113
 'Abd al-Raḥmān al-Uṭaqi, 115, 116
 'Abd al-Ṣamad al-Hāshimi, 178, 179
 'Abd al-Ṣamad Ibn al-Mu'addal, 399, 399n
 Abdelmalik, 444n
 'Abd Ṣhams, 178, 302
 'Abd al-Wahhāb 477, 477n, 478, 479
 'Abd al-Wahhāb (Qādī), 176, 204
 'Abd al-Wahhāb al-Māliki, 201
 'Abd al-Wahhāb al-Thaqaṭi, 447, 447n
 'Abd Ibn Abi Rabi'ah 446, 447
 'Abdūn, 64, 66
 al-Abiwardi, 120, 120n
 Abou Abbad Mabad, 445n
 Abouyezid, 444n
 Abraham, 467, 467n
 Abrez Gasc, 125, 247, 365, 491
 'Abu Tribe, 242
 Abu 'l-'Āliyah al-Ḥasan, 160
 Abu 'Abbād, 485
 Abu 'Abd Allāh al-Abbali, 12
 Abu 'Abd Allāh al-Ḥasan, 338
 Abu 'Abd Allāh al-Qudā'i, 116
 Abu 'Abd Allāh al-Rāzi, 95
 Abu 'Abd Allāh Muḥammad, 494, 495
 Abu 'Abd Allāh Muḥammad Ibn 'Abd al-Mūmin, 223, 223n
 Abu 'Abd Allāh (Shī'ite), 105, 106
 Abu 'Abd al-Ḥarrāni, 420
 Abū 'Abd al-Raḥmān Ibn Lahī'ah, 37
 Abu 'Abd al-Raḥmān al-Sulami, 13, 13n
 Abu 'l-'Abbās al-Nāshī, 79
 Abu 'l-'Abbās (grandson of Ibn Furāt), 426, 427
 Abu Aḥmad al-'Askari, 519n
 Abu 'Ali al-Ḡhassānī 30 al-'Āḍid (Ibn Muḥammad 'Abd Allāh Ibn Yūsuf), 97, 98, 98n, 99
 al-'Āḍil, 417, 418, 419
 al-'Āḍil Ibn Ṣāliḥ Ibn Ruzzik, 146
 Abu Aḥmad al-'Askari, 158, 298
 Abu Aḥmad al-Ṣūfi, 345
 Abu 'l-'Ala, 84, 497
 Abu 'l-'Ala al-Mu'arri, 175, 202, 217n, 224, 342, 362, 382, 382n
 Abu 'l-'Ala Ibn 'Ammār, 475, 476n
 Abu 'Ali Aḥmad, 217
 Abu 'Ali al-Fārisi, 88, 230, 232, 332n, 459
 Abu 'Ali al-Jubbā'i, 166
 Abu 'Ali al-Muqri, 205
 Abu 'Ali al-Qāli, 303
 Abu 'Ali al-Shalawbiūs, 459
 Abu 'Ali 'l-Qāli, 20
 Abu 'Ali Muḥammad Ibn Waḡḡah, 176
 Abu 'l-'Amayḡhal, 76, 77, 78
 Abu 'Amr al-Hāshimi, 312
 Abu 'Amr al-Makḡzūmi, 471
 Abu 'Amr Tujibi, 117, 117n
 Abu 'Amr 'Uṭḡmān 459
 Abū 'Amr Ibn al-'Ala, 314, 533,

- 534
 Abu 'Amr Ibn al-'Ala, 314, 473, 474, 475, 476, 477, 478, 481, 476, 497, 498, 501
 Abu 'Amr al-Shaybānī, 327n
 Abu 'l-'Arab al-Zubayrī, 330, 331
 Abu 'l-Aswad al-Du'ali, 497
 Abu 'l-'Atāhiyah, 65, 350, 471,
 Abu 'l-'Aynī, 160, 160n
 Abu Ayyub al-Anṣārī, 113, 113n
 Abu al-Bassām, 457
 Abu Bakr Ibn Mujāhid, 39
 Abu Bakr Ibn Qura'ah, 364
 Abu Bakr Ibn Shādhān, 307
 Abu Bakr Ibn 'Abd al-Raḥmān, 478
 Abu Bakr Ibn al-'Arabi, 9, 9n, 313
 Abu Bakr al-Ḥāzimi, 267
 Abu Bakr al-Adfuwū, 294
 Abu Bakr al-'Allāf, 426
 Abu Bakr al-Khaṭīb, 159
 Abu Bakr al-Khuwarazmi, 367
 Abu Bakr al-Ṣiddīq, 126, 126n, 127, 185, 241, 241n, 454, 518
 Abu Bakr al-Sirāfi, 277, 277n
 Abu Bakr al-Ṣūlī, 21, 355, 358, 358n, 360, 424, 425
 Abu Bakr al-Ṭurṭūshi, 216n, 503n
 Abu Bakr Ibn 'Ayyāsh, 289
 Abū Bakr Ibn Fūrak, 187, 188
 Abu Bakr al-Mazrafi, 52, 52n
 Abu Bakr (Physician), 32n
 Abu Bakr al-Ṭūsi, 187, 187n
 Abu Bakr Muḥamad, 402
 Abu Bakr Muḥammad al-Sam'āni, 194
 Abu Bakr Muḥammad al-Shunātrīnī, 95, 95n
 Abu 'l-Baqa al-'Ukbari ('Abd Allāh Ibn Abi 'Abd Allāh al-Ḥusayn), 78
 Abu Burdah Ibn Abi Mūsā, 13, 14, 15, 16, 276
 Abū Dāwud, 152, 152n, 292n
 Abu Ḍirār al-Ghanawī, 529, 526n
 Abu Dulaf al-'Ijli, 130, 131, 131n, 175, 175n, 298, 300, 347, 348, 349
 Abu Dulāmah, 140
 Abu 'l-Faḍā'il, 404, 405
 Abu 'l-Faḍl 'Abbās Ibn Abi 'l-Futūḥ, 418, 424, 428
 Abu 'l-Faḍl 'Abd Allāh Ibn Aḥmad, 344
 Abu 'l-Faḍl al-Mikāl, 162
 Abu 'l-Faḍl Ibn Māmūn, 307
 Abu 'l-Faraj al-Ispahani, 303, 301, 301n, 302, 315, 350, 489
 Abū Farās, 50, 63n, 400
 Abu 'l-Faraj al-Ispahani, 167n, 374
 Abu 'l-Faṭḥ al-Busti, 375, 376, 377
 Abu 'l-Faṭḥ Muḥammad, 88, 88n
 Abu 'l-Fayyāḍ al-Baḡri, 272n
 Abu 'l-Fidā, 18n, 24n, 30n, 39n, 71n, 140n, 143n, 165n, 197n, 220, 248n, 258n, 328n, 370n, 375n, 412n, 428n, 449n, 460n, 496n, 517n
 Abul Feda, 527n
 Abu 'l-Futūḥ al-'Ijli, 248
 Abū Ḥalīb Muḥammad Ibn Aḥmad Ibn Sahl, 175
 Abu 'l-Ghanā'm, 452, 453
 Abu Ḥānīnī, 109, 109n, 110
 Abu Ḥafṣ al-'Aṭṭār, 432n
 Abu 'l-Hakam al-Maghribi, 110, 111
 'Abu 'l-Hakam al-Maghribi ('Ubayd Allāh), 110
 Abn Ḥāmid al-Isfarā'ini 172, 272, 293
 Abu Ḥāmid al-Marw al-Rūdi, 272n
 Abu Ḥnīfah, 47, 54n, 165n, 173, 193, 199'n, 249n, 279, 492n
 Abū l-Ḥārith al-Nawfali, 358, 359
 Abū l-Ḥārith al-Sarakhsī, 120
 Abbu'l-Ḥasan, 12
 AAbu 'l-Ḥasan (grandson of Ibn al-

- Furāt), 426
 Abu 'l-Ḥasan 'Alī al-'Askari, 261, 262, 263
 Abu 'l-Ḥasan Aḡh'ari, 18
 Abu 'l-Ḥasan al-Barmaki, 485
 Abu 'l-Ḥasan al-Bayhaqi, 385
 Abu 'l-Ḥasan al-Marzubān, 172
 AB 'l-Ḥasan Ibn Muḥammad al-Baḡhdādi, 175, 176
 Abu Hāshim al-Jubbā'i, 166, 167, 167n
 Abu Hāfīm al-Rāzi, 448, 448n
 Abu Hāfīm al-Sijistāni, 40, 157
 Abu Hilāl al-'Askari, 519, 519n
 Abū Hukaymah (Kātib), 65
 Abu Hurarab, 103, 253
 Abu 'l-Ḥusayn al-Ṭarābulusi, 111
 Abu Ishāq Ibrāhīm al-Ḡhazzi, 282
 Abu Ishāq Ibrāhīm al-Ziyādi, 40, 40n
 Abu Ishāq al-Isfarā'ini, 187, 188
 Abū Ishāq al-Marwazi, 172, 275
 Abu Ishāq (Mu'ta'im), 74, 75
 Abu Ishāq al-Ḥābi, 182
 Abu Ishāq al-Sab'i, 464
 Abu Ishāq al-Ḥirāzi, 87, 119, 120, 125, 154, 185, 190, 200, 201, 225, 226, 227, 232, 247, 268, 281, 453
 Abū Ismā'il Ibrāhīm Ibn Aḥmad al-Ḥusayni al-Rassi, 70
 Abu Jahl, 447
 Abu Ja'far Aḥmad Ibn 'Abd Allāh, 42
 Abu Ja'far Muslim Ibn 'Ubayd Allāh al-Ḥusayni, 70
 Abu Jahwar, 324
 Abu Jawād Ḡhiyāthī, 336, 336n
 Abu Khalaf, 172
 Abu 'l-Khaṭṭāb Ja'far, 427
 Abu 'l-Khayrwarīsi, 274
 Abū Khuzaymah, 36, 36n
 Abu 'l-Ma'ālī, 156
 Abu Ma'bad, 38, 38n
 Abu 'l-Maḥṣin, 30n, 75n, 91, 98n, 116n, 117n, 180, 181, 182, 291n, 369n, 396n
 Abu Manṣūr al-Baḡhdādi, 184
 Abu Manṣūr al-Daylami, 231
 Abu Maryam, 135
 Abu Maysarah al-Fihri, 248
 Abu 'l-Miḥḡagh, 257
 Abu Muḥammad ('Abd al-Ḥakam), 32
 Abu Muḥammad al-Ḥasan, 358
 Abu Muḥammad al-'Ijli, 192
 Abu Muḥammad al-Juwayni, 153, 155
 Abu Muḥammad (Khaṭīb), 318
 Abu Muḥammad al-Yazīdi, 289
 Abu Muḥammad Ibn 'Abd, 454
 Abu Muḥammad Ibn al-Kh: ḡshāb, 87
 Abu 'l-Mu'issim, 424, 426
 Abū Mūsā al-'Anazi, 36
 Abu Mūsā Aḡh'ari, 13, 14, 14n, 15
 Abu Muslim al-Khurasāni, 130, 131, 132, 133, 133n, 134, 135, 135, 137, 138, 139, 140, 140n, 212, 251, Abu Muḥanna Ibn Ya'qūb, 429, 430
 Abu 'l-Muḡaffar, 193
 Abu 'l-Muḡaffar 'Abd al-Rahīm, 194, 195
 Abu al-Najīb al-Suhrwardy, 185, 186, 454, 456
 Abu Naṣr al-Shirāzi, 313, 314
 Abu Nu'aym al-Isfahāni, 154, 264, 291
 Abu Nuwās, 65, 79, 157, 168, 169, 259, 266, 348, 531, 532
 Abu 'l-Qāsim Ibn Barhān, 452
 Abu 'l-Qāsim, 483
 Abu 'l-Qāsim al-Ahwāzi, 313
 Abu 'l-Qāsim al-Anmāfi, 224, 225
 Abu 'l-Qāsim al-Dāraki, 171, 172, 173
 Abu 'l-Qāsim Hibat Allāh, 251, 492
 Abu 'l-Qāsim al-Maḡribi (Wazīr),

- 75, 75n, 215, 377
 Abu 'l-Qāsim al-Iskāf, 153, 153n
 Abu 'l-Qāsim al-Qushayrī, 187, 188, 189, 206
 Abu 'l-Qāsim al-Saymari, 272, 272n, 273n
 Abu 'l-Qāsim al-Tanūkhī, 364, 365, 366
 Abu 'l-Qāsim 'Ubayd Allāh, 197
 Abu 'l-Qāsim Ibn Imām al-Haramayn, 156
 Abu 'l-Qāsim Ibn Ḥajjaj, 123
 Abu 'l-Qāsim Ibn al-Maṭṭarībi, 141
 Abu Rabī'ah, 446, 447
 Abu 'l-Raddād ('Abd Allāh Ibn 'Abd al-Salām), 99
 Abu Rān' al-Faḍl, 323, 326
 Abū Raja, 37n
 Abu Rakwa, 379n
 Abu 'l-Raqa'maq, 381
 Abu Rifā'ah, 314
 Abu Sa'd al-Mālīnī 313, 313n
 Abu Sa'd al-Mutawallī ('Abd al-Rahmān Ibn Māmūn), 119, 200, 201
 Abu Sa'd Qushayrī, 206
 Abu Sahl, 367
 Abu Sabī Ibn Ziyād, 360
 Abu Sa'īd al-Dawlat, 381
 Abd Sa'id al-Iṣṭakhri, 290
 Abū Sa'id, 123, 159, 206
 Abu Sa'id al-Khudrī, 253, 253n
 Abu Sa'id al-Tuwāl, 472
 Abu Salamah al-Majīshūn, 150
 Abu Šālīh (Mufiwadhḥīn), 46
 Abu Ḥayyāh Ibn al-Ḡharīq, 14
 Abu Sufyān Ibn Ḥarb, 178, 341
 Abu Sulaymān al-Dārānī, ('Abd al-Rahmān al-Ansī), 117
 Abū Ṭāhir al-Silafī, 182, 236, 236n, 278, 283, 314
 Abu Ṭāhir al-Tamīmī, 198n
 Abu 'l-Ṭāhir Ibn 'Awf al-Zuhri, 236, 236n
 Abu Ṭālib 408n
 Abu Ṭālib al-Mubārak 392, 392n
 Abu Ṭālib al-Zaynabī, 281, 281n
 Abū Ṭālib (uncle to al-Mu'izz), 33n
 Abu Ṭālib 'Abd al-Jabbār, 326
 Abu Tammām, 11, 58, 72, 73, 76, 78, 335, 362, 529, 532, 533
 Abu al-Ṭarīf, 109
 Abu 'l-Tayyib copyist, 355
 Abu 'Ubayd al-Bakrī, 338, 528
 Abu 'Ubayd Ibn Sallām, 289
 Abu 'Ubaydah, 23, 167n, 295, 474, 475, 477
 Abu 'Ubaydah (Grammarian), 41n, 157, 158
 Abu 'Umar Aḥmad, 324, 325
 Abu Usāmah Junādah, 205
 Abu 'Uḥmān al-Nājim, 357, 358
 Abu 'Uḥmān Sa'id, 402
 Abu 'l-Wafa al-Ḥalwānī, 240
 Abu 'l-Waḥsh, 111
 Abu 'l-Walīd al-Bāji, 324
 Abn 'l-Waqt al-Sijzi, 207, 209
 Abu Zar'ah, 34n
 Abu Zayd al-Anṣarī, 194
 Abu Zayd al-Dabūsī, 194
 Abu Zayd al-Marwazī, 316, 316n
 Abu 'l-Zinād, 25, 103
 Abū Zur'ah Ṭāhir Ibn Muḥammad, 88
 Abyssinia, 39
 Abyssinian, 414
Adab al-Kātib, 40, 40n, 42, 84
Adab al-Khawāṣṣ, 75
 Adam, 251, 350
 al-'Addās, 313
 'Aden, 412
 Adham, 29n, 30n
 Adḥanah, 486

- Adharbijan, 130
 Adl in Ibn Bundad, 130
 'Adi al-Hakkārī, 240
 'Adī Ibn Hanīfah (tribe), 14n
 'Adnān Tribe, 319n
 'Aḍud al-Dawlah, 205, 310, 396, 398
 Afdal Shāhanshāh, 217, 217n
 Afrāṭīn, 410n
 Africa, 39n, 98, 106, 107, 116n, 165n, 196n, 197, 198n, 222, 266, 313n, 318
 Aḡhmāt, 197
 Aḥmad Ibn 'Ali Ibn Ḥajar al-'Asqalānī, 12n
 Aḥmad Ibn Afdal, 218, 219
 Aḥmad Ibn 'Abd Allāh al-Farghānī, 89
 Aḥmad Ibn Abi Kḥālīd, 485
 Aḥmad Ibn Faraj, 448
 Aḥmad Ibn Ghāzī, 525
 Aḥmad s/o al-Malik al-Zāhir, 527
 Aḥmad Ibn Muḥammad al-Ḥāsib, 100, 101, 102
 Aḥmad Ibn Mūsā al-Lūlū'i, 496, 496n
 Aḥmad s/o Abu Qutaybah, 40
 Aḥmad Ibn Yūsuf, 489, 489n al-Ahtam (Tamīmī), 15
 al-Aḥwaṣ, 363, 363n
 al-Ahwāz, 300, 354, 364, 396
 Al-Aḥzan Ibn 'Awf al-'Abdī, 22 al-'Akawwak, 306, 306n, 346, 347, 348, 349, 351
 Akḥbār al-Ṣaḥābah, 345
 Akḥfash, 43
 al-Akḥfash al-Aḡḡhar, 295, 296 al-Akḥfash al-Awsaṭ, 295
 al-'Ala Ibn 'Ammār, 474
 al-'Alawī al-Baḡrī, 23, 23n
 Aleppo, 52, 53, 71n, 128n, 141, 167n, 184n, 201n, 215n, 217, 217n, 227, 228, 229, 229n, 315n, 339, 342, 343, 345, 346, 352, 367, 368, 401, 403, 404, 404n, 407, 415n, 420, 422, 422n, 520, 521, 522, 523, 523n
 Alexander, 132, 140n, 235, 236, 344n
 Alexand r Dhu 'l-Qarnayn, 140, 140n
 Alexenderia, 36n, 116, 146, 283, 284, 336, 344n, 416, 417, 420
 Alfonso Raimond, 49n
 Algiers, 7
 'Ali al-Harawī, 342
 'Ali 'l-Riḍa, 258, 258n, 260, 261
 'Ali Ibn 'Abd Allāh Ibn al-'Abbās, 133, 178, 179, 253, 263, 265, 266, 267, 268
 'Ali Ibn Abi Tālib, 97, 105, 113, 132n, 149, 159, 252, 255, 258, 260, 264, 268, 302, 308, 309, 352, 363, 367n, 443, 466, 474, 474n, 492n, 518
 'Ali Ibn Aḡma', 159
 'Ali Ibn Balīk, 449n
 'Ali Ibn Ḥamzah Iṣpāhānī, 134
 'Ali Ibn al-Ḥusayn Ibn Aḥmad, 104
 'Ali Ibn 'Isā Wazīr, 296
 'Ali Ibn Juday', 136
 'Ali Ibn Muḥammad al-Nawfili, 477
 'Ali Ibn Naḡr, 204
 'Ali Ibn Rayṭah, 350
 'Ali Ibn 'Umar al-Talamankī, 327
 Almeira, 83, 94, 94n, 110
 Alp Arslān, 153, 519, 520
 'Alqamah, 11n
 Amālī, 181n, 192n
 Amālī (al-Qālī), 20
 Amat al-Raḥīm d/o 'Abd al-Karīm al-Qushayrī, 207
 Amat al-Raḥmān, 457
 al-'Āmirī (Majd al-'Arab), 50, 50n
 'Ali Ibn Ḥusayn al-Maḡhrabī, 214 al-A'mash, 248, 466
 'Amīd al-Dawlat, 369, 369n
 Amīn (Caliph), 71n, 287, 471, 479n, 531
 Amin al-Dawlat, 490

- 'Amr b. al-Ahtam, 12, 15n
 'Amr Ibn 'Alqamah al-Kināni, 39n
 'Amr Ibn al-'Āṣi, 116
 'Amr Ibn al-Baḥr, 470
 'Amr Ibn al-Dinār, 248, 253
 'Amr Ibn al-Ḥārith, 37, 37n
 'Amr Ibn al-Mallik, 143, 143n
 'Amr Ibn Mas'adah, 485, 486, 488, 489
 'Amr Ibn 'Ubayd, 466, 467, 467n, 468, 469
 'Amr Ibn Umayyah, 67, 144
 'Amr Ibn Zibriqān, 15n
 Amro 'l-Qays, 203n
 Anas Ibn Mālik, 152n
 al-Anbār, 31, 56, 79, 80, 125, 137, 139, 192, 212, 340, 341
 Andulsian, 341
 al-'Ants al-'Badi' al-'Tāts, 375
 Annals (Abu 'l-Feda), 18n
 'Antarah, 11n
 Anthologie Grammaticale, 11n, 19n, 47n
 Antioch, 362, 363, 366
 Anujūr, 122n
 Anūshirwān, 39n, 130n, 138n, 140n al-'Aqabah, 248n
 al-'Aqīdat al-Nizūmyah, 154
 'Aqil, 185, 207
 'Aqil al-Manahi, 240
 al-'Aqīqiyah, 356, 356n
 Arab, 1, 5, 116, 198n, 297, 330n, 347, 383n, 401, 471n, 472, 530
 'Arābat al-Awsi, 531, 531n
 Arabia, 143n, 534n
 Arabian, 1, 14, 82, 83, 131, 140, 156, 161, 199, 205n, 349n, 396, 448, 498, 528
 Arabic, 1, 2, 3, 4, 7, 9, 10, 31n, 33n, 36n, 45n, 50n, 63n, 64n, 66n, 71n, 72n, 73n, 83, 84n, 86, 112n, 114n, 126n, 127n, 132n, 134, 135n, 151, 157, 166, 180, 184n, 196n, 197n, 226n, 229n, 233, 252, 275n, 277n, 294n, 302n, 305n, 307n, 309n, 318n, 323, 328n, 340, 340n, 341, 367n, 371n, 373, 376n, 377n, 379n, 382n, 383n, 384n, 385n, 393n, 402n, 404n, 410n, 415n, 432n, 436n, 442n, 450n, 452n, 471n, 473, 474, 474n, 475n, 507n, 510n, 513n, 528n, 534n
 Arabisite Acrzte, 33n
 Arabs, 1, 2, 3, 4, 8, 17, 23, 40n, 41n, 66, 71n, 93, 116, 140n, 158, 161, 167, 187, 234, 247, 355, 288n, 290, 295, 300, 302, 317n, 328n, 330, 334, 335, 343n, 345, 346, 401, 413n, 423, 446n, 457, 459, 471, 472, 474, 476, 477, 493, 498, 503, 528n, 530
 'Aradah Ibn Yarbū, 467
 'Arafah, 28
 Arbela, 136, 225, 229, 240, 335, 346, 455, 458, 511, 513, 514, 515, 516, 522
 Ardaghīr, 132, 132n, 354
 al-'Arīgh, 506
 Aristotle, 440n
 Armenia, 170, 233
 Armenian, 516
 Arrangon, 94n
 Arranjāni, 395
 Arsitan, 264n
 Arwa Bint Kurayz, 517
 Asad (tribe), 287
 Asad Ibn Jawhar, 361
 Asad Ibn Sa'd, 34, 34n
 Asad al-Din Shīrkūh, 228, 229, 509
 As'ad al-'Ijlī, 120
 As'ad al-Mihānī, 186, 285, 306
 As'ad Ibn Shihāb, 413
 Asadiyah, 165n, 166, 229
 al-Aṣṣār, 136, 302, 302n
 A'gha, 477
 al-Ash'ari, 347, 275, 275n, 276, 277

Agh'ari, 189, 190
 Aḡhab, 31, 152n, 164, 204
 Agharites, 13, 275
 Aḡhānān, 132n
 'Aṣim Ibn Abi 'l-Najūd, 13, 447
 'Āsiyah, 139
 Aslam Ibn Sidrah, 341
 Asma, 235, 413
 Asma Bint Abi Bakr, 241, 241n
 Asma Bint Muḥharribah, 447, 447n
 al-Aṣma'i, 18, 23, 25, 76n, 78, 156,
 157, 158, 159, 160, 160n, 163, 314,
 340, 474, 476, 476, 476n
 'Asqalān, 146, 216, 218, 336, 604
 'Asqalāni, 447n
 Agram Ibn Ḥumayd, 73
 Asrār (Dabūsī), 47
 Asrār al-'Arabīyah, 125
 'Aṭa Ibn Abi Rabāḥ, 114, 248, 249,
 249n, 250, 250n
 Avicenna, 10
 'Awārif al-Ma'arīf, 455, 456
 al-'Awāṣim, 362
 al-Awḍi, 39, 39n
 'Awn b. Muḥammad, 21
 'Awf Ibn Muḥallim al-Shaybāni, 73,
 73n, 74, 74n
 Awfa Ibn Dalham, 532n
 Awfa Ibn 'Uqbah Ibn Buḥaṣh, 532
 al-Awfā'i Ibn 'Amr 'Abd al-Raḥmān
 Ibn 'Amr, 32n 113, 114, 115, 199, 248
 Aswaf, 194
 Awzā'ab, 115
 'Aydhāb, 143, 143n, 144, 331
 Aydhāj, 312, 312n
 'Āyishah (Prophet's Wife), 103, 127, 253
 'Āyishah Bint 'Alī Umayyid, 444
 'Āyishah Bint Ṭalḥah, 25, 26n
 Aylah, 503, 503n

'Ayn Tāb, 523, 523n, 527
 'Ayn Zarbah, 401, 401n
 Ayyūb al-Sikhtiyāni, 447
 al-Azaj Gate, 92, 247, 394
 Azd Tribe, 195, 199, 205, 459
 al-'Aziz, 527
 al-'Aziz Nizār Ibn al-Mu'izz, 89
 al-'Aziz 'Ubaydi, 434
 'Azzah, 254, 353

B

Bāb, 479
 Bābak al-Ḥurrami, 70
 al-Babbaḡha, 182, 183, 184, 184n, 200, 403
 Babylon, 140n
 Bādarāya, 202, 204
 Baghdād, 20, 21, 31, 40, 41, 42, 43,
 47, 52, 52n, 56n, 60, 62n, 73, 79, 80,
 86, 87, 88, 90, 92, 107, 110, 111,
 112, 119, 120, 121, 122n, 124, 125,
 127, 128, 128n, 148, 149, 153, 157,
 167, 170, 172, 175, 171, 179, 780,
 184, 185, 186, 188, 189, 190, 192,
 198, 200, 201, 202, 203, 208, 209n,
 210, 224, 229, 232, 247, 254, 254n,
 271, 272, 273, 274, 275, 377, 278,
 281, 284, 285n, 287, 290, 291, 292n,
 295, 296, 298, 299, 300, 303, 304,
 306, 307, 312, 332, 333, 334, 335,
 339n, 344, 349, 351, 353, 354, 356,
 357, 362, 364n, 365, 366, 369, 369n,
 370, 372, 381, 388, 391, 394, 396n,
 423, 425, 427, 429, 430, 430n, 431,
 431n, 434n, 449, 449n, 452, 453,
 454, 455n 456, 458, 460, 461, 471,
 471n 472, 480, 485, 490, 491, 392,
 492n, 510, 512, 516
 Baha al-Dawlah, 205
 Baha al-Dīn Qarāṣh, 509, 238
 Bahā al-Dīn al-Qāsim, 306

- Baba al-Din Shaddād, 407,
 407n
 Baḥrayn, 160, 363n
 Bahdalah, 13
 Bāhilah, 173n, 157, 152n
 Bahnasah, 417n
 Bajilah, 135
Ḥaḥr al-Maḥhab, 181
 Bakka Ibn 'Amir, 529, 529n
 Bākūsāya, 202, 204
 al-Bāḫharzi, 1g9, 384, 385, 386
 Bakr Ibn Wā'il, 512
 Bakr (Tribe), 80
 al-Bakri, 838n
 Bajaya, 197
 Bāḫharz, 386
 Ba'labek, 53, 114, 114n, 240
 Balḫ, 29n, 44, 344
 Balqa, 179, 268
 Bānat, 490
 Banu Qurrah, 379, 379n
 Barājah, 159, 160
 Barcelona, 94n
 Barmak, 483
 al-Barq al-Shāmi, 521
 al-Barda'i (Abū Sa'id, 11
 Barhān al-Uḡl, 52
 Bark Yāruq, 278
 al-Barmaki, 304
 Barqah, 417
 Barqa'id, 346
 al-Basāsiri, 43
 Baḡshār Ibn Burd, 20
 Baḡrah, 14, 17, 21, 22, 23, 23n, 24, 38,
 76n, 99, 113; 137n, 157, 158, 159,
 159n, 160, 161, 167, 199, 252, 254n,
 260, 261, 272, 273n, 275, 276, 312,
 354, 354n, 364, 366, 382, 447, 447n,
 448n, 449n, 454, 467, 469, 471, 472,
 475, 480, 484, 485, 495, 498, 499
 al-Bassāmi, 358, 359, 362
 Baṣām, 76
 al-Batalyawas 85
 al-Baṭalyawsi, 42, 86, 166
 al-Baṭṭa, 438, 438n
 Bāsikin, 515, 516
 Bāqillāni, 188, 275
 al-Bayḍa, 472
 al-Bayḍāwi, 273n
 al-Bayān, 54n
 al-Bayāḍi, 384
 Bayhaq, 277
 al-Bayhaqi, 123, 153n, 188
 al-Bayrut, 113, 114, 115
 Baysān, 146, 146n
 Bayt Fār, 240
 al-Bazzi, 40, 40n
 Berlier, 501
 Berghana, 144n, 268n, 412n
 al-Bazzāz (Abū 'Umar), 13, 13n
 Berbar, 8
 Bib Orient, 38n
 Bijayāh, 500
 Bilāl Ibn Abi Burdah, 14, 15, 277, 531
Biographical Dictionary (Ibn Khallī-kān), 1
 al-Biqā' 114, 114n
 al-Bīrah, 128n
 Biḡhr Ibn Abu 'Anir, 478
 Biḡhr Ibn Bakr, 32, 32n
 Biḡhr Ibn Ghayāth, 369n
 Bouo Makhzoum, 445n
 Brockous, 314n
 al-Buḥturi, 109, 109n, 163, 174, 269,
 426, 426n
 Bilbays, 417, 418
 Bilqis, 440
 Buḫārī, (Imām), 34n, 207, 208, 292n,
 294, 316, 494
 Bulbays, 294
 Bulārāh w/o Abu 'l-Futūh, 418
 al-Buwayḍa, 508
 Būrān, 351
 Buḫārā, 57, 120, 101, 377

Burckhardt, 4, 33, 214n
Burhān, 154, 194
 Buṣṭr, 136, 212, 213, 213n
 al-Buṣṭri, 336, 336n
 al-Buṣṭrawi Poet, 310
 Buṭḥaynah, 145, 145n
 Buwayḍa, 396n
 Buzurjimihr, 130

C

Carlyle, 400n
 Catalonia, 94n
 Ceuta, 221, 313n, 328, 331493, 494, 495
 Chinese, 341
 Chosroes, 39
Chrestomathic, 353n
 Christian, 5n, 38n, 43n, 94n, 137,
 301n, 330, 331, 460n, 490, 491
 Constantinople, 113n
 Coptic, 341
 Cordova, 92, 93, 321, 322, 494
 Courayba, 444n
 Cairo, 24n, 26n, 31, 33, 34, 35, 36,
 36n, 42, 52n, 54, 60, 60n, 68, 69,
 73, 75n, 79, 80, 97, 98, 100, 102,
 106, 115, 116, 117, 118n, 122n,
 134n, 147, 148, 161, 177, 204, 206,
 214n, 217, 218, 225, 226, 233, 234,
 236, 237, 237n, 549n, 284, 285, 294,
 314, 315, 320, 336, 336n, 379, 381,
 382, 391, 406, 407n, 410n, 416, 417,
 419, 422, 432, 435n, 430, 441, 450n,
 457n, 459, 463, 464, 493n, 503, 504,
 506, 508
 Cureston Dr. 276n, 451n
 Chammakh, 531n

D

al-Ḍaḥḥāk Ibn Qays al-Harūri, 135
 Dahlak, 413

al-Dajjāl, 128
 Da'laj Ibn Aḥmad, 172, 172n
 Damascus, 52, 53, 54, 87, 111, 112,
 114n, 115, 118, 121, 122, 136, 186,
 225, 229, 227, 228, 229n, 233, 234,
 236, 268, 304, 306, 336, 337n, 346,
 391, 403n, 404, 420, 421, 431n,
 434n, 449, 465n, 477, 496n, 505,
 506, 508, 520, 527
 Dāmi 'Ḥān, 76n
 Dammūn 14
 al-Dabūsī (Abū Zayd), 47, 47n
 Dabūsiyah, 47
 al-Daqqāq (Abu 'l-Ḥasan 'Alī), 187,
 188, 190, 191, 206
 Dāwūd al-Ispahani (Zāhiri), 209n, al-Dāwūdī, 209
 al-Dār (Tribe), 38
 al-Dāraqūṭni, 43, 289, 290, 299, 432n
 Dārīn, 39, 39n
Daw al-Siqf, 84 al-Dāwūdī Abu 'l-Ḥasan 'Abd al-
 Raḥmān, 208
 Dāwūd al-Zāhiri, 209n, 331n
 Dead Sea, 143n
 Deguigne, 527n
 Denia, 327, 494
 de Perceval, 531n
 Dayr al-Jamājīm, 113
 de Slane, 371n, 376n, 409n, 413n, 419n, 434n, 450n, 457n
 de Sacy, 11n, 19n, 41n, 85n, 105n,
 106n, 138n, 140n, 180n, 192n, 194n,
 195n, 277n, 294n, 302n, 353n, 359n,
 379n, 407n, 417n, 419n, 420n, 440n,
 461n, 462n, 464n, 471n, 477n
 al-Dḥahabi, 33n, 39n, 40n, 117n,
 209n, 273n, 332n, 392n, 448n, 439n
 Dharr 451n
 d' Herbelot, 38n, 130n, 223n, 402n
 Dhuḥl, 162, 162n, 515n
 Ḍiya al-Dīn 'Isā, 514

Dhahīrah, 81, 162, 202, 204, 309, 328, 359
Dhu 'l-Rummah, 14, 528, 529, 530, 531, 532, 532n, 533n, 534
Dhu Kibār, 16
Dhu Nuwās, 19n
Dhu 'l-Qarnayn Ibn Hamdān, 189
Dhu Sha'bayn, 19
Dilaq, 417, 417n
Diya al-Dīn (Ḥarīf), 56, 60
Diya al-Dīn al-Hadbānī, 225
Diya al-Dīn al-Shahruzūri (qāḍī), 53
Dhu Shanātīr, 19n
Dhu Tuwa, 27: 113
Dī'bil al-khuzā'i, 175
Diḥyah al-Kalbi, 457, 457n
d' Ibn Souraydj, 444n, 445n
Dik al-Jinn, 167, 167n, 168, 169, 179
Dimyāt (Damietta), 60
Dioscorides, 77n
Dinawar, 41, 42, 70, 71, 233
Diwān d' Amro 'l-Kais, 11n
Diya al-Dīn Na r Allāh, 346
Diyār Bakr, 286, 520
d' Omar-ibn-abi-Rabia, 444n
al-Duhaym, 413, 413n, 414
Dujayl Ahwāz, 354
Dujayl Baḥdād, 113, 453, 354
Diyār Bakr, 53, 335
Dumayāt al-Qaṣr, 189, 385
Dunya (Dick al-Jinn's hand-maid), 170
al-Duwal al-Islamiya, 42n
al-Duwal al-Munqaṭ'ah, 69, 69n, 70n
Durrat al-Ḥawāṣ, 96, 307

E

Edessa, 465
Egypt, 19, 31, 32, 34, 35, 37n, 56, 57, 67, 69, 70, 71, 73, 75n, 82n, 89, 95, 96, 97, 98, 106, 117n, 122, 122n,

123, 124, 124n, 136, 143n, 144, 145, 146, 147, 152n, 162, 165n, 168, 175, 177, 196n, 198, 199, 202, 203, 205, 212, 218, 219, 225, 226n, 235, 236, 253n, 254, 285, 291, 294, 296, 304, 313, 313n, 315, 319, 328n, 331n, 334, 336, 336n, 337, 344, 345, 379, 379n, 380, 382, 391, 405, 406, 412, 416, 417n, 418, 419, 420, 421, 428, 431, 331, 431n, 434, 436, 437n, 439, 441, 442, 444, 448n, 457, 461, 465, 500, 503, 509, 523
Egyptian, 98, 123, 162, 179n, 402, 501, 506
Eichhorn, 40n, 173n, 340n
Elias Saint, 269
Emessab, 34n, 53, 57, 59, 107, 114n, 165n, 167, 168, 228, 330, 506, 527
Encyclopaedia of Islām, 234n
English, 4, 5, 10, 63n, 127n, 135n, 184n, 337n, 442n, 510n
Euphrates, 3, 56, 71n, 80, 145, 125, 201n, 361n, 415n, 422
European, 143n, 221n, 143n, 385n

F

Al-Faḍl, Ibn al-'Amīd, 487
al-Faḍl Ibn al-Rabī, 158
al-Faḍl Ibn Saḥl, 485
al-Fā'iz al-'Ubaydi, 97, 431, 501, 502, 504
Fakhr al-Dīn, Jihār kas, 2381
Fakhr al-Dīn 'Isā Ibn Mawdūd, 509
Fakhr al-Dawlah Ibn Jābir, 384
Fakhr al-Dīn, 512
Famm al-'alḥ, 351
al-Farazdaq: 15, 66, 353, 528, 528n al-Fāli, 311, 312, 312n
Fāmiyat, 314, 314n
al-Fārabi (Ibn Maṭar), 208
al-Farāwi, 189

- al-Farazdaq, 353, 354n, 474, 528
     528n al-Farḡhānī, 75
 Faridūn, 130
 al-Fāriqī (Abu 'Alī), 52
 al-Fārisī, 2, 2n, 43, 181, 229
 Farḡh : 43
 al-Farq wa 'l-Mī'yār Bayn Awḡḡād wa 'l-Aḡrār : 374
 al-Farra : 44, 92, 288, 288n, 289, 470,
     470n
 Fārs : 19, 39n, 43, 206, 372, 396, 398,
     472, 480n
 Fasa : 43
 Fasāwi : 43
 al-Faḡlīh : 43, 43n, 333
 al-Fasr, 500
 Fātik, 364, 364n.
 Fātik al-Majnūn, 298
 Fāṭimah d/o al-Daqqāq 206
 Fāṭimah d/o Prophet, 261
 Fāṭimah, 482
 Fatwa 'Ālamgīrī, 235n
 Fawā'id al-Muḡadḡḡah, 52
 Fayyūm, 136, 212, 237
 Fayyūm, 464,
 Fez, 221
 Fihri : (tribe) 32, 248
 Fiqh al-Lu, at, 164
 Fluegell : 11n, 59n, 519n
 Fihrist, 355n
 French : 10, 140n, 184n, 305n, 500n
 Freytag, 404n, 513n, 529n
 Franks, 464, 504
 Fuqaym (tribe) : 14
 Fur'a, 244, 244n
 Fur'an : 36n
 Fūrān, 118, 119
 al-Fūrānī (Abu 'l-Qāsim 'Abd al-Raḡmān Ibn Muḡammad), 118,
     120
 Fuṣṭat
- Fuṣūṣ, 177
- G
- German, 184n, 398n
 al-Gḡābah, 267, 268
 Ghadir Khumm, 367, 367n
 Ghāfiq (tribe) 35, 35n
 Ghārib al-Mīṣannaf, 327, 327n al-Gḡharīd, 444, 444n, 445
 Ghāriḡ, 444n, 445n
 al-Gḡharq : 14, 14n
 Ghars al-Nī'mah Ibn al-Ṣāhi, 15
 Ghaver, 506
 Ghayāth al-Umawī, 155
 Ghaylān, 529
 Ghāzi Ibn Muwḡūd, 520
 Ghāzi Ibn Yūsuf, 524, 525, 526
 Ghazzālī, 54n, 60, 228, 277, 279, 281,
     285n, 297, 453, 453n
 Ghaznah, 181, 207
 al-Gḡhazzi, 295
 Ghazzah, 428
 Gīyāth, 524, 526
 Ghunyat al-Mustarḡidīn, 155
 al-Gḡurar wa 'l-Durar, 308
 Granada, 38n, 460n, 494, 495
 Greek : 33n, 63n, 78n, 230, 231n, 285,
     341, 399, 404, 407, 427
 Greeks : 17, 138
- H
- al-Ḥabbāl, 313, 313n
 Ḥabīb Ibn 'Abd Allāh Ibn Raḡḡbān,
     169, 170
 Ḥabīb Ibn Maslamah, al-Fihri, 167,
     167n, 170
 Ḥādī Caliph, 178
 Ḥadithab, 56
 Ḥaḡramawt, 415
 Ḥaḡramūt : 34n, 36, 37

- Ḥaḍrami : 35, 37, 123, 123n
 al-Ḥāfīz al-'Ubaydi 217, 218, 219, 420 al-Ḥāfīz al-Silāfi 317, 333, 336
 Ḥaḥḥah (Umm al-Muminin), 25
 Ḥajar tribe, 115, 116
 Hajar (country), 160
 Ḥajar, 295
 Ḥājir, 516
 al-Ḥājiri al-Irbili, 512, 513, 514, 516
 Ḥajjāj Ibn Arṭāh, 448n
 Ḥajjāj Ibn Yūsuf al-Thaqafi, 255, 324, 475, 476n
 Ḥajjāj Ibn Yūsuf Thaqafi : 18, 27, 28, 159
 Ḥājī Khalīfah : 11n, 23n, 41n, 43n, 46n, 59n, 70n, 78n, 111n, 117n, 123n, 128n, 169n, 192n, 195n, 198n, 201n, 207n, 224n, 245n, 285n, 327n, 259n, 369n, 375n, 393n, 410n, 452n, 475n, 580n, 494n, 519n al-Ḥakam Ibn Sa'd al-Ashirah, 437 al-Ḥukam 'Ubaydi, 379n al-Ḥākim, 205
 al-Ḥākim al-'Ubaydi, 405, 406, 434, 436
 Hakkār, 240
 al-Hakkārī Shaykh al-Islām, 226, 239, 342 al-Ḥākim Ibn al-Bayyī', 119
 Hamadūn, 73, 136
 Ḥamāt, 53
 Hamdān (tribe), 16, 19, 115
 Ḥayyāt Ibn Shurayh, 34, 34n, 35
 Hamadān, 191, 246, 246n, 451, 572n al-Hamadāni, 451
 al-Hamadāni, Abu 'l-Ḥasan Ja'far, 356
 al-Hamadāni Muḥammad
 Ḥamārah : 11, 19n, 73, 159n, 327, 335, 515n, 532n
 Ḥamāt, 286, 461, 464, 465, 466
 Hamdān, 450, 510, 521, 551, 551n
 466
 Ḥamdān, 398, 403, 411n
 Ḥamdūn al-Nadīm, 360, 360n
 Hamiltom : 31n, 288n
 Ḥammāds, 157, 157n
 Ḥammād Ibn Zayd 292n
 al-Ḥamra, 70
 Ḥamzah al-Isfahāni, 19n
 Ḥamzah, Ibn 'Abd Allāh Ibn Umar 27
 Ḥamzah al-Zayyāt, 289
 Ḥanbalites, 190
 Ḥāni Ibn Tawbah, 314
 Ḥanīfah (tribe) : 20, 22, 23
 Ḥanzala tribe, 448n
 Ḥanzalah Ibn Ṣafwān, 89
 al-Harawī, 343, 344, 422, 422n
 Ḥarb Gate, 92, 210, 275, 461
 Ḥarb Ibn Umayyah, 178, 341
 al-Ḥarīri, 96, 307, 396n, 462
 Ḥārīth (tribe), 133
 Ḥārīth Ibn Ka'b, 133, 134, 470
 Ḥarrān, 53, 133, 210
 Ḥārūn al-Rashīd (Caliph), 73, 471, 471n, 531
 Ḥārūn Ibn 'Alī al-Munajjim, 375, 375n
 Ḥārūn Ibn Mūsā 496, 496n
 al-Ḥasan al-Baḡrī, 444, 467, 469, 496
 al-Ḥasan Ibn 'Alī Ibn Abī Ṭālib, 253, 518
 al-Ḥasan Ibn 'Alī Ibn Muḥammad Ibn 'Alī Ibn Mūsā Ibn Ja'far al-Ṣādiq, 104
 al-Ḥasan Ibn 'Alī Ibn Abī Ṭālib, 170
 al-Ḥasan al-Baḡrī : 17, 18, 249n, 250n, 474
 Ḥasan Ibn Qifjūq, 512
 al-Ḥasan (Imām), 67, 67n, 258, 363 al-Ḥasan attendant, 100
 Ḥasan Ibn Amr Himyarite : 19
 al-Ḥasan Ibn Ḥāfīz, 98n

- al-Ḥasan Ibn Hārūn, 449n
 al-Ḥasan Ibn Ṣahl, 485
 al-Ḥasan Ibn Wahb, 486
 Ḥāshim Ibn 'Abd Manāf, 61, 133, 178
 Ḥāshim Khuzā'i, 21
 Haskūrah, 501, 501n
 Hawāzin (tribe), 363n
 al-Ḥawfi Abu 'I-Ḥasan 'Alī Ibn Ibrāhīm, 177, 294, 313
 Ḥāwī, 273
 Haythān Ibn 'Adī, 341, 446
 Hebrew, 341
 Hecham fild 'Abd al-Malik 518n
Heddayah: 31n
 Helarew: 33n
 Heraclius, 231n, 457n
 Herāt, 203, 304, 313n
 Hibat Allāh Abu 'I-Qāsim, 298, 420, 492
 Hibat Allāh Ibn 'Aḥib al-Khayr, 490
 Hibat Allāh al-Ṣā'in, 306
 Hibat Allāh Ibn Sanā 'I-Mulk, 377
 Hijāz, 89, 153, 188, 191, 193, 197n, 266, 341, 379, 380, 448n
 Hilāl tribe, 297
 Hīrah, 78
Historia Anteislamica, 15n, 16n
 Hit: 30, 31
Hilyat al-Awliya, 154, 264, 291
 Hushaymah al-Khammarah, 21
 al-Ḥimā, 57
 Ḥimyar tribe, 115, 116, 124, 161, 199, 341, 495
 341, 495
 Hind, 82
 Hīrah, 137, 340, 341
 Hijāz, 23, 26, 67, 76
 Ḥimyar: 16
 Hishām Caliph 266
 Hishām Ibn 'Urwah, 244
 Hishām al-Maḥzūme, 266, 447
 Hishām al-Muwayyad, 93
 Hishām (Caliph), 212
 Hishām Ibn 'Uqbah Ibn Buhaysh, 532
 Ḥubaysh, 160, 160n
 Hudhayl (tribe), 151
 Ḥumayd al-Ṭūsi 347, 348, 350, 351 al-Ḥumaydi 300, 300n, 313, 313n, 322, 323, 324, 325, 328 al-Ḥusrah, 415
 Ḥusām, al-Dīn, 513
 Ḥulwān, 56
 Ḥusayn (qāḍī), 44, 44n
 al-Ḥusayn (Abu 'Abd Allāh), 52
 al-Ḥusayn, Ibn 'Alī Ibn Abī Ṭālib, 105, 150, 168, 255, 266, 279, 362, 363 Ḥusayn Ibn al-Ḥirr, 252
 al-Ḥusayn Ibn al-Ḥamdān, 429
 al-Ḥusayn Ibn Ismā'il, 480n al-Ḥusayn Ibn Nizār (al-Mintaḥir bi Allāh), 97-98
 Ḥuṣayyim, 292n
 Ḥumaydah, 83
 Ḥumaymah, 133, 179, 268
 Ḥusn al-Muḥaḍḍirah, 82n, 503n al-Ḥusri, Abu 'I-Ḥasan, 328, 329, 330
 al-Ḥusri, Alim Ishāq, 328 al-Ḥasayn, Abū 'Abd Allāh Ibn 'Abd Allāh Ibn al-Ḥusayn, 61

I

- Ibn al-Abbār, 500, 500n
 Ibn 'Abbās: 25, 89, 103, 178, 248, 252, 253, 264, 264n, 267, 466
 Ibn 'Abd al-Barr: 11, 11n, 34, 151
 Ibn 'Abd al-Ḥakam 31, 32
 Ibn 'Abdūn, 479
 Ibn 'Abd us, 355, 355n
 Ibn Abī Mūsa al-Ḥaṣḥmi, 431
 Ibn al-'Adīm, 90, 175, 210, 211, 212,

- 404n
 Ibn Abi 'l-Dunya, 23
 Ibn Abi Layla 'Abd al-Raḥmān, 250n,
 Ibn Abi Layla (Muḥammad) 250,
 250n
 Ibn Abi Rabūh, 248
 Ibn Abi Uḡaybi'ah 33n, 62n
 Ibn Abi-'Uḡrūn, (Ṣḥaraf al-Dīn), 52,
 54, 55, 225, 229
 Ibn al-Aḡlāl, 386, 387
 Ibn al-Āmidī, Abu 'l-Faḍā'il, 338n
 Ibn al-Anbārī, 122, 124, 332
 Ibn al-'Arīf, 324
 Ibn As'ad al-Mawqili, 56, 57, 58, 59
 Ibn Asad, 338, 339
 Ibn 'Asākīr Abi 'l-Qāsim, 54, 114, 121
 Ibn al-'Asākīr, Fakḥr al-Dīn, 121,
 275, 282, 303, 306
 Ibn al-Ash'atī, 113, 165n
 Ibn al-'Askari, 201, 365
 Ibn al-'Aṣṣār, 333
 Ibn Aṭṭār : 16n, 24, 71n, 192, 219, 344,
 345, 346, 448n, 480n
 Ibn 'Awf, 336, 420
 Ibn al-Azraq, al-Fāriql, 141
 Ibn Bābak, 179
 Ibn Bābshāh, 96
 Ibn Bānah, 489, 490
 Ibn Bari (Abu Muḥammad 'Abd Allāh
 Ibn Abi 'l-Waḥshī, 95, 97, 198, 236,
 334, 336n, 420
 Ibn Bārī', 500
 Ibn al-Barqī, 152, 152n
 Ibn al-Barr, 319
 Ibn Baṣḥkuwāl, 38, 92, 322, 328,
 359n, 494
 Ibn al-Bassām, al-Ṣḥantarāni, 359n
 Ibn Bassām, 63, 63n, 81, 81n, 162,
 195, 202, 204, 309, 328, 358, 359n,
 362, 363, 277
 Ibn al-Bawwāb Kātib, 337, 338, 339,
 340, 392n, 393,
 Ibn Bayṭhar, 77n
 Ibn al-Bayyī', 207, 271
 Ibn al-Bazri, 452, 453
 Ibn al-Dāmaḡlāni, 281
 Ibn al-Buḥturī, 79
 Ibn Badrūn, 479
 Ibn al-Dabbās (al-Bārī) 55
 Ibn Daghlal, 405
 Ibn Dahhān al-Mawsili, 56, 110
 Ibn Dihyah, 128, 129, 457, 458, 458n, 459
 Ibn Dīnār al-Wāsiṭī, 307
 Ibn al-Dubās (Abu 'l-Karīm Mubārak), 91
 Ibn al-Dubayḥī, 112
 Ibn Durayd, 109n, 112, 122, 167, 311, 365
 Ibn Durustūlyah, 40, 40n, 43
 Ibn al-Faḍl, 492, 493
 Ibn Faḍlān, 285, 285n
 Ibn al-Faraḍī, (Abu 'l-Walīd, 'Abd Allāh al-'Aḍī), 92
 Ibn al-Farīḍ (al-Ṣḥaraf), 461, 461n,
 462n
 Ibn al-Farra, 35
 Ibn al-Fayyāḍ, 399, 399n
 Ibn Firrūt, 11, 11n, 336n
 Ibn al-Furāt, 62n, 165, 165n, 166,
 423, 424, 425, 426, 426n, 428, 430,
 431, 431n, 432, 433
 Ibn Ḡhāniand, 94n
 Ibn al-Ḥaddād, al-Miṣri, 45
 Ibn Ḥajar al-'Asqālāni : 12n
 Ibn Ḥājib, 11, 233, 235
 Ibn al-Hakkāri, 453, 453n
 Ibn Ḡhalbūn, al-Ṣūri, 213, 215
 Ibn al-Ḥamadāmi, 275
 Ibn Ḥamdis al-Ṣaḡalli, 195, 197, 507, bn Ḥamnūyah al-Sarakhsī, 208
 Ibn Ḥawzāh, al-Sulami, 420
 Ibn Ḥanbal Aḥmad, 126, 150, 199,
 210, 278, 284, 292n, 339, 339n,

- 448n, 449
 Ibn al-Ḥārith, 122
 Ibn al-Ḥasim, 458
 Ibn Ḥāzim, 65, 66
 Ibn Ḥazm al-Zāhiri, 310n, 320n, 321, 322, 323, 324, 325, 326,
 Ibn Hibat Allāh 207, 209
 Ibn Hilāl, 340
 Ibn Ḥinzūbah, 291, 292, 427
 Ibn Hishām, 128, 161, 471n
 Ibn Hubayrah ('Umar), 17, 18
 Ibn Ishāq, 161, 161n
 Ibn al-Jahm, 351, 352, 353, 354
 Ibn Jahwar, 324, 324n
 Ibn Jārūd, 448
 Ibn al-Jaṣṣāṣ, 62
 Ibn al-Jawāliqi, 125, 125n
 Ibn al-Jawzī, Abu 'l-Faraj, 125, 126, 178, 260, 263, 289, 290, 408
 Ibn al-Jazzār (Abū Ja'far): 32, 32n
 Ibn Jinni, 88, 91, 184, 230, 231, 451, 452n, 500
 Ibn Jurayj ('Abd al-Malik), 148, 149, 152n, 199
 Ibn al-Kalbi, 266, 341, 450
 Ibn Kaṭṭān, 38, 39, 39n, 496
 Ibn al-Kattāni, 322
 Ibn Khallikān: 1, 11n, 31n, 33n, 35n, 50n, 52n, 54n, 59n, 63n, 68n, 71n, 74n, 78n, 98n, 105n, 106n, 117n, 120n, 123n, 124n, 134n, 140n, 151n, 153n, 157n, 160n, 161n, 163n, 164n, 168n, 175n, 177n, 179n, 188n, 193n
 Ibn Kaṭṭān of Quraysh, 39, 39n
 Ibn Khālaf Abu Ṭ-ḥir Ismā'il, 177
 Ibn Khaldūn: 1, 2n, 3, 7, 10, 11n, 12, 73n, 220n, 222n, 223n, 328n, 406n, 410n, 411n, 437n, 443n, 500n
 Ibn al-Khall, 393, 393n
 Ibn al-Khallāl, 334
 Ibn Khallikān: 197n, 205n
 Ibn Khallikān, 220, 222, 245n, 248n, 252n, 256n, 267n, 285n, 287n, 293n, 295n, 296n, 298n, 301n, 316n, 319n, 327n, 331n, 334n, 336n, 341n, 349n, 359n, 363n, 364n, 368n, 369n, 372n, 382n, 385n, 393n, 396n, 403n, 411n, 435n, 437n, 447n, 449n, 453n, 460n, 462n, 463n, 464n, 466n, 467n, 494n, 417n, 319n, 520n, 529n
 Ibn Khamīs al-Mawṣili, 52
 Ibn Khāqān, 42, 42n, 81, 197n, 359n, 372
 Ibn Kharūf, 331, 332
 Ibn al-Khashshāb, (Abu Muḥammad 'Abd Allāh Ibn Aḥmad) 90, 91, 92, 96, 335
 Ibn Khayrān, 380, 381
 Ibn Khayyāt, 408
 Ibn Khudayj: 36, 36n
 Ibn al-Khuwārazmi, 374
 Ibn Kulayb al-Ḥarrāni, 210
 Ibn al-Labbīnah, 197, 197n
 Ibn Lahī'ah ('Abd Allāh), 35, 36, 36n, 37
 Ibn Ma'dān al-Yaḥṣubi: 36
 Ibn al-Madīni, 292, 292n, 448n
 Ibn Ma'īn, 448n
 Ibn Mājāh, 292n, 448
 Ibn al-Mājjishūn 'Abd al-Malik, 150, 151, 152
 Ibn Mākūlā: 43, 298, 299, 300, 322
 Ibn Mālik: 11
 Ibn Mammāti, 458
 Ibn Mandah, 182
 Ibn al-Mannī, 285, 286
 Ibn Ma'rūf Qāḍī, 291, 364
 Ibn al-Marzubān, 271, 360, 360n
 Ibn Mas'adah, 486
 Ibn Maṣāl, 416, 417
 Ibn Mas'ūd, ('Abd Allāh) 103
 Ibn Mawdūd, 511
 Ibn Mirdās, 405
 Ibn al-Mubārak, 34n, 37, 37n

- Ibn Muḥallīs al-Andalusī, 177
 Ibn al-Muḥassin al-ʿĀbī, 431
 Ibn Muḥayyī, 496, 496n
 Ibn Mujahid, 290
 Ibn Munāẓẓir, 476, 476n
 Ibn al-Munajjim, 350, 350n, 368, 368n, 372, 373, 374, 375, 403, 403n
 Ibn Munir, 111
 Ibn Munqidh, 407, 504
 Ibn Muqaffa', 478
 Ibn Muqlab, 163, 269, 296, 296n, 337, 338, 392n, 393n, 427
 Ibn Muqallad, 358
 Ibn al-Murakkaḥīm, 112
 Ibn Mūṣalāya, 490
 Ibn al-Musayyab (Sa'id): 16, 25, 256
 Ibn Muḥīr al-Mawwālī, 388, 389, 390
 Ibn al-Mustawfī, 240, 335, 346, 516
 Ibn al-Mu'tazz, 61, 62, 63, 64, 65, 108, 144, 197, 348, 387, 428, 429, 430, 431
 Ibn Nabīḥ al-Miṣrī, 82, 82n
 Ibn al-Naḥḥūs, 313, 409:
 Ibn al-Najjār, 185, 200
 Ibn Nāqiyā. (Abu 'l-Qāsim 'Abd Allāh Ibn Muḥammad), 86, 87
 Ibn Naṣr al-Mālikī, 203, 205
 Ibn al-Naṭṭāḥ, 471, 471n,
 Ibn Niftawayh, 357
 Ibn Nūbakhtī, 369n, 380
 Ibn Nubātah, 88, 140, 141, 142, 173, 175, 176, 184
 Ibn Nuṭṭah, 299
 Ibn al-Qābisi, 316, 317
 Ibn Qalāqis, 163
 Ibn Qānī' 472, 472n
 Ibn Qarājī, 505
 Ibn al-Qāsim al-Mālikī (Abu 'Abd Allāh, Ibn 'Abd al-Raḥmān al-'Utaqi) 115, 164, 165, 165n, 166, 204)
 Ibn Quray'ah 364n,
 Ibn al-Qaṭṭā' 318, 319
 Ibn al-Qaṭṭān, 272, 492
 Ibn Qutaybah, 18, 40, 42, 43, 78, 78n, 84, 126, 137, 137n, 142, 152, 223, 241, 243, 257, 477, 517, 529, 529n
 Ibn Qūṭiyah, 319
 Ibn Rā'iḳ, 428
 Ibn Rawāḥab al-Ḥamawī, 227
 Ibn Raghibān, 170
 Ibn al-Rūmī, 79, 295, 296, 354, 355, 357
 Ibn Ruzzīk, 56, 57
 Ibn al-Sā'atī, 390, 390n, 391
 Ibn Ṣabannak, 201
 Ibn al-Ṣabbāḡh, 199, 200, 201
 Ibn al-Ṣūbī, 200
 Ibn Sa'd: 13, 16, 35, 152, 244, 254, 254n
 Ibn Ṣadaqah, 345, Ibn Ṣafī, 333
 Ibn Ṣafī, 33
 Ibn Sa'id Ḥāfiṣ, 205, 206
 Ibn Sa'id, al-Kilābī, 403
 Ibn Ṣalāḥ: 11
 Ibn al-Salāḥ, Sharakḥānī, 226, 227, 228
 Ibn Sallām, 157, 157n, 327n
 Ibn Sallār, 417, 418
 Ibn Sūrah al-Shantarīnī, (Abu Muḥammad 'Abd Allāh Ibn Muḥammad), 80, 83
 Ibn al-Sarrāj Abu Bakr, 293
 Ibn al-Sarrāj al-Ṣūrī, 388
 Ibn al-Sawāḍī, 491, 492, 493
 Ibn al-Ṣayrafī, 331, 331n
 Ibn Sayyār, 480, 480n
 Ibn Shaddād, 332, 521
 Ibn Shāh, 378
 Ibn Shāhin, 201
 Ibn al-Shajari, 125, 125n, 234
 Ibn Shākir, 73n, 76n

- Ibn al-Shalwaḥānī, 355n
 Ibn Shās, 60
 Ibn Shīrshīr, 79
 Ibn al-Shujā', 265
 Ibn Shukr, 284
 Ibn Sīd al-Ba'aliyawsi (Abu Muḥammad 'Abd Allāh Ibn Muḥammad) 83
 Ibn Sīdah, 326, 327
 Ibn al-Sikkīt, 42, 43n
 Ibn Sīnān, 296
 Ibn al-Sitri, 338
 Ibn Surayj, 224, 518n
 Ibn Ṭabarzād, 460
 Ibn Ṭabāṭaba, 67, 67n, 68, 69, 70, 451, 452
 Ibn al-Ṭabā Ṭabā (Fakhr al-Dīn), 42n
 Ibn al-Ṭahhān, 206
 Ibn Ṭaghīfīn, 220, 317n, 326
 Ibn Tūmart, 220, 221, 317n
 Ibn 'Ubayd Allāh, 57, 59, 358
 Ibn al-Ukhwat al-Bay' 389, 399, 404
 Ibn 'Umar, 16, 24, 25, 27n, 28, 346, 466
 Ibn 'Unayn, 347, 348, 507, 507n
 Ibn Usamah: 31
 Ibn 'Uyaynah, 152n, 199, 289, 292n
 Ibn Wahb: 32, 33, 34, 34n, 37n, 152n, 164
 Ibn Waki' al-Tinnisi, 514
 Ibn al-Walīd (Caliph), 495
 Ibn al-Yamāni, 380
 Ibn Ya'qūb al-Najīrī, 177
 Ibn Yāsīn, 336, 336n
 Ibn Yazīd, al-'Adawī, 472
 Ibn Yūnus Astronomer, 434, 434n, 435, 436
 Ibn Yūnus (Historian 'Abd al-Rahmān), 122, 123, 123, 124, 162, 206
 Ibn Yūnus 'Imād al-Dīn Abū Ḥamid, 227
 Ibn Yūnus, al-Miqrī: 34, 36
 Ibn Yūsuf, 524
 Ibn Zanbūr al-Māridāni, 431, 431n, 432, 433
 Ibn al-Zayyāt, 58, 470
 Ibn al-Zubayr, 27n
 Ibn al-Zubayr al-Kūfi, 339-382
 Ibrāhīm, Aydmūr, 401
 Ibrāhīm Ibn al-'Abbās al-Ṣūlī: 201, 211, 430, 485, 488
 Ibrāhīm Ibn Adham, 29, 29n, 30n
 Ibrāhīm Ibn Jabalah, 213
 Ibrāhīm Ibn al-Mahdi, 326, 374
 Ibrāhīm (Imām) Ibn Muḥammad Ab-basīd, 130, 131, 132, 133, 479
 Ibrāhīm Ibn Muḥammad Ibn Ṭalḥah, 242
 Ibrāhīm Ibn 'Umar Ibn Kaysān, 248
 Ibrāhīm al-Ḥarbi, 23, 473, 473n
 Ibrāhīm al-Mawḡilī (al-Nadīm), 21
 Ibrāhīm al-Rassi, 70
 Ḍaḥ, 88, 272n, 276, 332
 Idrīs Ibn Ma'qil, 130, 131
 al-Idrīsī, 402n
 Ifrīqiyah: 8, 9, 405
 Iḥyā al-'Ulūm, 54n
 al-'Ijl, 22, 30n
 al-Ikhshīd, 403, 403n
 Ikhshīdites: 122, 122n
 Ikmal, 299, 497
 'Imād al-Dawlah Ibn Buwayh, 396, 397
 'Imād al-Dīn, 50n, 51, 54, 57, 59n, 60, 90, 91, 197n, 222, 436n, 441, 442, 442n, 492
 Imād al-Dīn al-Ispahani, 86, 110, 142, 143, 143n, 196n, 359n, 385, 390, 409, 415, 521
 'Imād al-Dīn Zinkī, 112, 519, 520 521
 'Imādiyah, 511
 Imām al-Ḥaramayn, 118 188, 190, 206
 Imām al-Ḥaramayn 'Abd al-Malik

44, 45, 46, 53, 152, 153, 154, 155, 277, 384
'Ikrimah, 252, 253, 254
Imra al-Qays, 11n, 482n, 534 al-'Imrāni (Abu 'l-Ḥasan), 53, 53n
India, 207
Indian, 341
al-Intiqār, 194
al-Iqtidāb fi Sharḥ Adab al-Kuṭṭāb,
42n
'Irāq : 14, 17, 26, 26n, 31, 36, 42, 50n,
72, 75, 76, 77, 131, 135, 165n, 168,
185, 191, 204, 245, 246n, 255, 259,
269, 277, 298, 304, 315, 334, 346,
352, 364, 396, 401, 406, 415, 423,
448n, 458, 459, 493, 498, 510
al-Irshād, 43, 273n
al-Irshād al-Muṣṣabib, 53
Īsā Ibn Ja'far Ibn al-Muṣṣabib, 356
'Īsā Ibn Ma'qil, 130, 130n
'Īsā Ibn Mawdūd, 512
'Īsā Ibn Muḥammad al-Hakkāri, 453
'Īsā Ibn 'Umar, 471, 471n
'Īsā Ibn 'Umar al-Thaqafi, 495, 496,
498, 498n, 499
'Īsā al-Hakkāri, 508, 509
Īsā al-Juzuli, 499
Iṣṣal-illa fahm-i-Kitāb al-Khiṣṣāl, 321
Iṣṣahān, 131, 173, 181, 190, 191, 254
Isfarā'in 153, 153n, 185
Ishāq Ibn Rāhwayh, 40
Ishāq Ibn Sulaym, 32n
Ishāq al-Mawṣili, 372, 374, 490
ishḥarat, 108
Is'ird, 204, 204n
Iskandarāni, (Abu 'l Tāhir), 54
Iṣlāḥ al-Ghalaṭ, 41
Iṣlāḥ al-Manṭiq, 42
Ismā'il al-Fārisi, 207
Ismā'il Kātib, 213
Ispahān, 50n, 298, 300, 304, 315, 354, 458

Istīlām, 194
Istirabād, 333
Italian, 184n
I't ilāl al-Qulūb, 534
Iyāḍ (tribe), 142
'Iyāḍ al-Yāḥsubi Qāḍi, 313, 313n
Izz al-Dīn Aybak, 505, 508
'Izz al-Dīn Mas'ūd 521, 522
'Izz al-Dīn Mūsak al-Ṣalabi 233

J

Jabalah Ibn Mālik, 447
Jābir Ibn 'Abd Allāh, 25, 152n, 149,
149n, 248, 248n
Jacob, 250n
Jadhīmah (tribe) : 13, 22
Jadhwat al-Muqtabis, 325
Ja'far Ibn Ḥanẓalah, 139, 139n
Ja'far Ibn Ḥamṣ al-Khilāfah, 343
Ja'far Ibn Yaḥyā Barmakide, 485
Ja'far al-Khuldi, 339
Ja'far al-Ṣādiq, 223, 223n, 224, 447n al-Jāhiz, 269, 346, 346n, 470, 479,
480, 481n, 483, 484, 486
al-Jahm, 351
Jalāl al-Dawlah, 369n, 370n
Jalāl Mulk, 408
Jalūla : 18, 18n, 19
Jamāl al-Dīn Ḥājjib, 246, 246n
Jamāl al-Dīn Ispahami 519
Jāmi', 497
Jāmi' (Ibn Wahb), 34
Jamharat al-Nisab, 266, 302, 450
Jamharah Ibn Durayd, 311
Jamāl 'Udlri, 145, 145n
Jam'u (Juwayni), 46
al-Janad, 250, 412, 412n
Jarbaḥāqān, 298
Jarīr, 534
al-Jargara'i, 406, 406n, 480n al-Jarmi, 43, 332

- Jāsim, 168
 Jas's al-Fulk 406, 406n
Jawāhir al-'Ilmīnah fi Madhhab 'Alim 'l-Madinah, 60 al-Jawāliqi, 334
Jawāriḥ wa 'l-Ṣayl, 63
 Jawhar (General), 68
 al-Jawhari: 19, 78, 95, 293, 304, 304n, 498, 517, 519
 al-Jawz, 128, 128n
 al-Jayyāsh, 413
 Jazīrah, 453, 453n
 Jazīrat Ibn 'Unar, 66, 66n, 344, 346, 452, 453, 453n, 521
 al-Jazūli (Abu Mūsā 'Isa), 96
 Jerusalem, 89, 95, 186, 227, 283, 284, 345, 419, 506, 509
 Jesus, 89
 Jew, 5n
 Jibril, 516
 Jibril Ibn Ḥāfi', 502
 al-Jihābiyāri, 169, 169n, 355n, 486
 Jordan, 144n, 146n, 506
 Joseph, 402, 402n
 Jubba, 167, 167n
 Jūdi Mountain, 452
 Juḥfah, 510n
Jumal, 84, 91, 122, 333n, 500
 Jurayj, 148
 Jurjān, 271, 299, 300, 333
 Jurjāni, 151, 181, 181n, 268, 269, 270, 271, 333n Juwayn, 45
 al-Juwayni, 45, 188, 384
 al-Juzulāh, 501, 501n
 al-Juzūli, 460, 460n, 500, 501
- K
- Ka'b (tribe), 44
 al-Ka'bi, 44
 Kabul, 467, 467n
 al-Kadra, 412, 412n
 Kāfi, 232
 al-Kāfiyūh, 233
 Kāfūr al-Ikhshīdi, 291, 303
 al-Kāfūr al-Ikhshīdi, 67, 68, 122n Kahlān (tribe): 35n, 451n
 al-Kalb (tribe), 151, 167, 352
 Kamāl al-Dīn (qādi): 47, 519
 Kāmil (Ibn Atḥīr): 16n, 24, 71n al-Kāmil, 256, 263, 264, 264n, 267, 345
 al-Kāmil Ibn Shāwar, 440
 Karak, 143, 143n, 144, 465, 505, 506
 Karkh, 276, 425, 452
 Kash, 252, 252n
 Kaṭṭīrah, 179, 179n
 al-Khaṭāji, 408, 403n
 Khālaf Ibn Marwān, 350
 Kaysūm, 71n
 Kāzimah, 160
 al-Kāzrūni, 181
 Khālif Ibn Ma'dān, 320
 al-Khalal, 84
 Khālid, (Abū Ṣafwān Ibn Ṣafwān), 15, 16
 Khālid Ibn 'Abd Allāh al-Qasri, 498
 Khālid Ibn Sinān al-'Absī, 89
 Khālid Ibn 'Azīd Ibn Mu'āwiyah, 253, 265
 Khālid al-Qasri, 14, 131
 Khālidites, 315, 315n
 Khālifah Ibn Khayyāt, 18, 268
 Khāliḥ Ibn Aḥmad 43, 79, 374, 471, 473, 496, 497 al-Khallāl, 146
 al-Kharā'iṭi, 534, 534n
 Kharidah, 50n, 51, 54, 57, 60, 86, 90, 111, 143, 196n, 197n, 222, 385, 390, 409, 415, 441, 492
 Kharqa, 529, 530
 Kharrūbah, 509

- al-Khashshāb, 123
Khasib, 168
 al-Khaṭīb al-Baḡhdādī, 134, 184, 189,
 192, 201, 254, 254n, 273, 274, 277,
 287, 299, 304, 307, 312, 351, 366,
 369, 471n, 485
Khayzurūn, 175
 al-Khiddab, 332
 al-Khidr Ibn 'Aqīl, 225
Khidr (saint), 269, 269n al-Khilā'i 312, 313, 314
 al-Khiraqi, 449, 449n
Khilāt, 465,
Khilaf : 31, 33, 33n, 464n
Khuftidskān, 514, 516, 517,
 517n
Khurāsān, 62n, 70, 71, 75n, 76, 107,
 131, 132, 133, 134, 135, 136, 137,
 137n, 138, 165n, 187, 187n, 191,
 193, 194, 227, 252, 254, 255, 298,
 299, 300, 304, 344, 352,
 352n, 384, 446n, 448n, 458
 al-Khut'hami (poet) 381
Khuwārizm, 207, 246n
Khuzā'ah, 75, 108, 496n
Khuzā'i Ibn Māzin, 475
Khuzistān, 167n
 al-Kisfayah, 272n, 273n
 Kinānah (tribe), 115, 336n al-Kisā'i (Shams al-Dīn), 11 al-Kisā'i, 21, 470, 471, 472
 al-Kisā'i (Abu 'l-Hasan), 287, 288,
 288n, 282
 Kisra, 125
Kitāb al-'Adāb, 63
Kitāb al-Aḡhānī : 73, 86, 300, 301,
 350, 374n, 489, 518
Kitāb al-Aḥkām li uḡl al-Aḥkām,
 322
Kitāb al-A'māl, 43
Kitāb Aḡh'ār al-Mulūk, 63
Kitāb al-Ashribah, 41
Kitāb al-Awā'il 419, 419n
Kitāb al-A'yān wa 'l-Amāt'hil, 431
Kitāb al-Badī', 63
Kitāb al-Barā'at, 108
Kitāb al-Bārī', 350, 375
Kitāb al-Bayān, 53, 53n
Kitāb al-Bayān wa 'l-Tabyīn, 430
Kitāb al-Dhārī'ah fi Ma'rāfat al-
Shārī'ah, 53
Kitāb al-Diyārāt, 315
Kitāb al-Faṣl, 322
Kitāb al-Fawā'id, 53
Kitāb al-Ḥaywān, 480
Kitāb al-Ḥayy'i wa 'l-Mayyīt, 43, 43n
Kitāb al-Iqān, 38, 38n
Kitāb al-Intiqār 53
Kitāb al-'Iqd, 349
Kitāb al-Ishārāt, 343
Kitāb al-Jinān, 381
Kitāb al-Jumal al-Kubra, 122
Kitāb al-Jumān, 86
Kitāb al-Khayl, 41
Kitāb al-Khuṭab, 343
Kitāb al-Ma'ārif, 18, 40, 40n, 78, 126, 152, 241, 257, 517
Kitāb al-Lafz al-Muḥīt, 374
Kitāb Ibn Murrah, 241n, 302
Kitāb al-Madḥḥab fi Dhikre A'immat
al-Madḥḥab, 225
Kitāb al-Maḡhāzi, 242n
Kitāb al-Man Ḡāb 'anhu 'l-Mu'rib, 164
Kitāh al-Masā'il, 41
Kitāb al-Maysir wa 'l-Qiddūh, 41
Kitāb al-Munīr fi Mawli Si-aj al-
Munīr, 458
Kitāb al-Murshid, 53
Kitāb al-Mustazhiri, 453, 453n
Kitāb al-Sariqāt, 63
Kitāb al-Sibawayh, 470, 471n, 496, 500
Kitāb al-Ṣuwar, 410, 410n

- Kitāb al-Taṣṣiḥ*, 41
Kitāb al-Ta'rif wa 'l-l'ām, 128
Kitāb al-Tawassuṭ, 43
Kitāb al-Zahr wa 'l-Riyāḍ, 63 al-Kiya al-Harrāsī ('Alī Ibn Muḥammad), 277, 278, 279, 281, 282, 454
 Kosegarten, 301n, 443n
 Kūfah, 13, 13n, 14, 16, 17, 18, 41, 78, 107, 113, 130, 131, 135, 136, 137, 149, 169n, 268, 287, 289, 337, 355n, 367, 393, 450, 466, 477, 478
 Kuṣṣāf, 126
 Kuṣṣājīm, 33n, 79
 Kurāmāh, 106
 Kuṭayyir 'Azzah (Abu Ṣaḥḥar), 254, 353, 354

L

- Lakḥm (tribe), 38, 94, 149, 283
 Lane, 102n
 Laṭā'f al-Ishārāt, 207
 Latin, 10, 33n, 301n, 404n, 407n
 Layla, 48, 51, 190
 al-Layṭī Ibn Bakr, 485
 al-Layṭī Ibn Sa'd, 36, 37, 37n
 Leyden, 164n
 Lisbon, 220n
 Lubābah Bint 'Abd Allāh Ibn Ja'far Ibn Abi Ṭālib, 265
 Lubayna, 383
 Lubbānah, 265
 Lukk, 417
 Luma', 226, 232, 276, 451, 452n

M

- Ma'āfir Ibn Ya'fur, 162, 199, 314
 al-Ma'āfirī, 95, 95n, 162, 198
 Ma'an Ibn Zā'idah, 148, 149
 Ma'arrat al-Nu mān, 202, 362
 Ma'bad, 444, 517, 518
 al-Madā'in, 134, 134n, 139, 140, 466, 466n
 al-Madān, 478n

- Madārik al-Uqūl*, 154
 Maḍḥij, 118, 437, 442
 Maḍḥij (Mālik Ibn Udud), 442
 Madīnah, 16, 24, 26n, 37, 60, 69, 103, 113n, 149n, 150, 153, 165n, 241, 241n, 242, 244, 244n, 253n, 254, 255, 256, 258, 259, 262, 263, 267, 268, 414, 443, 444, 505n, 510n, 518, 519
 al-Madīni (A u Ṣādiq), 95
 al-Madrasah al-Suyūfiyah, 504
 Maḥāzi wa 'l-Siyar, 161
 Maḥrib (Algiers and Morocco), 7, 8, 9, 106, 107, 164, 165, 165n, 166, 220, 222, 252, 600, 501
 Magian, 5n
 Maḥbūb Ibn al-Ḥasan, 447
 al-Mahdi (Caliph), 16n, 178, 213, 468, 468n Mahdiyah, 106, 107, 318
 al-Mahjam, 413, 414n
 Maḥmūd, 520n
 Maḥmūd Ibn Ṣāliḥ, 408, 409
 Majd al-Dīn Abu Ḥafṣ Umar, 509
 Majd al-Dīn al-Mubārak, 346
 Maḥḥadh al-Nazar, 53
 Maḥḥūl, 17, 17n
 Maḥḥwān, 130
 Maḥḥzūm, 40n, 447, 517
 al-Makin, 24n, 360n
 Makkah, 26n, 27, 29n, 38, 39, 40n, 92, 104, 113n, 114n, 116n, 122, 131, 137, 148, 153, 178, 188, 241n, 244n, 245, 245n, 248, 249n, 253, 253n, 261, 266, 269n, 316, 341, 344, 380, 411, 414, 423n, 437, 437n, 439, 462, 469, 477, 479, 492, 494n, 496n, 500, 510n, 531
 Malāṭiyah, 139n, 422
 Mālik (Imām), 11, 29, 31, 32, 33, 33n, 37, 38, 60, 84, 95n, 115, 150, 152n, 164, 165, 165n, 166, 201, 203, 233, 236n, 279, 316, 494

- Malik Ibn al-A'ṣar, 157
 Malik Ibn Dīnār, 248
 Mālik Ibn Sa'īd Qādī, 436
 Mālik Ibn Udad, 118
 Malik Ibn Ṭawq, 201
 Malik Ibn Wuhayb, 316, 317n
 al-Malik al-'Adil, 147, 227, 239, 421, 465, 522, 527 al-Malik al-Afḍal Nūr al-Dīn, 147, 186, 420, 421, 422, 422n al-Malik al-Aḡḡraf, 227
 al-Malik al-'Azīz, 145, 146, 147, 204, 236, 237, 238, 239, 345, 420, 421, 465, 523, 526
 Mālik al-Kāmil, 148, 459, 506 al-Malik al-Manṣūr, 147, 236, 421, 465, 466n, 527 al-Malik al-Mu'aẓẓam, 458, 505, 506, 507, 507n, 515 al-Malik al-Mukarram, 413 al-Malik al-Muẓaffar, 526 al-Malik al-Nāḡir Ṣalāḥ al-Dīn, 142, 143, 145, 147, 227, 508, 526 al-Malik al-Nāṣir Ibn al-Malik al-'Azīz, 238 al-Malik al-Ṣāliḥ Najm al-Dīn, 50 al-Malik al-Ṣāliḥ Ṣalāḥ al-Dīn, 527
 Malik Ṣhāḥ Saljūqī, 278
 al-Malik al-Zāḥir, 343, 345, 420, 522, 523, 527
 Māliqah, 129
 Ma'mar, 182, 182n, 199
 al-Māmūn (Cliph), 21, 70, 71, 71n, 72n, 75n, 107, 132, 158, 165n, 258, 258n, 259, 260, 326, 348, 349, 351, 352, 396n, 434n, 479, 479n, 485, 489 al-Māmūn al-Baṭā'iḥi, 503, 503n al-Māmūni, 396, 396n
 al-Māmūniyah, 430, 430n
 Manāzgird, 465
 Manbaj, 401, 415, 415n
 al-Manṣūr (Caliph), 34, 35, 36, 135n, 137, 137n, 138, 139, 140, 169, 178, 254, 254n, 263, 266, 268, 431, 468, 469, 479, 479n al-Manṣūr al-Farāwī, 458 al-Manṣūr Ḥājib, 324
 al-Manṣūr Sam'ini, 193
 al-Manṣūr 'Ubaydi, 106
 Maqāmāt, 462
 al-Maqdisi Ḥāfiẓ, 283, 284
 al-Maqqari, 359n, 495n
 al-Maqrizi, 33n, 464n
 Maqq, 407, 407n
 Maqqūrah, 365
 Marāḡḡah, 517n, 527
 Mārān (tribe), 226
 Marāḡid, 14n, 39n, 128n, 134n, 159n, 167n, 202n, 226n, 411n, 415n, 417n, 430n, 505n, 515n
 Mārib, 440
 Marj al-Rābiṭ, 135
 Marj al-ḡuffar, 465, 465n
 Marrān, 569
 Marṭān, 436
 Marṭḡad Ibn Zayd, 115
 Ma'rūf al-Karkhi, 293, 293n
 Marw, 14n, 28, 31, 40, 41, 44, 76, 118, 120, 130, 134, 159, 191, 192, 193, 194, 195, 250, 258, 344
 Marw al-Rūd, 120
 Marwān Ibn Abi Ḥafṣah, 353
 Marwān Ibn al-Ḥakam, 212, 265
 Marwān Ibn Muḡammad al-Jadi, 133, 135, 136, 137, 137n, 211, 213, 213n Marwān Ibn Muḡammad al-Nāḡiq, 300 al-Maṣḡid wa 'l-Maṣḡid, 79
 Maṣḡārt (Mountain), 411
 Maṣḡariq al-Anwār, 494
 Masmūdah, 221
 Maṣḡū'at, 126

- Marzubān, 272
 al-Marzubāni, 159, 159n, 295
 Mas'ūd Ibn 'Uqbah Ibn Buhays, 532, 533
 al-Mas'ūdi, 21, 43n, 212, 212n, 365, 468
 Maṭariyah, 512, 512n
 Mathew, 15n, 90n, 94n,
     241n
 Maṭīrah, 64, 66
 Ma'ūnah, 201
 al-Māwardi, 272, 274, 275
 Mawdūd, 511, 512, 520n, 521
 Mawqif al-Imām, 46
 al-Maydāni, 446n, 458, 529n
 Maymūn Ibn Mahrān, 25
 Maymūn al-Qaddāh, 105
 Mayyāfāriḡin, 141, 204n, 403, 452,
     465
 Mayyah, 528, 529
 Mayyurqah, 197
 al-Māzari, 493, 493n
 Māzandrān, 271, 333, 458
 Māzin (tribe), 473
 al-Māzin, 515
 al-Māzini, 232
 Mazrafah, 52
 M. Caussin de Perceval, 290n, 434n,
     436n, 444n, 446n
 M. de Gayanagos, 359n, 495n
 Medīne, 445
 Medinas, 445
 Makke, 444n, 445n
 Mekkois, 444n
 Mesopotamia, 71, 71n, 135, 191,
     204n, 212, 315, 348, 349, 362, 404,
     458, 465, 527
 M. Grengeret de Langrange, 364n,
     462n, 464n
 Midrār, 105, 105n
 al-Mihani (Abu As'ad), 52
 Mina, 492, 492n
 Minhāj Ahl al-Sunnah, 194
 al-Minqari, 16, 16n
 Miqdād Ibn Aswad, 443
 Mir'āt al-Jinān, 208n
 Mir'āt al-Zamān, 167n
 Mir Khaund, 140n
 Mir Khond, 370n
 Mis'ar Ibn Kidām, 157
Mishkāt, 15n
 al-Mishkāt, 90n, 94n, 241n
 Misk n al-Dārimi, 19, 19n
 Miṣr, 116
Mizān, 125
Mizān al-Shi'r,
 Moawia fils d' Abu Sofyan, 445n
 Morocco, 7, 192, 221, 222n, 317n,
     457, 495, 500, 501
 Moses, 89, 247
 Mogul, 47, 50, 50n, 52, 55, 56, 59,
     66n, 136, 186, 191, 226, 227, 230,
     232, 240, 313, 315, 333, 342, 344,
     345, 346, 388, 404, 491n, 511, 512,
     514, 519, 520, 521, 522
 al-Mu'āfa, 335, 335n
 al-Mu'āfa al-Jariri, 295
Mu'allaqah, 317
 Mu'āwiyah (Caliph), 30, 113n, 116n,
     170, 178, 245, 264, 449n
 Mu'āwiyah Ibn Bakr al-'Ulaymi, 473
 Mu'āwiyah Ibn Ḥudayj, 116, 116n
 Mubārak Ibn Mubārak, 338
 al-Mubarrad, 43, 61, 242n, 256, 263,
     264, 264n, 267, 267n, 295, 348,
     475n
 Muḍar (tribe), 30n, 116
Mudawwanah, 11, 165
 al-Muḍḥayyal fi 'l-Luḡḥah, 198
 al-Mufaḍḍal, 447, 447n al-Mufaḍḍal al-Ḍubbi, 43, 530 al-Mufaṣṣal, 336, 506
 al-Mufaḥḥah, 175, 204
Muḡīth al-Khalq, 155

- Muḥadīd ḥab*, 54n, 225, 227, 232, 453
Mu'jam al-Aṣḥāb, 38n al-Muḥallab, 66
 al-Muḥallabi, 302, 364, 370, 374
 Muḥammad 451
 Muḥammad (Prophet), 1, 13, 14, 15, 15n, 19, 38n, 39n, 43n, 67n, 89, 90n, 94, 97, 100, 102, 103, 112, 113n, 116n, 126n, 132n, 143, 178, 203n, 231n, 241, 241n, 248n, 253, 253n, 259n, 264n, 322n, 362n, 370, 435n, 438, 443, 447n, 457n, 494n, 517
 Muḥammad al-Baydaq, 488
 Muḥammad (Abu 'Abd Allāh)' 32, 268
 Muḥammad al-Jawād, 261
 Muḥammad Ibn al-'Abbās al-Yazīdī, 122
 Muḥammad Ibn 'Abd Allāh Ibn al-Muḥammad Ibn Dāwūd Ibn al-Jarrāḥ 429, 429n, 430, 488, 488n Muḥammad Ibn 'Abd Allāh Ibn Ṭāhir, 107
 al-Muqaffa' 478
 Muḥammad Ibn Abi Bakr, 116n
 Muḥammad Ibn 'Alī 'Abbāsīd, 131, 133, 178, 179, 479
 Muḥammad Ibn Ghāzī 525
 Muḥammad Ibn al-Hanafīyyah 290n
 Muḥammad Ibn al-Hasan al-Madh-hajī 322
 Muḥammad Ibn al-Hasan al-Naq-qūsh, 290
 Muḥammad Ibn al-Ḥasan Shāybanī, 287, 288, 288n, 289
 Muḥammad Ibn Ibrāhīm Ibn Mu'ab 480, 480n, 481
 Muḥammad Ibn Ishāq al-Mu'abi 372, 480n
 Muḥammad Ibn Ismā'il Ibn Ja'far al-ṣādiq, 104, 105
 Muḥammad Ibn Naṣr, 361
 Muḥammad Ibn al-Nu'mān, 435, 435n
 Muḥammad Ibn Sa'id al-Azraq, 429
 Muḥammad Ibn Salamah al-Ḍubbi, 534
 Muḥammad Ibn al-Sari Ibn al-Ḥakam 75n
 Muḥammad Ibn Tūmart, 220
 Muḥammad Ibn 'Urwab, 242
 al-Muḥassan, 366
 Muḥi al-Dīn Muḥammad 53
Muḥkam, 326
 al-Mu'izz al-'Ubaydī, 68, 69, 69n, 70, 105, 105n, 106
 Mu'izz al-Dawlah Ibn Buwayh, 303, 396
 Mujāhid, 113, 248
Mūjaz, 276
Mukātabāt al-Iḥlūwān bi'l-Shi'r, 63
Mu'ḥaṣṣiṣ, 327
al-Mukhtalif wa Mutalif, 291, 299 al-Muḥṭār al-Musabbīḥī, 70
 al-Mukhtār al-Ṭḥaqafī, 150
Muḥṭaṣir, 449
 al-Muktafī (Caliph), 111, 358, 449n
Mulaḥ al-Mumālīḥah, 86
 al-Mu'lim, 493
Munāqaḍāt al-Shu'ara, 363 al-Mundhīrī (Zakī al-Dīn), 69
 Muṭis, 62, 62n
 Mūnis Eunuch, 429, 430, 431n, 449n
Mūnis al-Walīd, 164
 Munqidh, 111
 Muntaṣir Caliph, 479, 479n
al-Muntaẓim, 126
 Munyah Ibn Khāṣīb, 503
 Muqaddis Ibn Sayfī al-Khalāqī, 74n
 al-Muqanna' al-Khurāsānī, 250, 251, 252
 Muqātil al-Minqarī, 528

- Muqatṭam Mt, 147, 391, 435, 459 509
Muqtaḍib, 232
 al-Muqtadi bi-Allāh, 490 al-Muqtadir, 61, 62, 62n, 423, 427,
 428, 429, 430, 431n
 Murāmīr Ibn Marwah, 340
 Murāmīr Ibn Murrah, 341
 Murcia, 94, 326, 327
 Murrah tribe, 340
 al-Murtaḍa Ibn al-Shahrazūri, 47,
 50, 51, 52
 Murtaḍa 'l-Dawlat, 405
al-Murtajal, 91
 Murūj (Moḡul), 226, 226n
Murūj al-Dhahab, 21, 43n, 212, 365, 486
 Mūsa al-Naṣrānī, 219
 Māsa Ibn Hārūn, 292, 292n
 Muḡ'ab Ibn al-Zubayr, 25, 26, 26n,
 76n, 149, 241, 244, 245, 245n
 Musabbihī, 70, 315, 435, 436
 Muḡalla, 527
 Musaylamah, 23
Mushkil al-Ḥadīth, 41
Mushkil al-Qur'ān 41
Mushṭabih al-Nisbah, 205, 299
al-Mushṭarik, 167n, 519
 Muslim (Imām), 11, 493, 494
 Muslim Ibn al-Walīd, 72, 72n
 Muslim Ibn Ziyād Ibn Abīh, 75 Muslim (Abū Ja'far Ibn 'Ubayd Allāh) 70
Musnad, 291, 291n, 292
 al-Musta'in 85, 85n, 93n, 352
 Musta'li, 98n
 al-Mustangir, 218, 407, 412, 515
 al-Mu'taḍid, 356, 361, 362, 423
Mu'talif wa 'l-Mukhtalif, 205 al-Mu'tamid (Caliph), 373
 al-Mu'tamid Ibn 'Abbād, 196, 197n
 326, 330, 331
 Mu'tamin (Caliph), 479, 479n
 Mutanabbi, 11, 73, 84, 88, 90, 141,
 216, 231, 232, 235, 235n, 297, 310,
 317, 355, 364n, 367, 371, 403, 404,
 500
 al-Mu'tayim, 58, 71, 75, 470
 al-Mutawakkil (Caliph), 42, 42n, 100,
 101, 102, 261, 262, 263, 352, 360n,
 362, 372, 479n, 480, 480n, 490
 al-Muṭawī' 224, 224n
 al-Mu'tazz Ibn Shākir, 105
al-Muḥallat, 83, 83n al-Muṭṭalib al-Khuzā'i, 175
 al-Muwaffaq Abu 'l-Karam Ibn Ma'- šūm, 417, 418
 al-Muwaffaq Yūsuf Ibn Khallāl, 146
Muwatta, 11, 29, 31, 37, 38, 84, 95n,
 165n, 166, 236n, 316, 494
 Muwayyid al-Naysapuri, 245n
 Muẓaffar al-Dīn, 240, 522
 Muẓaffar al-Dīn Kükubri, 511
 al-Muzani, 46, 224, 275

N

- Nābi"ḥah, 12n, 244, 497
 al-Naḍr al-'Abdari, 443
 Nāṣ', 27, 209n, 328
 Nafī fīls d'Alcema, 444n
 Nahawand, 121, 233
 al-Naḥḥās, Abu Ja'far, 294
 al-Naḥḥās Abu Naṣr, 408
Nahj al-Balāḡ, 308
 Nahrawān, 202
 Nahḡal tribe, 447
 Najāh, 412, 413
 Najd, 89, 108, 383, 383n, 411n, 515
 516, 516n, 534n
 Najīb al-Dawlat, 405,
 al-Najjād, 339, 339n
 Najm al-Dīn al-Khubūshānī, 99

- Najrān, 43n
 Naḳḳlah, 104
 al-Nāmi, 403
 al-Nasā'i, 292n
 al-Nāshī (Abu 'l- 'Abbās 'Abd Allāh Ibn Muḥammad al-Anbārī), 79 al-Nāshī 'l-Aḡḡhar (Abu 'l-Hasan) 366, 367, 368
 Naḡibīn, 53, 66n, 521
 Nāḡir al-Dawlat, 397
 al-Nāḡir (Imām), 421, 424
 Nāḡir al-Marwazi, 181, 185
 Nāḡir li Dīn Allāh (Caliph), 511, 512, 516
 Nāḡir al-Dīn, 228
 al-Nāḡir 'Abd al-Raḥmān, 324n, 325
 Naḡr Ibn Shabāṭh, 71, 71n
 Na r Ibn 'Abbās, 418, 419, 420, 502, 503, 504
 Na r Ibn 'Maḡḡūr, 362
 Naḡr Ibn Sayyār al-Layṭhī, 134, 135, 135n, 136
 Natū'if al-Fikr, 128
 Nawānah, 134, 134n
 al-Nawfali, 358
 Nawqān, 187n
 Naysapur, 45, 46, 70, 119, 120, 136, 153, 156, 162, 181, 185, 189, 190, 191, 193, 195, 197, 207, 271, 277, 285n, 298, 304, 344, 352, 371, 385, 401, 458
 Nāzūk, 426
 al-Naẓẓām, 480
 Niebuhr, 412n
 Nihāyat al-Maṭlab, 53
 Nihāyat al-Maṭlab fi Dirāyat al-Maḡḡhab, 154, 206
 Nile, 145, 390, 464n
 Nizām al-Mulk, 58
 Nizām al-Mulk al-Ṭūsi 153, 181, 190, 200
 Nizār ('Ubaydi) 98n
 Nizār (tribe), 332
 Noab, 251, 444n, 452
 Nuḡūm, 30n, 75n, 98n, 139n, 219n, 248n, 253n, 254n, 291n, 313n, 369n, 396n, 432n, 503n
 Nukat al-'Aḡḡyah, 146
 al-Nu'mān Ibn Baḡḡir al-Ansāri, 82, 83
 Nu'mān Ibn al-Munḡḡhir, 78
 Nūr al-Dīn Maḡmūd, 520
 Nūr al-Dīn Zinki, 52, 53, 229n, 407, 520, 521
 Nūr al-Huda, 492n
 al-Nuwayri, 165n, 266n
- O
- Omer Fils de Khattab, 518n
 Oran, 221
 Oumm Othman, 444n
 Outhman, 518n
- P
- Paris, 160n, 404n
 Persia, 66, 80, 255, 320, 354, 396
 Persian, 2, 13, 14, 66, 130, 131, 134, 138, 139, 140, 206, 209n, 255, 272, 341, 373, 396, 398n, 473, 498, 512
 Persian 'Irāq, 186, 199, 458
 Persians, 2, 3, 39, 125, 126n, 231n
 Pocock, 41n, 275n
 Portuguese, 184n
 Price, 18n, 24n, 446n
 Prolegomena (Ibn Khaldūn), 1, 3, 7
 Ptolemy, 317n
- Q
- al-Qābisi, 399

- Qābūs Amir, 316
 Qāḍi Abu Naḡr, 401
 Qāḍi 'l-Āmidī, 391, 395
 Qāḍi 'l-Anjab, 284
 al-Qāḍi 'l-Ashraf, 147, 147n al-Qāḍi 'l-Fāḍil, 54, 55, 142, 145, 146, 147, 236, 237, 239, 421
 Qāḍi Husayn, 120
 Qāḍi 'Iyāḍ, 493, 494, 495, 495n
 Qāḍi al-Raḡhīd, 310
 al-Qāḍi 'l-Tanūkhī, 363
 Qāḍi 'l-'Uḥmānī, 415
 al-Qādisiyah, 56, 354
 al-Qaffāl, 44, 45, 46, 118
 al-Qāhir (Caliph), 62n, 427, 431, 449n, Qaḥṭān (tribe), 437
 al-Qā'im, 106, 298, 490
 Qalā'id al-'Iqyān, 81, 197n, 359
 Qal'at Kawkab, 144n
 al-Qamrāwī, 329, 329n, 331
 al-Qāmūs, 36n, 78n, 153, 478n
 al-Qa'nabī, 37, 38
 al-Qānūn, (Isa), 499
 Qarāfab, 68, 147, 204, 226, 239, 285, 313
 Qarmāṭ, 449n
 al-Qāsim Ibn Muḥammad Ibn Abi Bakr, 256, 257
 Qāsim Ibn Hāghīm Ibn Falīṭah, 437, 437n, 439 al-Qāsim Ibn 'Ubayd Allāh, 357, 358, 359, 361, 362 al-Qāsim al-Shāghhī, 154
 Qāsiyūn, 286, 434n
 Qatādah, 18, 37n, 248, 248n
 Qatādah al-Sadūsī, 476
 Qātūl, 480, 480n
 Qayrawān, 32n, 104, 104n, 107, 165, 165n, 166, 254, 317, 328, 328n, 330
 Qays 'Aylān, 156, 156n
 Qays (tribe), 177, 309
 Qays Ibn 'Aḡīm al-Minqari, 16, 16n, 528
 Qays Ibn Zubayr al-'Absī, 143, 143n Qazwīn, 246
 al-Qazzāz, 290
 Qinnisrin, 167n, 362
 Qirmisīn, 42n
 Qubul, 40
 Quḍā'ah, 142, 199n, 363, 365
 al-Quḍā'i, 31, 33, 102, 406, 406n
 Qumas, Qumis, 76, 191
 Qūmis, 72, 76, 76n
 Qur'an, 1, 2, 3, 4, 7, 8, 9, 10, 11, 12n, 38, 40, 43, 45, 46, 48, 52, 52n, 66n, 86, 88, 90, 100, 128, 140, 140n, 158, 165n, 170n, 177, 188, 188n, 204, 205, 206, 207n, 223, 229n, 231n, 233, 238, 241, 243, 243n, 247n, 250n, 251n, 257n, 259n, 260n, 261, 273, 276, 280n, 281n, 287, 290, 292n, 293, 294, 295, 297, 298, 317n, 320n, 321, 321n, 328, 335, 336, 342n, 355n, 409, 409n, 410, 413n, 414, 415n, 435n, 440n, 447, 448, 451n, 467n, 469, 474, 476, 495, 496, 496n, 498, 501, 510n, 519n
 Qur'an, 36n
 Qurayb 159
 Quraysh (tribe), 32, 37n, 126, 126n, 148, 150, 152, 152n, 170, 236n, 255, 256, 263, 266, 300, 328, 330, 340, 341, 351, 370, 388, 443, 495
 Qurun, 521
 Qushayr Ibn Ka'b 191
 Qūsiyah, 235
 Quss Ibn Sā'idah, 43, 43n, 143, 143n
 Qutaybah Ibn Muslim, 157n, 255
 Qutaybah Ibn Sa'id, 448n
 Qutaybah Bint Naḍr, 443
 Quṭb al-Dīn Mawdūd, 511, 512, 520
 Quṭb al-Dīn Naysapuri, 121, 306
 Quṭrub, 841
 Quṭrubbul, 364, 364n

R

Rabadhah, 244n
 al-Raba'i Abu 'l-'Ala Sa'id, 177 al-Raba'i, Abu 'l-Ḥasan, 332
 al-Rabi', 172
 al-Rabi' Ibn Sulaymān, 158, 224
 al-Rabi' 'Ibn Yūnus, 479
 al-Rabi' 'Ibn Zayd, 470
 Rabi'ah (tribe), 30n, 162n, 332
 Rabi' al-Abrār, 134n, 255
 al-Rāḍi (Caliph), 374, 427, 429
 Raḍi al-Dīn al-Naysapuri, 245, 245n al-Raḍi, 105
 Raḡhbān Ibn Dunya, 171
 Raḡbah, 201, 201n
 Ramlah, 405, 428
 Raqqah, 71, 71n, 212, 215, 334, 521
 Raqqādah, 107
 Rās al-Dawā'ir, 331
 al-Rasḥīd (Caliph), 2, 21, 157, 178, 259, 287, 289, 362, 479n, 489 al-Rasḥīd Abu 'l-Ḥusayn, 381 al-Rasḥīd Ibn al-Zuhayr, 409
 al-Rass, 89, 89n
 Rassmussen, 363n, 533
 Rawāḡah, 229
 Rawḍ al-Unuf, 148, 161, 443
 Rawḡ Ibn Zanzā', 82
 Ray, 21, 77, 175, 181, 191, 289, 448n, 472n
 Rayḡūnah, 32
 Rāyṭah, 447, 447n
 Rayṭah, d/o 'Ubayd Allāh, 133
 al-Rāzī Abu 'Abd Allāh, 236n
 Reinaud, 140n, 165n, 269n, 294n, 421n, 465n, 527n,
 Reiske, 517n
 Retrospect (Price), 18n, 24n, 446n
 Riḡlah (Ibn al-'Arabi), 9
 al-Riyāḡhi Abu 'l-Faḍl al-'Abbās,

23, 22, 157
 Roman, 341
 Romans, 302n
 Roudhayya, 444n
 Ru'bah Ibn al-'Ajjāj, 533
 Rūḡ, 490
 Rukn al-Dawlat, 205n, 396, 398
 Rūm (Asia Minor), 138
 Rumaynah, 27
 Rūmiyat al-Madā'in, 138, 139, 140, 140n al-Rummāni, 293
 al-Ruḡḡāṭi, (Abu Muḡammad 'Abd Allāh Ibn 'Alī), 94
 Rusa, 89
 Russel, Dr. 180n, 229n
 Ruwaym, 209, 209n
 Ruzayq, 75

S

al-Ṣābi, 163, 315, 340
 al-Sabī'i, 253, 253n
 Sa'd al-Dawlat, 404
 Sadid al-Mulk, 407, 408, 409
 Sa'd al-'Ashīrah, 115
 Sa'd (Tribe), 173
 Ṣadafi, 124
 Sadid, 111
 Sadif Ibn Sahl (tribe), 124
 Ṣadr al-Dīn Qāḍi, 225, 226
 Ṣafawān, 159, 159n 160
 al-Saffūḡ, 133, 134, 136, 137, 178, 212, 263, 266, 268, 290n, 477, 478
 Ṣafīyyah Bint 'Abd al-Muṡṡalib, 241
 Ṣafīyyah Khātūn, 527
 Ṣafwat al-Muḡḡḡah, 53
 Ṣahyyah Umm al-Muminīn, 357
 Ṣaḡḡah, 78, 95, 498, 517, 519
 Ṣāḡib Ibn 'Abbād, 166, 167, 270, 301, 363, 373, 426, 428

- Sahl Ibn Yūsuf, 496
 Saḥnūn, 164, 165n, 166
 Şa'id (place), 235, 391
 Sa'id al-Aḥwal, 413, 414, 415
 Sa'id al-Ba 'ḥdād, 327
 Sa'id Ibn 'Alī, 206
 Sa'id Ibn 'Ahd al-'Aziz, 114
 Sa'id Ibn 'Abd al-Malik, 404
 Sa'id Ibn Hārūn al-'Ijlī, 223, 223n
 Sa'id Ibn Ḥumayd al-Tūsi, 65, 66
 Sa'id Ibn Jubayr, 253
 Sa'id Ibn Muḥḥad, 66
 Sa'id Ibn al-Musayyib, 256
 Sa'id Ibn Muslim Ibn Qutaybah, 137n
 Sa'id al-Dawlat, 184
 Sa'id al-Jarīri 447n
 al-Sakḥāwī, 335, 336, 337
 al-Sakḥī wi (Shams al-Dīn), 12n, 229n Sal'a, 267, 268
 al-Salāḥ Kurd, 227, 228
 Şalāḥ al-Dīn (Ayyubī), 35n, 54, 57, 98, 99, 99n, 106, 219, 219n, 226n, 229n, 236, 236n, 237, 306, 343, 407, 420, 440, 441, 442, 464, 465, 508, 509, 521, 522
 Salamah al-Waṣīf 490
 Salamiyah, 107, 167, 171
 Sale city, 221
 Şan'a, 411n, 412
 Sālīm (Hishāms Mawla), 212
 al-Salāmi, Abu 'l-Ḥusayn 'Alī Ibn Aḥmad, 76, 81
 Şālīḥ Ibn Aḥmad, 526
 Şālīḥ Ibn Mirdās, 405
 Şālīḥ Ibn Ruzzik, 97, 438, 439, 441n, 442, 442n, 503, 504, 526
 Şālīḥiyah, 506
 Salīḥ Ibn 'Abd Allāh Ibn 'Abbās, 139
 Sālīm Ibn 'Abd Allāh Ibn Umar, 256, 257
 Saljūq, 519
 Saljūqs, 181
 Sallār, 419
 al-Sam'āni, 43, 46, 94, 119, 129, 172, 181, 186, 191, 192, 193, 246, 275, 276, 289, 293, 294, 304, 345, 358, 371, 385, 389
 Sarḥān, 517n
 Samaw'al, 533, 533n
 Sanām, 252
 al-Şan'āni, 199
 Sanjar, 521
 Sanjird, 130
 Sāpūr Ibn Ardešīr, 512
 Şarāt, 361, 361n
 Sari al-Raffa, 403
 Sāriyah, 333
 Şarkḥad, 331, 421, 505, 506, 508
 Sarr Man Ra'a, 66, 73, 448, 480, 480n, 490
 Samarqand, 471
 al-Sarāt, 411
 al-Sarūjī (Abu 'l-Ḡhanā'im), 52
 Sasanides, 132n
 Sāwah, 135
 Sawākin, 331
 al-Şawma'i 209n
 Şaydah, 14
 Şaydah, 531
 al-Şaydalāni, 458
 Sayf Ibn Dhi Yazan, 39n
 Sayf al-Dawlat, 141, 173, 174, 184, 215n, 231, 301, 303, 315n, 364, 368, 368n, 370, 398, 398n, 399, 400, 401, 402, 403, 404, 404n, 419
 Sayf al-Dīn Ghāzi, 519, 520, 521, 522 al-Sayyid al-Ḥumyari, 209, 290n
 Schulten, 522n
 Seleucus Nicato, 140n
 Seljūq, 246n
 Semitic, 507n
 Seville, 81, 326, 330, 331, 332, 459, 460

- Shā'ib, 19
al-Shā'ibī, 16, 17, 18, 19, 26, 27, 149, 252
Shāhib Ibn Shabbah, 16
al-Shābushī, 301n, 315, 316
Shāḥīyākh, 352
al-Shāfi'i, 31, 32, 33, 44, 45, 53n, 118, 119, 121, 123, 151, 158, 172, 181, 184, 187, 191, 193, 194, 204, 224, 226, 239, 247, 268, 272, 277, 282, 285, 285n, 290, 304, 313, 314, 417, 448n, 453
al-Shāfiyah, 233
Shāhanshāh, 464
Shahba, 524
al-Shahhāmi Zāhir Ibn Ṭāhir, 181
Shahrastāni, 275n
Shahrastāni, 276n, 451n
Shahrūzūr, 226, 229, 517n, 520
Shalawbin, 460
Shāmil, 154, 200
Shammākh, 531, 532
Shammosiyah, 434
Shams al-Dawlah, 508
Shams al-Dawlah Tūrān Shāh, 227
Shams al-Dīn, 506n, 512
Shams al-Dīn Bāfīkīn, 515
Shanfara, 11n
Shantarīn, 83
al-Shara, 415, 415n
Sharaf al-Dīn, 54, 54n
Sharaf al-Dīn Rāj h, 523
al-Sharaf al-Hillī, 527
Sharāḥīl Ibn 'Abd, 16
Sharāt, 268, 268n
Sharḥ Shawāhid al-Mughni, 76n
Sharīf al-Baṭḥā'i, 382
Sharīf al-Murtaḍa, 308, 309, 310, 310n, 311, 312, 312n Sharīf al-Raḍī, 308
al-Shāshī, 453, 453n
Shawbak, 506
Shawbek, 268
Shāwar, 98, 439, 440, 441n
Shaybān, 515n
Shaybān (tribe), 302
Shayḍhalah, 246, 247
Shayrkūh, 98
Shayzar, 111, 407, 408, 409
Shihāb al-Dīn al-Subrwardī, 186, 454
Shihāb al-Dīn Ṭughril, 523
al-Shirūwī, 193
Shāmāt, 349, 349n
Shāhi Ibn 'Alqamah, 35n
al-Shā'ibī, 336
Shi'b Jabalah, 363n
Shihāb al-Dīn Abū Salamah, 229, 229n
al-Shimghāti, 399
Shirāz, 332, 391, 472
al-Shirāzi (Abū Ishāq), 53n, 54n
Shirmāh Daylamite, 219
Shu'bah Ibn al-Ḥajjāj, 157
Shudhūr al-'Uqūd, 178, 260, 289, 408
Shu'lah, 152n, 466
Shumaym al-Hillī, 334, 335
Shurayh, 14
Sicily, 195, 195n, 196, 196n, 197, 319, 319n, 330, 331
Sibī Ibn Ḥujr, 36n
Sibt Ibn al-Jawzi, 219n
Siḥr al-Balaghah,
Sijilnāsah, 105, 106, 107
Ṣilat, 494
Sīrat al-Rasūl, 161
Sībawayh, 2, 96, 289, 295, 331, 470, 471, 471n, 472, 473, 496, 497, 500
Silsilah (Juwayni), 46
Simnān, 76
al-Simsimāni, 307, 308
Sinān al-Ahtami, 16
Sinān al-Khafāji, 217, 217n

- Sinān Ibn Thābit, 62, 62n
 Sind, 257, 467
 Sinjār, 52, 53, 521
 al-Sinji, Abū 'Alī, 44, 44n, 45
Siq al-Zind, 84
 al-Sirāfi, 332
Sirāj al-Mulūk, 29n, 30, 503n
Sīrot al-Rasūl, 11, 128, 494n
al-Sirr, 128
Sirr al-Bard'ah, 164
 Sitt al-Shām Zamarrud Kī ātūn, 227,
 227n, 228, 229
Siyar al-Sulaf, 38n
 Sijistān, 45, 75, 76, 446
 Silāfi Hāfiḡ, 417
 Solomon, 85, 85n, 402n
 Souleyman fils d' Abdelmelik, 444n,
 518n
 Spain, 8, 9, 80, 83, 86, 92, 94, 110,
 128, 129, 39n, 177, 196, 198n, 222,
 319, 319n, 321, 323, 326, 327, 331,
 332, 338, 457, 458, 459, 460n, 494,
 495, 495n, 500n
 Spanish, 9, 81, 92, 184n, 324, 359
 Sprenger Dr. 43n
 Suddā, 85, 85n
 Suhayl Ibn 'Abd al-Rahmān Ibn 'Awf 444 al-Suhayli ('Abd al-Rahmān al-Khat'h'ami), 128, 129
 al-Suhayli, (Abu 'l-Qāsim), 161, 443
 Suhrward. 185, 456
 Sukhnūn, 164n
 Sukaynah Bint Husayn, 25, 26, 26n,
 151, 245
 Sulāfah Bint Yezdegird, 255, 257 al-Sulayhi, 409, 410, 412, 413, 414, 415, 416
 Sulaym (tribe), 165n
 Sulayma, 378, 382
 Sulaymān (Caliph), 266
 Sulaymān Ibn 'Alī, 477
 Surayj, 518n
 Surayji, 518
 Šurr Durr (poet), 300, 383, 383n, 384
 Sūs, 50
 Sūsah, 318
 Šuwāb al-Ṭuwāshi, 506
 al-Suwayda, 518
 Sulaymān Ibn Fahd, 230
 Sulaymān Ibn Kathīr Harrāni, 132
 Sulaymān Ibn Mansūr Caliph, 178
 Sulaymān Ibn Rafī', 249
 Sulymān Ibn Wahb, 100
 al-Šuli, 425
 al-Šu'lūki (Abu 'l-Ṭayyib Sahl), 45,
 224n
 Sumaysāf, 71n, 421, 422
 Sumayyī Ibn Sinān, 15
 Suqmān Ibn Urtuq, 419
 Syria, 17, 19, 71, 73, 107, 111, 113,
 115, 136, 144, 165n, 167n, 168, 179n,
 186, 191, 196n, 213, 227, 236, 241,
 242, 253, 268, 268n, 269, 285,
 286, 299, 304, 314n, 315n, 331, 334,
 335, 345, 349n, 352, 362, 404, 405,
 407, 408, 418, 420, 422, 427, 428,
 448n, 458, 465, 477, 478, 479, 486,
 503, 504, 510, 518, 520, 521, 527
 Syriac, 491n
 Syrian, 21, 31, 60, 62n, 341, 422, 506
 Suyūti, 76, 82n, 152n, 236n
 St. Germain, 38n
 Šubhī Ibn Kāhil, 104
 Sufyān al-Thawri, 26, 29, 113
 Syracuse, 165n

T

Ta'daqub, 232

- Ṭabaqūt* (Ibn al-Anbārī), 125
Ṭabaqūt (Ibn Sa'd), 13, 152
Ṭabaqāt al-Fuqaha, 54n, 157n, 268
Ṭabaqāt al-Muḥaddithīn, 32n, 34n, 37n, 157n
Ṭabaqāt al-Nuḥāt, 475
Ṭabaqāt al-Qurra, 38n, 39n, 40n, 496n
Ṭabaqāt al-Shāfi'īn, 46n, 54n, 153n, 154n, 285n, 392n
Ṭabaqāt al-Shu'ara, 41, 369, 369n, 381, 381n, 529
Ṭabaqāt al-Shu'ara (Ibn al-Mu'tazz), 63, 348
Ṭabaqāt al-Udaba, 332
 Tabar, 511, 512
 Ṭabarān, 187
 al-Ṭabarānī, 435
 al-Ṭabarī, Abu Ṭayyib, 45
 Ṭabarī (Jarir), 71, 76, 126n, 172, 268, 276, 351, 362, 424n, 428, 429, 430
 Ṭabarī, Muḥammad Ibn al-Ḥusayn, 290
 Ṭabaristān, 181, 182, 208n, 464n
 Ṭabarzad, 461
 Ṭābiḥ, 30n
 al-Ṭabrizī, 159n
Tabṣīrah, (Juwaynī), 46
 Tabūk, 505
Tadhkirah (Juwaynī), 46
Tafsīr, 53
 Taḡhlab (tribe), 302, 496n
Tahdhīb al-Tahdhīb, 447n
 al-Ṭaḥḥān, 123n
 Ṭāhir, 71, 73, 74, 74n, 352, 352n
 Ṭāhir (Ibn al-Ḥusayn al-Khuzā'i, 77, 490
 Ṭā'if, 253n, 394n, 411, 411n
 Taj al-Dawlat, 409n
 Tāj al-Mulūk, 408
 Tāj al-'Ula, 330
Tājī, 315
Takassi, 11
 Ṭalḥah Ibn 'Abd Allāh, 76n
 Ṭalḥah al-Jūd (Ibn 'Amr Ibn 'Abd Allāh) 76n
 Ṭalḥah al-Khayr (Ibn 'Abd Allāh al-Tamūnī), 76n
 Ṭalḥah al-Nidi (Ibn 'Abd Allāh Ibn 'Awā), 76n
 Ṭalḥah al-Ṭalḥāt (Abu Muḥammad Ṭalḥah al-Khuzā'i, 75, 76, 76n
 Ṭalḥah (d. of 'Abu Ṭalḥah), 76
 Ṭalḥah Ibn Ṭāhir, 71
Talḡin, 232
Talḡih Fuhūm al-Aḥar, 126
 Tamim (tribe), 15, 15n, 16n, 30n, 173, 191, 194, 379, 473, 528
 Tamīm Kalbi, 167
 Tamīm al-Dārl, 38, 389
 Tamīm Ibn al-Mu'izz Ibn al-Bādīs, 381
 Tamīm Ibn Murr, 470
Tanbih, 84
 Tangier, 328, 330, 331
 Ṭaniyah, 14
 al-Tanūkh (tribe), 363, 363n, 365 al-Tanūkhī, Abu 'l-Qāsim, 293, 301, 301n, 304, 304n, 363 al-Taḡī (Ḥusayn), 104, 105
 Taḡī al-Dīn Ibn al-Ṣalāḥ, 226, 230
 Taḡī al-Dīn Ibn Shāhanshāh, 464, 464n, 465
Taqrib, 322
Taqwīm al-Adillah, 47
 Ṭarafah, 11n
Tarṭīf Ṭahṣīḥ al-Tārīkh, 33n
Tārīkh al-Ḥukama, 62n, 433n
Tārīkh al-Islām, 33n
 Ṭāriq Ibn 'Abd al-'Aziz, 26
al-Tarīqat al-Anīqah fi 'l-Tajnis, 375
Tarīqat fi Khilāf, 246
 Ṭarsūs, 486
Tashīl, 11

Taḡrif, 451

al-Tawṣīyah, 460

al-Ṭāwūs Ibn Kaysān 246

al-Ṭāwūsī, 245

Taym (tribe), 126, 150, 152

Tayy (tribe), 186, 379n

Teheran, 26n

al-Tha'ālībī, 63n, 162, 164, 164n, 182, 184, 215, 269, 363, 365, 368, 368n, 371, 385, 398, 399, 403n

Thābit Ibn Yahya al-Rāzi, 485n

Tha'lab, 43, 43n, 61, 295, 314, 333

al-Tha'labī, 298

al-Thamānīnī, 451, 452

Thaqlif (tribe), 448n, 495

al-Thawri, 152n, 448n, 466

Thiqat al-Dawlat al-Anbārī, 394n

Thurayya Ibn 'Ali Umayyed, 443, 444

Tiberias, 122, 146n

Tigris, 56, 66, 66n, 74n, 128n, 139, 175, 186, 204n, 209n, 274, 277, 356, 354, 361n, 388, 430, 460, 480n, 512

Tihāmāh, 411n, 412, 413, 415, 415n, 437, 510n

al-Tihāmi (poet), 377, 379, 379n, 380, 382

Tikrit, 354, 510, 511, 512

Tilmsen, 221, 223

Tinnis, 402, 402n, 417

al-Tirmidhī, 292n

Transoxiana, 191, 194, 252, 252n, 275

Travels in Arabia, 214n

al-Tuḡhrā', 58, 482n

Tuḡhril, 246n, 345

Tuḡhtiklo, 134n

Tukush Khān, 246n

Tunis, 8, 11, 12, 106, 165n

Tūrān Shāh (Shams al-Dawlat), 99

Turcoman, 510, 512

Turkigh, 126n, 261, 266n, 300, 369n,

370n

al-Turtūshī, 30, 30n

Tūs, 21, 187n, 289, 344

Tuways (Īsa), 517, 518, 519

Tyre, 213

U

'Ubayd Ibn 'Aqīl, 496

'Ubayd Allāh Ibn 'Abbās Qādī, 431

'Ubay Allāh Ibn 'Abd Allāh al-Hudhali, 103, 104

'Ubayd Allāh Ibn 'Abd Allāh Ibn Ṭāhir, 76, 107, 109, 110

'Ubayd Allāh Ibn 'Īsa, 355

'Ubayd Allāh Ibn Qays al-Ruqayyāt, 76, 179, 179

'Ubayd Allāh Ibn Sari Ibn al-Ḥakam, 75, 75n

'Ubayd Allāh Ibn Sulaynān, 424, 425

'Ubayd Allāh Ibn Ziyād, 150

'Ubayd Allāh al-Mahdī, 33n, 60, 104, 105, 106, 107, 171, 217

Uḥud, 253

'Ukāz, 43n

'Ukbarah, 52, 299, 300, 364, 364n

Umāmāh d/o Ḥamdūn, 359

'Umān, 294

'Umar (Caliph), 14, 18, 25

Umar Ibn 'Abd al-'Azīz, 30, 103, 103n, 133, 134

Umar Ibn Abi Rabī'ah, 148, 148n, 149, 363, 363n, 442, 446

'Umar Ibn 'Alī, 447, 448n

'Umar Ibn Dharr, 450, 451

'Umar Ibn Hubayrah al-Fazārī, 498

'Umar Ibn al-Khattāb, 113, 117n, 255, 278, 446, 518

'Umar Ibn Shabbah, 21, 157, 447

'Umārah al-Yamāni, 146, 416, 437, 440, 441, 442, 526

'Umārah Ibn Ḥamzah, 254, 254n

'Umayyah Ibn Khālid, 148
 Umayyah less. 443n
 Umm Ḥabīb, 148, 258
 Umm al-Khayr Fāṭimāh, 209
 Umm Kulthūm Bint Abi Bakr, 245n
 Umm Mālik, 312
 Umm Thābit, 109
 Umm Zara', 494, 494n
 'Unwān, 177
 'Ūriuwalah, 94
 'Urwah Ibn al-Zubayr, 25, 26n, 152n,
 241, 242, 243, 244, 245
 Usāmah grandson of Sadīd al-Mulk,
 409
 Usāmah Ibn Munqidh, 418, 419,
 503
 Usāmah Ibn Zayd al-Tanūkhī, 100
 Usāmah Ibn al-Zubayr, 409
 'Uṣfān, 510, 510n
 Ustuwa, 187, 191
 'Uṭbah, 394
 'Uṭbah Ibn Abi Sufyān, 342
 al-'Uṭbi, 244
 'Uṭhmān (Cliph), 14, 18, 25n, 113,
 116n, 166, 466, 466n, 476, 518
 'Uṭhmān Ibn Muḥammad, 401
 'Uṭhmān al-Judhami, 37
 'Uyūn al-Akhbār, 41, 41n
 'Uyūn al-Siyar, 428
 'Uyūn al-Tawārikh, 74n, 76n

V

Valencia, 85, 86, 457, 459

W

al-Walī (Ahmad), 104, 105
 al-Wāḥidī, 297, 298
 Wā'il, 512
 al-Wajiz (al-Ḡhazzālī), 60, 249, 297
 al-Wajiz (al-Wāḥidī), 297

Wakī', 249n, 356
 Walī al-Dawlah, 380
 al-Walīd (Caliph), 241, 242, 244, 255, 265, 266, 268
 al-Wāqidi, 254, 254n, 268
 Wasa' (Valley), 437
 al-Wasāṭāh Bayn al-Mutanabbi wa
 Khushūmihi, 271
 Washīqah, 130
 Washmgir Amīr, 315, 316
 Waṣīf (Dik al-Jinn's slave), 170, 367
 Waṣīf Ibn Sawāritikīn, 429
 Wāsil Ibn 'Aṭa, 467
 Wāsiṭ, 52, 209n, 293, 365, 391, 394,
 404, 458, 491, 493
 Wasīṭ, 228, 249, 297
 Wāwa, 403, 403n
 Welid, fils d' Abdelmelek, 444n, 446n,
 518n, 531n
 Weyers, M. 164n, 317n
 Wilken, 370n, 498n
 William of Tyre, 504n
 Wustenfeld, 33n

Y

Yadhbūl, 395, 396n
 al-Yāfi', 30n, 123n, 157n, 201n, 208n,
 225n, 272n, 285n, 396n
 Yahya (Qāḍi), 71
 Yahya al-Tabrizi, 311
 Ya'qūb, 11, 11n
 Yamāmah, 14n, 22
 Yahsub Ibn Mālik, 495
 Yahya Ibn Aḥmad Ibn al-Mu'addal,
 151
 Yahya Ibn Ma'īn, 448n, 466
 Yahya Ibn Tamīm, 418
 Yahya Ibn Yahya, 37
 Yahya Ibn Ziyād, 478
 Yahya al-Māmūni, 434
 Ya'ish Ibn Ṣadaqah, 393

- Yalalbakht, 501
 Yalamlam, 394, 394n
 Yaman, 13, 16, 19, 37, 39, 43n, 53n,
 110, 112, 115, 148, 149, 199, 250,
 331, 341, 380, 409, 411, 411n, 412,
 416, 437, 441, 442, 448n, 451n, 475
 Yamūt Ibn al-Muzarra', 480
 Ya'qūb al-Ḥamawī, 519
 Ya'qub al-Manḡūr, 129
 Ya'qūb Ibn Dāwūd, 213
 Ya'qūb Ibn Ishāq al-Ḥaḍramī, 52n
 Yāqūt, 118n, 252
 Yāqūṭah, 16n
 al-Yās, 511
 al-Yasa', 105, 106
 Yasār al-Ispahani, 134
 Yatimah, 63n, 163, 163n, 164, 164n,
 182, 183n, 215, 215n, 226, 269, 385,
 398, 399, 399n, 403n
 Yazīd Ibn 'Abd Allāh, 100
 Yazīd Ibn 'Abd Malik, 481, 482
 Yazīd Ibn Ḥātim, 36n
 Yazīd Ibn Ḥātim al-Muhallabi, 36,
 165n
 Yazīd Ibn Mu'āwiyah, 178, 278, 279,
 280, 281
 Yazīd Ibn 'Umar Ibn Hubayrah,
 137n
 Yazīd Ibn al-Walīd, 255
 Yazīd Ibn Mu'āwiyah, 178
 Yazīd Ibn Unays, 34
 Yemen, 444n
 Yemenites, 13n
 Yezdgird, 455
 Yūnus Ibn 'Abd al-A'la, 33,
 123
 Yūnus Ibn Ḥabīb, 471, 471n, 477
 Yazīd Ibn Rummanah, 34
 Yūsuf Ibn Tāshifin, 81, 326, 328
 Yūsuf Ibn 'Umar al-Thaqafi, 14, 489, 498, 499
 Yūsuf Ibn Yaḥya, 62n
 Yūsuf, 524
 Yūsuf Ibn 'Abd al-Mumin, 223, 423n
 Yūsuf Ibn Ḥāfiz, 77, 502
 Yūsuf, (Abū Ya'qūb), 45
- Z
- Zāb, 56, 136
 Zabbān, 475
 Zabīd, 413, 415, 437, 439
 Zād al-Masīr fi 'Ilm al-Tafsīr, 126
 Zād al-Musāfir, 33n
 al-Zāfir, 97, 416, 420, 502, 503, 504
 al-Zāhi, 369, 370, 371, 372, 379n, 380, 382 al-Zāhir al-Ubaydi, 405, 406, 407
 Zahr al-Ādāb, 328, 376
 al-Zajjāj, 2, 2n, 84, 122
 al-Zājī. Abu 'l-Qāsim Ibn 'Abd al-Raḥmān Ibn Ishāq, 121, 122, 331,
 333n
 Zaki al-Dīn, 69, 70
 Zallāqah, 326
 Zamaḥshari, 88, 89, 134n, 229n, 255, 336, 506
 Zanjān, 186
 Zarzāri (tribe), 416
 Zayn al-Islām al-Qughayri, 185
 Zawā'id, 54n
 Zawra, 510
 Zayd Imām, 223n
 Zayd Ibn Ḥārithah, 258
 Zayd Ibn Mūsā, 260, 261
 Zayn al-Ābidīn, 255, 256, 257, 258,
 261, 263
 Zayn al-Dīn, 511, 512
 Zaynab Bint Ja'far, 258
 Zaynabi Qāḍi 'l-Qudāt, 492, 492n, 493
 Zanj, 23, 24
 Zij al-Ḥakīmī, 434
 Zij Ibn Yūnus, 434

- Zij Yahya*, 434
Z'inki, 519
Zirr Ibn Ḥubaysh, 13, 13n
Ziyādat Allāh (Aghlabite), 32n, 165n
Zubayd, 257
Zubayd Ibn al-Ḥārith al-'Ulāqi, 116
al-Zubaydi, 168
Zuhayr Ibn Abi Sulma, 317
al-Zubayr Ibn al-'Awwām, 241 al-Zubayr Ibn al-Bakkār, 108
Zubayr, 11n
Zuhrah (tribe), 236n
al-Zuhri, 16, 33, 103, 114, 241, 248, 248n, 253, 255
Zūlāq, 70
Zulaykha, 402n

Ibn Khallikan's

WAFAYAT AL-A'YAN
WA ANBĀ' ABNA' AL-ZAMĀN

(A Biographical Dictionary)

Vol. 1

Eng. Translation
M. de Slane

Edited by
Dr. S. Moinul Haq

BASIC CONCEPTS OF THE QUR'AN

By MAULANA ABUL KALAM AZAD

Translated by DR. SYED ABDUL LATIF

Being a Resume of the views advanced by him in his Commentary of the Surat-ul-Fatiha, the opening chapter of the Qur'an

The volume sets out on a brief canvas the ideology of the Qur'an as estimated by the late Maulana Abul Kalam Azad and should serve as an illuminating Introduction to the Study of the Qur'an.

ISBN 81-7151-217-8 23x36/16 pp. 16+118 1996

Book Code No. 000075

Rs 60/-

AN ORIENTAL BIOGRAPHICAL DICTIONARY

L. R. SEALE

Thomas Seale's Oriental Biographical Dictionary, revised and edited by L. R. Seale, is still the most comprehensive work of its kind. It gives detailed biographical information on prominent persons in the history of the East from the first century B.C. to the nineteenth century.

The Dictionary is a work of scholarship and has been highly acclaimed by Oriental scholars and historians all over the world. It is indispensable for scholars and students of the history of Muslim India, consisting as it does material gathered from Persian, Arabic, Urdu and European sources. The history of the Maratha and Rajput States and Kingdoms is also covered in full detail. Students of Muslim India's art, music and literature will find much of great interest and use in the volume.

More than 4500 entries are listed according to the English variant of each individual's name together with their Persian form in the parenthesis.

ISBN 81-7151-214-3 20x26/8 pp. 8+432 1996

Book Code No. 000018

Rs. 300/-

KITAB BHAVAN

1784, Kalan Mahal, Darya Ganj

New Delhi-110002 (India)

Phones : 3274686, 3277392-93

Telex : 31-63106 ALI IN

Fax : 91-11-3263383

Ibn Khallikan's
Wafayat al-A'yan

wa
Anbā' Abna' al-Zamān
(A Biographical Dictionary)

(M. de Slane's English Translation)

VOLUME IV

Edited by:

S. MOINUL HAQ

M.A., Ph.D.

KITAB BHAVAN

New Delhi - 110002 (India)

KITAB BHAVAN

Exporters & Importers

1784, Kalan Mahal, Daryaganj

New Delhi-110002, [India]

Phones : 3274686, 3277392, 3277393

Fax : 91-11-3263383

Telex : 31-63106 ALI IN

ISBN 81-7151-170-8 Set

ISBN 81-7151-174-0 (Vol. IV)

First Published in India      1996

Published by:

Nusrat Ali Nasri for Kitab Bhavan

1784, Kalan Mahal, Daryaganj

New Delhi-110002

Printed in India at:

Johar Offset Printers

Maujpur, Ghonda

Delhi-110053

CONTENTS

	PAGE
499 Fātik al-Majnūn ... ..	1
500 Al-Faṭḥ Ibn Khāqān ... ..	3
501 Fityān al-Shaghūrī ... ..	4
502 Al-Faḍl Ibn Yaḥyā al-Barmakī ... ..	7
503 Al-Faḍl Ibn al-Rabī' ... ..	18
504 Al-Faḍl Ibn Sahl ... ..	22
505 Al-Faḍl Ibn Marwān ... ..	27
506 Al-Fuḍayl Ibn Iyād al-Ṭālaqānī ... ..	29
507 'Aḍud al-Dawlah Ibn Buwayh ... ..	32
508 Al-Qāsim Ibn Muḥammad ... ..	38
509 Abū 'Ubayd al-Qāsim Ibn Sallām ... ..	39
510 Abū 'l-Qāsim al-Ḥarirī ... ..	42
511 Abū Aḥmad al-Qāsim al-Shahrūzūrī ... ..	51
512 Ibn Firruh al-Shāṭibī ... ..	54
513 Abū Dulaf al-'Ijlī ... ..	57
514 Qābūs Ibn Waḥamgīr ... ..	64
515 Mujāhid al-Dīn Qā'imāz al-Zaynī ... ..	67
516 Qaṭadah Ibn Dī'āmāh al-Sadūsī ... ..	70
517 Qutaybah Ibn Muslim ... ..	71
518 Qarāqūsh ... ..	78
519 Qaṭarī Ibn al-Fujā'ah ... ..	80
520 Kāfūr al-Ikhshīdī ... ..	83
521 Kuthayyir the lover of 'Azzah ... ..	88
522 Kūkubrī ... ..	95
523 Al-Layth Ibn Sa'd ... ..	105
524 The Imām Mālik ... ..	107
525 Mālik Ibn Dīnār ... ..	112
526 Majd al-Dīn Ibn al-Aṭhīr ... ..	113
527 Majd al-Dīn al-Mubārak Ibn Munqidh ... ..	117
528 Ibn al-Mustawfī al-Irbilī ... ..	119
529 Ibn al-Dahhān ... ..	126

	PAGE
530 Mujallī Ibn Jummayyī'	128
531 Abū 'Alī al-Tanūkhī, the Qāḍī	129
532 Al-Shāfi'	134
533 Ibn al-Ḥanafīyah	140
534 Muḥammad al-Bāqir	145
535 Muḥammad al-Jawād	146
536 Muḥammad al-Ḥujjah	148
537 Ibn Shihāb al-Zuhri	148
538 Muḥammad Ibn Abi 'l-Laylā	151
539 Muḥammad Ibn Sīrīn	153
540 Ibn Abī Dhī'b	157
541 Muḥammad Ibn al-Ḥasan	158
542 Muḥammad Ibn 'Alī al-Hāshimī	159
543 Al-Bukhārī	162
544 Ibn Jarīr al-Tabārī	165
545 Muḥammad Ibn 'Abd al-Ḥakam	166
546 Al-Tirmidhī the Jurisconsult	169
547 Ibn al-Ḥaddād, the Jurisconsult	171
548 Abū Bakr al-Ṣayrafī	173
549 Abū Bakr al-Qaffāl al-Shāshī	173
550 Abū 'l-Ḥasan al-Māsarjisi	175
551 Al-Khātan	176
552 Abū Sahl al-Ṣu'lūki	178
553 Abū 'l-Ṭayyib Ibn Salāmah al-Ḍabbī	179
554 Ibn al-Mundhir al-Naysābūri	182
555 Abū Zayd al-Marwazī	182
556 Ibn Warqā al-ʿUdanī	184
557 Abū Bakr al-Fārisī	185
558 Abū 'Abd Allāh al-Qudā'i	186
559 Abū 'Abd Allāh al-Mas'ūdi	187
560 Abū 'Āsim al-'Abbādī	188
561 Al-Khidrī	189
562 Abū Ḥamid al-Ghazzālī	191
563 Abū Bakr al-Shāshī	195
564 Abū Naṣr al-Arghiyānī	196
565 Muḥammad Ibn Yaḥyā	197
566 Abū Manṣūr al-Barāwī	200

	PAGE
567 Abu 'l-Hasan Ibn al- Khall ...	202
568 Muḥī al-Dīn Ibn al-Zakī ...	204
569 Al-Sadīd al-Salamāsi ...	214
570 Hafadat al-Ṭūsī ...	215
571 Al- Khubūshāni ...	216
572 Kamāl al-Dīn al- Shahrūzūrī ...	217
573 Muḥī al-Dīn al- Shahrūzūrī ...	221
574 Fakhr al-Dīn al-Rāzī ...	224
575 'Imād al-Dīn Ibn Man'ah ...	229
576 Al-Jājarinī ...	233
577 Rukn al-Dīn al-'Amīdī ...	234
578 Ibn Dāwūd al-Zāhirī ...	237
579 Abū Bakr al-Ṭurṭūshī ...	239
580 Abu 'l-Hudhayl al-'Allāf ...	242
581 Abū 'Alī al-Jubbā'ī ...	244
582 The Qāḍī Abū Bakr al-Bāqilānī ...	246
583 Abu 'l-Ḥusayn al-Baṣrī ...	247
584 Ibn Fūrak ...	248
485 Abu 'l-Faṭḥ al- Shahrastānī ...	249
586 Muḥammad Ibn Ishāq ...	252
587 Al-Tirmidhī the Traditionist ...	254
588 Ibn Mājah ...	255
589 Al-Ḥākim Ibn al-Bayyī' al-Naysābūrī ...	256
590 Abu 'Abd Allāh al-Ḥumaydī ...	258
591 Al-Māzari al-Mālikī ...	260
592 Abū Mūsa al-Iṣḥānī ...	261
593 Abu 'l-Faḍl Ibn al-Qaysarānī al-Maqdisī ...	262
594 Abū 'Abd Ailāh Ibn Mandah ...	264
595 Al-Farabrī ...	265
596 Al-Furāwī ...	265
597 Al-'Ājurri ...	257
598 Al-Salāmi the Ḥāfiẓ ...	267
599 Al-Ḥāzimi the Ḥāfiẓ ...	268
600 Abū Bakr Ibn al-'Arabī ...	270
601 Al-Naqqāsh al-Baghdādī ...	272
602 Ibn Shanbūdh ...	274
603 Ibn al-Sammāk ...	277

	PAGE
604 Abū Ṭālib al-Makkī al-Ḥarithī ...	279
605 Ibn Sam'ūn ...	280
606 Abū 'Abd Allāh al-Hāshimī the Ascetic ...	281
607 Ibn al-A'rābī ...	282
608 Muḥammad Ibn al-Kalbī ...	286
609 Quṭrub ...	289
610 Al-Mubarrad ...	290
611 Ibn Durayd ...	297
612 Abū 'Umar al-Zāhid al-Muṭarriz ...	305
613 Abū Maṣṣūr al-Azhari ...	311
614 Abū 'Abd Allāh al-Yazidī ...	313
615 Ibn al-Sarrāj the Grammarian ...	315
616 Ibn al-Anbārī the Grammarian ...	317
617 Abū 'l-'Aynā ...	319
618 Muḥammad Ibn 'Umar al-Wāqidī ...	326
619 Muḥammad Ibn Sa'd ...	329
620 Abū Bishr al-Dūlābī ...	330
621 Abū 'Abd Allāh al-Marzubānī ...	331
622 Abū Bakr al-Sūlī ...	333
623 Al-Ḥātimī ...	339
624 Ibn al-Qūṭayyah ...	345
625 Abū Bakr al-Zubaydī ...	350
626 Abū 'Abd Allāh al-Qazzāz ...	353
627 The Amīr al-Mukhtār al-Musabbihī ...	355
628 Ibn Ḥamdūn the Kātib ...	359
629 Ibn Quray'ah ...	361
630 Ibn Muḥriz al-Wahrānī ...	363
631 Ibn Taymiyah al-Ḥarrānī ...	364
632 Al-'Attābī the Grammarian ...	367
633 Al-Mas'ūdī al-Bandahī ...	368
634 Ibn Nuqṭah ...	370
635 Ibn al-Dubaythī ...	372
636 Ibn Ḥafar al-Ṣaḥallī ...	373
637 Al-'Utbi the Poet ...	375
638 Abū Bakr al-Khuwārazmī ...	378
639 Al-Salāmī the Poet ...	380
640 Ibn Sukkarah al-Hāshimī ...	386

CONTENTS

v

PAGE

641	The Sharif al-Raḍī	...	...	390
642	Ibn Ḥānī the Poet	...	...	395
643	Ibn 'Ammār D ḥu 'l-Wizāratayn	...	...	400
644	Abū Bakr Ibn al-Ṣā'igh Ibn Bājjah (Avempace)			404
645	Ibn al-Raḥḥā al-Ruṣāfī	...	...	407
646	Ibn Zuhr (Avenzoar)	...	...	409
647	Ibn Ḥayyūs	...	...	414

P R E F A C E

Ibn Khallikān has divided his work into two* volumes; the first volume ended with the names under غ (ghayn).† In the present edition the first volume is covered by volumes I, II and III.

As the complete autograph of the second volume of the original has not been traced and we have only a fragment of it, we have collated and compared M. de Slane's version (Vol. IV and V of the present edition) with the latest Egyptian edition (ed. 'Abd al-Ḥamid), and the Teherān edition. As in the previous volumes, the English translation of passages omitted by de Slane have been included.

M. de Slane's English translation (Vol. III) was published in 1845; its revised edition appeared in 1868. We have used the latter from notice No. 580 (p. 242) in the present volume.

The publication of Vols. II and III have been delayed for some unavoidable reasons; they are now under print and will appear shortly.

KARACHI :

S. MOINUL HAQ

June, 1964.

---

* M. de Slane published his English translation in four volumes.

† Cf. Autograph, Vol. I, f. 286.

IBN KHALLIKAN'S
BIOGRAPHICAL DICTIONARY

---

499 FĀTIK AL-MAJNŪN

The amīr Abū Shujā' Fātik, the Great, surnamed al-Majnūn, was a Greek by birth. He, his brother and his sister had been carried off captives from a place near the castle called Dhu 'l-Kilā'a, in Asia Minor. He learned writing in Palestine, and was one of those slaves whom al-Ikḥshīd took away from Rarīlah against the will of their masters and without even paying their value. His former master then declared him free, and from that time he continued to live a freeman among the mamlūks belonging to the Ikḥshīd family. He was distinguished for his generosity, lofty spirit, and daring courage, and this quality procured him the surname of al-Majnūn (the madman). During the life of al-Ikḥshīd, he and Kāfūr were both in his service, but, when he died, leaving a son to the care of Kāfūr, Fātik refused to remain in Old Cairo, lest he should be obliged to give the precedence to his former comrade and ride in his suite. He therefore retired to his fief, which consisted of al-Fayyūm and its territory, and he there took up his residence, although the air and the water of that province were noxious in their qualities and prejudicial to the constitution. Kāfūr stood in dread of him, and treated him with high respect whilst he dissimulated his real feelings. Fātik's indisposition continuing to increase, he was obliged to proceed to Old Cairo for medical assistance, and he arrived there whilst al-Mutanabbī was living as a guest with Kāfūr. The poet had often heard of Fātik's generous character and undaunted courage, but dared not now wait upon him lest he should offend Kāfūr; as for Fātik, he inquired after him regularly and sent him polite letters. They met at length by accident in the desert (outside the city), and had a long conversation. When Fātik returned to his house, he immediately sent to al-Mutanabbī a present to the value of one thousand dīnārs, and this he followed up by others. The poet then obtained permission from Kāfūr to celebrate the praises of his benefactor, and, on the 9th of the latter Jumādā, A.H. 348 (August, A.C. 959)* he pronounced the eulogium of Fātik in the celebrated and splendid qaṣīdah which begins thus.

"As thou (O poet) hast neither steeds nor wealth to offer, let eloquence aid thee, since fortune aids thee not."

It is the same poem which contains this admirable verse :

"(Glory belongs only) to the like of Fātik ! nay, 'the like of' weakens the idea ;—to the like of the sun, then, it belongs ; but where has the sun its like ?"

Fātik died at Old Cairo on the eve of Sunday, the 11th of Shawwāl, A.H. 350 (November, A.C. 961)†, and al-Mutanabbī, who had left Egypt some time before, lamented his death in the qaṣīdah which begins thus :

"Grief troubles the mind and resignation calms it ; thus, between them both, (my) tears are rebellious and obedient."

In this poem we find the following elegant thoughts :

"I am weak on quitting my friends, but if my soul hears of death and battle, I am strong. I am increased in force by the wrath of the foe ; but if a friend even hint a reproach, I tremble with sorrow. The stream of life is limpid for the fool, for him who thinks not of the past and of the future ; for him who is blind to inevitable fate, and, in pursuit of vanity, yields to the delusions of hope. Where is he who built the pyramids? what was his people? what, his life? his death? Monuments remain for a time after their founders ; then ruin strikes them and they follow (them to oblivion)."

* 17 August.—Ed.

† 24 November.—Ed.

The whole elegy is of singular beauty<sup>1</sup>. When al-Mutanabbi left Baghdād, he composed a poem in which he described his journey from Egypt and deplored the loss of Fātik. This piece, which was recited by him on Tuesday, the 9th Shā'bān, A.H. 352 (September, A.C. 953)*; begins thus :

"How long must we travel as the stars do, through the darkness : (the unwearied stars) which travel not with the feet of camels or with those of men?"

The following are the lines in which he mentions Fātik :

"Egypt has no other Fātik whom we may visit ; he has left no successor amongst men. He whom the living could not equal in virtues is now on an equal with the dead in the dust of the tomb. I have lost him, and I seem to be journeying in search of him, but the world only offers me a void."

500 AL-FATĤ IBN KHĀQĀN

Abū Naṣr al-Fatĥ Ibn Muḥammad Ibn 'Ubayd Allāh Ibn Khāqān Ibn 'Abd Allāh al-Qaysī (member of the tribe of Qais) al-Ishbīlī (native of Seville) was the author of the Qalā'id al-'Iqyān (collars of gold) and of other works. In the Qalā'id he has united (a series of notices on) a great number of Moorish poets, and he employs, in each of these articles, a highly elegant style and the most refined allusions. He is also the author of the work called Maṭmah al-Anfus wa Masrah al-Ta'annus fī Mulaḥ Ahl il-Andalus (the aspiring-point for souls and open field for familiarity, containing elegant anecdotes of Spaniards). He gave three editions of this treatise, a large one, a medium, and a compendium ; it contains much information, but is rarely to be found in our countries (the East). In these works the great genius and extraordinary accomplishments of the author are eminently conspicuous. He was a great traveller, and seldom 1 See it in M. Grangeret de Lagrange's Anthologie Arabe.

* 1 September.—Ed.

stayed long in one place. He died a violent death, A.H. 535 (A.C. 1140-1), in the funduq (or caravan-serai) of Morocco.—The ḥāfiẓ Ibn Dihyah (No. 472) says, in his work entitled *al-Muḥrib fī Aṣḥār Ahl il-Maghrib** (the amusing book, treating of the poetry of the Western Arabs): "I met a number of his disciples, and they spoke to me of his works and astonishing (talents); in his conduct he was a libertine he but in his written compositions he displayed a style which might be called lawful magic and limped water. He was murdered in the funduq where he resided, in the capital of Morocco, towards the commencement of the year 529 (Oct.-Nov., A.C. 1134). The person who abetted this crime was the Amīr of the Muslims himself, Abu 'l-Ḥasan 'Alī Ibn Yūsuf Ibn Tāshifīn." This Amīr of the Muslims was the brother of Abū Ishāq Ibrāhīm Ibn Yūsuf Ibn Tāshifīn, him for whom Abū Naṣr had composed his Qala'id al-'Iqyān, as it appears from his own statement in the preface of the work<sup>1</sup>.

501 FITYĀN AL-SHĀGHURĪ

Fityān Ibn 'Alī Ibn Fityān Ibn Thumāl, surnamed al-Shihāb (i.e. Shihāb al-Dīn, flambeau of the faith), was a member of the tribe of Asad, a follower of the Ḥanīfite doctorines and a native of Damascus. He bore the designation of al-Shāghūrī al-Mu'allim† (the preceptor), and he acquired distinction by his abilities and by his talent for poetry. He was engaged in the service of different princes, and their praises were celebrated by him whilst he instruct-

---

1 For further information respecting Ibn Khāqān and his productions, see M. Weyer's Specimen criticum exhibens locos Ibn Khacanis de Ibn Zeidouno, and the first volume of his Orientalia. I feel myself bound to say that the Qala'id al-'Iqyān is a work as barren in facts as it is brilliant in style.

* M. de Slane gives: Muḥrib.—Ed.

†M. de Slane gives: Mu'allam (past participle) which signifies 'pupil' not the 'preceptor'.—Ed.

ed their children. The dīwān, or collection of his poems contains a number of fine passages, and, as he dwelt for a time at al-Zabadānī, he made it the subject of some charming pieces. One of these, which we here give and in which he has reached the acme of perfection<sup>1</sup>, is on the garden of al-Zabadānī, an extensive tract of country offering a delightful sight in spring for the variety of its flowers, but, in winter, covered with snow :

“Kānūn (January) has congealed the wine in every cup, and even extinguished the embers which were lighted in the brasier (kānūn). O Garden of al-Zabadānī ! thou displayest a handsome face even when the face of the weather is contracted with frowns. The snow which covers thee is like cotton ; the clouds shake it out, the air cleans it, and the rainbow is the bow<sup>2</sup>.”

Happening, when an old man, to take a bath, and finding the water very hot, he said :

“I think your water is as hot as hell, and I suffer from it pains and smarting. I remember seeing you scald kids, but what makes you now scald old goats?”

I have since found, in the Kharidah, a piece of five verses, containing the same idea ; they are inserted in a biographical notice on the kātib Sa'd Ibn Ibrāhīm al-Shaybānī al-As'ardī (a native of As'ard in Mesopotamia), and surnamed al-Majd (i.e. Majd al-Dīn, or glory of religion). Speaking of these lines, 'Imād al-Dīn al-Iṣpāhānī, the author of the Kharidah, says : “They were recited to me by Sa'd himself to exemplify what could be said in dispraise of a bath, but he did not give them as his own.” The fifth verse is as follows :

“It was a well-known custom to scald kids, but what has induced you to scald old goats?”

---

1 He means perfection of style to suit the taste of that age. The piece is a mere issue of quibbles.

2 This is an allusion to the mode then employed of cleaning cotton. In modern times the operation is performed by a machine called a gin.

'Imād al-Dīn continues: "He (Sa'd) was still alive on the 6th of the latter Rabi', in the year 587 (A.C. 1191) and serving with the victorious army outside Acre<sup>1</sup>. "I warn the reader not to take the verse for Fityān's; he has merely inserted it amongst his own.—Fityān was attached to the service of the amīr Nūr al-Dīn Mawdūd Ibn al-Mubārak, the resident agent<sup>2</sup> at Damascus and brother of 'Izz al-Dīn Farrūkh Shāh, the son of the Sulṭān Ṣalāḥ al-Dīn's brother by the mother's side. He was employed to teach Mawdūd's children writing, and this induced Ibn 'Unayn to address him the following lines :

"O thou who art wrongly surnamed al-Shihāb,<sup>3</sup> for thy darkness would infect even the shooting stars in the heavens ! be not too proud of thy place in the Mawdūd's empire, even though thou thinkest to hold it in firm possession. If thou utterest a single bark therein, thou wilt have to twist thy tail about thy nose.<sup>4</sup>"

This last verse is borrowed from a passage in the Ḥamāsah.<sup>5</sup>—Ibn 'Unayn and al-Shāghūrī were in correspondence, and some raillery passed between them, too long to be related.—Al-Shāghūrī was born at Bānyās, somewhat later than A.H. 530 (A.C. 1135-6). ---In one of his pieces he says :

"Why should I be active and stirring, since tranquillity is happiness ? Yet I do not disapprove the search of fortune ; but I see the worthless wretch placed by his vices above the honest man whose advancement is impeded by his virtues."

He left a second diwān of verses, a small collection, and consisting exclusively of couplets. I saw a copy of it at Damascus and extracted from it the following :

1 'Imād al-Dīn means the army commanded by Ṣalāḥ al-Dīn, which endeavoured, vainly however, to prevent the Crusaders under Richard Cœur de Lion from besieging and capturing the city of Acre.

2 Resident Agent, or Shahnah; see No. 77, note on Shahnah.

3 This word signifies properly shooting star.

4 In English we should say: Thou wilt have to clap thy tail between thy legs.

5 See Ḥamāsah, page 687.

"The rose in thy cheek is brilliant and blooming; the magic in thy eyes is complete and copious; the lover who adores thee is absent-minded and sleeps not; he hopes and fears, complains and is grateful.<sup>1</sup>"

He died on the morning of the 22nd of Muḥarram, A.H. 615 (April, A.C. 1218)*, and was interred in the cemetery outside the Lesser Gate (al-Bābā al-Ṣaghīr, at Damascus).—Shāghūrī means belonging to al-Shāghūr, a habitation in the vicinity of Damascus.—Al-Zabadānī is a village between Damascus and Ba'lbek, abounding with trees and well watered; I saw it repeatedly and consider it a most beautiful and delightful spot.

502 AL-FAḌL IBN YAḤYĀ AL-BARMAKĪ

Abu 'l-'Abbās al-Faḍl was the son of Yaḥyā Ibn Khālīd Ibn Barmak (or Bermek) al-Barmakī (the Barmekide). He surpassed in generosity all the members of the family, beneficent as they were, nay even his brother Ja'far (No. 129) who, however, was his superior as a letter-writer and a kātib. Al-Faḍl acted as wazīr to Hārūn al-Rashīd previously to his brother Ja'far's appointment, and the khalīf, who wished to confer that post on the latter, said to their father Yaḥyā: "Dear father;"---for he used to call him father,—"I wish to transport to Ja'far the signet which is now held by my brother al-Faḍl."---He used to call al-Faḍl his brother, because they were born nearly at the same time, and his mother al-Khayzurān had given the breast to al-Faḍl whilst al-Faḍl's mother, Zubaydah, who was a mullatto girl from Madīnah, had given hers to al-Rashīd. They were therefore foster-brothers<sup>1</sup>. Alluding to this circumstance, Marwān Ibn Abī Ḥaṣṣah said in a eulogium on al-Faḍl:

1 In the original Arabic these verses are turned most ingeniously.

2 By the Muslim law, foster-brothers and foster-sisters are assimilated in most respects to real brothers and real sisters.

* 20 April.—Ed.

"A single advantage is quite sufficient for thy glory; the noblest of free women nourished thee and the khālīf with the same breast. Thou art an honour to Yaḥyā in every solemn assembly, as Yaḥyā is an honour to Khālīd."

Al-Rashīd then said to Yaḥyā: "I am ashamed to write that order to al-Faḍl; do it for me." Yaḥyā in consequence wrote these words to his son al-Faḍl: "The Commander of the Faithful has ordered that the signet should be passed from thy right hand to thy left." In reply to this, al-Faḍl wrote as follows: "I have heard the Commander of the Faithful's words respecting my brother, and I obey them. No favour is lost for me which goes from me to Ja'far, and no rank has been taken from me when he receives it." On hearing this answer, Ja'far exclaimed: "What an admirable being is my brother! how noble his soul! how clearly the marks of his excellence appear! how great the gift of intelligence he possesses! how vast his abilities in the just expressing of his thoughts!!--Al-Rashīd confided his son Muḥammad (al-Amin) to the special care of al-Faḍl, and his other son al-Māmūn, to that of Ja'far.—Al-Faḍl being afterwards entrusted by him with the administration of Khurāsān, proceeded to that province and remained in it for some time. Al-Rashīd then received a letter from the postmaster<sup>2</sup>, of Khurāsān, stating that al-Faḍl Ibn Yaḥyā was so much occupied with hunting and the enjoyment of pleasures that he neglected the affairs of the people. Having perused the contents of this dispatch, he handed it to Yaḥyā, who was sitting in his presence (to transact business), and said: "Dear father; read that letter and write to al-Faḍl what may turn him from those courses." Yaḥyā then wrote on the back of the letter: "God keep thee, my dear son, and grant thee to enjoy the pleasures of life! the Commander of the Faithful has learned with displeasure that thy passion for hunting and thy continual parties of pleasure

---

1 Ibn al-Athīr, the historian, does not fail to remark, in his Kāmil, that, as long as al-Khayzurān lived, al-Rashīd did not attempt to deprive al-Faḍl of his wazirate; but, the very year in which she died, he put that project into execution.

2 See No. 143, note on postmaster.

make thee neglect the affairs of the people. Return to a conduct more becoming to thee; for he who returns to what is becoming or to what is dishonourable becomes publicly known by that line which he adopts. Adieu!" At the foot of the letter he inscribed the following lines:

"Pass the day in the pursuit of honours and bear with patience the absence of thy beloved. But when the darkness approaches and veils our vices, pass the night to thy satisfaction, for night is the clever man's day. How many of the men whom you think devotees, that play strange pranks in the face of the night! It lets down the veils of darkness around them, and they spend their hours in pastime and enjoyments till morning. The fool exposes his pleasures to public gaze, and all his watchful foes denounce the scandal."

Al-Rashīd, who was looking on whilst Yaḥyā wrote this letter, exclaimed when it was finished: "Father, thou hast hit the mark!" From the moment al-Faḍl received it, he passed all his days in the mosque, till he was removed from his post. One of his deeds is thus related: When the government of Khurāsān was conferred on him, he entered the city of Balkh, which was the native place of the family and contained the fire-temple called al-Nūbihār. The Magians adored this element, and his ancestor Barmak had been the servant (or priest) of that temple<sup>1</sup>. Al-Faḍl now wished to destroy the edifice, but solidity of its construction resisting his efforts, he could succeed in ruining a portion of it only, and therein he built a mosque.---Al-Jihshyārī<sup>2</sup> mentions, in his History of the wazīrs, that, in the year 176 (A. C. 792-3) al-Rashīd conferred on Ja'far Ibn Yaḥyā the government of all the western provinces, from al-Anbār to Ifriqiyah, and invested al-Faḍl with the administration of all the eastern provinces from Sharwān<sup>3</sup> to

---

1 Al-Mas'ūdī says, in his Murūj al-Dhahab: "The grandee entrusted with the guardianship (sidānah) of this temple (the Nūbihār at Balḥ) was entitled al-Barmak (the Barmak).

2 See No. 359, note on al-Jihshyārī.

3 This town lay in Adḥarbaijān. A manuscript has here Nahrawān, which seems preferable, this place is being situated in 'Irāq.

the farthest extremity of the country of the Turks. Ja'far fixed his residence in Egypt and appointed deputies to govern the provinces placed under his care, and, in the year 178, al-Faḍl proceeded to his post. On arriving in Khūrāsān, he put an end to the rule of injustice, founded mosques, constructed cisterns, erected ribāṭs<sup>1</sup>, burned the registers of the arrear taxes, increased the pay of the troops, and, in the following year, spent ten millions<sup>2</sup> of dirhams on the military leaders, the *kātib*s and the persons who went to visit him. Having appointed deputies to administer the provinces, he returned to 'Irāq towards the close of the year, and was received with the highest honours by al-Rashīd and the assembled people. This prince even commanded the poets and the Khatibs to extol the merits of al-Faḍl, so that his eulogists increased manifold. Amongst the number was Iṣḥāq Ibn Ibrāhīm al-Mawṣilī (No. 84), who composed a piece containing these verses :

"Were I known to excellence (faḍl), to Faḍl the son of Yaḥyā, he would assist me in my adversity. He is truly a man; illustrious by his deeds and fortunate in his undertakings, he risks all to purchase glory."

Abu 'l-Ḥawl al-Ḥimyarī made a satire on al-Faḍl, but afterwards went to ask him a favour. Al-Faḍl then said to him : "Shame on thee! with what sort of a face canst thou come into my presence ?"---"With the same," replied the other, with which I shall appear before Almighty God, and certainly I have committed worse faults against Him than against thee." On hearing this, al-Faḍl laughed and made him a present. One of his sayings was : "The joy of him who is promised a favour is not equal to mine in granting one." A person having observed to him one day that his generous character would be perfect were he not so abrupt in his manner, he made this reply : "I learned generosity and abruptness of manner from 'Umārah

---

1 See No. 72, note on ribāṭ.

2 1 read الان الف, but all my manuscripts give the reading reproduced in the printed text.

Ibn Ḥamzah<sup>1</sup>." Being then asked on what occasion, he related as follows: "My father was administering the revenue in a province of Persia, when he lost an immense sum by a bankruptcy. Being then carried a prisoner to Baghdād, he was called upon to account for the money (as it belonged to the state), and had to deliver up all his personal property. Three millions of dirhams, which still remained due, were urgently required, and as he could devise no means to procure them, he remained in utter despair. There was only one man, as he knew, capable of assisting him, but that was 'Umārah Ibn Ḥamzah, and a profound enmity subsisted between them. He at length said to me one day, and I was then a boy: 'Go to 'Umārah and make him my salutations; then inform him of the misery to which I am reduced, and request of him this sum as a loan till such time as God may enable me to repay it!'"---'Thou knowest,' said I, 'your mutual feelings towards each other; why then should I go on such a message to thy enemy. I am certain that if he were able to bring thee to ruin, he would do it.'"---'Thou must go to him'; said my father, 'God may subdue him and open his heart to pity.'—To this I could make no reply, and I set out reluctantly, now advancing and then receding, till I at length arrived at 'Umārah's house. Having obtained permission to go in, I found him at the farthest extremity of his hall of state, reclining on soft cushions his hair perfumed with civet<sup>2</sup> and his beard with musk, and with his face turned towards the wall."---'Umārah's absence of mind was so great that he never sat in any other way. "I stood at the foot of the hall and offered him my salutation, but he did not return it; I then saluted him in the name of my father, and told him my business. He remained silent for a time and at length said: "We shall see about it." On this I retired, bitterly repenting to have directed my steps towards him, and

---

1 See No. 396, note on Umārah.

2 The verb غالى signifies: To perfume the hair or beard with ghāliyah غالية. This word, the precise meaning of which I did not recollect when writing the note on غالية (No. 111) means civet. The Arabs call a civet-cat, Qatṭ al-Ḡhāliyah, and the same word gato de algalia, has passed into the Spanish and Portuguese languages.

convinced that he meant to refuse my application; I uttered complaints against my father for exposing me uselessly to such humiliation, and my anger against 'Umārah was so great that I even resolved not to go back to him. I stayed away about an hour, but, having got cool, I returned and found a number of loaded mules at the door. Having asked what they were, I was informed that 'Umārah was just sending them off to us with the money. I then went home to my father and, not to diminish the value of the favour thus conferred, I abstained from mentioning what had passed between 'Umārah and me. A short time after, my father was reinstated in his post, and having soon gained great wealth, he gave me the amount of the debt, telling me to take it to 'Umārah. On arriving, I went in and found him as before: I saluted him, but he made no reply; and I then offered him my father's salutation, thanked him for his kindness to us and informed him that I had brought the money. On hearing these words, he exclaimed, in a passion: 'Was I then thy father's banker, scoundrel? be off and be damned to thee! and keep the money.' I immediately withdrew and returned the money to my father, who was much astonished as myself at the singularity of 'Umārah's character. He then said to me: 'By Allāh! my son, I cannot consent to let thee have it all; so take one million of dirhams and leave two to thy father.'---The same anecdote, with some slight variations, is related by al-Jihshīyārī in his History of the wāzirs: thus he states that the sum lent was one million of dirhams; that the occurrence took place in the reign of al-Mahdī; that Yaḥyā was farming the revenues of the province of Fārs when he lost his money by the bankruptcy; and that al-Mahdī, who was angry with him, had told the person commissioned to make him pay in his receipts to government, that if he did not receive the amount before sunset, he should bring him Yaḥyā's head.—“It was thus,” continued al-Faḍl, “that I learned generosity and abruptness of manner from 'Umārah!” ‘Umārah Ibn Ḥamzah

---

1 Here in the Arabic, follow the words والقسط راالصيرنى al-Qisṭār al-ṣayrafī (nummularious callidus). If they form a surname, the phrase descended from 'Ikrimah the mawlā of Ibn 'Abbās (No. 396), and was himself a mawlā and kātib to Abū Ja'far al-Manšūr. He was hasty, proud, generous, eloquent and one-eyed. Al-Manšūr and his son al-Mahdī admitted him to their convivial parties, and bore with his strange humours on account of his merit, his elegant language, and faithful services. He had been employed by them in the highest posts of the (financial) administration. A collection of epistles was left by him, and one of them, called Risālat al-Khamīs (the Thursday epistle), was usually read to the members of the 'Abbāsīd family. It is related that al-Faḍl's chamberlain went in to him one day and said: "There is a man at the door who claims relationship with thee."—"Let him come in", said al-Faḍl; and the stranger was introduced. He was still young and well-looking, but miserably dressed. When he made his salutation, al-Faḍl signed to him to be seated, and he sat down. Al-Faḍl waited for some time, and at length asked him what he wanted.—"The shabbiness of my dress," replied the other "will inform thee."—"That is true; but how art thou related to me?"—"I was born about the time of thy birth, I lived in thy neighbourhood, and my name is derived from thine."—"As for the neighbourhood, that may be," said al-Faḍl, "and the names may be similar, but who told thee of our births?"—"It was my mother; when she brought me forth, a person said to her: 'On this very night Yaḥyā Ibn Khālīd has got a son to whom they have given the name of al-Faḍl.'—My mother therefore testified her respect for thy name by bestowing it on me, but she gave it the diminutive form of Fuḍayl (little Faḍl) to indicate my inferiority." Al-Faḍl smiled and asked him his age. "Thirty-five years."—"True; that is the age I count myself to be. What has become of thy mother?"—"She is dead."—"And what hindered thee from coming to me long before this?"—"I could not induce which follows must begin thus in the translation: Al-Qiṣṣa al-Sayrafī and 'Umārah Ibn Ḥamzah descended, etc. But in two of my MSS, the phrase Al-Jihshiyarī relates the same anecdote etc., is inserted between the words al-Sayrafī and 'Umārah. The true reading is therefore uncertain, and I prefer not hazarding a translation.

(Continued on page 13)

---

(Continued from page 12)

myself to do so, because I felt that my ignorance and youth were obstacles to my entering into the society of princes; but as this desire had clung to my heart since many years, I made such studies as might qualify me to meet thee, and this I at length decided to do."—"What art thou good for?"—"For business of any kind, important or trifling." Al-Faḍl immediately ordered his attendant to give the man one thousand dirhams for each year of his age, and ten thousand more to defray his personal expenses till such time as he could be placed. To this he added the present of a noble horse.—When al-Rashīd put Ja'far to death, as we have already related (No. 129), he arrested his father Yahyā, and his brother al-Faḍl, who were then living in the palace. On setting out for al-Raqqah, he took them both with him, and kept all the members of the Barmekide family in custody, with the exception of Yahyā. When they reached al-Raqqah, al-Rashīd sent to inform Yahyā that he might take up his residence in that city or whatever he pleased. Yahyā replied that he preferred being with his son, and the khalīf then sent to ask him, if he would like to dwell in a prison. Yahyā declared that he would, and from that time he was kept with al-Faḍl in confinement. At first they were allowed some liberty, but subsequently they experienced alternations of rigour and relaxation, according to the nature of the reports which reached al-Rashīd concerning them. He then confiscated the property of every member of the family.—It is said that Masrūr the eunuch was sent by him to the prison, and that he told the guardian to bring al-Faḍl before him. When he was brought out, he addressed him thus: The Commander of the Faithful sends me to say that he ordered thee to make a true statement of thy property, and that thou didst pretend to do so, but he is assured that thou hast still great wealth in reserve; and his orders to me are, that, if thou dost not inform me where the money is, I am to give thee two hundred strokes of a whip. I should therefore advise thee not to prefer thy riches to thyself." On this al-Faḍl looked up at him and said: "By Allāh! I made no false statements, and were the choice offered to me of being sent out of the world or receiving a single stroke of a whip, I should prefer the former alternative: that, the Commander of the Faithful well knoweth, and thou also knowest full well that we maintained our reputation at the expense of our wealth ; how then could we now shield our wealth at the expense of our bodies? If thou hast really got any orders, let them be executed. "On this, Masrūr produced some whips which he brought with him rolled up in a napkin, and ordered his servants to inflict on al-Faḍl two hundred strips. They struck him with all their force, using no moderation in their blows, so that they nearly killed him. There was in that place a man skilled in treating (wounds), who was called in to attend al-Faḍl. When he saw him, he observed that fifty strokes had been inflicted on him, and when the others declared that two hundred had been given, he asserted that his back bore the traces of fifty and not more. He then told al-Faḍl that he must lie down on his back on a reed-mat, so that they might tread on his breast. Al-Faḍl shuddered at the proposal, but having at length given his consent, they placed him on his back. The operator then trod on him, after which he took him by the arms and dragged him along the mat, by which means a great quantity of flesh was torn off the back. He then proceeded to dress the wounds, and continued his services regularly, till one day, when, on examining them, he immediately prostrated himself in thanksgiving to God. They asked him what was the matter, and he replied that the patient was saved, because new flesh was forming. He then said : "Did I not say that he had received fifty strokes? Well, by Allāh! one thousand strokes could not have left worse marks ; but I merely said so that he might take courage, and thus aid my efforts to cure him." Al-Faḍl, on his recovery, borrowed ten thousand dirhams from a friend and sent them to the doctor, who returned them. Thinking that he had offered too little he borrowed ten thousand more, but the man refused them and said : "I cannot accept a salary for curing the greatest among the generous; were it even twenty thousand dinārs, I should refuse them." When this was told to al-Faḍl, he declared that such an act of generosity surpassed all that he himself had done during the course of his life. For he had learned that the doctor was poor and in great distress.—The following verses, which, I believe, are by Abu 'l-'Atāhiyah, were frequently recited by al-Faḍl in his prison :

"We address our complaints to God in our sufferings for it is His hand which removeth pain and affliction. We have quitted the world, and yet we exist therein; we are not of the living, neither we are of the dead. When the gaoler happens to enter our cell, we wonder and exclaim : 'This man has come from the world !' "

I have since discovered that these verses are by Ṣāliḥ Ibn 'Abd al-Quddūs; they form part of a poem which he composed when in prison. Some, however, attribute them to 'Alī Ibn al-Khālīd, who having been suspected of atheism at the same time as Ṣāliḥ, was imprisoned along with him by the order of the khalīf al-Mahdī.—The praises of the Barmekides were celebrated by all the contemporary poets. Marwān Ibn Abī Ḥaṣṣah, or Abu 'l-Hajnā as some say, composed the following lines on al-Faḍl :

"The power of doing good and of harming is in the hands of princes, but the Barmekides do good and harm not. If punishment is to be inflicted, that duty is imposed on others; but to them all good is justly attributed. When thou knowst not the origin and ancestry of a man, examine his acts; when the roots are swollen with moisture<sup>1</sup>, the sprouts flourish and the crop is abundant."

Al-'Attābī<sup>2</sup> the poet incurred the displeasure of al-Rashīd, but was pardoned through al-Faḍl's intercession. On this occasion he pronounced these lines :

"I was cast into the abyss of death, from which neither counsel nor artifice could save me. But your words ceased not in my favour till you snatched my life from the grasp of fate.

Abū Nuwās praised him also in a qaṣīdah wherein he said:

"I shall complain to al-Faḍl, the son of Yaḥyā, the son of Khālīd, of the pains of love; perhaps he may unite me to my mistress."

---

1 The word ندى nadd means both moisture and generosity. Here the poet confounds the two ideas.

2 Abū 'Amr Kulthūm Ibn 'Umar Ibn 'Taḥḥlib al-Taḥḥlibī, a poet and kātib, was a native of Damascus, established at Qinnisrīn. He bore the surname of al-'Attābī. The Barmekides honoured him with their patronage, and at a later period he enjoyed the friendship of Ṭāhir Ibn al-Ḥusayn.—(Fihrist, fol. 166).

On its being remarked to the poet that he was wrong in addressing such a strange request to al-Faḍl, he replied that he meant a union of preference (and affection), not a union of the persons. Al-Mutanabbī imitated this where he says :

“Perhaps the amīr may see my abasement, and intercede with her who made me an example of (unrequited) love.”

A certain poet composed one single line on al-Faḍl, which was this :

“What we have all experienced from al-Faḍl’s generosity has converted the human race into (grateful) poets.”

Fault having been found with this verse because it was isolated, al-‘Udhāfur Ibn Ward Ibn Sa’d al-Qummi composed the following to match it :

“He taught the most unprolific geniuses amongst us how to compose in verse, and the avaricious how to show generosity.”

This line was much admired.—The affection of al-Faḍl for his father was extreme : it is related that, when they were in prison and unable to procure warm water, which however was necessary for his father, as he could not make use of cold water in winter, al-Faḍl took the copper ewer which contained the water for their use and applied it to his stomach, that he might thus, in some measure, diminish its coldness and render it fit for his father’s use.—The anecdotes told of al-Faḍl are very numerous. He was born on the 22nd of Dhu ‘l-Ḥijjah, A.H. 147 (February, A.C. 765)*, but al-Ṭabarī says, in his History, towards the commencement of his chapter on the reign of Hārūn al-Rashīd : “The birth of al-Faḍl Ibn Yaḥyā took place in the year 148.”—God best knows the truth!—He died in prison, at al-Raqqah, on a Friday morning in the month of al-Muḥarram, A.H. 193 (Oct.-Nov. A.C. 808); some say, in the month of Ramaḍān, A.H. 192. When al-Rashīd was informed of his death, he said: “My fate is near unto ”his; and so it proved, for he expired at Tūs, on the eve of Saturday, the 3rd of the latter Jumādā, A.H. 193 (March, A.C. 809);* some state, however, that he died on the 15th of the month, and others, that he breathed his last on the eve of Thursday, the 15th of the first Jumādā; but Ibn al-Labbān al-Farāḍī<sup>1</sup> mentions that his death occurred in the month of the latter Rabi'; they all agree, however, as to the year. We have already stated that al-Faḍl and al-Rashīd were born about the same time.—On the death of al-Rashīd, his sons, Muḥammad al-Amīn and (Abū Ja'far) al-Manṣūr the governor of Khurāsān, were established as his successors in the khalīfat.

---

* 19 February.—Ed.

503 AL-FAḌL IBN AL-RABĪ'

Abu 'l-'Abbās al-Faḍl was the son of al-Rabī' Ibn Yūnus Ibn Muḥammad Ibn 'Abd Allāh Ibn Abī Furwāh.—This last, whose real name was Kaysān, was a mawlā to (the khalīf) 'Uthmān Ibn 'Affān (No. 223).—We have already spoken of his father al-Rabī' (No. 223) and mentioned something of what passed between him and Abū Ja'far al-Manṣūr.—When the sovereign authority devolved to al-Rashīd, this prince chose the Barmakides for his wazīrs, and al-Faḍl, who had aspired to an equality with them and hoped to rival them in influence, conceived a deep hatred against them on

---

1 Abu 'l-Husayn Muḥammad Ibn 'Abd Allāh al-Baṣrī (a native of Baṣrah), and surnamed Ibn al-Labbān (the son of the milkman), was an eminent jurisconsult of the Shaf'ite sect, and possessed such skill in the calculation of inheritance-shares that he obtained the surname of al-Farāḍī. A number of works were composed by him on this subject, and Abū Ishāq al-Shīrāzī declared that no one had ever produced any thing like them. Ibn al-Labbān was heard to say that there was not an inheritance-calculator on earth who had not been his disciple or a disciple of his disciples; otherwise that person could do nothing good in his profession. He gave his lessons in a college built purposely for him at Baḡhdād, and he died in the month of the first Rabi' A. H. 402 (October, A. C. 1011).—(Ṭabaqāt al-Shāfi'in.)—We here again find another college built before the time of Nizām al-Mulk, who has been generally supposed to have founded the first establishment of the kind. See Introduction to Vol. I.

* 24 March.—Ed.

finding all his efforts for that purpose, ineffectual. 'Ubayd Allāh Ibn Sulaymān Ibn Wahb (No. 12, note on 'Ubayd Allāh) said: "When God wills the destruction of a family (or people) and the rain of their prosperity, he disposes certain causes to effect that purpose; and one of the causes which contributed to the fall of the Barmakides was their disdain for al-Faḍl Ibn al-Rabī'. He therefore wrought against them underhand, and having succeeded in forming a close intimacy with al-Rashīd, he turned that prince's heart against them. In this he was seconded by the kātib Ismā'il Ibn Ṣabīḥ till the event was brought to pass." It is related that Yaḥyā Ibn Khālīd al-Barmakī was one day holding a court for the dispatch of public business, with his son Ja'far seated before him to write his decisions on the memorials which were presented, when al-Faḍl came in with ten written applications from different persons. To each of these Yaḥyā made an objection, and ended by refusing his sanction to every one of them, on which al-Faḍl gathered them up, saying: "Go back (to those who sent applications) repelled and rejected!" He then turned to go out and recited the following lines:

"Fortune may yet alter her present course and produce some change; Fortune is apt to stumble in her gait. She may grant certain wishes, procure satisfaction for certain offences, and replace this state of things by another."

Yaḥyā, overhearing these words, immediately recalled him, saying: "Come back, Abu 'I-'Abbās! I insist upon it;" and set his approval to all the memorials. It was very shortly after this, that the fall of the Barmakides was brought about through al-Faḍl's means, and he then became wazīr to al-Rashīd. In allusion to this event, Abū Nuwās (No. 162), or Abū Ḥazrah according to some, recited the following lines:

"Fortune slighted the merits of the Barmakides when she overthrew their power by a fatal stroke. But certainly that same fortune which respected not the desert of Yaḥyā will have no regard for those of the family of al-Rabī'."

A discussion having arisen one day in the presence of al-Rashīd between Ja'far Ibn Yaḥyā and al-Faḍl Ibn al-Rabī' the former called his adversary a foundling, in allusion to the circumstance that no one knew who al-Rabī's father was (No. 223). Stung with the insult, al-Faḍl exclaimed: "Bear witness to that, Commander of the Faithful!" On this Ja'far turned to al-Rashīd and said: "Commander of the Faithful! before whom does this ignorant man cite thee to bear witness? thee, who art the judge of the judges!"—After the death of al-Rashīd, al-Faḍl continued to act as wazīr; having enjoyed the confidence of that prince, he procured al-Amīn's elevation to the throne, without taking the least notice of al-Māmūn, who was then in Khurāsān. This prince immediately resolved on dispatching a body of troops to intercept him on his return from Ṭūs, where al-Rashīd had breathed his last, but he was dissuaded from his purpose by his wazīr al-Faḍl Ibn Sahl who felt apprehensive of the consequences. Al-Faḍl Ibn al-Rabī then foresaw the danger which awaited him in case of al-Māmūn's accession to the khalīfate, and he therefore persuaded al-Amīn to deprive him of his rights as declared successor to the throne, and confer them on his own son Mūsā Ibn al-Amīn. This produced a misunderstanding between the two brothers, and at length al-Māmūn, by the advice of his wazīr al-Faḍl Ibn Sahl, dispatched an army from Khurāsān under the command of Ṭāhir Ibn al-Ḥusayn (No. 281)<sup>1</sup>. Al-Amīn then took counsel of al-Faḍl Ibn al-Rabī, and sent 'Alī Ibn 'Isā Ibn Māhān at the head of an army from Baghdād to repel the invaders. In the battle which ensued, the latter general lost his life. This occurred A.H. 194 (809-10). From that moment the affairs of al-Amīn fell into confusion and the power of al-Māmūn was consolidated; as for al-Faḍl Ibn al-Rabī, he retired to a place of concealment in the month of Rajab, A.H. 196 (March, April, A.C. 812), on perceiv-

---

1 When al-Faḍl Ibn al-Rabī advised al-Amīn to deprive al-Māmūn of his right to the throne and confer it on his own son Mūsā, some of the more prudent of that prince's counsellors endeavoured to dissuade him from so dangerous a project: but their representations were of no avail, and the fatal influence of al-Faḍl predominated. Al-Amīn then essayed to draw al-Māmūn to Baghdād, so that he might secure his person, but the latter would not let himself be circumvented in this manner, and sent a letter of excuse. The two princes ing that all his plans had gone to ruin. He appeared in public, some time after, when Ibrāhīm Ibn al-Mahdi (No. 8) usurped the khalīfate at Baghdād and he entered into his service. On the failure of Ibrāhīm undertaking, al-Rabī' concealed himself a second time, and finally obtained his pardon from al-Māmūn through the intercession of Tāhir Ibn al-Ḥusayn, who conducted him into the presence of the prince. This circumstance is sometime related in a different manner. From that time till his death he remained unemployed, having never, as far as I can discover, occupied any post under al-Māmūn. The poet Abū Nuwās wrote al-Faḍl the following lines to console him on the loss of al-Rashīd and congratulate him on the accession of al-Amin :

"O Abu 'l-'Abbās! be consoled in thy sorrows over the noblest of the dead by the aspect of the best that ever was or will be among the living. The vicissitudes of time revolve and now produce evil, now good. The prince who lives repays for (the loss of) him who is dead and hidden in the dust of the grave ; thou hast not suffered by the exchange, neither hath the dead deceived (thee by appointing an unworthy successor)."

In another piece of verse composed in praise of al-Amin, Abū Nuwās said of him :

"It is not repugnant to God that (the good qualities of) all mankind should be united in a single individual."

(Speaking of the verses given before this last,) Abū Bakr al-Ṣūlī said: "The kātib Aḥmad Ibn Yūsuf (No. 117, note on Aḥmad)

---

(Continued from page 20)

then entered into a long correspondence, and al-Māmūn was almost induced to transfer his rights to Mūsā, when his wazīr al-Faḍl Ibn Sahl had a private interview with him and encouraged him to resist, assuring him that, by adopting resolute proceedings, he could not fail to obtain possession of the khalifate. Al-Māmūn followed his wazīr's advice, and al-Faḍl Ibn Sahl began to gain partisans to the cause of his master and to strengthen the frontier garrisons. The war broke out soon after, and al-Amin fell a victim to the injudicious counsels of his minister al-Faḍl Ibn al-Rabī'.—(Al-Duwal al-Islāmiyah, MS. No. 895, fol. 200).

took the idea of these verses, and having enlarged upon it he addressed his piece to one of his brethren whose parrot had died, and who had a brother of a most untractable temper, called 'Abd al-Ḥamīd, still living." The piece is as follows :

"Thou survivest ; and may our lives be the ransom of thine ! May God, the possessor of all grandeur, grant thee consolation ! Great was the stroke which fate inflicted on thee when it killed thy parrot. How strange that death should come unto it and miss 'Abd al-Ḥamīd, thy brother. 'Abd al-Ḥamīd was a fitter object for death than thy parrot. Every sort of misfortune has come over us; the loss of the one and the presence of the other."

In the life of Ibn al-Rūmī (No. 438) we have inserted two pieces similar to this, and addressed to the wazīr Abu 'l-Qāsim 'Ubayd Allāh on the death of one of his sons and the existence of the other. The idea is borrowed from the verses just given, but it was Abū Nuwās who opened the way. Succeeding poets appropriated the thought with some slight difference in the mode of its expression.—Al-Faḍl Ibn al-Rabī' died in the month of Dhu 'l-Qa'dah, A.H. 208 (March-April, A.C. 824); some say in the month of the latter Rabī'. It was on him that Abū Nuwās composed his poem, rhyming in d, which contains the expression : and good works became (for him) a custom.

504 AL-FAḌL IBN SAHL

Abu 'l-'Abbās al-Faḍl Ibn Sahl al-Sarakḥsī was the brother of al-Ḥasan Ibn Sahl, him whose life has been given (No. 169). He made his profession of Islāmism<sup>1</sup> to al-Māmūn in the year 190 (A.C. 805-6); but some say that it was his father Sahl who made the profession, and that it was al-Mahdī who received it. Al-

---

<sup>1</sup> Ibn al-Athīr says in his Kāmil, year 190, that al-Faḍl Ibn Sahl was originally a Majūsī or fire-worshipper.

Faḍl Ibn Sahl served Al-Māmūn as wazīr and domineered over him to such a degree that he once outbid him for a female slave whom he wanted to purchase. When Ja'far the Barmakide resolved on placing al-Faḍl in the service of al-Māmūn, Yaḥya (Ja'far's father) spoke of him so favourably in the presence of al-Raṣhīd, that the latter ordered him to be brought in. On appearing before the khalif, al-Faḍl was so completely overcome with confusion that he could not utter a word. Al-Raṣhīd then turned towards Yaḥyā with the look of one who blamed his choice, but Faḍl (recovered himself and) said: "Commander of the Faithful! it is an excellent proof of a servant's merit that his heart is seized with respect in the presence of his master." "To this al-Raṣhīd replied: "If you kept silent that you might frame this answer, I must say that you have succeeded well; but if it came to you extempore, it is still better and better." To every succeeding question which the khalif addressed him, he replied in a manner suited to justify the character given of him by Yaḥyā. Al-Faḍl was highly accomplished, and he received the surname of Dhu 'l-Riyāsatayn (the holder of the two commands) because he exercised the authority of the wazīrate, and that of the sword (as commander in chief of the army.) (Like his master al-Māmūn) he acknowledged the rights of the family of 'Alī.<sup>1</sup> In astrology he displayed the greatest skill, and most of his predictions received their accomplishment. Abu 'l-Husayn 'Alī al-Salāmī relates, in his History of the governors of Khurāsān, that, when al-Māmūn resolved on sending Ṭāhir Ibn al-Husayn (No. 281) against his brother Muḥammad al-Amin, al-Faḍl Ibn Sahl examined the horoscope of this general, and finding the indicator in the middle of the sky and that it was Dhū yamīnayn<sup>2</sup>, he told al-Māmūn that Ṭāhir would conquer al-Amin provided he were surnamed Dhu 'l-Yamīnayn. Al-Māmūn then conceived a high admiration for al-Faḍl's talent, and gave this surname to Ṭāhir; he became also an assiduous student in the science of the stars. The same writer says: "One of al-Faḍl Ibn Sahl's astrological predictions wherein he perfectly succeeded was

---

1 "It was he" says Ibn al-Athīr, "who advised al-Māmūn to designate 'Alī Ibn Mūsā al-Riḍā as successor to the khalifate."

2 Dhu yaminayn signifies doubly fortunate, and ambidexter.

the following : when Ṭāhir Ibn al-Ḥusayn was nominated to march forth against al-Amin, al-Faḍl designated a fortunate hour for his departure and, at that moment, he knotted his standard<sup>1</sup> and placed it in his hand, saying: 'I here knot for thee a standard which shall not be untied for six and fifty years'. Now, from the time of Ṭāhir Ibn al-Ḥusayn's going forth against 'Alī Ibn 'Isa, al-Amin's general, till that of Muḥammad Ibn Ṭāhir Ibn 'Abd Allāh Ibn Ṭāhir Ibn al-Ḥusayn's capture of Nāysāpūr by Ya'qūb Ibn al-Layth al-Ṣaffār, precisely six and fifty years intervened. Ibn al-Layth took Muḥammad prisoner on Sunday, the 2nd of Shawwāl, A.H. 259 (August, A.C. 873).*—Another instance of his successful predictions was that concerning himself : when al-Māmūn obliged al-Faḍl's mother to deliver up all the property which he had left on his decease, she brought to him a coffer, locked and sealed. On opening it he found a little box, closed also with a seal, and within it a paper folded up and containing a piece of silk bearing the following inscription in his own handwriting : "In the name of God, the Merciful, The Clement! This is the fate which al-Faḍl Ibn Sahl has predicted for himself : he will live forty-eight years, and be killed between water and fire." He lived precisely to this age, and was murdered in his bath at Sarakhs by Ghālīb, the maternal uncle of al-Māmūn. Many other instances are given of his successful predictions.—It is related that he one day said to Ṭhumāmah Ibn al-Ashras<sup>2</sup> : "I know not what to do ; I am overwhelmed by the number of persons who apply to me for favours."—"Quit thy

---

<sup>1</sup> See No. 361, note on spear and horse.

<sup>2</sup> Abū Ma'an Ṭhumāmah Ibn al-Ashrar, a member of the tribe of Numayr and a native of Baṣrah, was surnamed al-Mājīn (the libertine) for his disorderly life. The Khalifs al-Raṣhīd and al-Māmūn admitted him into their society, and many amusing anecdotes are told of him. One evening after sunset, he went out in a state of inebriation, and seeing al-Māmūn riding towards him, he took the other side of the street ; but the Khalif remarked him and rode up, upon which the following dialogue ensued : "Is it you, Ṭhumāmah ?"—"Yes."—"Are you drunk ?"—"No."—"Do you know me ?"—"Yes."—"Who am I ?"—"I do not know." This answer threw al-Māmūn into such a fit of laughter, that he nearly fell off his horse. Ṭhumāmah died seat," said Thumamah, "and it shall be my business to prevent a single one of them from meeting thee." Al-Faḍl acknowledged the counsel to be good, and from that period Thumamah remained charged with all his personal affairs. During his residence in Khurāsān, al-Faḍl had a fit of sickness which brought him to the brink of death; on his recovery, he held an audience, in which numerous congratulations, all drawn up with great elegance, were addressed to him. When the speakers had finished, he turned to them and said: "Sickness has advantages which no reasonable man can deny: it expiates sins; it prepares for us the reward due to patient suffering; it rouses us from supineness; it makes us grateful for the benefit of health; it calls us to repentance, and it incites us to charity."—"His praises were celebrated by some of the most eminent poets of the age; thus Ibrāhīm Ibn al-'Abbās al-Ṣūlī (No. 10) said of him:

(Continued on page 25)

* 2 August.—Ed.

"There is no hand like that of al-Faḍl Ibn Sahl. Its gifts are wealth, and its stroke is death. Its palm is formed for liberality, and its back to receive grateful kisses."

It was from this that Ibn al-Rūmī took the idea of the following passage; it belongs to one of his poems in which he addresses the wazīr al-Qāsim Ibn 'Ubayd Allāh Ibn Wahb:

"I am placed between poverty and the necessity of maintaining a respectable appearance; in this position the worthiest of men would die of inanition. Stretch then forth to me that hand of which the palm is accustomed to bestow, and the back to be kissed."

It was of al-Faḍl that Abū Muḥammad 'Abd Allāh Ibn Muḥammad (some say Ibn Ayyūb) al-Taymī<sup>1</sup> said:

(Continued from page 24)

A.H. 213 (A.C. 828-29) (al-Nujūm al-Zāhirah). He professed the Mu'tazilite doctrines, but held some other peculiar to himself, and of which al-Ḥabhrastānī gives an account: see Dr. Cureton's Shahrestānī, Arabic text, page 49.

1 Al-Taymī (التيمي) is the true reading. The Khaṭīb, says, in his History of Baḍād (MS. of the Bib. du Roi, ancien fonds, No. 634, fol. 119, and fonds Asselin, MS. No. 541, fol. 25 verso), that Abū Muḥammad 'Abd Allāh Ibn Ayyūb al-Taymī, a member of the tribe of Taym Allāh Ibn Ḥu'alaḥ, was one of the eminent poets of the 'Abbaside dynasty, and celebrated the praises of al-Amin and al-Māmūn.

"Rest assured that the noblest in every city, great though they be, are all al-Faḍl's inferiors. When it pleases him, you may see the greatest of mankind humbled before him, and he humbleth himself only before God. The more God exalts him, the more he is humble and the more each man of rank is humble before him."

Muslim Ibn al-Walīd al-Anṣārī, surnamed Sarī al-Ghawānī (No. 10, note), said of him in one of his qaṣīdahs :

"You established one khālīfate and overthrew another; great was that which you established and that which you overthrew."

Al-Jihshiyārī (No. 359, note) relates that al-Faḍl Ibn Sahl having been plunged into the deepest affliction by the loss of a son called al-'Abbās, Ibrāhīm Ibn Mūsā Ibn Ja'far al-'Alawī<sup>1</sup> went in to him and recited this verse :

"Better for thee than the possession of al-'Abbās is that indemnity for his loss which God reserves thee ; and a better company than thine for al-'Abbās is that of God."

Al-Faḍl acknowledged the truth of his words and made him a present ; from that time, he felt consoled.—Al-Māmūn at length found the influence which al-Faḍl had acquired so onerous to himself, that he suborned his maternal uncle Ghālīb al-Sa'ūdī the black<sup>2</sup> to murder him. Al-Faḍl was at Sarakhs and in his bath, when Ghālīb entered suddenly with some others and slew him : this occurred on Thursday, the 2nd of Shā'bān, A.H. 202 (February, A.C. 818);* some say, A.H. 203. He was then aged forty-eight years ; some say, forty-one years and five months. Al-Ṭabarī states, in his History, that al-Faḍl died at the age of sixty ; others again say that he was murdered on Friday,† the 2 of Shā'bān, A.H. 202. This last date I consider to be the true one. Elegies were composed on his death by Muslim Ibn al-Walīd,

1 This is the same 'Alide who revolted in Yamen, A.H. 200.—See Abu 'l-Feda's Annals'.

2 Al-Māmūn's complexion was dark or tawny ; what is here said by Ibn Khalikān accounts for that peculiarity.

* Thursday was first Shā'bān (11 February).—Ed.

† Friday fell on 2 Shā'bān (12 February).—Ed.

Di'bil (No. 213), and Ibrāhīm Ibn al-'Abbās (No. 10).—His father Sahl died also in the year 202, soon after the assassination of his son. His mother, who was also the mother of his brother al-Ḥasan (No. 169), lived to witness the marriage of Būrān (No. 117) with al-Māmūn. On the death of al-Faḍl, this prince went to console his mother and said: "Grieve not for him, neither be afflicted at his loss; for God has given thee a son in me to replace him; so you need not conceal from me the sentiments which you used to confide to him." On this she wept and answered: "O Commander of the Faithful! why should I not grieve for a son who gained me another such as you?"—Sarakhs means belonging to Sarakhs, a city in Khurāsān.

505 AL-FADL IBN MARWĀN

Abu 'l-Abbās al-Faḍl Ibn Marwān Ibn Māsarkhas was wazīr to al-Mu'taṣim. That prince having accompanied his brother al-Māmūn to Asia Minor and being with him when he died there, it was al-Faḍl Ibn Marwān who administered the oath of fealty to the people. Al-Mu'taṣim, having thus succeeded to his brother, hastened to testify his satisfaction to al-Faḍl for his conduct, and, having made his entry into Baghdād on Saturday, the 1st of Ramaḍān, A.H. 218 (September, A.C. 833),* he invested him with the dignity of wazīr, confiding to him at the same time the administration of all his affairs. Al-Faḍl had directed his education, and, by the length of time thus passed in his service, he acquired the highest influence over him, even before the expiration of al-Māmūn's reign. He was originally a Christian, and possessed but a slight knowledge of (Muslim) science; he displayed, however, a full acquaintance with the duties of his office. A collection has been made of the epistles composed by him, and he left a work entitled al-Mushāhadāt wa 'l-Akḥbār (observations and narrations), containing an account of the events which had passed under his own observation. One of his sayings was : "A kātib is like a wheel for raising water; he gets out of order if not kept at work". At an audience which he held one day for the dispatch of public business, he noticed, among the memorials presented to him, a paper on which were inscribed these lines :

---

* 20 September.—Ed.

"Thou actest like Pharaoh, O Faḍl Ibn Marwān ! but take warning. Thy predecessors were al-Faḍl, al-Faḍl, and al-Faḍl ; three princes now gone their ways ; whom fetters, prison, and violence deprived of life. Thou hast become a tyrant among men, and thou shalt perish as those three before thee have perished."

The Faḍls here meant were those whose lives have been just given ; namely al-Faḍl Ibn Yaḥyā al-Barmakī, al-Faḍl Ibn al-Rabī' and al-Faḍl Ibn Sahl. These verses are attributed by al-Marzubānī<sup>1</sup> in his Mu'jam al-Shu'arā, to al-Haytham Ibn Firās al-Sāmī, a descendant of Sāmāh Ibn Luwayy, and al-Zamakhsharī, makes a similar statement in his Rabī' al-Abrār. An anecdote of a similar kind is told of Asad Ibn Razīn the kātib : when Abū 'Abd Allāh al-Kūfī was appointed to replace Abū Ja'far Ibn Shīrẓād<sup>2</sup> and had occupied the residence and filled the seat of his predecessor, Asad wished to go into his presence, but the usher refused him admittance. On this he returned home and wrote al-Kūfī these lines :

"We have seen the curtain of thy door drawn against us, but this humiliation was not effected by thy will. Hear my words, and be not angry with me ; I seek neither money nor honours : Gratitude survives when all else perisheth ; how many attained, like thee, a princely station, yet their power ended and they themselves departed. In that palace—in that hall—on that very throne—I saw the power high exalted which is now overthrown."

---

1 The life of Abū 'Abd Allāh Muḥammad al-Marzubānī is given by our author.

2 I am inclined to think that this Abū Ja'far Ibn Shīrẓād was the same person whom the author of the al-Duwal al-Islāmiyah calls Aḥmad Ibn Ṣāliḥ Ibn Shīrẓād al-Quṣrubullī. According to this writer, he possessed great abilities and became wazīr to al-Mu'tamid, but he held this post for about a month only, and died A.H. 266 (A.C. 879-80).—(MS. No. 895, fol. 235).

When Abū 'Abd Allāh read these verses, he sent for the author and after many apologies, he granted the request which he had intended to make. Something similar to this will be found in the life of 'Abd al-Malik Ibn 'Umayr, where we mention the observation made by him to 'Abd al-Malik Ibn Marwān, when the head of Muṣ'ab Ibn al-Zubayr was presented to him (No. 351).—The feelings of al-Mu'taṣim for al-Faḍl Ibn Marwān underwent at length a total change, and he caused him to be arrested in the month of Rajab, A.H. 221 (June-July, A.C. 836); he said at the same time: "He was disobedient to God whilst serving me, so God hath given me power over him." Al-Faḍl was afterwards employed by other khalīfs, and he died in the month of the latter Rabi' A.H. 250 (May-June, A.C. 864); aged eighty years. It is stated, however, in the Fihrist<sup>1</sup> that he lived to the age of ninety-three: God only knows the truth! Al-Ṭabarī places his fall in the month of Ṣafar of the year before mentioned. Al-Ṣūlī (No. 10) says: "When al-Mu'taṣim disgraced him, he seized in his house one million of dīnārs<sup>2</sup> and took away, besides, furniture and vases to the value of another million. He detained him in prison five months, and having then ordered him to remain a prisoner in his house, he chose for wazīr Aḥmad Ibn 'Ammār<sup>3</sup>."—A favourite saying of al-Faḍl Ibn Marwān was: Attack not thy enemy when he is advancing, for he has thus an advantage over thee; neither attack him in his retreat, for thou hast already got rid of him."

506 AL-FUḌAYL IBN 'IYĀḌ AL-ṬĀLAQĀNĪ

Abū 'Alī al-Fuḍayl Ibn 'Iyāḍ Ibn Mas'ūd Ibn Bishr al-Ṭālaqānī al-Fundīnī, a celebrated ascetic and one of the Men of the Path,<sup>4</sup> drew his origin from a family of the tribe of Tamīm which had settled at Ṭālaqān. He commenced his life as a highway robber

1 See No. 273, note on Fehrist.

2 About five hundred thousand pounds sterling.

3 See the life of Muḥammad Ibn al-Zayyāt.

4 See No. 418.

and intercepted travellers on the road from Abiward to Sarakhs, but his conversion was operated by the following circumstance : As he was climbing over a wall to see a girl whom he loved, he heard a voice pronounce this verse of the Qur'ān : Is not the time yet come unto those who believe that their hearts should humbly submit to admonition of God?<sup>1</sup> On this he exclaimed : "O Lord ! that time is come." He then went away from the place, and the approach of night induced him to repair for shelter to a ruined edifice. He there found a band of travellers, one of whom said to the others : "Let us set out ;" but another answered : "Let us rather wait till daylight, for al-Fuḍayl is on the road and will stop us." Al-Fuḍayl then turned his heart to God, and assured them that they had nothing to fear. He ranked amongst the greatest of the Sayyids (or saints). Sufyān Ibn 'Uyaynah (No. 249) relates the following anecdote concerning him : "Hārūn al-Rashīd called for us, and when we entered into his presence, al-Fuḍayl followed, with his cloak drawn over his face, and said to me : 'Tell me, Sufyān ! which of these is the Commander of the Faithful?'—'There he is ;' said I, pointing out al-Rashīd. He then addressed (the khalif) in these terms : 'O thou with the handsome face ! art thou the man whose hand governeth this poeple and who hast taken that duty on thy shoulders ? verily, thou hast taken on thyself a heavy burden. !' Al-Rashīd wept on hearing these words, and ordered to each of us a purse of money. We all received the gift, except al-Fuḍayl ; and al-Rashīd said to him : 'O Abū 'Alī ! if thou dost not think it lawful to accept it, give it to some poor debtor, or else feed therewith the hungry, or clothe the naked.' He requested, however, the permission to refuse it ; and, when we went out, I said to him : 'Thou hast done wrong, O Abū 'Alī ! why didst thou not take it and spend it in works of charity?' On this he seized me by the beard, and exclaimed : 'O Abū Muḥammad ! how canst thou, who art the chief jurisconsult of this city and a man whom all look up to, how canst thou make such a blunder ? had the money been lawfully acquired by those people (the khalif and his officers) it had been lawful for me to accept it.'"—It is related that al-Rashīd once said to him : "How great is thy

---

1 Qur'an, sūrat 57, verse 15.

self-abnegation !” to which he made the answer: “Thine is greater.” —“How so?” said the khalif.—“Because I make abnegation of this world, and thou makest the abnegation of the next; now, this world is transitory and the next will endure for ever.” —The following anecdote is related by al-Zamakḥsharī in his Rabīʿ al-Abrār, Chapter on Food: “Al-Fuḍayl said one day to his companions: ‘What say you of a man who, having some dates in his sleeve, sits down in the privy and throws them into it one after the other?’ They answered that he must be mad. ‘Then’! said he, ‘whosever throws them into his belly till he fills it is yet more insane; for that privy is filled from this one.’” It was a saying of his that, when God loves a man, he increases his afflictions, and when he hates a man, he increases his worldly prosperity. He said another time: “If the world with all it contains were offered to me even on the condition of my not being taken to an account for it, I should shun it as you would shun a carrion, lest it should defile your clothes.” —“The display<sup>1</sup> of devotional works,” said he again, “to please men is hypocrisy, and acts of devotion done to please men are acts of polytheism.” Other sayings of his were: “I am certainly disobedient to God, and I perceive it in considering the tempers of my ass and of my slave (for they do not always act to please me).” “If I had the power of offering up a prayer which should certainly be fulfilled, I should ask for nothing else than a proper imām (or head of the Muslim community); for with a good imām the people would enjoy peace.” —“For a man to be polite to his company and make himself agreeable to them, is better than to pass nights in prayer and days in fasting.” —Abū ‘Alī al-Rāzī<sup>2</sup> said: “I kept company with al-Fuḍayl during thirty years, and I

---

1 In place of ترك, as given in the printed text and the MSS., I am confident we must read تراء.

2 According to the author of the Ṭabaqāt al-Ḥanifiyyah (MS. Fonds St-Germain, No. 132, fol. 102), Abū ‘Alī al-Rāzī was an imām (of the law) and had been taught jurisprudence by the celebrated Abū Yūsuf.

* “To abstain from doing (prohibited) deeds .....” is faithful translation.—Ed.

never saw him laugh or smile but on one occasion and that was the death of his son. On my asking him the reason, he replied : 'Whatever is pleasing to God, is pleasing to me.' " His son was a generous-minded youth and ranks among the greatest of the holy men ; he was one of those who died through love of the Creator. They are all mentioned in a book which I heard read a long time ago, but I cannot now recollect the name of the author. It was said by 'Abd Allāh Ibn al-Mubārak (No. 300) that, when al-Fuḍayl died, sadness (in person) was removed from the world. He was born at Abiward—some say at Samarqand—he passed his youth at Abiward and then went to Kūfah, where he heard Traditions ; from thence he removed to Makkah and continued to reside there till his death, which occurred in the month of Muḥarram, A.H. 187 (January, A.C. 803)—Ṭālaqānī means belonging to Ṭālaqān in Khurāsān (No. 93).—Fundīnī means native of Fundīn, a village in the dependencies of Marw.—Abiward is a small town in Khurāsān.—Samarqand is the greatest city of Transoxiana ; Ibn Qutaibah says in his Kitāb al-Ma'ārif, under the head of Shamir Ibn Ifriqish, king of Yaman : "This prince went forth with a vast army, and entered 'Irāq, whence he set out for China ; he directed his course through Fārs, Sijistān and Khurāsān, taking cities and castles, slaying and making captives. He entered the city of al-Ṣughd and destroyed it, for which reason it was called Shamirkand (شمرکند), which means : Shamir destroyed it ; kend, in Persian signifying to destroy. This name was then altered to suit the genius of the Arabic idiom and it became Samarqand (سمرقند). This city was afterwards rebuilt and it still remains the name."

507 'AḌUD AL-DAWLAH IBN BUWAYH

Abū Shujā' Fannākhusrū, surnamed 'Aḍud al-Dawlah (the arm of the empire), was the son of Rukn al-Dawlah Abū 'Alī al-Ḥasan Ibn Buwayh al-Daylamī. The remainder of the genealogy has been already given in the life of his uncle Mu'izz al-Dawlah Aḥmad (No. 71). When his uncle 'Imād al-Dawlah was on his death-bed in Fārs, he received the visit of his brother Rukn al-Dawlah, and they agreed that Abū Shujā' Fannākhusrū should be put in possession of that province; it was at this period that he received the title of 'Aḍud al-Dawlah. We have already spoken of his father (No. 168), of his eldest uncle, 'Imād al-Dawlah (No. 455), and of his cousin Bakhtiyār (No. 106); but none of them, notwithstanding their great power and authority, possessed so extensive an empire and held sway over so many kings and kingdoms as 'Aḍud al-Dawlah. In fact, he not only united his relations' states to his, (and we have already mentiond, in the lives of each, what these states were,) but he joined thereto Moṣul, Mesopotamia, and other provinces; having brought countries and nations into subjection, and reduced the most refractory to obedience. He was the first monarch after the promulgation of Islamism who was addressed by the title of Malik (king), and the first also for whom prayers were offered up from the pulpits of Baghdād after those offered for the prosperity of the khalif. Another of his titles was Tāj al-Millat (crown of the faith), and this led Abū Ishāq al-Ṣābī to give the title of at-Tājī (the imperial, or coronarius) to the history of the Buwayh family which he composed by this prince's orders. Of this circumstance we have already spoken (No. 14) Aḍud al-Dawlah possessed a considerable degree of information in various sciences, and, being a man of talent, he loved the society of the learned. It was for him that the shaykh Abū 'Alī al-Fārisī composed his grammatical treatises, the 'Idāh' and the 'Takmilah' (No. 155). The greatest poets of the day visited his court and celebrated his praises in magnificent qaṣīdahs; one of them was al-Mutanabbī (No. 49), who arrived at Shīrāz in the month of the first Jumādā, A. H. 354 (May, A.C. 965), and recited his celebrated qaṣīdah rhyming in h, wherein he bestows on the prince the following eulogium :

"Having seen all other kings, I journeyed on till I saw their master—him whose hand controls their fate, and who orders it to strike or to spare them—Abū Shujā' of Persia, Aḍud al-Dawlah Fannākhusrū Shāhanshāh (king of kings). Such are his names; they cannot make him better known, but it gives us pleasure to pronounce them."

This was the first qaṣīdah he recited in his presence; and a month had not elapsed when he pronounced another, rhyming in n, and containing the following passage, in which he mentions the Valley of Bawwān (Shi'b Bawwān):

"My steed said (to me) in the Valley of Bawwān: 'Must we then quit this (delightful spot) for the battle-field? Adam, thy forefather, has given thee the example of disobedience and taught thee how to abandon Paradise'. I replied: 'When thou seest Abū Shujā', thou wilt forget the rest of men and think of this spot no more; for mankind and the world itself are but a road whereby to reach him who has no equal amongst men'."

He afterwards praised him in a number of other poems, and the same year, in the beginning of Sha'bān, he recited to him the qaṣidah rhyming in k, in which he offers his adieu to the prince and promises to revisit his court. This was the last piece composed by al-Mutanabbī, as he was killed on his way home. It contains the following passage:

"I now depart after closing up my heart with the seal of thy love, lest any other mortal should essay to harbour there. (I depart), burdened with (a debt of) lasting gratitude, so heavy that I have not strength to move. I fear that its weight will break down my camels; (but) then, they will not bear me (from thee) to another. It is perhaps God's will that this journey enable me (later) to fix my abode at thy court. Were it possible I should keep my eyes closed and shut out the sight (of all other men) till I see thee again. Deprived of thy presence, how shall I endure with patience? thy copious bounties have overwhelmed me, and yet they seemed to thee insufficient."

How ingeniously has he said in the same poem:

"When we part, whom shall I find to replace thee? since (the merit of) all other men is but a false illusion! I am like an arrow shot into the air; it finds nought to retain it and returns again."

His praises were celebrated also by the greatest poet of 'Irāq, Abu al-Ḥasan Muḥammad al-Salāmī, a person whose life will be found in this work. The admirable qaṣidah which he recited to 'Aḍud al-Dawlah contains this passage:

"To reach thee, a man who made the sight of thy palace the term of his camel's journey crossed the wide-extended desert. I, and my courage in the depths of darkness, and my sword, were three (closely-united) companions, like the stars of (the constellation of) the eagle. I encouraged my hopes with the sight of a king who, for me, would replace mankind, of a palace which, for me, would be the world, and of a day of meeting which, to me, would be worth an eternity<sup>1</sup>."

Such verses, I must say, do really deserve the name of lawful magic. The idea here expressed had been wrought up by Abū Bakar Aḥmad al-Arrajānī (No. 62) into this form :

"Know that he whom I went to praise is a man without defects. How often, at eve, has the recital of his virtues been suspended, like handsome ear-rings, to the ears of listeners. I saw him, and, for me, he was the human race; eternity was in that hour, and the world in that abode."

But how far above the earth are the Pleiads! al-Mutanabbī has expressed the very same idea in the last hemistich of a single verse; he says :

"(Thy dwelling-place) is the sole object of my journey; a sight of thee is all I wish for; thy dwelling is the world, and thou art all created beings."

He has not, indeed, completed the thought, neither has his verse the beauty of al-Salāmi's, because he omitted the day worth an eternity. Let us return to 'Aḍud al-Dawlah: this prince once received a letter from Abū Maṣṣūr Iftikīn the Turk, governor of Damascus, containing the following communication: "Syria is free (from the presence of foreign troops), it is now within our grasp, and the rule of the monarch of Egypt has ceased therein; aid me therefore with money and soldiers, so that I may attack those people even in the seat of their power." To this, he replied by a note of which (every two words) were similar in their written form, so that it could not be read until the vowels and diacritical points were added ; it ran thus : "Thy power has misled thee, and the result of that undertaking would be thy disgrace ; fear therefore the dishonour which may attend it. By this, perhaps, thou mayest be guided. In the composition of this letter he has displayed the utmost ingenuity. Iftikin was originally a mawlā to Mu'izz al-Dawlah Ibn Buwayh, and afterwards obtained dominion over Damascus : he marched in person against al-'Aziz al-'Ubaydī, the sovereign of Egypt, and a sanguinary conflict ensued ; the troops of Iftikin were routed, and he himself was intercepted in his flight by Dagħfal Ibn al-Jarrāh al-Badawī who passed a rope about his neck and led him to al-'Aziz. That prince set him at liberty and treated him with great kindness, Iftikin survived his defeat but a short time, and died (in Egypt) on Tuesday, the 7th of Rajab, A.H. 372 (December, A.C. 982)*.—'Aḍud al-Dawlah left some pieces of poetry, and the following passage is quoted from one of his qaṣīdahs by al-Tha'ālibī, in the Yatimah ; this writer says : "I selected it from that qaṣīdah which contains an unequalled verse :

---

1 In No. 52, this verse has been mistranslated.

'We drink not wine unless the rain (keep us at home) ; and in the morning only, we hearken to the song of the maidens, perfect in beauty, stealing away the reason whilst they sing<sup>2</sup> to the double-corded lyre ; they bring forth the goblet from its shrine, and pour out the liquor to him who surpasses all mankind—the arm of the empire (Aḍud al-Dawlah) the son of its pillar (Rukn al-Dawlah), the king of kings, the vanquisher of fate.' "

It is related that when 'Aḍud al-Dawlah was on the point of death, the only words which he could pronounce were the following, and these he did not speak but chant : "Nought has availed my wealth ! my power has expired !" It is said that he died very soon after. He was carried off by an epileptic attack on Monday, the 8th of Ṣhawwāl A.H. 372 (March, A.C. 983)† at 1 See Abulfeda Annales, tom. II, p. 521 et seq.

2 The MSS. and the printed text have ناعمات, but I read ناعمات.

* 26 December.—Fd.

† 26 March.—Ed.

Baghdād, and his body was interred in the palace, till removed to Kūfah, where it was deposited in the Mashhad of 'Alī Ibn Abī Tālib. Aḍud al-Dawlah died at the age of fortyseven years, eleven months and three days. The Aḍudian Hospital (al-Bīmāristān al-Aḍudī) situated on the west side (of the river Tigris) was so called after him: he spent an immense sum on this establishment which, for excellent arrangements, has not its equal in the world. He completed its erection in the year 368 (A.C. 978) and provided it with more furniture and utensils than could possibly be described.—It was he who brought to light the tomb of 'Alī Ibn Abī Tālib, at Kūfah, and erected over it the Mashhad or funeral chapel, which is still subsisting. He spent a large sum on this building, and left directions that he should be buried in it. A great difference of opinion prevails respecting the tomb (discovered by 'Aḍud al-Dawlah); some consider it to be the tomb of al-Moghayrah Ibn Shu'bah al-Thaqafī, and pretend that the place of 'Alī's tomb is not known; but the truth, I am inclined to believe, is, that 'Alī was buried in the government palace (Qaṣr al-Imārah) at Kūfah—Shīb Bawwān (the valley of Bawwān) is a spot near Shīrāz, abounding in trees and water. It was so called after Bawwān, the son of Irān, the son of al-Aswad, the son of Sem, the son of Noah. Abū Bakr al-Khwarazmī states that there are four delightful spots in the world. The Ghūṭah of Damascus, the river al-Uballah<sup>2</sup>, the valley of Bawwān, and the Ṣughd of Samarqand, but the Ghūṭah of Damascus, says he, surpasses the others.

---

1 Abū 'Isā (or Abū Mu ammad) al-Muḡhayrah Ibn Shu'bah Ibn 'Āmir, well known as one of Muḥammad's Companions, bore so high a reputation for sagacity that he was surnamed Muḡhayrat al-Rāy (Muḡhayrah of foresight). He contracted, it is said, seventy marriages; a number which his readiness in divorcing his wives easily accounts for. He died A. H. 50 (A. C. 670-1).—(Nujūm). The Khaṭīb says, in his abridged history of Baghdad (MS. No. 634, fol. 9), that al-Muḡhayrah accompanied Muḥammad to al-Hudaybiyah (A. H. 6) and was with him in the rest of his expeditions; he made the campaigns of 'Irāq against the Persians, and then governed Baṣrah, as the Khalīf 'Umar's lieutenant, for about two years. Mu'āwiyah entrusted him with the government of Kūfah, in A. H. 41 (al-Baḥr al-Zā'ir, MS. No. 659 A), and he died in that city.

2 The Nahr, or river of al-Uballa, was the name given to a canal branching off the Tigris and falling into the canal of al-Makīl near Baṣrah.

508 AL-QĀSIM IBN MUḤAMMAD

The genealogy of Abū Muḥammad al-Qāsim Ibn Muḥammad Ibn Abī Bakr is so well known that we need not retrace it here.<sup>1</sup> He was one of the most eminent of the Tābi'īs, and of the seven great juriconsults of Madīnah (No. 114). In real merit he surpassed all his contemporaries. He handed down Traditions from a great number of Muḥammad's Companions, and Traditions were received from him and taught to others by many of the principal Tābi'īs. "I never met any one" said Yaḥyā Ibn Sa'id,<sup>2</sup> "whom I could pronounce superior in merit to al-Qāsim Ibn Muḥammad". (The Imām) Mālik pronounced al-Qāsim one of the (great) juriconsults of the Muslim people. The following anecdote is related by Muḥammad Ibn Ishāq<sup>3</sup>: "A man went to al-Qāsim and asked him whether he or Sālim (No. 236) was the most learned in the law; and he replied: 'Such, with the blessing of God, is Sālim'. He made this reply to avoid telling a falsehood by saying that Sālim was more learned than himself, and to avoid estolling his own merits by declaring himself more learned than Sālim; and yet he was really the more learned of the two." In making his prostrations during prayer, he used to implore God to pardon his father's criminal conduct towards 'Uthmān.<sup>4</sup> We have stated in the life of the 'Alī Zayn al-'Ābidīn (No. 397) that he, al-Qāsim and Sālim Ibn Muḥammad were cousins by the mother's side, and that their mothers were daughters to Yazdegird, the last of the Persian Kings. Al-Qāsim died at Qudayd, A.H. 101 (A.C. 719-20) or 102; others say A.H. 108 or 112. On his death-bed he said:

---

1 See No. 345, note on Abū Bakr.

2 Abū Sa'id Yaḥyā Ibn Sa'id Ibn Qays, a member of the tribe of Najjār, a native of Madīnah and one of the Tābi'īs received Traditions from Anas Ibn Mālik, amongst others and taught them to Mālik, al-Layth Ibn Sa'd, and other celebrated imāms. Abū Ja'far al-Manṣūr appointed him qāḍī of al-Hāshimiyah in 'Irāq, and he died there A. H. 143 (A. C. 760-1).—Tab. al-Muḥaddithīn. Syar al-Salaf).

3 His life is given by Ibn Khallikān.

4 Muḥammad the son of Abū Bakr was accessory to the murder of 'Uthmān. See Abu 'l-Feda's Annals, year 35.

"Shroud me in the clothes which I always wore at prayers; my shirt, my izār, and my ridā<sup>1</sup>." To this his daughter replied: "My dear father, shall we not add two suits more?" and he answered: "Abū Bakr was thus shrouded, but the living have more need for new clothes than the dead.<sup>2</sup>" He died at the age of seventy or seventy-two years. Qudayd is a halting place for caravans between Makkah and Madīnah.

509 ABŪ 'UBAYD AL-QĀSIM IBN SALLĀM

Sallām, the father of Abū 'Ubayd al-Qāsim Ibn Sallām was a Greek slave belonging to an inhabitant of Herāt. His son Abū 'Ubayd made the Traditions, philology, and jurisprudence the objects of his studies, and was distinguished for piety, virtuous conduct, orthodox principles and eminent talents. "Abū 'Ubayd," said the qāḍī Aḥmad Ibn Kāmil<sup>3</sup> "was conspicuous for piety and learning, a doctor versed in the various branches of Islamic science, such as the Qu'rān readings, jurisprudence, grammar, and history, and a correct transmitter of poems and narrations preserved by oral tradition. Never, to my knowledge, has any person impeached the sincerity of his faith."—"Abū 'Ubayd," said Ibrāhīm al-Ḥarbī (No. 19, note), "was like a mountain into which the breath of life had been breathed, so that it produced every thing well." He exercised the functions of qāḍī in the city of Ṭarasūs (Tarsus) during eighteen years. The traditional knowledge which he handed down was received by him from Abū Zayd al-Anṣārī (No. 245), al-Aṣma'ī (No. 354), Abū 'Ubaydah, Ibn al-A'rābī<sup>4</sup>, al-Kisā'ī (No. 408), al-Farrā<sup>5</sup>, and many others. Of 1 See Author's Preface, note on ثوبان.

2 These were Abū Bakr's words when a similar question made to him. He asked to be buried in his old clothes. See Kosegarten's Taberistanesis Annales, tom. II, p. 141.

3 See No. 83, note.

4 The lives of Abū 'Ubaydah and Ibn al-A'rābī will be found in this work.

5 The life of Yaḥyā Ibn Zayd al-Farrā is given by Ibn Kḥallikān.

his own productions (kutub muṣannafah) upwards of twenty, relating to the Qur'ān, the Traditions and the obscure expressions occurring in the Traditions were delivered down orally. He composed works entitled: (al-Ḡharīb al-Muṣannaf (original collection of rare expressions); al-Amṭhāl (proverbs); Ma'āni al-Shi'r (the ideas recurring in poetry) and a number of other instructive treatises: it is said that he was the first who composed a book on the obscure expressions occurring in the Traditions (Ḡharīb al-Ḥadīth). He attached himself, for some time, to 'Abd Allāh Ibn Ṭāhir (No. 318), and, when he wrote out his Ḡharīb, he presented it to this amīr<sup>1</sup>, who expressed his satisfaction and said: "A mind which led its master to compose a book like this deserves to be dispensed from the necessity of searching for him the means of subsistence." He then settled on him a monthly pension of ten thousand dirhams.<sup>2</sup> Muḥammad Ibn Wahb al-Mas'ūdī<sup>3</sup> said: "I heard Abū 'Ubayd relate as follows: 'I was forty years composing this work, and whenever I happened to receive a useful hint from the mouths of men, I wrote it down in its proper place in this book, and I was unable to sleep that night, through joy at having procured such a piece of information. Now, one of you (scholars) will come to me for four or five months, and then say: 'I have remained here very long'. "—"Almighty God," said Hilāl Ibn al-'Alā al-Raqqī<sup>4</sup>, "bestow-

1 In the Introduction to the first volume, note, I risked two conjectures on the meaning of the word muṣannaf. We here find Abū 'Ubayd presenting his Ḡharīb al-Muṣannaf to 'Abd Allāh Ibn Ṭāhir, and Ibn K<sup>1</sup> allikān has just stated, that a number of this doctor's kutub muṣannafah were taught by oral transmissions. From this it would appear that my first conjecture is untenable. I therefore conclude that the kutub muṣannafah were original works, and that the kutub were mere compilations of traditional information.

2 About two hundred and sixty pounds sterling. A large monthly pension, if the statement be true.

3 This may perhaps be the same person as Muḥammad Ibn Wahb, a celebrated devotee and a disciple of al-Junayd, whose death is placed by the author of the Mir'at (MS. No. 640, fol 211) in A.H. 271 (A.C. 884-5).

4 I find in al-D<sup>h</sup>ahabī's Tārīkh al-Islām, year 337, that Hilāl Ibn al-'Alā was one of the masters of Isḥāq Ibn Ibrāhīm al-Jurjānī, a ḥāfiẓ who died in that year.

ed out of His bounty, four men on this (Muslim) people at different times : He gave them al-Shāfi'ī, who founded a system of jurisprudence on the Traditions; Aḥmad Ibn Ḥanbal (No. 19) who showed such firmness under persecution that, without his example, the people had relapsed into infidelity; Yaḥyā Ibn Ma'in<sup>1</sup>, who, from among the genuine Traditions relative to the Prophet, expelled those which were false; and Abū 'Ubayd al-Qāsim Ibn Sallām, who explained the obscure terms of the Traditions, and had he not done so, the people had rushed into error." —Abū Bakr Ibn al-Anbārī<sup>2</sup> said : "Abū 'Ubayd divided the night in three parts, one of them for prayer, one for sleep, and one for the composition of his works." —"Abū 'Ubayd," said Ishāq Ibn Rāhwayh (No. 82), "surpasses us all in science, in philological knowledge, and in the mass of information which he has collected; we stand in need of Abū 'Ubayd, and he standeth not in need of us." Tha'lab (No. 42) declared that if Abū 'Ubayd had been (born) among the children of Israil, he would have been the admiration of his people. Abū 'Ubayd always wore his hair and beard dyed red with ḥinnā<sup>3</sup>, and he had a dignified and venerable aspect. On arriving at Baghdād he read his works to the public, after which, in the year 222 (A.C. 837) or 223, he set out to perform the pilgrimage, and having fulfilled that duty, he died at Makkah, or, according to another statement, at Madīnah. Al-Bukhārī<sup>4</sup> places his death in the year 224, and another author adds, in the month of Muḥarram. The Khaṭīb (No. 33) says, in his History of Baghdād, that Abū 'Ubayd died at the age of sixty-seven years; the ḥāfiẓ Ibn al-Jawzi, (No. 345) refers his birth to the year 150 (A.C. 767-8), and Abū Bakr al-Zubaydī<sup>5</sup> states, in his Kitāb al-Taqrīẓ, that he was born A.H. 154.—It is related that, when Abū 'Ubayd had accomplished the pilgrimage and hired (camels) to take him back to 'Irāq, he had a dream in the night preceding his intended departure, and, in this dream, he saw the Prophet sitting, with

---

1 His life will be found in this work.

2 The life of Ibn al-Anbārī is given by our author.

3 See No. 19, note on ḥinnā

4 His life is given in this work.

5 His life will be found in this work.

persons standing near him to keep off the crowd; whilst a number of persons went in and saluted him and placed their hands in his. "As often as I tried to enter," said Abū 'Ubayd, "the ushers kept me back, and I spoke to them, saying: 'Why will you not leave the way free between me and the Apostle of God?' to which they answered: 'No by Allāh! thou shalt not enter, neither shalt thou salute him, because thou intendest to go hence to-morrow for 'Irāq.' On this I replied: 'In that case, I shall not depart'. They then took my engagement to that effect and allowed me to approach the Prophet; and I went in and saluted him, and he took me by the hand. The next morning, I broke off my bargain for the hire of the camels, and took up my abode at Makkah." He continued to inhabit this city till his death, and he was interred in the quarter called Duwar Ja'far. Some say that he had this dream at Madīnah, and that he died three days after the departure of the pilgrims. He was born at Herāt.—Ṭarasūs (Tarsus) is a city on the coast of Syria, near al-Sīs and al-Miṣṣiṣah (No. 50). It was (re-)built by al-Mahdī, the son of al-Manṣūr, A.H. 168 (A. C. 784-5), according to Ibn al-Jazzār (No. 97, Note), in his History.—Besides the works abovementioned, Abū 'Ubayd composed treatises on the words which terminate in a long or in a short alif on the Qur'ān-readings, and on the genders; the book entitled Kitāb al-Niṣab (book of genealogies), the Kitāb-al-Ahdāth (book of accidents)<sup>1</sup> Ādāb al-Qādi (duties of a Qādi), on the number of verses contained in the Qur'ān, on faith, on Vows, de Menstruis, the Kitāb al-Amwāl (liber opum), etc.

510 ABU 'L-QĀSIM AL-ḤARĪRĪ

Abū Muḥammad al-Qāsim Ibn 'Alī Ibn Muḥammad Ibn 'Uthmān al-Ḥarīrī al-Baṣrī (Native of Baṣrah) al-Ḥarāmī, the author of the Muqāmāt (stations), was one of the ablest writers of his time, and obtained the most complete success in the composition of his Maqāmahs, wherein is contained a large portion of the language spoken by the Arabs of the desert, such as its idioms, its proverbs, and its subtle delicacies of expression. Any person who acquires a sufficient acquaintance with this book to understand it rightly, will be led to acknowledge the eminent merit of this man, his extensive information and his vast abilities. The circumstance which induced him to compose it is thus related by his son, Abu 'I-Qāsim 'Abd Allāh<sup>1</sup>: "My father was sitting in his mosque, (situated) in the (street of Baṣrah called) Banū Ḥarām, when in came an elderly man dressed in tattered clothes<sup>2</sup>, carrying the implements of travel<sup>3</sup>, and miserable in his appearance, who spoke with great purity and expressed himself with elegance. The assembly asked him whence he came, and he replied: from Sarūj; they then desired to know his name, and he answered: Abū Zayd. In consequence of this, my father composed the Maqāmah called al-Ḥarāmiyah, now the forty-eighth of the collection, and gave it under the name of this Abū Zayd. It then got into circulation, and its existence came to the knowledge of Sharaf al-Dīn Abū Naṣr Anūshīrwān Ibn Khālīd Ibn Muḥammad al-Qāshānī, wazīr of the imām (khalīf) al-Mustarshīd billāh; and he, having read it, was so highly pleased that he advised my father to add some more to it. My father therefore completed his work in fifty Maqāmahs".— It is to this wazīr that he alludes in the passage of his introduction to the Māqāmahs wherein he says: "And one whose advice is an order, and whom all are eager to obey<sup>4</sup>, recommended

<sup>1</sup> This seems to have been a treatise on the pollutions and other accidents which invalidate prayer. Every work on Muslim law contains a chapter on this subject.

1 'Imād al-Dīn says, in the Ḥarīdah (MS. No. fol 169), that Abu 'I-Qāsim 'Abd Allāh, the son of al-Ḥarīrī, held an eminent post under government and inhabited Baḡhdād.

2 Literally wearing two tattered garments. I have already made the remark that, with the Arabs, two garments, an upper and a lower, formed a complete suit of clothes.

3 The implements of travel: a staff, a cup for drinking, a long knife, a bag of provisions, and perhaps a cloak.

4 Literally: The obeying of whom is a booty. That is, all strive to obtain the opportunity of obeying him, as they would strive for a rich booty.

me to compose some Maqāma's in the style of Badī' al-Zamān's<sup>1</sup>; yet (I knew that) the foundered steed could never come up to the point which the sound one had already reached."— I found the circumstance thus related in a number of historical works<sup>2</sup>, but I have since met at Cairo, in the year 656 (A. C. 1258), with a copy of the Maqāmahs, the whole of it in the handwriting of the author al-Ḥarīrī, and I found written on the cover in his own hand also, that he had composed the work for the wazīr Jamāl al-Dīn 'Amīd al-Dawlah Abū 'Alī al-Ḥasan Ibn Abi 'l-ʿIzz 'Alī Ibn Ṣadaqah. Jamāl al-Dīn also was one of al-Mustarshid's wazīrs, and there can be no doubt that this statement is more exact than the former, since it is the author himself who makes it. The wazīr Jamāl al-Dīn died in the month of Rajab, A. H. 522 (July, A. C. 1128).—Such was al-Ḥarīrī's motive for putting the Maqāmahs under the name of Abū Zayd al-Sarūjī<sup>3</sup>. It is stated by al-Qāḍī 'l-Akrām Jamāl al-Dīn Abu 'l-Ḥasan 'Alī Ibn Yūsuf al-Ḥaybānī al-Qifṭī, the wazīr of Aleppo<sup>4</sup>, in his work entitled Anbā al-Ruwāt fī Abnā al-Nuḥāt (relations of historical traditionists concerning the sons of grammarians), that the real name of the person designated as Abū Zayd was al-Muṭahhar Ibn Salām<sup>5</sup>, "who was", says he, "a native of Baṣrah, a grammarian, and a pupil of al-Ḥarīrī, under whom he studied in that city, and by whose lessons he attained proficiency :

1 See No. 51.

2 The author here refers to the narration made by al-Ḥarīrī's son. The intervening passage is a later addition.

3 It may be perceived from this that the preceding passages are later additions, but they are certainly by the author himself.

4 This qāḍī was born at Qifṭ, a town in Upper Egypt, whence his surname. He was distinguished for the great variety of the sciences which he cultivated and for the number of his works, one of which, containing the history of philosophers (Tārīḥ al-Ḥukamā), is very often cited by Abu'l-Faraj in his Dynasties; an abridgment of it by al-Zūzīnī is in the Bib. du Roi. Al-Qifṭī died A. H. 646 (A. C. 1248-9). For an account of his life, see Fleischer's Abulfedae Historia Anteislamica, pp. 234-5.

5 In some of the manuscripts, this name is written Sallār, سَلَّار and such is also the reading of the Ḥarīdah, in the notice on Zayn al-Islām Abu 'l-'Abbās Muḥammad, one of al-Ḥarīrī's sons (MS. No. 1373, fol 169. verso).

he was licensed also by al-Ḥarīrī to teach orally some pieces of traditional literature which he had communicated to him. The qāḍī Abu 'l-Faṭḥ Muḥammad Ibn Aḥmad Ibn al-Mandā'ī al-Wāsiṭī taught al-Ḥarīrī's Mulḥat al-l'rāb with the authorisation of Abū Zayd, and he mentioned that he had learned it from him as he had learned it from the author. He came to us at Wāsiṭ in the year 538, and we learned that work from his lips. He then went up to Baghdād and died there after a short residence<sup>1</sup>." Such also is the statement made by

1 The following note communicated to me by M. Reinaud, member of the Institut, contains some interesting remarks on the origin of Mūqamahs :

arīrī s'est peint dans ses Macamas sous le nom de Harets fils de Hemmam. A l'égard d 'Abou-Zeyd, qui joue le principal rôle dans cette longue suite de tableaux, c'en était pas un personnage imaginaire ; on a vu le témoignage du fils de Hariri, rapporté par Ibn Khallekan. Hariri lui-même s'est exprimé à cet égard d'une manière positive. Il dit qu 'Abou-Zeyd était originaire de Saroudj en Mesopotamie ; que cette ville ayant été prise de force par les chrétiens, fut mise au pillage, que sa propre fille fut faite captive, et que, dépouillé de tout, il n'eut pas d'autre ressource que de prendre la fuite et de recourir à la générosité publique. Hariri fait ainsi parler Abou-Zeyd dans sa Macama XLVIII, laquelle fut composée la première de toutes (voy. l'édition de Hariri, par M. Silvestre de Sacy, pag. 570 et 571) : "Je suis un des anciens habitants de Saroudj ; je vivais au milieu de l'abondance et environné de la considération publique. Tout-à-coup Dieu voulut que ma situation changeât. Les Romains sont entrés dans mon pays en ennemis furieux ; ils ont fait les femmes captives et se sont emparés de tous les biens. J'ai pris la fuite, et je me suis mis à implorer la générosité de chacun, après avoir vu si souvent implorer la mienne. Maintenant il pèse une charge sur moi, dont il me tarde de me débarrasser. Ma fille est restée captive entre les mains de l'ennemi, et je suis impatient de recueillir la somme nécessaire pour la racheter." Dans la Macama XIV Abou-Zayd s'exprime ainsi : "Saroudj est ma patrie ; mais comment y retourner ? L'ennemi y a établi sa demeure et s'y livre à tous les excès (voy. ibidem, page 140)." D'un autre côté, un écrivain arabe dit avoir entendu faire ce récit à Hariri : "L'homme de Saroudj est un scheyk éloquent et un esprit plein de ressources. Étant venu à Bassora, il entra un jour dans la mosquée des benou Haram, et se mit à adresser la parole à un chacun, demandant des secours. Un des valī de la ville était présent, et la mosquée renfermait beaucoup de personnes de mérite. L'élégance qu'Abou-Zeyd mettait dans ses discours, la facilité qu'il avait à s'exprimer sur tous les tons, les traits piquants dont il assaisonnait ses paroles frappèrent les assistants d'admiration. Le soir de ce même jour

(Continued on page 46)

al-Sam'ānī in his Ḥcyl (supplement) (No. 368), and by 'Imād al-Dīn; in the Kharīdah.—The latter adds "His honorary title was Fakhr al-Dīn; he exercised the Ṣadriyah (magistracy)<sup>1</sup> at al-Mashhān and died there subsequently to the year 540 (A.C. 1145-6)."—"In choosing the name of Ḥārith the son of Ḥammām for the person who is supposed to relate the Māqāmahs, alplusieurs personnes distinguées de la ville s'étant réunies chez moi, je témoignai mon étonnement du talent singulier dont ce mendiant faisait preuve. La-dessus les diverses personnes de l'assemblée se mirent à raconter ce qu'elles avaient eu chacune occasion de voir dans les autres mosquées de Bassora; Abou-Zeyd les avait parcourues successivement, chaque fois sous un costume différent et chaque fois employant un artifice nouveau. Frappe d'un fait si singulier, je me mis la nuit même à composer sur ce modèle ma première Macama, qui eut un succès extraordinaire."—(Voy. I édition de Hariri, par M. de Sacy, page. 563). Or les Romains dont parle Hariri ne sont pas autres que les Francs ou guerriers d'Occident qui avaient pris part à la première croisade et qui ne tardèrent pas à s'emparer de Saroudj. Voici ce qui raconte Ibn Alatir, dans son Kamel al-Tverykh, sous l'année 494 (1101): "Les Francs se rendent maîtres de la ville de Saroudj en Mesopotamie. Précédemment les Francs s'étaient emparés de la ville d'Edesse, à la suite d'une invitation des habitants eux-mêmes. En effet, la plupart des habitants étaient de race arménienne, et il n'y avait parmi eux qu'un petit nombre de Musulmans. Cette année, Socman rassembla dans Saroudj une troupe considérable de Turcomans et se disposa à attaquer les Francs. Ceux-ci s'avancèrent à sa rencontre. On en vint aux mains au mois de rebi premier (janvier 1101), et Socman fut mis en fuite. Après la défaite des Musulmans, les Francs se portèrent vers Saroudj et en entreprirent le siège. La ville ayant été prise, un grand nombre des habitants furent mis à mort; les femmes furent faites esclaves et leurs biens pillés; il ne se sauva que les personnes qui s'étaient dérobées au danger par la fuite."

(Continued from page 45)

1 M. de Sacy, in his translation of Ibn Khallikān's life of al-Ḥariri (see Chrestomathie, tom. III, p. 175, and his edition of the Maqāmahs introduction, p. xv) considers the word Ṣadriyah as the equivalent of Ṣadr al-Islām, which title he renders by chef du clergé musulman. As the Muslims have no established clergy, I hesitate adopting his opinion, and the following extract from the Kharīdah, in which the author, 'Imād al-Dīn speaks for himself, may serve to fix the real meaning of the word: "In the year 556 (A.C. 1161) I met Abu 'l-Abbās Muḥammad, the son of al-Qāsim al-Ḥariri, and surnamed Zayn al-Islāmī (ornament of Islamism), at al-Mashhān; and I read under him forty of his father's Maqāmahs. He was a man of merit and spoke with elegance and fluency. I was (then) employed in the Ṣadriyāt"—(this word

(Continued on page 47)

Ḥarīrī meant to designate himself." So I have found it written in some commentaries on that work; and the name itself is taken from the saying of Muḥammad; "Every one of you is a ḥārith and every one of you is a hammām," wherein ḥārith means gainer, and hammām, one who has many cares; and there is no person but is ḥārith and hammām, because every one is employed in gaining his livelihood and is solicitous about his affairs. A great number of persons have commented the Maqāmahs, some in long, and others in short, treatises.—I read in a certain compilation that, when al-Ḥarīrī had composed his Maqāmahs, which were at first only forty in number, he left Baṣrah and went with the work to Baḡdād, where he gave it as his own production. But a number of the literary men of that city refused to believe him, and they declared that it was not he who composed it, but a native of Maḡrib, an elegant writer, who died at Baṣrah and whose papers al-Ḥarīrī had appropriated. The wazīr therefore called al-Ḥarīrī before the dīwān or council, and asked him his profession; to which he replied that he was a munshī<sup>1</sup>. The wazīr then required him to

---

(Continued from page 46)

is the plural of Sadriyah)— "as lieutenant of the wazīr 'Aūn al-Dīn, and, as this son of al-Ḥarīrī was extremely modest and reserved, I had to employ a stratagem in order to induce him to come to me. As he had omitted to pay up the full amount of his land-tax, I sent him a summons, and, when he appeared before me, I forgave him the debt and said: 'My object was merely to bring you here and make your acquaintance, etc.'"—(MS.No 1373, fol. 169 v). From this it appears that the Sadriyah was a court of justice, and that one of its attributions was to pursue the recovery of arrear taxes. I may add that the first magistrate of the Ottoman empire is called the Sadr-Rūm, and one of his prerogatives is to take the cognizance of all causes in which the pecuniary interests of the state are concerned.—See d'Ohsson's Tableau general de l' Empire othoman, tom. IV, page 538.

1 M. de Sacy has rendered the word munshī by ecrivain-redacteur. Such persons were employed by government to draw up the official correspondence, etc.—Al Ḥarīrī did not here indicate his real profession, which was that of Ṣāḥib al-Khabar, or government spy. Intelligence officer.—Ed. He exercised these functions at Baṣrah, as we learn from 'Imād al-Dīn (Kharīdah, MS. No. 1373, fol. 169). He corresponded directly with the dīwān of the Khalīf at Baḡdād, and probably, like the postmaster, who acted also in the same capacity, he kept an eye on the conduct of the provincial governor.

compose an epistle on a subject which he indicated, and al-Ḥarīrī retired, with ink and paper, into a corner of the diwān, where he remained a long time without being favoured with any inspiration on the subject. He at length rose up and withdrew in confusion<sup>1</sup>. Among the persons who denied al-Ḥarīrī's claim to the composition of the Maqāmahs was the poet Abu 'l-Qāsim 'Alī Ibn Aflah (No. 451); and he, on this occasion, made the two following verses, which are, however, attributed by others to Abū Muḥammad Ibn Aḥmad al-Ḥarīrī, surnamed Ibn Jakīnā<sup>2</sup>, a native of Baghdād and a celebrated poet :

"We have a shaykh, sprung from Rabī'at al-Faras, who now plucks his beard through frenzy. May God send him back to prate at al-Mashān<sup>3</sup>, as he already struck him dumb in the diwān".

It must be here observed that al-Ḥarīrī pretended to draw his origin from Rabī'at al-Faras<sup>4</sup>, that he had a custom of plucking his beard when absorbed in thought, and that he inhabited al-Mashān in the neighbourhood of Baṣrah.—Having returned to his native town, al-Ḥarīrī composed ten more Maqāmahs, and sent them (to Baghdād), attributing, at the same time, the embarrassment and inability which he manifested in the diwān to the awful respect with which he had been overcome.—Al-Ḥarīrī has left some other fine works; such are the Durrat al-Ḥawwāṣ fi awḥām il-khawāṣṣ [the pearl of the diver, being a treatise on the mistakes committed by

---

1 Any person who reads the long extracts from al-Ḥarīrī's poems and epistles given in the Kharīdah, must come to the conviction that he was fully capable of composing the Maqāmahs. I may be allowed to add that I consider the Maqāmahs as the most elegantly written and the most amusing work in the Arabic language.

2 See No 76, note on Ibn Jakīnā.

3 "Mashān was a place in the dependencies of Baghdād to which persons were banished who had incurred the displeasure of the sovereign."—Abu 'l-Feda's Annals, year 515. See also Chrestomathie, tom. III, p. 180.

4 C'est Rebia, fils de Modhar.—Voy. Spec. hist. Ar. ed. White, p. 47; et Eichhorn, Monum. antiquis. hist. Ar. p. 120 :—(Note de M. de Sacy.)

persons of rank in speaking Arabic<sup>1</sup>): the Mulḥat al-I'rāb (elegancies of grammar)<sup>2</sup>, a treatise in verse which he afterwards explained in a commentary; a dlwān, or collection of epistles, and a great number of poetical pieces besides those contained in his Maqāmahs. One of them offers a very fine thought and merits insertion<sup>3</sup>. The following verses are given as his by 'Imād al-Dīn, in the Kharīdah:

"How many (were) the gazelles at Ḥajir<sup>4</sup> which fascinated with their eyes! How many the noble minds struck with amazement by fair maidens! How often did the graceful movements of a nymph, advancing with a stately gait, excite an ardent passion in (my) bosom! How many were the pretty cheeks whose aspect induced the censurer (of my foolish love) to excuse me! How many pains combined to afflict my heart when the ringlets of her I loved were unveiled and disclosed to sight!"

Al-Ḥarīrī left some qaṣīdahs in which he made a frequent use of the rhetorical ornament called tajnīs (alliteration). It is related that he was dwarfish and ugly: a stranger who went to visit him for the purpose of learning something (of his compositions) from his own lips, could not dissemble his contempt when he saw him. Al-Ḥarīrī observed it, and the visitor having asked him to dictate something to him, he replied: "Write down as follows:—

"Thou art not the first nocturnal traveller whom moonlight has deceived<sup>5</sup>, nor the first pasture-searcher (of a nomadic

1 A long extract from this excellent philological work has been given by M. de Sacy in his Anthologie Grammaticale.

2 M. de Sacy has inserted an extract of the Mulḥah, with the commentary, in the Anthologie Grammaticale. Some chapters of the commentary are excellent.

3 The piece consists of three lines, but it does not seem to me fit for translation. [The translation is:

The accusers say: Even now, this infatuation? Do you not see hair growing on his cheeks?

I replied: If he who accuses me, looks carefully at the winkings of his eyes, shall certainly not remain firm.

He who has stayed in the barren land cannot leave it when the spring sets in.—Ed.]

4 See No. 493.

5 That is: Who has taken moonlight for day; who was deceived by appearances.

tribe) who was pleased at the sight of the green herbs which flourish on dung<sup>1</sup>. Choose some one else, for I am like al-Mu'aydi: listen to what is said of me, but look not at me.' "

These words covered the stranger with confusion and he hastened to withdraw. Al-Ḥarīrī was born, A.H. 446 (A.C. 1054-5), and he died at Baṣrah, in the street of Banū Ḥarām, A. H. 516 (A. C. 1122-3); some say A. H. 515. He left two sons; Abū Maṣṣūr * al-Jawālīqī<sup>2</sup> said: "I was authorised to teach the Maqāmahs by Najm al-Dīn 'Abd Allāh and the chief qāḍī of Baṣrah, Ḍiyā al-Islām 'Ubayd Allāh<sup>3</sup>, who had both received a similar authorisation from their father, the author of that production."—Al-Ḥarīrī received the surname of al-Ḥarāmī because he dwelt in the street of Banū Ḥarām. These people were an Arabian tribe which took up their residence in that street and it was called after them.—Ḥarīrī means a manufacturer or seller of ḥarīr (silk).—Al-Maṣḥān is a village above Baṣrah, abounding with date-trees and notorious for its unhealthiness: it was the native place of al-Ḥarīrī's family; it is said that he possessed there eighteen thousand date-trees and was a wealthy man.—The wazīr Anūshīrwān held a high eminence by his talents, his learning and his influence; he composed a small historical work entitled Ṣudūr Zamān il-Futūr wa Futūr Zamān il-Ṣudūr (the great men of the times of relaxment, and relaxment of the times of great men), from which copious extracts are made by 'Imād al-Dīn al-Iṣfahānī in his history of the Saljūq dynasty, entitled: Nuṣrat al-Fitrah wa 'Uṣrat al-Fitrah [succour against languor and asylum for the human race (?)]. This wazīr died in the year 532 (A. C. 1137-8).—As for the person called Ibn Mandā'ī, and whose real names were Abu 'l-Faṭḥ Muḥammad Ibn Abi 'l-'Abbās Aḥmad Ibn Bakhtiyār Ibn 'Alī Ibn Muḥammad Ibn Ibrāhīm Ibn Ja'far al-Wāsiṭī [native of Wāsiṭ], he had a number of distinguished men for disciples, and, amongst others, Abū Bakar al-Ḥāzimī<sup>4</sup>. He was born at 1 Such herbage has a fair appearance, but is worthless as food for cattle.

2 His life is given by Ibn Khallikān.

3 Al-Ḥarīrī had therefore three sons: 'Abd Allāh (see note on p. 43), Muḥammad see note on p. 44 and 'Ubayd Allāh.

4 The life of al-Ḥāzimī is given by Ibn Khallikān.

* The Cairo edition has: Abu 'l-Man ūr Ibn al-Jawālīqī...Ed.

Wāsiṭ in the month of the latter Rabi', A. H. 517 (June, A. C. 1123), and he died in the same city on the 8th of Shā'bān, A. H. 605 (Feb, A. C. 1209).*—The name of al-Mu'aydl occurs in the proverb; Hear speak of al-Mu'aydl, but avoid seeing him, or, as it is sometimes expressed: Hear speak of al-Mu'aydl, that is better than to see him. Al-Mufaḍḍal al-Ḍubbi<sup>1</sup> states that this saying was first uttered by al-Munḍhir Ibn Mā al-Samā in addressing Shiqqah Ibn Ḍumra al-Tamimi al-Dārimi, of whom he heard a great deal. On seeing him, he was so much struck by his ill looks that he made use of this expression, which thenceforward became proverbial. Shiqqah then made the following reply: "Prince, mayest thou be preserved from every malediction<sup>2</sup>! men are not to be chosen for their bodies like animals selected for slaughter; to appreciate a man thou must examine the two smallest of his members; his heart and his tongue." Al-Munḍhir highly admired his answer, as being a proof of his wisdom and his talent for elegant expression. This proverb is employed when speaking of a man who bears a high reputation, but is deficient in personal appearance<sup>3</sup>. The word Mu'aydl means descended from Ma'add, the son of 'Adnān; it is an adjective formed from the diminutive Mu'ayd, which is itself formed regularly from Mu'add, after suppressing a d.

511 ABŪ AḤMAD AL-QĀSIM AL-SHAHRUZŪRĪ

Abū Aḥmad al-Qāsim Ibn al-Muẓaffar Ibn 'Alī Ibn al-Qāsim al-Shahrūzūrī, the father of the qāḍī 'l-khāfiqayn Abū Bakr Muḥammad, of al-Murtaḍā Abū Muḥammad 'Abd Allāh, and of Abū Maṣṣūr al-Muẓaffar, was the progenitor of the Shahrūzūrī family which gave so many qāḍīs of that surname to Syria,

---

1 His life will be found in this work.

2 See Pococke's Specimen hist. Arab, p. 57.

3 See Freytag's Meldanil Proverbia, tom. I. p. 223, where the anecdote of al-Munḍhir and Shiqqah more fully related.

* 15 February.—Ed.

Moşul and Mesopotamia. He acted for some time as hākim<sup>1</sup> in the city of Arbela, and passed also some time at Sinjār in the discharge of the same functions. A number of his sons and grand-children, all pre-eminently distinguished for learning and personal worth, attained the highest posts under government, and merited the special favour of (their) sovereign; they acted as hākims or as qādīs, and their reputation rendered them the marked object of general favour; such were his grandson, the qādl Kamāl al-Dīn Muḥammad, and his great grandson Muḥī al-Dīn, the son of Kamāl al-Dīn. We shall give notices on these two in a subsequent part of this work. The descendants of al-Qāsim form a numerous body, and they have continued, till this day, to be the qādīs of Moşul and the most eminent persons of the city. He visited Bagh<sup>h</sup>dād more than once, and the ḥāfiẓ Abū Sa'd al-Sam'ānī has spoken of him in the Kitāb al-Dhayl (supplement to the history of Bagh<sup>h</sup>dād). The same writer also noticed him twice in the Kitāb al-Ansāb; the first time under the word al-Irbili, where he says: "And it," meaning Arbela, "has produced a number of learned men, one of whom was the qādl Abū Aḥmad al-Qāsim al-Shahruzūrī;" to which he adds that he belonged to the tribe of Shaybān. The second time he speaks of him is under the head of al-Shahruzūrī, where he mentions also his son the Qādi 'l-Khāfiqayn with high commendation. Ibn al-Mustawfī notices him in the History of Arbela, and inserts therein some of his poetry from which we select the following lines:

"My desires extend beyond al-Suhā and al-Zubānā<sup>2</sup>; the object of my wishes is high exalted and admits not my approach<sup>3</sup>. I shall continue in toil and anxiety till time is no more or till my life has ceased"

Having found the same verses in al-Sam'ānī's Dhayl and attributed by him to the qādi 'l-Khāfiqayn, I am unable to

---

1 Hākim is a general name for magistrates of every rank.

2 Al-Suhā is a small star in the tail of the Greater Bear; it is marked Z (zeta) in Flamsteed's celestial Atlas. The Arabs give the name of the two Zubānās to the stars A (alpha) and B (beta) of the Balance.

3 He means the Divinity.

declare which of the two was their author. Al-Qāsim died at Moṣul, A. H. 489 (A. C. 1096), and was interred in the funeral chapel bearing his name and situated near the mosque erected by his ancestor Abu 'l-Ḥasan Ibn Farghān<sup>1</sup>.—His son 'Abd Allāh al-Murtaḍā the author of the Mawṣiliyān Qaṣīdah (No. 312) was the father of Kamāl al-Dīn.—As for the qāḍī 'l-Khāfiqayn, al-Sam'ānī says of him that he studied the science (of the law) under Abū Ishāq al-Shīrāzī (No. 5) and that he acted as qāḍī in a number of towns; he travelled to 'Irāq Khurāsān, and al-Jibāl (Persian 'Irāq), where he received by oral transmission a great quantity of Traditions, some of which he communicated to al-Sam'ānī himself. He was born at Arbela, A. H. 453 (A. C. 1061-33) or 454; he died at Baghdād in the month of the first Jumādā, A. H. 538 (Nov.-Dec. A. C. 1143), and was interred at the Abrez Gate. The title of Qāḍī 'l-Khāfiqayn (qāḍī of the East and West) was given to him in consequence of his having exercised the functions of that office in a great number of towns.—His brother Abū Maṣṣūr al-Muzaḥḥar is thus noticed by al-Sam'ānī, in his Dhayl: "He was born at Arbela and brought up at Moṣul, whence he removed to Baghdād, and studied under the shaykh Abū Ishāq al-Shīrāzī. He then returned to Moṣul, and at a very advanced period of life, he accepted the post of qāḍī at Sinjār although he had lost his sight<sup>2</sup>.—I asked him the year of his birth, and he informed me that he was born in the month of the latter Jumādā, or of Rajab, A. H. 457 (May-June, A. C. 1065), at Arbela". He does not indicate the year of his death. Shahrzūr means belonging to Shahrzūr, a large town which is now counted among the dependencies of Arbela; it was built by Zūr, the son of al-Ḍaḥḥāk<sup>3</sup>. Shahrzūr signifies in Persian, the city of Zūr; al-Iskandar (Alexander) Dhu 'l-Qarnayn died there on his return from the

1 One of the manuscripts has the ancestor of, and I acknowledge that the text seems to me corrupted, as I read in the Qāmūs; FARGHAN; an ancestor of Abu 'l-Ḥasan al-Mawṣilī (of Moṣul), the traditionist.

2 See the observations of our author in No. 313.

3 Ḍaḥḥāk or al-Ḍaḥḥāk, as the Arabs pronounce the name, was the tyrant who makes so conspicuous a figure in the fabulous history of ancient Persia.

East<sup>1</sup>; I asked a native of the place about his tomb, and he informed me that a tomb did exist there, called the Tomb of al-Iskandar, but that the inhabitants did not know who this person was. It is a city of great antiquity. The Khaṭīb (No. 33) says, in his History of Baghdād, that al-Iskandar made Madā'in Kisrā (Ctesiphon) his residence, and that he continued to inhabit that city till his death; his coffin was then transported to Alexandria, because his mother was dwelling there, and he was interred near her<sup>2</sup>.

512 IBN FIRRUH AL-SHĀṬIBĪ

Abu Muḥammad al-Qāsim Ibn Firruh Ibn Abi 'l-Qāsim Khaḥaf Ibn Aḥmad al-Ru'aynī al-Shāṭibī al-Ḍarīr (the blind) al-Muqri' (the teacher of the Qur'ān-readings), is the author of the qaṣīdah on the Qur'ān-readings, named by him Ḥirz al-Amān wa Wajh al-Tahānī (Wishes accomplished, and open congratulations<sup>3</sup>), consisting of one thousand one hundred and seventy-three verses, and displaying in its composition the utmost ingenuity. It is the main authority on which the Qur'ān-readers of this age rely, in their instructions to pupils, and very few persons undertake to study the readings till they have learned this poem by heart and mastered its meaning. It is filled with extraordinary allusions, obscure and subtle indications, and I do not believe that any work of a similar kind was ever produced before. He is declared to have said: "No one will read this qaṣīdah of mine without Almighty God's permitting him to derive profit from it; for I composed it purely and simply with the view of serving Almighty God." He composed also another qaṣīdah of five hundred verses and rhyming in d, from which, if learned by heart, a complete acquaintance is obtained with the contents of Ibn 'Abd al-Barr's Tamhīd<sup>4</sup>. Ibn Firruh was 1 Alexander the Great died at Babylon, as is well known.

2 Olympias, the mother of Alexander the Great, never inhabited Alexandria, and she lost her life in Macedonia, eight years after the death of her son.

3 Literally: Custodia votorum et facies gratulationum.

4 The life of Ibn 'Abd al-Barr is given in this work. In the 8th vol. of the Notices et Extraits, M. de Sacy has given a notice on the Akila or Ratya, another poem of Ibn Firruh's, on the orthography of the Qur'ān.

learned in the reading and interpretation of the Book of God (the Qur'ān), and pre-eminent by his knowledge of the Traditions relative to the Prophet; when pupils read to him out of the Ṣaḥīḥ of al-Bukhārī, or that of Muslim, or the Muwaffā (of Mālik), he would correct the text of their copies from memory, and indicate the necessary vowels and diacritical points, wherever their presence was required. In grammar and philology he stood unrivalled; in the interpretation of dream he displayed great skill; in all his conduct he was actuated by the purest motives, and his deeds, like his words, proceeded from a heart devoted to God. He read the Qur'ān, according to the different readings under Abū 'Abd-Allāh Muḥammad Ibn 'Alī Ibn Muḥammad Ibn Abi 'l-'Aṣi al-Nafrī<sup>1</sup>, and under Abu 'l-Ḥasan 'Alī Ibn Muḥammad Ibn Hudhayl al-Andalusī; he learned Traditions from Abū 'Abd Allāh Muḥammad Ibn Yūsuf Ibn Sa'ādah<sup>2</sup>, 1 Al-Maqqarī mentions this al-Nafrī in his notice on Ibn Firruh. See MS. No. 704, fol. 160.

2 'Abd Allāh Mu ammad Ibn Yūsuf Ibn Sa'ādah was an inhabitant of Xativa. but his ancestors dwelt in Valencia. Having received lessons in his native place from many men distinguished for learning, he travelled to the western provinces of Spain for the same purpose. In A.H. 520 (A.C. 1126) he journeyed to the East, and there cultivated jurisprudence and other branches of knowledge. He made the pilgrimage in the following year, and on his return to Egypt, he frequented the society of Abū Tāhir Ibn 'Awf (No. 389. note.) al-Silafi (No. 43) and other illustrious doctors. In the year 526 (A.C. 1131-2) he returned to Murcia with a vast stock of information in the Traditions, Qur'an-reading, Qur'anic interpretation, law, philology and scholastic theology. He had an inclination for Sūfism. Being appointed member of the town-council الشورى and preacher at the great mosque of Murcia, he began to teach the Traditions and jurisprudence, and he exercised the functions of qāḍī in the same city till the downfall of the Almoravides. He then passed to the qāḍīship of Xativa, and taught Traditions not only there, but in Murcia and Valencia, in which places also he filled the office of ḥaṭīb, or public preacher. Previously to this, he had taught Traditions at Almeria. He died at Xativa on the last day of Dhu 'l-Hijjah, A.H. 565 (Sept. A.C. 1170),* leaving one single work on quite an original plan and entitled سخرة الوهم المرتقى الى ذروة انهم. He was born in the month of Ramaḍān, A.H. 496 (June-July, A.C. 1103).-- (Al-Maqqarī; MS. No. 704, fol. 187).

* 13 September.

Abū 'Abd-Allāh Muḥammad Ibn 'Abd-al-Raḥīm al-Khazrajī, Abū 'l-Ḥasan Ibn Ḥudhayl, the ḥāfiẓ Abū 'l-Ḥasan Ibn al-Ni'mah<sup>1</sup> and others. A great number of persons studied under him with profit, and I met in Egypt with many of his former pupils. In his discourse he avoided prolixness; never, on any occasion, did he pronounce a word without necessity, and he never took his seat to teach the readings of the Qur'ān without being in a state of purity<sup>2</sup>, and assuming an air of dignified gravity and profound humility. When suffering under a severe illness, he neither complained nor uttered a groan, and, being asked how he was, he replied "In health," without adding another word. One of his disciples recited some verses to me and said: "Our Shaykh frequently repeated them; they form an enigma the word of which is bier." I asked him if they were the Shaykh's and he replied that he did not know. Some time afterwards, I met with them in the dlwān of the Khaṭīb Yaḥyā Ibn Salāmah al-Ḥaṣkafī, a person whose life will be found in this work. These verses are:

"Do you know an object to which one similar exists in the sky<sup>3</sup>? When it moves forward, people utter loud exclamations. When we meet it, it bears a burden and is borne as one, and every chief who may ride on it is a prisoner. It incites to piety, and yet it is avoided; it admonishes mankind, and yet they shun it. (When it visits a house), it was not called for through a wish for its presence, but it comes unwelcome to the person visited."

Al-Shāṭibī was born towards the end of A.H. 538 (June, A.C. 1444), and, at a very early age he officiated as Khaṭīb (preacher) in his native town. He came to Egypt in the year 572 (A.C. 1176-7) and said on arriving: "I know by heart enough of the sciences to load a camel so heavily that, if a single leaf more were added, it could not support the burden." He lodged at the house of al-Qāḍī 'l-Fāḍil (No. 349) who appointed him professor of Qur'ān-reading, grammar, and philology. He died on Sunday, the 28th of the latter Jumādā, A.H. 590 (June, A.C. 1194),* a little later than the hour of the afternoon prayer, and was interred on the Monday following in the funeral chapel of al-Qāḍī 'l-Fāḍil. I have frequently visited his tomb, which is situated in the Lesser Qarāfah Cemetery. The prayer was said over his grave by Abū Ishāq al-'Irāqī (No. 6) the khaṭīb of the Great Mosque of Old Cairo.—Firruh signifies iron in the Latin language of the non-Muslim inhabitants of Spain. Ru'ayn means descended from Dhū Ru'ayn, who was one of the princes of Yaman; a great number of persons have drawn their surnames from this ancestor.—Shāṭibī means belonging to Shāṭibah (Xativa), a large city with a strong citadel in the east of Spain, which has produced many men eminent for learning. It fell into the power of the Franks on one of the last ten days of Ramaḍān, A.C. 645 (end of January, A.C. 1248).—Some say that al-Shāṭibī's name was Muḥammad and his surname Abū 'l-Qāsim, but I found his name written Abū Muḥammad al-Qāsim in different ijāzahs (licences to teach and certificates of capacity) granted to him by his masters.

1 The name of Ibn al-Ni'mah is mentioned by al-Maqqarī; MS. No. 704. fol. 160 recto.

2 That is: In the state of bodily purity which is required of every Muslim when he proceeds to say his prayers.

3 Part of the constellation of the Greater Bear is called al-Na'sh (the bier) by the Arabs.

513 ABŪ DULAF AL-'IJLĪ

Abū Dulaf al-Qāsim Ibn 'Isā Ibn Idrīs Ibn Ma'qil Ibn 'Umayr Ibn Shaykh Ibn Mu'āwiyah Ibn Khuzā'i Ibn 'Abd al-'Uzzā Ibn Dulaf Ibn Jusham† Ibn Qays Ibn Sā'd Ibn 'Ijl Ibn Lujam‡ Ibn Ṣa'b Ibn 'Alī Ibn Bakr Ibn Wa'il Ibn Qāsiḥ Ibn Hinn Ibn Afṣā Ibn Du'mī Ibn Jadilah Ibn Asad Ibn Rabī'ah Ibn Nizār Ibn Sa'd Ibn 'Adnān al-'Ijlī was one of al-Māmūn's generals, and served also that khalīf's successor, al-Mu'taṣim, in the same

* 19 June.—Ed.

† M. de Slane gives Jushm.—Ed.

‡ The Egyptian edition gives Luḥaym.—Ed.

capacity. We have already mentioned his name in the life of al-'Akawwak (No. 436), with some verses composed by that poet in his praise, and we have observed (No. 347) that Abū Muslim al-Khurasānī had been brought up under the care of ('Isā Ibn Ma'qil, the brother of Idris), Abū Dulaf's grandfather. The life of the amīr Abū Naṣr 'Alī Ibn Mākūlā, the author of Ikmāl and one of Abū Dulaf's descendants, has also been given in this work (No. 414). Abū Dulaf was a spirited, noble, and generous chief, highly extolled for his liberality, courageous and enterprising, noted for his victories and his beneficence; men distinguished in literature and the sciences derived instruction from his discourse, and his talent was conspicuous even in the art of vocal music. Amongst the works which he composed are the following: the Kitāb al-Buzāt wa 'l-Ṣayd (on falcons and game), the Kitāb al-Ṣalāḥ (on weapons), the Kitāb al-Nuzah (on agreeable country retreats), and the Kitāb Siyāsat al-Mulūk (on the policy of princes). His praises were celebrated, in qasīdahs of the greatest beauty, by Abū Tammām al-Ṭā'ī (No. 143), and by Bakr Ibn al-Naṭṭāḥ (No. 164); the latter said of him:

"O thou who pursuest the study of alchemy, the great alchemy (the philosopher's stone) consists in praising the son of 'Isā. Was there but one dirham in the world, thou wouldst obtain it by this means."

It is stated that, for these two verses, Abū Dulaf gave Ibn al-Naṭṭāḥ ten thousand dirhams. The poet then ceased visiting him for some time and employed the money in the purchase of a village (or estate) on the river Ubullah. He afterwards went to see him and addressed him in these words:

"Thanks to thee, I have purchased an estate on the Ubullah, crowned by a pavilion erected in marble. It has a sister beside it which is now on sale, and you have always money to bestow."

"How much," said Abū Dulaf, "is the price of that sister?" The poet answered: "Ten thousand dirhams." Abū Dulaf gave him the money and said: Recollect that the Ubullah is a large river, with many estates situated on it, and that each of these sisters has another at her side; so, if thou openest such a door as that, it will lead to a breach between us. Be content then with what thou hast now got, and let this be a point agreed on." —The poet then offered up prayers for his welfare and withdrew. Abū Bakr Muḥammad Ibn Hāshim, one of the Khālidites (No. 240) imitated the idea of the first passage (here cited) in the following lines :

"The poets are convinced that their hopes in thee are safe from the strokes of despair. Alchemy is a false science for all other mortals whom we know, but not for them. Thou givest them money in bags when they bring the words on paper."

Abū Dulaf, having encountered some Kurds who were intercepting travellers in the province under his rule, struck one (camel—) rider through with his lance and the point entered into the body of another who was sitting behind him : he thus killed them both at a stroke. Ibn al-Naṭṭāḥ took this occasion for composing the following verses :

"On the day of battle when his spear<sup>1</sup>, which thou never seest blunted, pierced through two riders, people said : 'Wonder not at that ; were his lance a mile long, it would pierce through a mile's length of riders' ".

Abū 'Abd Allāh Aḥmad Ibn Abī Faṭḥ Ṣāliḥ, a mawlā to the Hāshimide family, was dark complexioned, dwarfish, and very poor. His wife once said to him : "I see, my man ! that the star of literature has set and that its arrow has missed the mark ; take then thy sword, spear, and bow, and go forth with the others to the wars ; God may perhaps grant thee a share of booty." In reply, he recited the following verses :

"What can induce thee to advise such an extravagance to a man like me?—to oblige me to bear arms and hear warriors in armour order me to halt ! Dost thou suppose me one of those men of death who from morn to eve aspire after destruction ? When death approaches another, I observe it with horror ; how then could I go and face it myself ? Dost thou think that single combats with the foe are my passion, and that my bosom contains the heart of Abū Dulaf?"

1 I read بطنه not بطنه

2 Literally : That my heart contains the breast of Abū Dulaf. A similar peculiarity of the Arabic idiom would allow us to say : My shoe cannot enter my foot, in place of my foot cannot enter my shoe. — See on this subject M. de. Sacy's Chrestomathie, tom. II. p. 399.

Abū Dulaf heard of this, and sent him a thousand dīnārs.— The profusion of Abū Dulaf in his donations involved him in debt, and the circumstance having become public, one of these solicitors went into his presence and said :

“O lord of gift and donations ! O thou of the open countenance and the open hand ! I am told that thou art in debt ; increase then its amount and discharge what I owe.”

Abū Dulaf made him a present and discharged his debt. A poet went to him one day and recited these lines :

“When God entrusted thy hand with the distribution of favours, he knew (that He would be well served). O Abū Dulaf ! never have the two (recording angels) written no in the register of thy words, though often it be written in those of other mortals. Thou hast rivalled in beneficence the rapid winds (which bear rain to the regions of the earth) ; and when they cease to blow, thou ceasest not to give.”

The poems composed in his praise are very numerous ; he himself composed some good poetry, from which I should transcribe passages were it not my desire to avoid prolixity. He completed the building of the city of al-Karaj (in Persia 'Irāq) which had been commenced by his father, and it became the residence of his tribe, family, and children. Whilst he was staying there, a poet (said by some to have been Maṣṣūr Ibn Bādān, and by others, Bakr Ibn al-Naṭṭāh) recited to him a eulogy, but did not obtain a recompense equal to his expectations ; he therefore departed, reciting this verse :

“Let me go and travel over the deserts of the earth ; for al-Karaj is not the whole world, neither is Qāsim (Abū Dulaf) the human race !”

Similar to this are the following lines ; by another poet, but I am unable to state which of them copied the other :

“If you resume your wonted generosity, it will be, as before, your obedient slave. If you will not, the earth is large ; you are not all the human race, neither is Khurāsān the world.”

I have since found these last verses in 'al-Sam'ānī's Dhayl, in the article of Abu 'l-Ḥasan 'Alī Ibn Muḥammad Ibn 'Alī al-Balkhī he there says: "The following lines were recited to me at Dawraq<sup>1</sup> by the qādī 'Alī Ibn Muḥammad al-Balkhī; he gave them as the words of the amīr Abu 'l-Ḥasan 'Alī Ibn al-Muntakhib, and he may have possibly heard them from the lips of that person." Here he inserts the verses.—It is related that when Abū Dulaf returned from al-Karaj, the amīr 'Alī Ibn 'Isā Ibn Māhān prepared a repast on a most magnificent scale, and invited him to partake of it; but a poet, who then went to 'Alī's house and was refused admittance by the porter, awaited the passage of Abū Dulaf and handed him a palm-leaf, on which were inscribed these words:

"If you meet him (Abū Dulaf) lingering carelessly say: 'You come from al-Karaj, with one thousand horsemen, to a feast. After that, let not other men be reproached for acts of baseness'."

Abū Dulaf immediately returned, swearing that he would neither enter the house nor eat a morsel of that dinner. I have read in a compilation of anecdotes that the name of this poet was 'Abbād Ibn al-Ḥarīsh, and that the repast was given at Baghdād.—I read in another compilation that, when Abū Dulaf was suffering from the malady of which he died, his indisposition became so grave that the public were refused admittance into his presence. It happened, however, that, one day, feeling much better, he asked the chamberlain what applicants might be then at the palace-door, and was informed that ten sharīfs (descendants of Muḥammad) from Khurāsān had been waiting many days, without being able to enter. He immediately sat up on his bed and having sent for them, he received them with great politeness and asked them the news of their country, what might be their private circumstances, and the motive of their visit. They replied that, being in narrow circumstances and hearing of his generous character, they had come to apply to him. On this, he ordered his treasurer to bring in one of the money-chests and having taken out of it twenty bags, containing each one thousand pieces of gold, he gave two of them to each of his visitors, with an additional sum for their travelling expenses home. "Touch not the bags," said he, "till you arrive in safety and join your families; here is a sum to defray your journey. But, let each of you write for me a note, stating that he is the son of such a one, the son of such a one, etc., the son of 'Alī Ibn Abī Ṭālib, by Fāṭimah, the daughter of the Apostle of God. Let him then add these words: 'O Apostle of God! I was suffering from distress and misery in my native town, and I went to Abū Dulaf al-'Ijlī who gave me two thousand pieces of gold through respect for thee and through the desire of conciliating thy favour, hoping thus to procure thy intercession.'" Each of the sharifs wrote out a note in these terms and delivered it to him. He then directed by his will that, when he died, the person who arranged his corpse for burial should place these papers in his winding-sheet, so that he might present them to the Apostle of God. Another proof of his respect to family of 'Alī is given in a relation of what passed one day between him and his son: he happened to say that whosoever did not carry to the utmost pitch his attachment to the family of 'Alī was conceived in fornication; on which his son observed that, for himself, he did not hold such principles: "There is a good reason for that," said the father; "when thy mother conceived thee, I had not given her time to perform the istibrā." The authenticity of this anecdote is best known to God. A number of historical writers give the following narration as having been made by Dulaf, the son of Abū Dulaf: "I saw in a dream a person come towards me and say: 'The amīr requires thy presence'. I went with him and he took me into a deserted and miserable house with blackened walls, roofless and without doors: he led me up a flight of stairs and made me enter into a garret, of which the walls bore the

<sup>1</sup> Dawraq, the Dorak or Felahi on our maps, is a town of Persia, in the province of Khūzistān. It lies about seventy-five miles south of Shūstar.

---

1 When a man purchases a female slave, it is not lawful for him to cohabit with her till she has had her next ensuing monthly indisposition. The waiting for this term is called istibrā (purification, or more exactly, waiting for purification). The end proposed in this regulation is, that it may be ascertained whether conception has not already taken place in the womb, in order that the issue may not be doubtful.—(Hamilton's Hedāya, vol. IV, p. 103.)

marks of fire, and the floor was strewed with ashes : I there beheld my father, quite naked<sup>1</sup> and leaning his hand on his knees ; he said to me in interrogative tone : 'Dulaf ?' and I replied 'Dulaf ;' on which he repeated these verses :

"Tell our family, and conceal it not from them, what we have met with in the narrow tomb<sup>2</sup>. We have been questioned as to all our deeds ; O pity my desolation and my sufferings !"

"He here said : 'Dost thou understand ?' and I answered 'Yes ;' and he then recited as follows :

'If after death, we were left (in peace), death would be a repose for all living beings ; but when we die, we are raised up again and questioned respecting all we ever did. '

'Dost thou understand me ?' I answered : 'Yes ;' and awoke. " Abū Dulaf died at Baghdād, A.H. 226 (A.C. 840-1) ; some say, A.H. 225.—Dulaf is a proper name, and, as it combines this quality to that of being formed, with some alteration, from another word, it belongs to the second declension<sup>3</sup>. The word from which it is derived is dalif (lente incedens).—We have already explained the word 'Ijl' (No. 87). Ubullah is the name of an ancient town at four parasangs from Baṣrah ; it is now included in the district of that city. It is, as we have said of Shi'b Bawwān and other places, in the life of 'Aḡud al-Dawlah (No. 507), an earthly paradise and one of the four most delightful spots in the world.—Al-Karaj is a city of al-Jabal, between Iṣfahān and Hamadān.—Al-Jabal is an extensive territory between 'Irāq and Khurāsān ; the common people call it 'Irāq al-Ajam (the 'Irāq of the Persians or Persian 'Irāq). It contains some large cities, such as Hamadān, Iṣfahān, al-Ray and Zanjān.

1 The correct reading is عريان .

2 The word here rendered by tomb is barza'<sup>1</sup>. It signifies, the interval between this world and the next, or between death and the resurrection. See Sale's note on this word ; Koran, surat 23, verse 102, and his preliminary discourse, sect. IV.

3 See M. de Sacy's Grammaire arabe, tom. 1, p. 408 of the second edition.

514 QĀBŪS IBN WUSHMAGĪR and the famous
 Shams al-Ma'ālī (the sun of exalted qualities) Abu 'l-Ḥasan Qābūs al-Jilī, the son of Abū Ṭāhir Wushmagīr<sup>1</sup>, the son of Ziyār<sup>2</sup>, the son of Wardān Shāh, amīr of Jurjān, and Tabaristan is spoken of in these terms by al-Ṭha'ālībī (No. 356), in the Yatimah: "I shall conclude this section by mentioning the greatest of princes, the star of the age, the source of justice and beneficence; one in whose person Almighty God hath united power and learning, the gift of wisdom and the plenitude of authority." "Further on, he says:" And "amongst the best known of the pieces attributed to him are the following :

"O thou who reproachest us with our misfortunes ! knowest thou not that adversity wars only with the truly great ? Hast thou not observed that putrid corpses float on the surface of the sea, whilst the pearls dwell in its lowest depths ? If we have become the sport of Fortune—if we have suffered from her protracted cruelty, recollect that in the heavens are stars without number, but only the sun and the moon suffer an eclipse.

"Each time thy memory bursts upon my mind, it excites my love to flame, and I feel its thrill in my heart. Every member of my body contains a portion of that love, and they might be said to have become hearts."

The author quotes also a quantity of passages from his prose compositions. Qābūs wrote a most beautiful hand, and when the Ṣāhib Ibn 'Abbād (No. 93) saw pieces in his handwriting, he used to say : "This is either the writing of Qābūs or the wing of a peacock"; and he would then recite these verses of al-Mu'anabbī's :

"In every heart is a passion for his handwriting ; it might be said that the ink which he employed was (a cause of) love. His presence is a comfort for every eye, and his absence an afflic-tion."

1 The signification of this name seems to be Quail-catcher.

2 For the orthography of this name, I follow the autograph manuscript of the Annals of Abu 'l-Feda; it occurs under the year 366.

The amīr Qābūs ruled over Jurjān and the neighbouring provinces, as did his father before him; his (grand) father died in the month of Muḥarram, A.H. 337 (July-Aug., A.C. 948) at Jurjān. Then (after the death of Minūcheher the son of Qābūs), the empire of Jurjān fell into the possession of another family<sup>1</sup>; but it would be long to relate the history of these events. Qābūs came to the throne in the month of Shā'bān, A.H. 388<sup>2</sup>. The kingdom of Jurjān had passed to his father on the death of Mardāwīj Ibn Ziyār Ibn Wardān Shāh al-Jilī, his father's brother. This Mardāwīj was a powerful and aspiring prince; 'Imād al-Dawlah Abu 'l-Ḥasan 'Alī Ibn Buwayh (No. 455) had served under him as commander in chief, and this circumstance mainly contributed to raise him to a throne<sup>3</sup>.—Qābūs was an honour and ornament to the world, but, with all his noble qualities and political foresight, the cup of his (domination) was ungrateful to the taste; no one felt secure from the outbursts of his violence and severity; the least slip was requited with bloodshed, and, in his anger, he never thought of mercy. The ferocity of his character at length discontented all minds and alienated all hearts; the principal officers of his army conspired to depose him and submit no longer to his orders, and, as he happened at that time to be absent from Jurjān at a camp near one of his fortresses, these proceedings escaped his observation. He did not become aware of their design till they came to arrest him and plundered him of his treasures and his horses; but the band of chosen adherents who then accompanied him made so brave a defence that the conspirators returned to Jurjān.

---

<sup>1</sup> The text of Ibn Khallikān is here drawn up so carelessly, that, to save his reputation as an historian, I have been obliged to help it out by parentheses. Wasḥmagīr died A. H. 356, and was succeeded by his son Bīsetun. Qābūs reigned after him.

<sup>2</sup> This is a mistake, in which however all the manuscripts agree; I consequently adopted the reading in the printed text, although aware of the error. Qābūs succeeded to the throne of Jurjān on the death of his brother Bīsetun, A.H. 366 (A.C. 976-7). I suspect the error to have originated with our author.

<sup>3</sup> I here suppress some observations which the author has already made in the life of 'Imād al-Dawlah.

Having taken possession of the city, they dispatched a messenger to his son Abū Maṣṣūr Minūcheher, who was then in Ṭabaristān, requiring him to come without delay and receive their homage as sovereign. He set out immediately, and, on his arrival, they promised to acknowledge his authority provided he dethroned his father. Apprehensive that the empire might escape from the hands of his family, if he rejected their offers, he felt himself obliged to comply, and the amīr Qābūs, perceiving the turn which affairs had taken, retired with his adherents to the neighbourhood of Baṣṭām, where he resolved to await the results. When the muntineers were informed of this movement, they forced his son Minucheher to march out with them, that they might expel their former master from the place of his retreat. On arriving there, the son had an interview with the father, and, after much weeping and lamentation on both sides, he offered to stand up in defence of his parent against every enemy, though it cost him his life. Qābūs perceived, however, that such a proceeding would be of no use, and feeling that he could not have a better successor than his son, he delivered the royal signet into his hands, with the request that he himself might be treated with kindness whilst he remained in the bonds of life; and it was therefore agreed on between them that he should reside in a certain castle till he reached the term of his existence. After the removal of Qābūs to the place of his detention, the son proceeded to load the troops with favours, but so apprehensive were they of the father's coming again into power that they never rested till they effected his death. He was murdered, A.H. 403 (A.C. 1012-3) and interred outside the city of Jurjān. It is said that, on his imprisonment in the castle, they refused him a cloak or any warm covering, and the extreme coldness of the weather deprived him of life—Jill, here means belonging to Jill; Jil was the brother of Daylam, and they each left descendants who were surnamed after them respectively. It is necessary to remark that this surname is quite different from that of Jill signifying native of (Jilān), the country beyond Ṭabaristān. As they have been sometimes confounded together, I think it right to warn the reader.—We have already spoken of Jurjān (No. 401), and we need not therefore repeat our observations here.

515 MUJĀHID AL-DĪN QĀ'IMĀZ AL-ZAYNĪ

Abū Maṣṣūr Qā'imāz Ibn 'Abd Allāh al-Zaynī (a freedman of Zayn al-Dīn), surnamed Mujāhid al-Dīn (champion of the faith), was a eunuch and an enfranchised slave of Zayn al-Dīn* 'Alī Ibn Baktikīn, the father of al-Malik al-Mu'azzam Muẓaffar al-Dīn, sovereign of Arbela. He was of a white complexion and a native of Ṭabaristān, whence he had been carried off when a child; and, as he gave tokens of great abilities, his patron promoted him and appointed him atābek (or tutor) to his children. On the fifth day of the month of Ramaḍān, A.H. 559 (July, A.C. 1164)†, he entrusted him with the whole management of public affairs at Arbela, and, in this office, Qā'imāz distinguished himself by the excellence of his administration and the justice with which he ruled the prince's subjects. Ever actuated by the spirit of virtue and piety, he built at Arbela a college and a (muslim) convent, on which he settled large estates (waqf). In the year 571 (A.C. 1175) he removed to Moṣul, and, having fixed his residence in the citadel, he took in hand the direction of affairs, and, in his correspondence with the neighbouring princes, he acquired more influence over them by his letters than any other had ever done before. The atābek Sayf al-Dīn Ghāzī Ibn Mawdūd (No. 496), the sovereign of Moṣul, struck with the uprightness of his conduct, confided to him the government of all his possessions and placed full reliance on him in every circumstance, so that the lieutenant in title was the sulṭān in reality. The greater part of the revenues of Arbela was delivered over to him, and he left many fair monuments of his piety at Moṣul, such as the great mosque, the college, and the (Muslim) convent which he erected outside the city, and all close to each other. He endowed the public charitable fund with numerous estates; he founded and provided for an orphan school, and he threw a new bridge across the river of Moṣul, to the great convenience of the public for whose service the old bridge was insufficient. He founded many other charitable institutions. A number of poets celebrated his

---

* The Egyptian edition inserts kunya Abū Sa'id before 'Alī.—Ed.

† 27 July.—Ed.

praises, Ḥayṣ Bayṣ amongst others (No. 241), and Sibṭ Ibn al-Ta'āwidhī; the latter, whose life will be found in this work, composed a qaṣīdah in his honour, commencing thus:

"When will he be restored to health who languishes with desire for thy presence? How can he ever recover who has been intoxicated with thy love? My heart and consolation are at war, but my eyes and tears are at peace (and inseparable)."

This poem, which is one of his best, was sent by him from Baghdād to Qā'imāz, who forwarded to him, in return, an ample pecuniary recompense and the present of a mule. When the latter arrived, he found it very much fallen away from the fatigue of the journey, and wrote these lines to his patron:

"Mujāhid al-Dīn! mayest thou be always a resource and a treasure for the indigent! Thou hast sent me a mule, but, on the way, it was metamorphosed into a goat."

Bahā al-Dīn As'ad al-Sinjārī (No. 89) composed also a poem in his honour, which is much celebrated and has been set to music. One of its passages is this:

"Beshrew my heart for a wearisome companion! it and my eyes have caused the torments which I suffer. How happy the days I spent at Rāmāh! how sweet the hours I passed at Ḥājir! they fled so quickly, that the first moments touched the last."

It was in pursuance of the amir Mujāhid al-Dīn's orders that Abū 'l-Ma'ālī Sa'd<sup>2</sup> al-Ḥazīnī composed this work, entitled Kitāb al-I'jāz fi Ḥall il-Aḥājil wa 'l-Ālghāz (the book of superiority, on the solution of enigmatical questions). He then took it to him

1. Rāmāh and Ḥājir were two romantic spots in Arabia. See No. 493 and No. 89, note.

2 The manuscripts and the printed text have here As'ad اسعد: this is an oversight of the copyists and the editor, as the poet's name was Sa'd.—See No. 242.

at Arbela and resided in the palace for some time, but feeling at length a longing desire to revisit his family al-Ḥazirah, he said :

"Who will condole with a fond parent who has but little consolation, and who now, in a distant city, sighs for his home ? In Arbela he calls on those he loves; but O, how far is al-Ḥazirah from Arbela ! "

Qā'imāz loved literature and poetry ; one of my acquaintances informed me that he frequently recited a piece of verse which contained the following passage :

"When thy sarcasms wound my heart, I support the pain with patience ; I conceal my sufferings and visit thee with a smiling countenance, as if I had heard nothing and seen nothing. "

The piece to which these verses belong is by Usāmah Ibn Munqidh (No. 81)—Of Mujāhid al-Dīn Qā'imāz we may say, in a word, that he left a wide renown. Majd al-Dīn al-Mubārak Ibn al-Aṭhīr<sup>1</sup>, the author of the Jāmi' al-Uṣūl, was employed by him as secretary, and drew up the documents which he addressed to the neighbouring princes. On the death of the atābek Sayf al-Dīn Ghāzi, his brother and successor, 'Izz al-Dīn Mas'ūd, listened to the frequent insinuations of evil-minded men and relative to the conduct of Qā'imāz, and, in the year 589 (A.C. 1193), he caused him to be arrested. Having afterwards discovered that he had been deceived, he set his prisoner at liberty and reinstated him in his former post. During the rest of his life, Qā'imāz continued in office. He died in the Castle of Moṣul on the 15th of the first Rabi'—some say the sixth—A.H. 595 (January, A.C. 1199)*. Ibn al-Mustawfi states, in his History of Arbela, that his death took place in the month of Ṣafar of that year. It was in A.H. 572 (A.C. 1176-7) that he commenced the erection of the mosque at Moṣul which bears his name.

1 His life will be found in this work.

516 QATĀDAH IBN DI'ĀMAH AL-SADŪSĪ

Abu 'l-Khaṭṭāb Qatādah Ibn Di'āmah Ibn 'Azīz Ibn 'Umar Ibn Rabi'ah Ibn 'Amr Ibn al-Ḥārith Ibn Sadūs al-Sadūsī, a native of Baṣrah and one of the Tābi'īs, was, though blind from his birth, a man of the greatest learning: "Not a day passed," said Abū 'Ubaydah (Ma'mar Ibn al-Muthannā), "without our seeing a messenger arrive from some of the Omayyide family, and stop his camel at Qatādah's door; being sent for the express purpose of questioning him on some point of history, genealogy, or poetry." The fact was that Qatādah surpassed all his contemporaries by the quantity of information which he had collected. Ma'mar said also: "I asked Abū 'Amr Ibn al-'Alā the meaning of these words of the Qur'ān مَقْرِنِينَ Maqrinīn, and as he made me no answer, I mentioned that I had heard Qatādah explain the word مَقْرِنِينَ by valentes ad; as he still remained silent, I said: 'And what is thy opinion, Abū 'Amr?' To which he replied: 'Let Qatādah's opinion always suffice thee, except when he discoursed of freewill and predestination (Qadar); had not the Prophet himself said: When qadar is spoken of, avoid the subject, I should put none of Qatādah's contemporaries on a level with him.'"—"Qatādah", said Abū 'Amr, "was the most learned genealogist of his time, and, in his youth, he met Daḡfal<sup>2</sup>. He used to go from one end of Baṣrah to the other without a guide, and, one day, he entered the mosque of Baṣrah when 'Amr Ibn 'Ubayd (No. 478) and some others had just gone apart from the circle of al-Ḥasan al-Baṣrī's auditors and formed one of their own. As they were speaking in a loud tone, he went over to them, imagining it to be al-Ḥasan's circle, but as he found, on joining them, that it was not so, he said: 'These are the seceders (al-mu'tazilah)!' and, standing up, he left them; from that time they were called the Mutazilites (seceders)". Qatādah was born A.H. 60 (A.C. 679-80), and he died at Wāsiṭ, A.H. 117 (A.C.

1 Qur'ān, sūraht 43, verse 12. These words signify. For we should not have been able to accomplish that.

2 Daḡfal Ibn Ḥanṣalah, the genealogist, belonged to the tribe of Shaybān Ibn 'Uhl. The year of his death is indicated further on. His abilities rendered his name proverbial: see Freytag's Meidini tom. I, p. 19, and tom. II, pages 162, 233 and 774.

735-6); some say, 118. Sadūsī means descended from Sadūs Ibn Shaybān, the progenitor of a great tribe which has produced many remarkable men, some of them eminent for learning.—Daghfal, the ablest of the Arabian genealogists, was the son of Ḥanzalah al-Sadūsī; he saw the Prophet, but did not hear him deliver any of his sayings. He afterwards joined Mu'āwiyah and was killed by the Azāriqah<sup>1</sup>. According to another, and a more authentic statement, he was drowned in the Dujayl at the battle of Dūlāb<sup>2</sup>.

517. QUTAYBAH IBN MUSLIM. The amīr, Qutaybah Ibn Abī Šāliḥ Muslim Ibn 'Amr<sup>3</sup> Ibn al-Ḥuşayn Ibn Rabi'ah Ibn Khālīd Ibn Asīd al-Khayr Ibn Qudā'i Ibn Hilāl Ibn Salāmah Ibn Ḥa'labah Ibn Wā'il Ibn Ma'n Ibn Mālik Ibn A'ṣar Ibn Sa'd Ibn Qays Ibn Ghaylān* Ibn Muḍar Ibn Nizār Ibn

<sup>1</sup> The heretical sect of the Azāriqah or followers of Ibn al-Azraq, a branch of the Khārījites, rejected equally the claims of 'Alī and Mu'āwiyah. Under the command of their chief and founder, Nāfi' Ibn al-Azraq, they joined 'Abd Allāh Ibn al-Zubayr at Makkah and fought in his defence, but, on discovering that he considered 'Uthmān as a rightful khalīf, they abandoned his cause and proceeded to Ba rah in A.H. 64 (A.C. 683-4), where they took the oath of allegiance to Nāfi' and established themselves at al-Ahwaz. The following year, their power increased considerably, and the people of Baṣrah, who had incurred their enmity, obtained from 'Abd Allāh Ibn al-Zubayr that a body of troops, under the orders of Muslim Ibn 'Abis عيسى, should march against them. The Azāriqah were repulsed from the territory of Ba rah and retreated to Dūlāb (دولاب) in the land of al-Ahwāz, where both parties encountered. The Azāriqah were here defeated with great loss, and Nāfi' Ibn al-Azraq fell in the battle, which was also fatal to Muslim Ibn 'Abis. As the insurgents still continued to be dangerous, Muḥalab Ibn Abi 'ufrah, an able general, marched against them by order of 'Abd Allāh Ibn al-Hārith, Governor of Ba rah. Their final subjugation was not effected till about A.H. 70 (A.C. 689).—(Abu 'l-Maḥāsīn's al-Bāḥr al-Za'ī, 'Al-Mākin's Historia Saracénica, p. 60. See also Price's Retrospect, vol. 1, page 429, 440, and 446. For their political and religious doctrines, see Dr. Cureton's Shuḥrastañi, page 98.

2 Dūlāb is spoken of in the preceding note.

3 The Qāmūs, under the root ق و ن, writes this name 'Umār; the Ṣaḥāb, under the same word, has 'Amr.

* The Egyptian edition gives 'Aylān.—Ed.

'Adnān al-Bāhili was amīr of Khurāsān in the reign of 'Abd al-Malik Ibn Marwān. He ruled this province during thirteen years, and he held his appointment from al-Ḥajjāj Ibn Yūsuf al-Thaqafī, who as governor of the two 'Irāqs and the neighbouring countries, had Khurāsān in his jurisdiction. Previously to this, Qutaybah had been governor of Ray, but, on the deposition of Yazīd Ibn al-Muhallab Ibn Abī Ṣufrah, he was appointed ruler over Khurāsān. In the life of Yazīd we shall indicate the particulars of this event. It was Qutaybah Ibn Muslim who reduced Khuwārizm, Samarqand, and Bukhāra, the inhabitants of which had broken their treaties. Clear-sightedness, interpidity, and generosity formed the leading features of his character. His father, Muslim, possessed the greatest influence at the court of Yazīd Ibn Mu'āwiyah, and was the owner of the celebrated horse al-Ḥarūn, whose qualities gave rise to a proverb<sup>1</sup>. In the year 95 (A.C. 713-4), towards the close of al-Walīd Ibn 'Abd al-Malik's reign, Qutaybah Ibn Muslim took the city of Farḡānah. Historians declare that, by his wars with the Turks, his expeditions into the heart of the regions beyond the Oxus, his taking of fortresses, his subduing of provinces, his carrying off of wealth and his slaying of brigands, Qutaybah surpassed al-Muhallab Ibn Abī Ṣufrah and every other general. As an example of his activity it may be stated that he effected the conquest of Khwārizm and Samarqand in a single year; by the capture of two such great cities<sup>2</sup>, prosperity was re-established in the country and contributions were brought in from all quarters. When Qutaybah had achieved these deeds, he sent for Nahār Ibn Tawsi'ah the favorite poet of al-Muhallab and his sons, and said to him: "What has now become of your verses on the death of al-Muhallab? You said:

---

1 This proverb I have not been able to discover.—Al-Jawharī, the author of the Ṣaḥāḥ, says that the horse Ḥarūn was celebrated for his speed, and gives his pedigree after al-Aṣmā'i, who makes him descend from Auwāj (No. 413).

2 This was in A. H. 93. Al-Ṭabarī calls the city of Khwārizm Madīnat al-Fīl (the city of the elephant).

'The expeditions which placed wealth within our reach are at an end ; generosity and beneficence have ceased with the life of al-Muhallab ! '

"Do you consider this last act of ours an expedition or not?" "Nay," said the poet, "it is something better ; I too have said : 'Never since we lived have we seen the like of Ibn Muslim ; his equal never existed before our time, and will never appear after us. With his sword he wrapt the whole Turkish nation in death, and shared the booty amongst us in donations ample and oft-repeated.' "

When al-Ḥajjāj (Ibn Yūsuf) received intelligence of Qutaybah's conquests, the number of enemies whom he slew and of prisoners whom he carried off, he said : "I sent out Qutaybah quite an inexperienced<sup>1</sup> boy, and I never gave him an inch without his giving me an ell in return." In the year 96 (A.C. 714-5) (the khalif) al-Walid died, and was succeeded by his brother Sulaymān Ibn 'Abd al-Malik, who disliked Qutaybah for reasons too long for us to relate<sup>2</sup>. The apprehensions of Qutaybah being excited by this event, he renounced his allegiance and rose in open revolt against his sovereign, but the great majority of those under his orders withheld their concurrence. Some time previously, he had deprived Waki' Ibn Ḥassān Ibn Qays of his commandment over the tribe of Tamīm<sup>3</sup>, and this Waki', who bore the surname of Abu 'l-Muṭarrif al-Ḡhudānī, now laboured underhand to seduce the troops, and kept away from Qutaybah's presence under the pretext of sickness. He then attacked him at Farghānah and slew him with eleven other persons of the family, in the month of 1 I read فاجر in place of فارس although the manuscripts and the printed text give the latter reading.

2 See Price's Retrospect. Vol. 1, page 486.

3 There were ten thousand men of the tribe of Tamīm in Qutaybah's army. The Tamīmītes remained in these provinces till al-Māmūn was proclaimed khalif ; they then accompanied him to Baḡdād, whence they were sent into North Africa, where one of their chiefs founded, a few years afterwards, the hereditary, but not independent dynasty of the Aḡhlabites.

The expedition which placed wealth within our reach are Dhu'l-Hijjah, A.H. 96 (Aug.-Sept. A.C. 715); some say, A.H. 97. Qutaybah Ibn Muslim was born in the year 49 (A.C. 669-70). Al-Salāmī<sup>1</sup> says, in his History of the governors of Khurāsān: "He ruled over Khurāsān nine years and seven months; but this is in contradiction with what is stated above. Al-Tabarī gives the year 88 as that of his nomination. Alluding to his death, Jarīr (No. 127) pronounced the following lines:

"You repented, having slain the noble son of Muslim; but, when you appear before God, you will repent still more. Thanks to his victories, you revelled in spoil; but now you are yourselves the spoil of every opponent. He has been transported to the dark-eyed maidens of Paradise, and you—Hell shall enclose you with its torments."

Muslim Ibn 'Amr, the father of Qutaybah, was slain with Mus'ab Ibn al-Zubayr, A.H. 72 (A.C. 691-2).—Abū 'Umar Sa'id Ibn Muslim, the grandson of Qutaybah, was a powerful chief, highly celebrated (by the poets). 'Abd al-Samad Ibn al-Mu'adhhdhal (No. 43) lamented his death in these lines:

"How many the orphans whom you protected in their destitution! how many the indigent whom you raised from poverty to riches! (Each of them now) exclaims, when adversity shows its fangs: 'May God's blessing be on Sa'id, the son of Muslim!'"

Sa'id governed Armenia, Mosul, Sind, Tabaristān, Sijistān and Mesopotamia; he died A.H. 217 (A.C. 832-3). The following anecdote was related by himself:

"When I was governor of Armenia, Abū Dahmān al-Ghalānī<sup>2</sup> came to see me and stayed for some days at my door (waiting for admittance). When he entered, he sat down before me, in the open space left by the other visitors who were drawn up in two lines reaching from my throne to the door<sup>3</sup>, and he then pronounced these

<sup>1</sup> See No. 282.

<sup>2</sup> The best historians place the death of Mus'ab in the year 71.

<sup>3</sup> One of my manuscripts has al-Ghalālī (الغلالی). The Arabic has بين السمتين the usatv down between the two lines (simāts).

* The Egyptian edition gives al-'Allābī.—Ed.

words! 'By Allāh ! I know people who, if they were informed that, by swallowing dust, they could straighten the curvature of their reins (i. e. raise themselves from a humble to an exalted station) would take it for nourishment through their desire of escaping from a modest station of life; but I, by Allāh, make a distant leap (i. e. have a high aim in view) and am slow in turning aside (from my purpose)'. The only thing which averts me from thee is that which repels thee from me. (i. e. I avoid thee because thou art rich and thou avoidest me because I am poor) but I prefer poverty with the favour (of God) to wealth with reprobation. And by Allāh! we (sūfis) never ask the gift of a government, but we receive it, or of wealth but we obtain more than we require. This power which is now in thy hands was once in the hands of others, and by Allāh! nothing remains of them here, but their reputation; it is good if they did good, and bad if they wrought evil. Answer them (the applications) of God's servants by receiving them with affability and granting them an easy access unto thee; for the love shown to God's servants is allied to the love due to God; and they are chosen by God to bear witness as to the conduct of his creatures and to observe those who turn away from the path of righteousness. Peace be with thee!'"<sup>4</sup> On the death of 'Umar, the son of Sa'īd Ibn Muslim, the following elegy was pro-

1. It is necessary to observe that the original Arabic of the very obscure address which follows, has been miserably altered by the copyists. I combined readings from different manuscripts in order to form a text offering some appearances of meaning, but not, I fear, with full success. The import of the discourse is rendered very difficult of comprehension by the speaker's not only affecting to employ the elliptic language and the idioms of the genuine Arabs of the desert, but giving to these terms a mystic signification.

2. For the meaning of the expression رَیْقِ الْجَوَاشِی see Schulten's Harizii consessus, 2nd part, p. 183.

3. Here the printed text, supported by the authority of all the manuscripts has رَیْقِ, but I cannot give any meaning whatever to the passage unless I replace it by نَحْوِ. The government and wealth which he here speaks of must mean spiritual gifts.

4. I can by no means give this as a correct translation of Abb. Dāhman's speech; the Arabic text may not be exempt from faults, and, if it be exactly given as our author transcribed it, I must have misunderstood at least one passage of it.

nounced by Abū 'Amr Ashja' Ibn 'Amr al-Sulamī, a celebrated poet of Raqqah who inhabited Baṣrah<sup>1</sup>.

"The son of Sa'id departed when not a spot of the East and of the West remained without some person to extol his virtues. I did not know with what profusion his hands bestowed their gifts, till the tombstone had hidden him from our sight. That man is now in a narrow cavity under ground, whose (renown) the extended plains of the earth could not contain. As long as my tears flow, I shall weep thy loss, and, if I exhaust them, let that (heart) which my bosom encloses answer for my feelings. Now, since thou art dead, I shall remain untroubled, even by the greatest afflictions, and unmoved by any joys. (We grieve for thee) as if thou hadst been the only person who ever died—the only one over whom the female mourners ever raised (the funeral cry). It now becomes (us) to lament thee in elegies, as it formerly became (us) us to praise thee in eulogiums."

This beautiful elegy is extracted from the Ḥamāsah<sup>2</sup>. The idea expressed in the last verse is similar to that contained in the following :

"O, best of those who to-day are worthiest of lamentations, and who yesterday were worthiest of praise !"

This verse is taken from a piece composed by Muṭi' Ibn Iyās Ibn Yaḥyā Ibn Ziyād, and which is given in the Ḥamāsah (page 390).—The numerous deeds of Qutaybah Ibn Muslim occupy a place in History<sup>3</sup>.—In our notice on al-Aṣma'i (No. 354), we have spoken of the word Bāhill and given its derivation. The Arabs of the desert (who were members of the tribe of Bāhilah) had an extreme repugnance to bearing this surname ; this feeling was so general that a poet said :

"It availeth a man nothing to be descended from Hāshim if he bears within him a Bāhilite soul."

1 See No. 91, note.

2 See Freytag's Hamasa, page 392.

3 Literally : The relations of his doings are numerous. See his history in Price's Retrospect, vol. I.

And another poet has pronounced that :

"If the words thou Bāhilite ! were addressed to a dog, the animal would howl from the ignominy of such an appellation."

It was observed to Abū 'Ubaydah that al-Aṣma'i claimed to be descended from Bāhilah, but he declared that could never have been the case. On being asked the reason, he replied: "Persons belonging to the tribe of Bāhilah disclaim all connexion with it ; how then is it possible that a man who did not belong to it should come forward and claim to belong to it ?" I read in a collection of anecdotes that al-Aṣḥ'aṭh Ibn Qays al-Kindī<sup>1</sup> said to the Prophet: "Are we all equally subjected to the law of talion ?" and he made answer : "Yes ; even if you slayed a man of the tribe of Bāhilah, I should slay you to avenge him." Qutaybah Ibn Muslim said to Hubayrah Ibn Masrūh<sup>2</sup> : "What a man thou wouldst be did thy maternal ancestors not belong to the tribe of Salūl<sup>3</sup> ! Suppose that I change them for others?" To this Hubayrah replied : "May God prosper the amīr ! change them for whom thou wilt of all the Arabic tribes, but spare me from Bāhilah." It is related also that an Arab of the desert met a person on the road and asked him who he was ? The other replied that he belonged to the tribe of Bāhilah. The Arab having expressed his commiseration for such a misfortune, the man said : "I must inform thee, more-

1 Al-Aṣḥ'aṭh Ibn Qays, a powerful Chieftain of the tribe of Kindah and one of the Companions of the Prophet, was the ancestor of Ya'qūb al-Kindī, the celebrated philosopher.—(See No 281, Note.)

2 Masrūh مَسْرُوح is an error of Ibn Khallikān or of his copyists ; the true reading is Mushamraj مشرج.—Hubayrah Ibn Mushamraj al-Kilābī (member of the tribe of Kilāb), was one of Qutaybah Ibn Muslim's generals, and highly distinguished for eloquence. In Price's Retrospect, vol. I, page 483, we find his name transcribed Hubayrah the Kulābite (read the Kilābite), and it occurs again repeatedly in the following page. The volume of the Annals of al-Ṭabari, in the original Arabic, preserved in the Bib. du Roi (supplement, p. 248), writes his father's name Mushamraj, and this historian cites two pieces of verse, p. 259 and p. 260, in one of which it rhymes with manhaj and maḥraj: from this we must conclude that the final letter to be j (ج) ; and moreover, the measure of both verses requires us to read in each Mushamraj, as there written, for if Masrūh be substituted, the verses cannot be scanned.

3 This tribe was also greatly despised by the Arabs.—(See Freytag's Meidanil Proverbia, t. II, p. 172).

over, that I am not sprung from that race, but am one of their slaves." The Arab immediately went over to him and kissed his hands and feet. "Why dost thou so?" exclaimed the man. The other answered: "Almighty God, blessed be his name! would not inflict on thee such a misfortune in this life, unless he intended to remunerate thee with Paradise in the next." An Arab was asked if he would consent to be a Bāhilite on the condition of entering into Paradise and he replied: "Yes, provided that the inhabitants of Paradise are not informed of my being a Bāhilite." They tell many anecdotes of this kind. Husayn Ibn Bakr al-Kilabi, the genealogist, being asked why the tribes of Bāhilah and Ghani were held in such depreciation by the Arabs, he replied: "They were once possessed of riches and honour, but what abased their reputation was, that being surpassed by their brethren of the tribes of Fazārah and Dhubyān in a rivalry of glorious deeds, their own merit appeared slight in comparison. This circumstance is stated by the wazīr Abū'l-Qāsim al-Maghribī (No. 187) in his Adab al-Khawāṣṣ.—We have spoken of Qutaybah in the life of Abd. Allāh Ibn Mūsīm. Ibn Qutaybah (No. 306),

518 QARĀQUSH

The amir Qarāqush Ibn Abd. Allāh al-Asadi, (client of Asad al-Dīn), surnamed Bahā al-Dīn (splendour of religion), was a slave to the sultān Ṣalāh al-Dīn, or, by another account, to that prince's uncle, Asad al-Dīn Shāyfkūh (No. 272), from whom he received his liberty. We have already made mention of him in the life of the juriscōnsult Tsā al-Hakkāfi (No. 49). When Ṣalāh al-Dīn established his dominion in Egypt, he confided to Qarāqush the government of the palace, and, at a later period, he nominated him his lieutenant in Egypt, and entrusted him with the entire direction of public affairs. Qarāqush was a man of lofty spirit and singularly favoured by fortune. I have read in a manuscript, which I have since consulted, offerings in place of all his proceedings. It was he who built the wall which encloses Old and New Cairo with the intervening grounds; he built also the Qal'ah al-Jabal<sup>1</sup> and the bridges at Jizah on the road leading to the Pyramids. All those monuments are proofs of an exalted mind. He erected a ribā, or convent, at al-Maqs, and the Khān Sabil<sup>2</sup> outside Old Cairo, at (the gate called) Bāb al-Futūh. He founded besides a great number of Waqfs (No. 20, note), producing revenues to an unknown amount. In all his intentions and proceedings he was actuated by the purest motives. When the sultān Ṣalāḥ al-Dīn took Acre from the Franks (A.H. 583, A.C. 1187-8), he gave (the command of) the city to Qarāqūsh, who, when the enemy returned and obtained possession of it a second time, remained a prisoner in their hands. It is stated that he paid ten thousand dinārs for his ransom. Our shaykh, the qādī Bahā al-Dīn Ibn Shaddād says, in his History of Ṣalāḥ al-Dīn<sup>3</sup>, that Qarāqūsh was delivered from captivity on Tuesday, the 11th of Shawwāl, A.H. 588 (October, A.C. 1192)*, and came to pay his respects to the sultān; this prince manifested an extreme joy on again seeing a person to whom he, Islamism, and the Muslims were so deeply indebted. Qarāqūsh then asked and obtained permission to go and procure money for his ransom, which was stated to be thirty thousand pieces (of gold). A number of extraordinary decisions are attributed to Qarāqūsh, as having been pronounced by him during his administration; nay, things have gone so far that al-As'ad Ibn Mammātī (No. 88) composed a small volume under the title of Kitāb al-Fashūsh fi Ahkām Qarāqūsh (stupidity, or the decisions, of Qarāqūsh), and containing things which it is highly improbable that such a man as Qarāqūsh could have said or done. They are manifestly mere inventions.

The Qal'ah-Jabal, or Castle of the Mountain, forms the citadel of Cairo. See the description of it in M. de Sacy's Abdullatif, page 208, note (4), and, in the first-line of the same note, read قلعة الجبل in place of قصر الشمع.

2 The Khān Sabil was a caravan serai built by Qarāqūsh for the gratuitous reception of travellers, liabud is Sabli (wa al-Khamsa firin). (Al-Maqrizī's Khitat.)

3 See Schulten's Saladini vita et res gesta, p. 267.

4 Ibn Shaddād, loco laudato, has eighty thousand.

* 23 October.—Ed.

for Ṣalāḥ al-Dīn would not have confided to him the affairs of the empire unless he had an entire confidence in his knowledge and abilities<sup>1</sup>. Qarāqūsh died at Cairo, on the 1st of Rajab, A.H. 597 (April, A.C. 1201)* and was interred at the foot of Mount Muqaṭṭam, in the funeral chapel which bears his name. This monument is situated near the well and pond which he had caused to be made at the border of the trench (which surrounds the city)—Qarāqūsh is the Turkish name of the bird called 'uqāb (eagle) in Arabic<sup>2</sup>; it is employed also as a proper name of a man.

519 QAṬARĪ IBN AL-FUJĀ'AH

Abū Na'āmah Qaṭarī Ibn al-Fujā'ah Ja'ūnah Ibn Māzin Ibn Yazīd Ibn Zayd Manāt Ibn Ḥanṭhar Ibn Kinānah Ibn Ḥurfūṣ† Ibn Māzin Ibn Mālik Ibn 'Amr Ibn Tamīm Ibn Murr al-Māzini al-Khārijī (the Khārijite) commenced his revolt when Muṣ'ab Ibn al-Zubayr was governing 'Irāq as lieutenant of his brother 'Abd Allāh Ibn al-Zubayr. Muṣ'ab was appointed to this post, A.H. 66 (A.C. 685-6), and Qaṭarī continued, during twenty years, to wage war and to be saluted, by the title of khalīf. Al-Ḥajjāj Ibn Yūsuf al-Thaqafī sent army after army against him, but they were always defeated. It is related that, in one of his battles, he rode forth from the ranks on a lean horse, with a cudgel in his hand, and challenged the opposite party to send out a man to fight him. One of them sallied forth to encounter him, but immediately fled when Qaṭarī removed the covering off his face to let him see who he was. "Where art thou going?" exclaimed Qaṭarī. "No man need be ashamed of flying from thee," answered his adversary. Abu 'l-'Abbās al-Mubarrad has a long section in his Kāmil on the his-

1 See M. de Sacy's Abdallatif, page 206.

2 Not precisely ; qarāqūsh signifies literally, niger avis.

* 7 April.—Ed.

† The Cairo edition gives Ḥurqūs.—Ed.

tory and wars of these Khārijites. Qaṭarī held his career without interruption till Sufyān. Ibn al-Abrad al-Kalbī marched against him, defeated and slew him in the year 78 (A.C. 697-8). He fell by the hand of Sawdah Ibn Abḥar al-Dārimī. Some say that he lost his life in Ṭabaristān, A.H. 79, and others state that he died in consequence of his having broken his thigh by his horse falling with him. His head was cut off and sent to al-Ḥajjāj. I must here notice a statement of historians which I am unable to explain; according to them, Qaṭarī waged war and bore the title of khalif for the space of twenty years, yet this is contradicted by the dates of his first revolt and of his death. This is a point to which I call the attention of the reader. Qaṭarī left no posterity. His father was called Fujā'ah because he had gone to Yaman and returned to his family quite unexpectedly (fujā'ah). They then gave him this surname, and it stuck to him ever after. It is Qaṭarī to whom al-Ḥarīrī alludes in the following passage of his sixth Maqāmah. "And they entrusted him with the management of this business, as the Khārijites entrusted (theirs) to Abū Na'āmah<sup>1</sup>." "He was a man of courage and daring, noted for his frequent wars and numerous battles, his intrepidity and contempt of death. On this last subject he composed the following lines :

"I said to myself when I wavered at the sight of warriors : 'Shame upon thee ! fear not ! wert thou to ask the delay of a single day above the term prescribed to thy existence, thy request would not be heard ; be firm then in the career of death ! be firm ! to obtain an everlasting life is a thing impossible. The robe of existence is not so precious that the heartless dastard should fold it up (to preserve it). The path of death must be trod by every mortal; the inhabitants of the earth must all listen to his summons. He who dies not young must live in suffering and fall into decrepitude, whilst fate delivers him over to solitary misery. Life is of no use to a man when he has become an object of contempt<sup>2</sup>."

1 See M. de Sacy's Ḥarīrī, page 57.

2 Literally, in French : Qui est compte pour une marchandise de rebut.

These verses are inserted in the first section of the Hamāsah<sup>1</sup>; they would give courage to the greatest coward. God ever created, and I know of nothing on the subject to be compared with them; they could only have proceeded from a haughty spirit, ardently aspiring after glory. Qafārī is counted as one of the Arabian pulpit-orators the most celebrated for precision of thought and elegance of style.—It is related that al-Hajjaj said to the brother of Qafārī: "I shall surely put thee to death."—"Why so?" replied the other "On account of thy brother's revolt;" answered al-Hajjaj. "But I have a letter from the Commander of the Faithful, ordering thee not to punish for the fault of my brother."—"Produce it." "I have with me something stronger than that."—"What is it?" "The book of Almighty God, wherein he says: And no burdened soul shall bear the burden of another<sup>2</sup>." Al-Hajjaj was struck with his answer, and gave him his liberty. Husayn Ibn Ḥafṣah al-Saḍī said of Qafārī in one of his poems:

"Thou art he whose loss we cannot support; though useless thy life, thy death was a calamity."

I have marked the pronunciation of the names of his ancestors; it is, therefore, unnecessary for me to lengthen this article by indicating the orthography of each, letter by letter; and the persons who copy this work may rely on the genuineness of what we have there marked; I have also put the vowel points to all the words in the verses.—It is said by some that Qafārī was not his name, but a surname, and that it is derived from the name of a town situated between al-Bahrayn and Umān; Abu Na'āmah, being a native of it, received this appellation. Some say also that it is the qaṣabah of Umān; the word Qasabah means the capital of a province (lit. the throne of region); see Hamāsah, page 144. See Qur'ān, Isrāh (verse 164).

3 The copyists have all neglected to insert the vowel and orthographical signs.

4 The author of the Mārāsīd notices a village called Qafār on the sea-shore in the province of al-Bahrayn, between Umān and al-Uqayr.

520. KĀFÜR AL-IKHSHIDI

Abu 'l-Misk (the father of) misk Kāfūr (camphor)<sup>1</sup> was the son of Abd Allāh and bore the surname of al-Ikhshidī (enfranchised slave of al-Ikhshidī). We have already mentioned some circumstances respecting him in the life of Fātik (No. 499). He had been possessed as a slave by a native of Old Cairo, but, in the year 312 (A.C. 924-5), he was sold in that city by his master Maḥmūd Ibn Wāḥb Ibn 'Abbās to Abū Bakr Muḥammad Ibn Tughj al-Ikhshid, a person whose life we intend to give. He then rose into such favour with al-Ikhshid that the latter appointed him atabek (guardian)<sup>2</sup> of his two sons. When al-Ikhshid died (A.H. 334, A.C. 946) his eldest son, Abū 'l-Qāsim Anūjūr (the word anūjūr signifies maḥmūd, praised in Arabic), obtained the government of Egypt and Syria from the khalif al-Rādī<sup>3</sup>, who issued a written instrument to that effect. Kāfūr continued to administer the state with great ability till the death of Anūjūr. This event took place on Saturday, the 18th—some say the seventh—of Dhū'l-Qa'dah, A.H. 349 Dec. (A.C. 960)*; his body was transported to Jerusalem and interred near that of his father; he was born at Damascus on Thursday, the 9th of Dhū'l-Hijjah A.H. 319 (December, A.C. 931)†. His brother Abū 'l-Ḥasan 'Alī succeeded to the throne; in this prince's reign the Greeks took Aleppo, Miṣṣiṣah Tarsūs, and all that territory, whilst Kāfūr continued to act as his faithful guardian and the deputy of his power. 'Alī died on the 11th of Muharram, A.H. 355 (January, A.C. 966)‡; he was born at Old Cairo on Tuesday, the 25th of Ṣafar, A.H. 326 (January, A.C. 938)§. From this epoch, Kāfūr assumed the 1 This name was given by him by antiphrasis: Camphor is white and he was a negro.

2 See No. 137.

3 This is an anachronism, al-Rādī died five years before. We must read al-Mutī, with Abū 'l-Mahasin, who says, in his Nujūm, that al-Ikhshid's nomination of Anūjūr as his successor was confirmed by the Khalif al-Mutī.

* 29 December.—Ed.

† 22 December.—Ed.

‡ 7 January.—Ed.

§ 2 January.—Ed.

uncontrolled government of the empire, and, when advised to proclaim the son of Abu 'l-Ḥasan 'Alī, he answered that so young a boy was not fit to reign. He then rode out escorted by spearmen, and exhibited the pelisses of investiture which had been sent to him from (the court of the Khalif in) 'Irāq; he published also a document conferring on him an honorary title (as governor of Egypt), and at length, on Tuesday, the 10th of Ṣafar, A.H. 355 (February, A.C. 966)*, he rode out wearing these pelisses. Abu 'l-Faḍl Ja'far Ibn al-Furāt (No. 130) served him in the capacity of Wazīr. Kāfūr loved the society of virtuous men, and treated them with marked honour. He was a negro of a deep black colour, with a smooth shining skin. It has been delivered down that al-Ikhshīd purchased him for eighteen pieces of gold (dīnārs). In the life of the sharīf Ibn Tabāṭabā (No. 317) will be found an anecdote respecting him. When Abu 'l-Tayyib al-Mutanabbī (No. 49) departed in anger from the court of Sayf al-Dawlah Ibn Ḥamdān (No. 456), he proceeded to Egypt, and celebrated the praises of Kāfūr in some qaṣīdahs of great beauty. In the month of the latter Jumādā, A.H. 346 (Sept. A.C. 957) he recited to him one of these pieces wherein he says, when describing the horses (which bore him to Egypt):

"They went to Kāfūr and neglected all other men; for he who seeks the sea, despiseth the rivulets. They bore us to the (dark) pupil of the eye of the age, and left behind them the white (of the eye) and its corners<sup>1</sup>."

Here the poet has attained the acme of perfection. In the month of Shawwāl, 347 (Dec.-Jan., A.C. 958-9), he recited to Kāfūr the poem rhyming in b, wherein he says:

"Whether I wish or not to praise Kāfūr, his noble qualities dictate to me and I must write. When a man leaves his family behind and visits Kāfūr, he again finds himself at home."

1 The commentators say, on this verse, that the poet, alluding to Kāfūr's dark complexion and to his merit, represents him as the most noble object upon earth, the pupil of the eye of the age; and that, for the worthlessness of other men, he designates them as the white and the corners of the eye, in which parts the sense of sight does not exist.

* 6 February.—Ed.

The same poem contains the following passage :

"On that day of rejoicing every man meets his friend with smiles, but I weep and lament (the absence of) those I love. I sigh for my family and long to meet them, but how far is that distant 'anqā' removed from my ardent wishes. If a choice must be made between (thee) Abu 'l-Misk and them, thou art sweeter to my heart than they are. The beneficent man is ever beloved, and the land which produces the plant of noble generosity is ever delightful."

It is related that al-Mutanabbī said : "When I went into Kāfūr's presence with the intention of reciting verses to him, he always laughed on seeing me and smiled in my face, but when I repeated to him these lines :

"Since friendship has become a mere deception, I am repaid for my smiles with smiles ; and when I choose a friend, my mind misgives me, for I know he is but a man !"

He never did so again, as long I remained with him. I was astonished at this proof of his sagacity and intelligence." In the month of Shawwāl, A.H. 349 (Nov.-Dec., A.C. 960), al-Mutanabbī recited verses in his presence for the last time, and never went to see him again. The qaṣīdah which he repeated to him on this occasion rhymes in b, and contains some passages in which the poet betrays his dissatisfaction. We extract from it the following passage :

"When near to thee, my eyes are rejoiced, but that nearness is combined with the remoteness (of those I love). Does it profit me to approach thy person, if that which I desire be refused me? I visit thee seldom, that I may not be burdensome; and I keep silent to spare thee the trouble of a reply. What I want I declare not; thou art fted with sagacity, and my silence is a sufficient explanation, nay, a plain request. But yet I am not one of those who require to be bribed into love, and whose attachment must be strengthened by rewards. I came to confound my calumniators, and my confidence in thy friendship was fully justified; I came to prove to persons who were hostile to me and went to (praise the princes of the) East, that I, who visited the West, was successful when they failed. Opinions differ, except respecting thee, thou art without a rival, and a lion where other kings are mere wolves. Nay, in this comparison, if the word wolves (ذباب) were not pointed and the reader took it for flies (ذباب), he would make no mistake. Praise bestowed on other men is falsehood mixed with truth; but that which thou receivest is truth pure from alloy. When I obtain proofs of thy friendship, I contemn wealth and look on all other men as dust. Were it not for thee, I had been always a traveller, every day changing town and companions. For me, thou art the world; to that world I am attached; and, were I to leave thee, I should be obliged to return to thee again."

---

1 This is an allusion to an old Arabian proverb : Mora difficile to find the 'Anqā. The 'Anqā was an enormous bird which carried off two children, on which Ḥan'alah Ibn Ṣafwān, a prophet of that time, invoked God against it, and it never appeared after. The commentator on al-Mutanabbī, who furnishes this information, says that the word مغرب in the expression عناء مغرب may be made to agree with عناء as an adjective agrees with a substantive ; but I have generally found it governed by it in the genitive as one noun governs another.—See M. de Sacy's commentary on al-Harīrī, page 594. Mr. Lane speaks of the 'Anqā in his translation of the Thousand and one Nights, Vol. III, page 91.

After reciting this poem, al-Mutanabbi remained a year in Egypt without going to see Kāfūr, against whom he was greatly incensed; he merely rode out in his train to avoid incurring his displeasure.

Having then made secret preparations for his departure, and every thing being arranged, he recited, on the ninth of Dhu'l Hijjah, A.H. 350 (January, A.C. 962)*, the qasidah rhyming in d wherein he satirized Kāfūr. The next day he left Cairo. This poem ends with the following lines:

Who could teach noble sentiments to this castrated negro?
his white masters? or his ancestors who were hunted like wild beasts? or his ear, bleeding under the hands of the coppersmith?

The coppersmith put a brass ring in his ear to show that he was a slave.

* 19 January.—Ed.

or the price set upon him, when none would give two oboles to purchase him? But so it is! the best of the whites are incapable of honourable deeds; how then could any be expected from black eunuchs?"

He composed many more satires against Kāfūr, all of which are inserted in the collection of his poems. On leaving him he went to 'Aḍud al-Dawlah, at Shīrāz, as we have already related. In a compilation of anecdotes, I read the following relation: "I was at the court of Kāfūr al-Ikhshīdī, when a man came in and prayed for him, saying: 'May God prolong the days of our master!' but the word days he pronounced as if it were in the genitive case. Some of the company began to converse about this mistake and blamed the man for making it, when a person of eminent rank, who happened to be present, repeated extempore these lines:

'Wonder not if the man who invokes God's blessing on our master commit a fault of grammar, or that, struck with confusion, he falter and stammer. For the awe which the prince's aspect inspires is so great, that it renders the man of education embarrassed in his speech. If it be a fault to put days in the genitive instead of the accusative, it was not committed through heedlessness; he thus offered a good omen to our master; and the belief in omens has been transmitted to us from (Muḥammad) the chief of the human race. He meant to pray that the prince's days should be days of enjoyment, not days of affliction, and that his life should be free from trouble!.'"

The author of these lines was the philologist and historian Abū Ishāq Ibrāhīm Ibn 'Abd Allāh Ibn Muḥammad Ibn Hashīsh al-Jīzī, one of Kāfūr's *kātib*s, and the person who prayed for Kāfūr and made the blunder was Abu 'l-Faḍl Ibn Shabās. The anecdotes told of Kāfūr are very numerous: having obtained possession of the sovereign authority after a series of occurrences too long to relate, he continued to hold it till his death. This event took place at Old Cairo, on Tuesday, the 20th of the first Jumādā, A.H. 356 (May, A.C. 957)*; but some say that he died on a Wednesday, and others place his death in the year 355 or 357; this last is the date given by al-Qūḍā'ī in his work, the Khīṭaṭ, and al-Farghānī<sup>1</sup> indicates the same date in his History. Kāfūr was interred in the Lesser Qarāfah, and his tomb is a well-known object in that cemetery. His reign did not continue long, as may be perceived, since it commenced on the death of 'Alī Ibn al-Ikhshīd. His dominion extended not only over Egypt, but Syria also, and public prayers were offered up for him as sovereign from the pulpits of Makkah, Hijaz, Egypt, and the cities of Syria, including Damascus, Aleppo, Antioch, Ṭarsūs, and al-Miṣṣ-ṣah. According to al-Farghānī, in his History, he died at the age of sixty-five years. Kāfūr ruled with justness and mildness; on his death, contestations arose respecting the choice of a successor, but it was at length unanimously decided that the son of Abu 'l-Ḥasan 'Alī Ibn al-Ikhshīd should be raised to the throne. Kāfūr reigned two years, two months, and twenty-three days. On Firday, the 23rd of the first Jumādā, A.H. 357 (April, A.C. 968)*; public prayers were offered up for Abu 'l-Fawāris Aḥmad Ibn 'Alī Ibn al-Ikhshīd. The history of these princes will be given in the life of their grandfather, Muḥammad al-Ikhshīd.

---

1 The word خَفَضَ is not only the technical term designating the genitive case, but it signifies also wealth, ease. The word نَسَبَ which, as a technical term, denotes the accusative case, signifies also pain, affliction.

521 KUTHAYYIR THE LOVER OF 'AZZAH

Abū Ṣakhr Kuthayyir Ibn 'Abd al-Raḥmān Ibn Abī Jum'ah al-Aswad Ibn 'Āmir Ibn 'Uwaymir al-Khuḏā'ī was one of the most celebrated Arabian lovers. Ibn al-Kalbī gives his genealogy as follows, in the Jamharat al-Nisab: "Kuthayyir Ibn Abd al-Raḥmān Ibn al-Aswad Ibn 'Uwaymir Ibn Makhlād Ibn Sa'īd† Ibn Khath-'amah Ibn Sa'd Ibn Maliḥ Ibn 'Amr Ibn Rabi'ah Ibn Ḥārithah

<sup>1</sup> See No. 70 and 125, note.

* Tuesday fell on 17 Jumādā al-Awwal corresponding to 30 April.—Ed.

† The Cairo edition adds, Ibn Sabī'.—Ed.

Ibn 'Amr Ibn Muzayqiyā Ibn 'Āmir Mā al-Samā Ibn Ḥārithah Imra al-Qays Ibn Ḥa'labah Ibn Māzin Ibn al-Azd." The remainder of this genealogy is well known<sup>1</sup>. "The Rabī'ah Ibn Ḥārithah mentioned in this list is the same person as Luḥayyi and it was 'Amr, the son of this Luḥayyi whom the blessed Prophet saw dragging his own entrails in hell. 'Amr Ibn Luḥayyi was the first who introduced the custom of making camels sā'ibahs, and *baḥīrah*s<sup>2</sup>, who altered the religion of Abraham, and called on the Arabs to worship idols. Luḥayyi and Afṣā, the sons of Ḥārithah, were the persons denominated Khuzā'ah, and, from them, the tribe bearing this name drew its descent. They were called Khuzā'ah (segment) because they separated from the tribe of Azd, when it left Yaman at the epoch of the Torrent of the Dike (Sayl al-Aram)<sup>3</sup>; they then settled at Makkah, and the rest of their people proceeded to Madinah, Syria, and 'Umān." A little before this, Ibn al-Kalbī says: "Al-Aṣḥyam, the same person as Abū Jum'ah, was the son of Khālīd Ibn 'Ubayd Ibn Mubashshir Ibn Rabāḥ, and father of the mother of Kuṭhayyir, the lover of 'Azzāh; for this reason, Kuṭhayyir was called the grandson of Abū Jum'ah. His mistress, 'Azzah was the daughter of Jamil Ibn Ḥaṣṣ Ibn Ayyās Ibn 'Abd al-'Uzzā Ibn Ḥājib Ibn 'Arār* Ibn Mālik Ibn Ḍamrah Ibn Bakr Ibn Abd Manāf† Ibn Kinānah Ibn Khuzaymah Ibn Mudrikah Ibn al-Yās Ibn Muḍar Ibn Nizār Ibn Ma'add Ibn 'Adnān." It is stated, however, by al-Sam'ānī, that Jamil was the son of Waqqāṣ Ibn Ḥaṣṣ Ibn Ayyās. The anecdotes told of Kuṭhayyir's affection for 'Azzah and of his interviews with her are numerous and well-known. The greater part of his poems were composed in her praise. Although a Rāfiḍī<sup>4</sup> and ardently devoted to the cause of the family of Abū 'Iṣṭalib, he used to go to the court of (the Umayyad khalif) 'Abd al-Malik Ibn Marwān, and recite

1 See Eichhorn's Monumenta, tab. XIII.

2 See Pococke's Specimen Hist. Ar., pp. 97. 319 et seq.

3 See M. de Sacy's Memoire sur divers evenements de l'histoire des Arabes avant Mahomet in the Memoires de l'Academie des Inscriptions to Belles-lettres, tom. 47.

4 See No. 63, Note.

* The Cairo edition has Ghafār.—Ed.

† The Cairo edition has Manāt.—Ed.

poems in his presence : Ibn Qutaybah relates, in his Ṭabaqāt al-Shu'arā (No. 305), that Kuṭhayyir went one day into the presence of 'Abd al-Malik, and this prince said to him : "I conjure thee by the rights of 'Alī Ibn Abī Ṭālib to inform me if thou ever sawest a truer lover than thyself." To this Kuṭhayyir replied : "Commander of the Faithful ! conjure me by your own rights, and I shall answer you". "Well," said the prince, "I conjure thee by my own rights ; wilt thou not tell it to me now?" "Certainly," said Kuṭhayyir ; "I will. As I was travelling in a certain desert, I beheld a man who had just pitched his toils to catch game, and I said to him : 'Why art thou sitting here ?' And he replied : 'I and my people are dying with hunger, and I have pitched these toils that I may catch something which may sustain our lives till tomorrow.' 'Tell me,' said I, 'if I remain with thee and if thou takest any game, wilt thou give me a share?' He answered that he would, and whilst we were waiting, behold, a gazelle got into the net. We both rushed forward, but he outran me, and having disentangled the animal, he let it go. 'What', said I, 'could have induced thee to do so, ?' He replied : 'On seeing her so like (my beloved) Laylā (in the eyes), I was touched with pity.' He then repeated these verses :

'Timid animal, so like to Laylā, fear not ! today, I am thy friend. When I delivered it from the toils, I exclaimed : 'As long as I live, thou shalt go free for Laylā's sake.' "

When 'Abd al-Malik resolved on marching out to combat Muṣ'ab Ibn al-Zubayr, his wife 'Ātikah, the daughter of Yazīd Ibn Mu'āwiyah, implored him not to go forth in person, but to send some one in his place. The more she pressed him, the more resolutely he refused, and when she found her entreaties unavailing, she burst into tears. On this, all the female slaves and attendants who surrounded her uttered loud lamentations, and 'Abd al-Malik exclaimed : "Damn that fellow, Ibn Abī Jum'ah !" meaning Kuṭhayyir, "one would think that he had witnessed this scene when he said :

"When he resolved on going forth to fight, the noble lady bedecked with necklaces of pearls could not turn him from his purpose. She forbade him, and finding that her prohibitions withheld him not, she burst into tears, on which her attendants wept in sympathy for her affliction.' "

He then insisted on her ceasing to weep, and she obeyed ; after which he set out as he had intended. It is said that 'Azzah went one day to see Umm al-Banīn, who was the daughter of 'Abd al-'Azīz, the sister of 'Umar Ibn 'Abd al-'Azīz, and the wife of al-Walīd Ibn 'Abd al-Malik. This princess asked her what was the nature of the debt to which Kuthayyir alluded in the verse where he says :

'Every other debtor pays, and his creditor is satisfied ; but 'Azzāh's creditor is put off, and remains afflicted.'

To this question 'Azzah replied that she promised him a kiss, but refused to keep her word. Umm al-Banīn then said : "Fulfil thy promise, and let the sin of the deed be upon me." "Kuthayyir had a slave-boy who kept a grocer's shop (for his master) at Madīnah, and the Arab women sometimes bought from him on credit. He once sold perfumes to 'Azzah, whom he did not then know, and he remained some days without being paid. She at length came back to the shop with some other woman, and he asked her for payment. "O," said she, "I am quite willing ; it shall be done very, very soon." On this he repeated these words :

'Every other debtor pays, and his creditor is satisfied ; but 'Azzah's creditor is put off, and remains afflicted.'

On this, the other woman asked him if he knew the name of his debtor, and, as he answered that he did not, they exclaimed : "By Allāh ! it is 'Azzah herself." On hearing these words, he said to them : "I take you to witness that I declare her liberated from what she may owe me." He then went to his master, and, having told him what had passed, Kuthayyir replied : "I take God to witness that thou art free for His sake ; and I give thee the shop with all its contents." The coincidence was certainly singular. Kuthayyir composed a great number of pieces on 'Azzah's deferring the fulfilment of her promise ; in one of these, he says :

'Charming 'Azzah! you defer the payment of thy debt ; and, surely, the worst of maidens are those who defer. To this she replied: 'Silly man! how can I pay a creditor from whom I never received money.'"

In another piece he says:

"She pretends that I am changed since our last separation; but who, O 'Azzah! does not undergo a change? My body is changed, but my soul remains as thou hast known it, and nothing (in me) has ever betrayed the secret of our love."

When Yazid Ibn al-Muhallab Ibn Abī Şufrah was slain with a number of his family at 'Aqr Bābī, as we shall relate in his life, the news of this event reached Kuthayyir, who had been always treated by them with great kindness; on which he shed a flood of tears, and exclaimed: "What awful calamities! the sons of Ḥarb destroyed religion on the day of al-Ṭaff<sup>1</sup>, and the sons of Marwān destroyed generosity on the day of al-'Aqr<sup>2</sup>!" Abu 'l-Faraj al-Işbahānī (No. 415), the author of the Kitāb al-Aghānī, relates as follows: "Kuthayyir was coming out from 'Abd al-Malik Ibn Marwān's, dressed in a gown of flowered silk, when an old woman, who was carrying home some fire in a lump of dried horse-dung, met him in the street. He expressed his disgust so openly that she asked him his name. He replied: Kuthayyir, the lover of 'Azzah. 'Are not you,' said she, 'the person who said:

'A blooming meadow, on a fertile soil, whose shrubs<sup>3</sup> overflow with sap, spreads not a sweeter perfume than the sleeves of

1 Al-Zamakḥṣharī says in his geographical dictionary that the word al-Ṭaff is employed to designate those high lands of Arabia which overlook the cultivated country of 'Irāq. The author of the Marāşid applies this denomination to the open country of Kūfah, on the road leading to the desert, and he adds that al-'ūsayn was slain there. It is therefore the name of the territory in which Karbalā is situated; and Kuthayyir most certainly alludes here to the murder of al-'ūsayn, the grandson of Muḥammad, and of his followers by the troops of the Umayyad Khalīf, Yazid, the grandson of Abū Sufyān, and great-grandson of Ṣaḥḥr.

2 The verb ضجرب signifies to expose to the sun, to wither, to injure. By the sons of Marwān he means the Umayyide princes.

3 The original has; whose jaḥjāth and whose 'Adhār exude sap. Those plants are unknown to me.

'Azzah at the midnight hour, when she places green aloes-wood on her fire.' " Kuthayyir replied that he was, and she said: "Were green aloes-wood placed on this lump of dung, it would give out a sweet perfume also. Why did you not say, like Imra 'l-Qays :

'Did you not observe that, every night on which I went to visit her, I found her smell of perfumes, and yet she uses them not!?' "

He immediately gave her the gown he wore, and implored her to conceal his blunder. At the time of my literary studies, I heard a teacher of the belles-lettres say that the latter part of the second verse composed by Kuthayyir referred to the meadow and served to complete the description of it; it was therefore as if the poet had said, that this meadow, whose soil is so fertile, and whose shrubs overflow with sap, smells not sweeter (when green aloes-wood is burned on its fire)<sup>2</sup>, than do the sleeves of 'Azzah. If the verse be explained in this manner, the objection falls to the ground; but it appears very improbable that such could have been the poet's meaning. Kuthayyir was noted for his thoughtlessness. It is related that he went one day into the presence of Yazid Ibn 'Abd al-Malik and said: "Commander of the faithful! what did al-ḡammākh<sup>3</sup> mean by these words :

إذا لا رطى توسدا برديه—خذ ود جوارى بالرمل عین

The khalif answered: "And what harm can it do me if I know not what that boorish Arab of the desert meant to say? turn this fool out!" When 'Abd al-'Aziz Ibn Marwān, the father of (the Khalif) 'Umar Ibn 'Abd al-'Aziz, was governor of Egypt, he had an attack of sickness, and his family wished to amuse him

1 See my Dīwan d'Amro 'l-Kais, page 37.

2 I insert here a passage absolutely necessary for the sense, although omitted in all my MSS.

3 See No. 499.

4 The verse is certainly difficult, and it is surprising that the khalif was unable to understand it. Its meaning appears to me to be this: "When the cheeks of large-eyed maidens in the desert are pillowed at morning and at evening under the shade of the arḡḍ-tree..."

and make him laugh. Kuthayyir (therefore) went to visit him, and pronounced these words as he stood at his bed-side: "Were it not that your pleasure would be incomplete in case that I got sick in order to restore you to health, I should implore the Lord God to pass your sickness over to me. I shall, however, pray him to grant thee health and me a life of enjoyment under thy protection." This made 'Abd al-'Aziz laugh, and Kuthayyir repeated these verses:

"We visit the sick-bed of our prince, the prince of all mankind; O that his sufferings could be transferred to his visitors! If his health could be redeemed at any price, I should sacrifice for it the most precious of my possessions.

One of Kuthayyir's most admired qasīdahs is that rhyming in t, wherein he says:

"In my wild passion for 'Azzah, after our mutual affection had cooled, I resembled the man who at noon waits for the coming of a cloud, but, when he lies down to sleep under its shade, it disappears."

Kuthayyir was in Egypt and 'Azzah in Madinah, when he conceived an anxious wish to see her. He therefore set out to visit her, and, as she was then travelling towards Egypt, they met on the road. A conversation, too long to relate, passed between them, and she then left him pursue her journey. Some time after, Kuthayyir returned to Egypt and went to see her, but found the people coming home from her funeral. He immediately proceeded to the grave, and, making his camel kneel down, remained there for some time, and then departed, reciting a piece of verse in which were the following lines:

"I exclaimed, when my emaciated camel stopped at her tomb, and my eyes overflowed with tears: 'Receive the salutation of meeting! when thou wert alive, I used to weep on leaving thee, but now, alas! thou art farther from me than ever!'"

The stories told of him and 'Azzah are very numerous. He died A.H. 105 (A.C. 723-4). Muḥammad Ibn Sa'd al-Wāqidi relates that Khālīd Ibn al-Qāsim al-Bayāḍī said: "Kuthayyir and

'Ikrimah, the mawlā of Ibn 'Abbās, died on the same day, in the year 105. I was present at the funeral prayer; it was said over them both together, in the afternoon, and the people declared that they had lost the ablest jurisconsult and the best poet in the world. They died at Madīnah." We have already noticed, in the life of 'Ikrimah (No. 396), the conflicting statements relative to the date of the latter's death; to that article we refer therefore to the reader. The meaning of the word Khuzā'i has been already explained (in this article). Kuthayyir is the diminutive form of the adjective kathīr (great); he received this name on account of his extremely diminutive size. He was so short that, when he went to visit 'Abd al-'Azīz Ibn Marwān, that prince used to banter him and say: "Stoop your head, lest you hurt it against the ceiling. He was also called Rabb al-Dhubāb (the king of the flies), for the same reason. One of his contemporaries said: "I saw him making the circuits round the Ka'bah; and if any one tell you that his stature exceeded three spans, that person is a liar."

522 KŪKUBRĪ

Abū Sa'īd Kūkuburī Ibn Abi 'l Ḥasan 'Alī Ibn Baktikīn Ibn Muḥammad, surnamed al-Malik al-Mu'azzam (the exalted prince) Muẓẓafar al-Dīn (the triumphant in religion), and lord of Arbela, was the son of Zayn al-Dīn (ornament of religion), 'Alī, surnamed Kūchak, who was blessed by Providence with a great number of other children. Zayn al-Dīn, being low in stature, received the appellation of Kūchak, a Persian word, which means little<sup>1</sup>. He was by race a Turcoman. Having obtained possession of Arbela and many other cities in the same territory, he distributed them among the sons of the atābak Qutb al-Dīn Mawdūd<sup>2</sup>, the son of Zinkī and lord of Moṣul, reserving for himself Arbela only. The history of these transactions would lead us too far. He lived to an advanced age, some say upwards of a hundred years, and he lost his sight towards the close of his life. (Zayn al-Dīn having

1 This word is written کوچک in the Persian.

2 The life of Mawdūd will be found in this work.

distributed his estates,) remained ever afterwards at Arbela, and he died there on the eve of Sunday, the 11th of Dhu'l-Qa'dah, A.H. 563 (August, A.C. 1168). * Ibn Shaddād says, in his life of Ṣalāḥ al-Dīn<sup>1</sup>, that his death occurred in the month of Dhu 'l-Hijjah of that year. He was interred in the sepulchral chapel which bears his name and is situated within the city-walls, near the Old Mosque. His great courage and strength rendered him particularly conspicuous. A number of colleges and other remarkable establishments for pious purposes were founded and endowed by him at Moṣul. My master 'Izz al-Dīn Ibn al-Athīr the ḥāfiẓ (see No. 435) says, in his lesser historical work, composed by him at the desire of the Banū Atābak, sovereign of Moṣul: "Zayn al-Dīn departed from Moṣul for Arbela in the year 563, and delivered all the cities and fortresses which he possessed into the hands of the atābak Qutb al-Dīn. Amongst them were Sinjār, Ḥarrān, Qal'at 'Aqr al-Ḥumaydiyah<sup>2</sup>, all the castles in the country belonging to the tribe of Hakkār, Tikrīt, Shahrūzūr, etc., reserving only Arbela for himself. He made the pilgrimage, A.H. 555 (A.C. 1160), in company with Asad al-Dīn Shayrkūh (No. 279)."—"On the death of Zayn al-Dīn, his son Muẓaffar al-Dīn (Kūkuburi), who was then fourteen years of age, succeeded to the throne, but remained under the tuition of his atābak Mujāhid al-Dīn Qā'imāz (No. 515), who, having conceived a strong prejudice against him, wrote to the August Dīwān (or court of Baghdād), representing him as unfit to govern, and requesting to know what should be done. He then imprisoned him and placed his younger brother, Zayn al-Dīn Abu 'l-Muẓaffar Yūsuf, on the throne. Some time afterwards, Muẓaffar al-Dīn left the country and proceeded to Baghdād, whence, after some fruitless endeavours to obtain justice, he removed to Moṣul. Sayf al-Dīn Ghāzī ibn Mawdūd (No. 496), the sovereign of that city, then took him into his service and granted him the towns of Ḥarrān as a fief. Having removed to Ḥarrān, he continued to make it his place of residence till he at length entered into the service of the sultān Ṣalāḥ al-Dīn, by whom he was treated with great favour. In the year 578 (A.C. 1182-3), this prince, who had conceived a high esteem for his dependent, took the city of Edessa* from Ibn al-Za'farānī and bestowed it on Muẓaffar al-Dīn in addition to Harrān; he then indemnified Ibn al-Za'farānī with the gift of al-Raqqah, which city he took from Ibn Hassān. It would be too long to relate the particulars of this transaction<sup>1</sup>. Some time afterwards, he bestowed on him the city of Sumaysāt, and married him to his sister, al-Sitt Rabi'ah Khātūn (her ladyship the princess Rabi'ah), the daughter of Ayyūb (No. 104). Before that, she had been the wife of Sa'd al-Dīn Mas'ūd Ibn Mu'in al-Dīn, lord of the Castle of Mu'in al-Dīn in the province of al-Ghawr<sup>2</sup>, who died in the year 581 (A.C. 1185-6). Muẓaffar al-Dīn fought in a great number of Ṣalāḥ al-Dīn's battles and displayed the highest bravery and resolution, standing firm in conflicts from which all others receded, as is testified by 'Imād al-Dīn al-Isbahānī, Bahā al-Dīn Ibn Shaddād, and other historians. These facts are so well known, that it is needless to insist on the subject, and his conduct at the battle of Ḥiṭṭīn<sup>3</sup> would alone suffice for his reputation. In this battle he and the prince of Hamāt, Taqī al-Dīn (No. 476), held their ground, although the whole army was routed and driven back; the soldiers then heard that these two chiefs still continued to resist the enemy, on which they returned to the charge, and the victory was decided in favour of the Muslims. When the sulṭān Ṣalāḥ al-Dīn was besieging

<sup>1</sup> Schulten's Saladini vita et res gesta, page 33.

<sup>2</sup> The qal'at, or castle of 'Aqr al-Ḥumaydiyah, was situated in the territory of Moṣul.

<sup>3</sup> 18 August.—Ed.

1 The following passage from the Two Gardens (see No. 386, Note) may serve to elucidate these events. "The kātib 'Imād al-Dīn says: The sulṭān (Ṣalāḥ al-Dīn) then wrote (to the princes of Mesopotamia), requiring them to come and make alliance with him. All those who obeyed were allowed to preserve their estates, on the condition of serving in the sulṭān's army and following him in his warfare against the infidels. Nūr al-Dīn Muḥammad Ibn Qarā Arsilān, lord of Ḥiṣn Kaifā, sent in his submission with an ambassador, and the sulṭān then departed from al-Birah and came to a halt under the walls of Edessa. Fakḥr al-Dīn Ma'sūd Ibn al-Za'farānī who was then in the city, made his submission, and it was bestowed on Muẓaffar al-Dīn in addition to Harrān. The sulṭān then proceeded to Harrān and from thence to al-Raqqah, which was then held by the amīr Quṭb al-Dīn Ināl Ibn Hassān, who also made his submission."—(MS. No. 707-A, fol. 167, verso.)

2 See No. 119. Al-Ghawr is the name given to the valley of the Jordan.

3 See M. Reinaud's Extraits d'auteurs arabes relatifs aux Croisades, page 194.

* The Egyptian edition has: al-Rohā.—Ed.

Acre, which city had fallen into the hands of the Franks, the princes of the East came to his assistance, and placed themselves under his orders, and amongst the number was the lord of Arbela, Zayn al-Dīn Yūsuf, the brother of Muẓaffar al-Dīn. Soon after his arrival he fell sick, and, on the 28th of Ramaḍān, A.H. 586 (October, A.C. 1190),* he expired at Nāṣirah (Nazareth), a village near Acre, in which, according to one of several conflicting statements, the blessed Messiah was born. On the death of Zayn al-Dīn Yūsuf, his brother Muẓaffar al-Dīn requested to obtain Arbela in exchange for Ḥarrān, Edessa, and Sumaysāt; the sultān having acceded to his wish, and granted him Shahrūzūr besides, he set out, and made his entry into Arbela in the month of Dhu'l-Hijjah, A.H. 586 (January, A.C. 1191). This is the summary of his history, but, as to the proceedings which mark his character, we may say that, in works of charity, he performed what no single man was ever known to have done before. He delighted in nothing so much as alms-giving, and every day he caused immense sums to be distributed, in different parts of the city, to crowds of needy persons assembled to receive them. His first distribution was made at daybreak, and, when he dismounted from his horse (on returning from the mosque), he found great numbers waiting at the palace-door; these he ordered to be brought in, and gave to each a dress adapted to the season, according as it was winter or summer, and with the dress he bestowed on him two or three pieces of gold, sometimes more, sometimes less. He built four asylums for the blind, and persons suffering from chronic distempers; these were always full, and every day he provided the inmates with all the things requisite for their wants: every Monday and Thursday evening he visited these establishments and entered into all the chambers, bestowing on<sup>1</sup> the occupants a small sum for extraordinary expenses, and inquiring into the state of their health. In this manner he visited each chamber

---

1 The fifth form of the verb قَدَّ is here employed by Ibn Khallikān with the signification of to bring. A similar signification is given by Ibn Baṭūṭah to the eighth form. In the account of his voyage to Sūdān, he says : كانت تنقلنا بالطعام "she brought us food".

* 27 October.—Ed.

successively, conversing affably with inmates and jesting with them so as to soothe their hearts. He built a house for the reception of widows, another for orphan children, and a third for foundlings; in this last a number of nurses were always in waiting, ready to suckle whatever children might be brought in. Every day, the occupants of these establishments were provided by his directions with all they required; he went very frequently to see them and ask them about their health, accompanying his inquiry with a donation over and above that which was regularly allotted to them. When he visited the hospital, he stopped at the bedside of each patient successively, and inquired how he had passed the night and how he felt. He founded also a house of hospitality, where all jurisconsults, dervishes, and other persons who came to the city might go to lodge. Indeed, none were refused admittance; a regular meal was furnished to them morning and evening, and when any of them resolved on continuing his journey, he received a sum proportioned to his wants. A college was built by him also and provided with professors for the Shafi'i and Hanafite students; he frequently went to visit them, dine with them, and pass the night in hearing religious music, to which he was so sensible that, when excited by its influence, he used to pull off part of his clothes: the next morning he always sent to the community some marks of his beneficence. The only pleasure in which he indulged was that of listening to music, for he never took the forbidden thing (wine), neither would he suffer it to be brought into the city. He built two convents for ṣūfis; these were always filled with fixed residents and visitors; on the days of solemn festival, the number of persons assembled there was astonishingly great, and these two establishments were endowed with estates (waqf) sufficient to defray the expenses of providing for all these strangers, who, when they intended to depart, were even obliged to accept a donation. He often went to see the ṣūfis and have concerts performed in his presence. Twice every year he dispatched a number of trusty agents to the cities on the sea-coast, and furnished them with large sums for the redemption of such Muslims as might be in the hands of the infidels (the crusaders). When any of the persons thus delivered went to see him, they received from him a sum of money, and his agents had directions to bestow a present on the others. Every year, he provided a sabil<sup>1</sup> for the pilgrims, furnished with every thing which they might require on the way; he dispatched it off with a trusty servant, bearing five or six thousand pieces of gold destined to be distributed among the needy and the persons employed in the mosques of the two holy cities (Makkah and Madinah). At Makkah he left numerous monuments of his piety, and these are still existing. He was the first person who brought water by an aqueduct to Mount 'Arafât for the use of the pilgrims on the night during which they station there; this work cost him a large sum. He constructed a number of fountains at the same mountain, because the pilgrims used to suffer greatly for want of water, and he erected there also a funeral chapel for himself. The pomp with which he celebrated the birthday of the Prophet surpassed all description; I shall, however, give a feeble outline of the ceremony. The people of the neighbouring provinces, having heard what veneration he testified for the Prophet, hastened to Arbela every year, and an immense multitude of jurisconsults, şūfis, preachers, Qur'ân-readers, and poets arrived there, at the same time, from Baghdād, Moşul, Mesopotamia, Sinjār, Naşibīn, Prersain 'Irāq, and all the other places in the vicinity. This influx of strangers continued without interruption from the month of Muḥarram till the commencement of the first Rabi'. Already, by his orders, upwards of twenty wooden pavilions, divided into four or five stories, were erected; one being appropriated to himself and each of the others to an amir or some person holding a high rank in the state. On the first day of the month of Şafar, these pavilions were decorated in a most splendid manner; a choir of singers, a band of musicians, and a troop of exhibitors of Chinese shadows were established in each; not a story being left without a company of these artists. During the whole period all business remained suspended, and the sole occupation of the people was to amuse themselves and walk from one band to another. These pavilions were erected on a line

---

1 The word sabil ( vay ) is often employed to signify a fountain for the use of wayfaring men (şāḥib al-sabil). It is here employed to signify a convoy of provisions.

from the gate of the citadel to the entrance of the convent near the hippodrome, and every day, after the 'aṣr prayer<sup>1</sup>, Muẓaffar al-Dīn went forth and stopped at each pavilion successively; listening to the music, and amusing himself with looking at the Chinese shadows or whatever else might be going on. He then passed the night in the convent, listening to religious music, and the next morning, after the prayer, he rode out to hunt, and returned to the citadel before the hour of noon. He continued in the same practice, every day, till the eve of the anniversary, and this he celebrated, one year on the eighth day of the month, and the next on the twelfth, in consequence of the different opinions held respecting the true date. Two days previously to the anniversary, he sent an immense flock of camels, oxen, and sheep to the hippodrome, accompanied with all his drummers, singers, and musicians. These animals were there sacrificed as victims and a number of caldrons being set up, the flesh was cooked in various manners. On the eve of the anniversary, after the maghrib (or sunset) prayer, he listened to a concert in the citadel, and then went forth<sup>2</sup>, preceded by a great number of persons bearing wax-lights. Two, or four of these lights, I am not sure of the exact number, were such as are employed in the grand ceremonies, being fastened, each of them, on the back of a mule, with a man seated behind to support it. He advanced in this manner to the convent, and the next day, at an early hour, a quantity of pelisses were brought out of that establishment<sup>3</sup> by the ṣūfis, each of them bearing a bundle of them in each hand, and advancing one after another. A great number of these dresses, I do not know exactly how many, having been brought out, he went down to the convent, where the persons of high distinction, the chiefs, and a great number of other eminent individuals had already assembled. A chair was then placed for the preacher, and Muẓaffar al-Dīn went up into a wooden tower, erected to receive him. This edifice had windows overlooking the place where the assembly and the

---

1 See No 257, note on times of prayers.

2 Insert in the Arabic text ثم ينزل.

3 The text varies here in the MSS. I take the true reading to be "from the citadel (and carried) to the convent." من القلعة الى الخانقا.

preacher were, and another set of windows opened on the hippodrome which was extremely wide. There, the soldiery were collected in a body, and the prince passed them in review, now looking at them, and then at the public and the preacher. When the soldiers had all defiled successively, a repast was brought into the hippodrome for the poor; a public repast, consisting of an immense quantity of meat and bread. Another repast was prepared in the convent for the persons who had attended the preaching. Whilst the troops were defiling and the preachers exhorting, he sent for all the chiefs and eminent men, and for the doctors, preachers, Qur'ân-readers, and poets, who had come from the neighbouring countries to witness the solemnity; each of these persons was separately introduced and clothed in a pelisse, after which he returned to his place. When all had been presented, the repast was brought in, and a portion of it was sent to the house of such of the company as were judged worthy of that honour. Towards the hour of the 'aṣr-prayer, or somewhat later, the repast ended, and the prince passed that night in the convent, listening to religious concerts till day-break. Such was his custom every year, and I have given merely an abridged account of the ceremony, because a full description of it would lead me too far. When the solemnity was ended, all prepared for their departure, and every one of them received from him a donation. We have already mentioned (No. 472) that, when the hāfiẓ Ibn Diḥyah arrived at Arbela and remarked the zeal displayed by Muẓaffar al-Dīn in celebrating this anniversary, he composed for him the work entitled al-Tanwīr, etc., and that the prince made him a present of one thousand pieces of gold; this was exclusive of the abundant gifts which he received for his subsistence during his stay. When Muẓaffar al-Dīn (may God be merciful to him!) tasted of any dish and found it good, he never reserved it for himself, but told one of the persons in waiting to carry it to such and such a Shaykh, or to such and such a woman, and these were always persons whom he had noted for their piety. He did the same with the sweetmeats, fruit, and every other article set before him. Noble qualities, profound humility, sincerity of belief, and soundness of moral principle were all combined in Muẓaffar al-Dīn; he showed a strong partiality to the followers of the Sunnite doctrine and orthodox believers; the only class of learned men which he treated with special favour was that of the jurisconsults and Traditionists; none of the others ever obtained any thing from him unless some particular considerations induced him to show them attention; the poets were also in the same case; he had but little esteem for them, and never made them any presents unless they came to recite him poems composed in his honour; then indeed he granted them a recompense, not wishing to frustrate the hopes of any person who counted on his generosity. He cultivated with pleasure the study of history, and his acquirements in that branch of knowledge were evident from his conversation. In his encounters and battles, numerous as they were, he was invariably victorious, the accounts which have been transmitted down of his battles not indicating a single defeat. Were I to enumerate all his virtues and noble deeds, I should be obliged to give a great extension to this work, but they are so well known that it is needless to enter into any details. If the reader remark that this article has been extended to too great a length, he will excuse me when I tell him that our family were under such obligations to Muẓaffar al-Dīn, that, to repay even a part of them, our utmost efforts would be vain; gratitude to a benefactor is, however, a binding precept. May God reward him for us with the best of retributions! in as much as the benefits and favours conferred by him on us, and by his forefathers on ours, were boundless, and men's affections are gained by acts of kindness. Having now proclaimed his virtues, I shall only add that all which I have stated has my own ocular testimony to support it, and that I have throughout avoided even the slightest exaggeration; nay, some of his acts I have passed over in silence, through my desire of avoiding prolixity. He was born in the castle of Moṣul, on Tuesday the 27th of Muḥarram, A.H. 549 (April, A.C. 1154),* and he died at the hour of noon on Wednesday, the 18th of Ramaḍān, A.H. 630 (June, A.C. 1233)† in his house at al-Balad. This town formed the state of Shihāb al-Dīn Qarāṭā, but, when Muẓaffar

---

* 13 April.--Ed.

† 29 June.--Ed.

al-Dīn Kūkubūrī arrested him in the year 614 (A.C. 1217-8) and took it into his own possession, he made it his occasional residence. His body was transported to Arbela and buried in the citadel, but, in pursuance to his dying injunctions, it was subsequently sent off to Makkah, where he had erected a mausoleum at the foot of the mountain to receive it, as has been already stated. When the pilgrim-caravan set out for Ḥijāz in the year 631, the body was sent with them, but it so happened that, on arriving at Lī'nah, they were obliged to return without effecting their journey, and the corpse was carried back and interred at Kūfah, near the Mash'had (or funeral chapel of 'Alī). May God in his mercy requite him well, and accept his good works, and receive him into everlasting happiness!—His wife Rabī'ah Khātūn, the daughter of Ayyūb, died at Damascus, in the month of Sha'bān A.H. 643 Dec.-Jan., A.C. 1245-6), and, to the best of my opinion, she had then passed her eightieth year. She was interred in the college which she had erected at the foot of Mount Qāsiyūn, and endowed for the Ḥanbalites. The number of her male relatives, such as brothers and nephews, whom I saw, and who were also princes, surpassed fifty—exclusive of those who were not princes. To name them individually would extend this notice too far, but I shall simply state, that her husband was prince of Arbela; her daughter's sons, princes of Moṣul; the son of one of her brothers, prince of Kḥalāt and that region; al-Ashraf, another brother's son, prince of Mesopotamia; the other nephews were princes of Syria and Egypt, whilst Ḥijāz and Yaman were possessed by her brothers and their sons. From this indication the whole number may be imagined. Kūkubūrī is a Turkish name, and signifies blue wolf<sup>1</sup>. Baktikīn is also a Turkish name. Līnah is the name of a station on the road from 'Irāq to Ḥijāz, but nearer to 'Irāq. In the year before mentioned, the caravan turned back on reaching it, in consequence of the extreme suffering they underwent for want of water<sup>2</sup>.

---

1 Gūk in Turkish means sky-blue, and būrī may perhaps mean wolf in some ancient dialect of that language.

2 Līnah is placed by Berghaus on his map of Arabia in lat. 30° 5' long, 42° 51' E. from Paris.

523 AL-LAYTH IBN SA'D

Abu 'l-Hārith al-Layth Ibn Sa'd Ibn 'Abd al-Raḥmān, the great imām of the people of Egypt in the sciences of jurisprudence and the Traditions, drew his origin from an Iṣbahān family, and was a mawlā to Qays Ibn Rifā'ah who himself was a mawlā to 'Abd al-Raḥmān Ibn Khālīd Ibn Musāfir al-Fahmī. The credibility and exactitude of al-Layth Ibn Sa'd as a Traditionist were of the highest order, nor was he less distinguished for his noble character and liberality. "I had written down," said he, "a great quantity of the (legal) information (communicated) by Muḥammad Ibn Shihāb al-Zuhrī (to his disciples), and I then asked to obtain the use of the post-horses, so that I might go and see him at al-Ruṣāfah<sup>2</sup>; but being then apprehensive that, in taking such (an easy mode of conveyance), I should not be acting in the sole view of God's favour, I abandoned my project." Al-Shāfi'i said of him. "Al-Layth Ibn Sa'd is a more learned jurisconsult than Mālik, only his disciples do not exalt him sufficiently." (Some students were one day) reading, under the tuition of Ibn Wahb (No. 302), the collection of legal questions which had been decided by al-Layth, when a person who was not a native of the place exclaimed, on hearing one of these questions read (with its solution): "Cleverly done for al-Layth! one would think he had heard Mālik, and then repeated his words: On this, Ibn Wahb said to him: "Say rather that Mālik heard al-Layth answer, and then repeated his words; I swear by the only true God, that we never saw a more learned jurisconsult than al-Layth!" This imām was noted for his generosity and liberality; he enjoyed a yearly income of five thousand pieces of gold (dīnārs), and this sum he distributed in gifts and other ways: "I went to see al-Layth" said Maṣṣūr Ibn 'Ammār<sup>3</sup>, "and

1 The life of al-Zuhrī is given in this work.

2 See No. 127, note.

3 Abu 'l-Ṣarf Maṣṣūr Ibn 'Ammār Ibn Kaṭhīr, a native of Khurāsān, or of Baṣrah, as some say, was celebrated for his wisdom, his piety, the elegance of his language, and his function as a preacher. Having gone to 'Irāq, he delivered Traditions there, and afterwards passed into Egypt, where he gave me one thousand dīnārs, saying : 'Let this help to preserve the wisdom with which God has endowed thee.' " I saw, in a certain compilation, that al-Layth held the principles of Ḥanafite sect, and that he exercised the functions of qāḍī in Old Cairo. I found stated, in the same work, that Mālik having sent to him a China cup filled with dates, he returned it filled with gold. He used to have almond-cake made for his disciples, and in it he inserted pieces of gold, so that he who eat most cake might get most money. In the year 113 (A.C. 731-2), being then twenty years of age, he made the pilgrimage, and heard the Traditions delivered by Nāfi<sup>1</sup>, the mawlā of Ibn 'Umar. He said that, according to what he had been told by his family, he was born A.H. 92 (A.C. 710-1), but it has been positively ascertained that the real date is A.H. 94, in the month of Sha'bān. He died at Old Cairo on Thursday (some say Friday), the 15th of Sha'bān, A.H. 175 (December, A.C. 791)* ; and was interred the next day in the Lesser Qarāfah cemetery, where his tomb still continues to be frequented by pious visitors. Al-Sam'ānī placed his birth in the month of Sha'bān, A.H. 124, and another writer, in A.H. 93 ; but our former statement appears to be the most correct. One of his disciples related as follows : "When we had buried al-Layth Ibn Sa'd, we heard a voice say : he pronounced moral discourses and exhortations. Al-Layth Ibn Sa'd, having heard of his proceedings, sent for him, and asked him how he presumed to hold discourses in the city without being authorised by the doctors of the law. He replied that zeal for religion was his only motive, and that, if al-Layth permitted him, he would make a discourse in his presence, promising that, if he then forbid him to preach, he should obey him. Al-Layth agreed to the proposal, and having heard from him a sermon which brought tears to his eyes, he made him a present of one thousand dīnārs, saying : "Go forth and preach to the people." During his residence in Old Cairo, the house and purse of al-Layth were at his disposal, and, on his departure for Baḡdād, the sons of that imām made him another present of one thousand dīnārs. He died A.H. 225 (A.C. 839-40).—(Mir'āt al-Zamān, MS. No 640, fol. 115, Nujūm).

---

(Continued from page 105)

1 His life will be found in this work.

* Friday, 16 December.—Ed.

'Al-Layṭh is departed, and you possess him no longer ! soon also shall learning depart and be interred !'

On hearing these words we turned round, but could see no one." It is said that he belonged to Qalqashandah a village about three parasangs to the north of Cairo—Fahmī means belonging to the tribe of Fahm, a branch of that descended from Qays (son of) Ghaylān*. It has produced many eminent individuals.

524 THE IMĀM MĀLIK

Abū 'Abd Allāh Mālik Ibn Anas Ibn Mālik Ibn Abī 'Āmir Ibn 'Amr Ibn al-Ḥārith Ibn Ghaymān, Ibn Jaṭhīl Ibn 'Amr Ibn Dhī Aṣḥab al-Ḥārith al-Aṣḥabī, a native of Madīnah and the great imām of that city (Imām dār il-Hijrah), was one of the most eminent among the imāms of Islamism. In his genealogy as here set forth, some substitute 'Uṭhmān for Ghaymān, and, in place of Jaṭhīl, (Muḥammad) Ibn Sa'd (al-Wāqidi) writes Khuṭhayl. Mālik learned to read the Qur'ān under the tuition of Nāfi' Ibn Abī Nu'aym ; he heard Traditions delivered by (Ibn Shihāb) al-Zuhri and Nāfi', the mawlā of Ibn 'Umar<sup>1</sup> he taught Traditions on the authority of al-Awzā'i (No. 336) and Yaḥyā Ibn Sa'id<sup>2</sup>, and he acquired his knowledge of the law from Rabi'ah al-Rā'i (No. 220), with whom he acted as mufti, or consulting lawyer, to the government. "There were very few men," said Mālik, from whom I received lessons, who did not come to me before they

1 The lives of these persons are given in this work.

2 The qāḍī Abū Sa'd Yaḥyā Ibn Sa'id al-Anṣarī was a native of Madīnah. His authority as a traditionist was cited by Mālik, Abū Ḥanīfah, Sufyān Ibn 'Uyaynah, and Sufyān al-Thawrī. Having gone to Kūfah to see Abū Ja'far al-Manṣūr, that Khalīf appointed him qāḍī of Hāshimiyah. He died A.H. 143 (A.C. 760-1).—(Al-Dhahabī's (Ṭabaqāt al-Ḥuffāz). Abu 'l-Maḥāsīn's Nujūm.)

* The editor of the Cairo edition observes that the correct name was Qays 'Aylān and not Ghaylān. As regards the insertion of ابن (the son of) is allowed by certain scholars. The Qāmūs supports the editor of the Egyptian edition vide لىع.—Ed.

died, to ask my opinion on some point of law." And Ibn Wahb (No. 302) relates that he heard these words proclaimed by a public crier in Madīnah : "Let no person act as muftī to the people except Mālik Ibn Anas and Ibn Abī Dhī'b¹." When Mālik felt inclined to deliver Traditions, he made an ablution, then seated himself in the middle of his mattress, and, spreading out his beard, he assumed a grave and dignified deportment, after which preparations he commenced. When asked his motives for so doing, he replied : "I delight in testifying my profound respect for the sayings of the Apostle of God, and I never repeat one unless I feel myself in a state of perfect purity." He avoided delivering Traditions when travelling, or standing, or when pressed for time : "for I like," said he, "to feel the meaning of the Apostle's words when I repeat them to others." He never went about on horseback in Madīnah, even when much enfeebled and advanced in years : "No," he would say, "I shall never ride in the city wherein the corpse of God's Apostle lies interred." Al-Shāfi'ī relates as follows : Muḥammad Ibn al-Ḥasan² said to me : "Which of the two is the more learned ; our master or yours? meaning Abū Ḥanīfah and Mālik. "Dost thou wish," said I, "that I should answer with impartiality?" He replied that he did, and I said : "I then ask thee before God, which of the two is the more learned in Qur'ān ; our master or yours ?"—"Yours, to a certainty," said he. "I again ask thee seriously," said I, "which of the two is the more learned in the Sunnah ; our master or yours?"—"Yours, to a certainty," he replied. "I shall again ask thee," said I, "which of the two is the best acquainted with the sayings (sentences forming legal decisions) pronounced by the companions of God's Apostle ; our master or yours." "Why, yours, to a certainty," was the answer. "Then," said I, "there only remain the analogical deductions (qiyās)³ ; and if they be not drawn from the three sources we have just mentioned, from whence can they be drawn?" Al-Wāqidī says : "Mālik used to go regularly to the mosque and attend the daily prayers, and the prayers of Friday,

---

1 The life of Ibn Abī Dhī'b is given in this work

2 A notice on Muḥammad Ibn al-Ḥasan is contained in this work.

3 See vol. I, Introduction.

and the funerals, and visit the sick, and fulfil all the duties (of social life) and take his seat in the mosque, with his disciples collected round him; he then discontinued sitting in the mosque, but attended the prayers, after which he would return to his seat and teach; he ceased also accompanying funerals, but still continued to go and condole with the family of the deceased; but, at a later period, he gave up all those customs, neither going to the mosque for daily prayers nor for the prayer of Friday, nor making any visits of condolence, nor fulfilling any of the social duties; yet the people bore this patiently, and he continued, till his death, in the same practice. He was sometimes questioned on his motives for so doing, and he used to reply: 'It is not given to every man to speak out his own excuses.' " "Some persons went secretly to Ja'far Ibn Sulaymān Ibn 'Alī Ibn 'Abd Allāh Ibn al-'Abbās, the uncle of Abū Ja'far al-Manṣūr, and accused him of declaring that he did not consider the oath of allegiance to the 'Abbāsids as binding. Ja'far was so highly incensed on hearing this, that he caused Mālik to be brought before him, and having ordered him to be stripped, he inflicted on him a severe flogging, and caused his arm to be drawn out to such a degree that it was dislocated at the shoulder; in fact, he treated him in a most scandalous manner. But, from the time Mālik received the flogging, he rose higher and higher in public estimation, so that the punishment he underwent seemed as if it had been an honour conferred upon him. In Ibn al-Jawzī's Shuḥḥūr al-'uqūd<sup>1</sup>, under the year 147, we find the following passage: "In this year, Mālik Ibn Anas received seventy stripes of a whip, on account of some legal opinions which did not correspond with the wishes of the sulṭāns (the persons invested with the civil power)." This may probably refer to the same occurrence which we have just noticed. Mālik was born A.H. 95 (A.C. 713-4), three years after conception<sup>2</sup>

---

1 Abu 'l-Faraj Ibn al-Jawzī's work, the Shuḥḥūr al-'Uqūd fī Tārīkh il-'Uhūd (necklace beads, on the events of history), is not noticed by Ibn Khallikān when giving the life of that historian. He quotes it, however, very frequently.

2 Abū Ḥanīfah declares that the longest period of pregnancy is twenty-four lunar months; but al-Shāfi'ī lengthens that term to four years and Mālik to six. See d'Ohsson's Tab. gen de l'Empire Othman, tom. V., p. 251.—It would appear that Mālik was born three years after his reputed father's death.

and he died in the month of the first Rabi', A.H. 179 (May-June, A.C. 795), aged eighty-four years. Al-Wāqidī<sup>1</sup> says that he died at the age of ninety, and Ibn al-Furāt<sup>2</sup> has the following passage in his historical work drawn up in the form of annals: "Mālik Ibn Anas al-Aṣḥabī died on the 10th of the first Rabi' A.H. 179." Others place his death in the year 178, and some state that his birth occurred in the year 90. Al-Sam'ānī says in his Ansāb (or dictionary of patronymics), under the word al-Aṣḥabī, that Mālik was born in 93 or 94; the truth is known to God alone! The ḥāfiẓ Abū 'Abd Allāh al-Ḥumaydī has inserted in his Judḥwat al-Muqtābis<sup>3</sup> the following relation, which had been first made by al-Qa'nabī (No. 304): "I went to Mālik Ibn Anas in his last illness, and saluted him; I then sat down and, perceiving that he wept, I said: 'O Abū 'Abd Allāh! what maketh thee weep?' And he answered: 'O Ibn Qa'nab! why should I not weep? and who has more reason to weep than I? By Allāh! I wish I had been flogged and reflogged for every question of law on which I pronounced an opinion founded on my own private judgment<sup>4</sup>! I had it in my power to abstain from doing so; O that I had never given opinions founded on my own private judgment!' or other words to that effect." He died at Madīnah, and was interred in the cemetery called al-Baqī'. Mālik was of a very fair complexion, inclining to red; tall in stature, having a large head, and the forehead bald; he wore clothes of those excellent stuffs which are brought from Aden, and he disapproved of shaving off the mustaches, considering it to be a sort of mutilation: he never changed the colour of his grey hair, by dying it. The following elegy was composed on his death by Abū Muḥammad Ja'far Ibn Aḥmad Ibn al-Sarrāj (No. 131):

"May the grave which has untied Mālik to al-Baqī' be watered with benignant showers from the dark thunder-cloud,

1 His life is given by our author.

2 See No. 42. note.

3 The life of al-Ḥumaydiyyeh will be found in this work.

4 See Introduction to first vol.

flashing its lightnings. He was the imām whose Muwaḥḥid<sup>1</sup> has spread his doctrines throughout the earth. The prophet Muḥammad, whose law he exalted, will protect him and preserve him from harm. His Traditions were of the highest authority; his gravity was impressive; and, when he delivered them, all his auditors were plunged in admiration. He had also (disciples), upright friends of truth, land-marks (to guide us); you might (vainly) ask which of them was the most learned. The son of Idrīs alone (al-Shāfi'i) would suffice for his glory, but that good fortune was only one of many favours."

Aṣḥab means descended from Dhū Aṣḥab; this person's name was al-Hārith, and his father, 'Awf Ibn Mālik Ibn Zayd Ibn Shaddād Ibn Zar'ah, was one of the posterity of Ya'rub Ibn Qaḥṭān. The tribe of Dhū Aṣḥab is one of the largest in Yaman, and it is from it that the whips called aṣḥabite (al-Siyāṭ al-Aṣḥābiyah) derive their name. In the Jamharat al-Nisab, Ibn al-Kalbī gives the genealogy of Dhū Aṣḥab in the following manner: "Hārith, called Dhū Aṣḥab, was the son of Mālik Ibn Zayd Ibn Ghawṭh Ibn Sa'd Ibn 'Awf Ibn 'Adī Ibn Mālik Ibn Zayd Ibn Sahl Ibn 'Amr Ibn Qays Ibn Mu'āwiyh Ibn Yusham Ibn 'Abd Shams Ibn Wāṭil* Ibn al-Ghawṭh Ibn Qaṭan Ibn 'Arib Ibn Zuhayr Ibn Ayman Ibn Humaysa Ibn Ḥimyar Ibn Sabā Ibn Yashjub Ibn Ya'rub Ibn Qaḥṭān; Qaḥṭān, whose real name was Yuqṭan<sup>2</sup>, was the son of 'Aabir (Eber) Ibn Shālikh (Shālāh) Ibn Arfakhshad (Arfaxad) Ibn Sām (Sem) Ibn Nūḥ (Noah)."<sup>3</sup> I must here observe that the genealogy of Dhū Aṣḥab, as I have given it at the beginning of this article, is copied from al-Hāzimi's work, the Kitāb al-'Ajālah<sup>3</sup>.

---

1 Al-Muwaḥḥid, or the beaten path, is the title of the collections of Traditions which forms part of the basis on which the Mālikite system of jurisprudence is grounded. The greater part of its contents are legal maxims and opinions delivered by the Companions of Muḥammad.

2 This is the Joktan of the English translation of the Bible; Gen. X. 25.

3 The life of Hāzimi will be found in this work.

* The Cairo edition has Wā'il—Ed.

525 MĀLIK IBN DĪNĀR

Abū Yaḥyā Mālik Ibn Dīnār, a native of Baṣrah and a mawlā to the family of the tribe of Quraysh called the Banū Sāmah Ibn Luwayyi, was distinguished for his learning, selfmortification, profound piety, and devout resignation. He never tasted of any food but that which he had procured with the produce of his own labour, his profession being to write copies of the Qur'ān, for which he received a pecuniary retribution. It is related of him that he said: "I read in the Old Testament that whosoever worketh with his hand shall have blessings in his life-time and at his death." He was one day present at an assembly where a story-teller related a tale which drew tears from the eyes of the audience; almost immediately after, some sheeps' heads were brought in, and they began to eat of them. Being invited to partake of their fare, he replied: "Those who wept may eat thereof, but I wept not." His merits were most abundant, and the recollection of them still subsists. It is thus that Ibn Baṣḥkuwāl (No. 206) relates, in his work entitled Kitāb al-Mustaghīthin. etc. (book of the implorers of God's assistance): "Mālik Ibn Dīnār had one day taken his seat (to teach), when a man went up to him, and said: 'O Abū Yaḥyā! invoke God to help a woman who is four years gone with child, and is in great tribulation!'. At these words Mālik got angry and, having shut the volume of the Qur'ān (in which he was reading), he remained silent for some time, and then said. 'These people will positively have us to be prophets!' and recommenced reading. Having ended, he called upon God, saying: 'O Lord! if that which is in the womb of this woman be a girl, change it for her into a boy! for Thou canst undo and maintain what thou plearest; and the book of fate is in thy possession!'. He then raised up his hands, and the people did the same, when a messenger came to tell the man that his wife was on the point of being delivered. Mālik had scarcely time to lower his hands, when the man reappeared at the door of the mosque, bearing on his shoulder a four year old boy, with short curly hair and a complete set of teeth, although his navel-string was yet uncut." He was one of the great saints. His death took place at Baṣrah, A.H. 131 (A.C. 748-9), a short time before the plague<sup>1</sup>. Writing of Mālik Ibn Dīnār, I am reminded of some verses which were recited to me by their author, my friend, Jamāl al-Dīn Maḥmūd Ibn 'Abd. He had composed them on a certain prince, who waged war against another and vanquished him, taking his treasures, and making captives of his chiefs and his warriors. When he had got all his adversary's property into his own possession, he distributed the money to his troops, and put his prisoners in chains. It was then that Ibn 'Abd celebrated his praises in a qaṣīdah of the highest excellence. He describes in it that battle, and in one passage, which we give here, he has a very clever play on the name of Mālik Ibn Dīnār ; he says:

---

1 See No. 524, note on the duration of pregnancy.

" You set at liberty the wealth which they had kept in confinement, and you reduced to bondage those who before were free. Then each of them who had been a mālik (a person possessing property) was induced to wish that he were now a dīnār 2."

This is remarkably fine, and I have been induced to mention it for that reason.

526 MAJD AL-DĪN IBN AL-ATHĪR

Abu 'l-Sa'ādāt al-Mubārak Ibn Abi 'l-Karam Muḥammad Ibn Muḥammad Ibn 'Abd al-Karīm Ibn al-Wāhid al-Shaybānī, generally known by the appellation of Ibn al-Athīr al-Jazarī, was distinguished (from his brother) by the title of Majd al-Dīn (glory of religion). Ibn al-Mustawfī says of him in his History (of Arbēla): "He was the most renowned of the learned, the most

---

1 "In this year (A.H. 131) occurred the great plague which carried off immense numbers. Ibn al-Jawzī says that seventy thousand persons died of it in a single day."—(Nujūm.)

2 Because all the dīnārs or gold pieces, so long treasured up and confined, had been just set at liberty.

respected of the men of talent; one of those distinguished characters at whom the finger of admiration is pointed, and whose skill in the conduct of affairs acquired them the highest confidence. " He studied the science of grammar under Abū Muḥammad Sa'īd Ibn al-Dahhān (No. 247.) but did not hear Traditions delivered, neither did he teach them, till he was more advanced in life. He is the author of some elegantly written works, and he composed a number of epistles replete with talent. In one of his productions, the Jāmi' al-Usūl fi-Aḥādith il-Rasūl (the combiner of the fundamental treatises on the Traditions of the Apostle), he inserted the contents of six authentic collections<sup>1</sup>; it is drawn up on the plan of Ruzayn's* work<sup>2</sup>, but contains a great quantity of additional matter. His other productions are : The Kitāb al-Nihāyah (utmost efforts), which is a treatise on the obscure terms occurring in the Traditions, and fills five volumes; the Kitāb al-Inṣāf, etc. (impartial comparison between the Kashf and the Kashshāf<sup>3</sup>; a commentary on the Qur'ān selected from the similar works of al-Tha'labī (No. 30) and al-Zamakhsharī; the al-Muṣṭafā wa 'l-Mukhtār fi'l-Ad'iyat wa'l-Adhkār (the selected and chosen, treating of the forms of invocation to God, and of the prayers commemorative of his

---

1 The six authentic collections of Traditions are those of al-Bukhārī, Muslim, al-Tirmidhī, Abū Dāwūd, al-Nasā'ī, and Ibn Mājjah each of whom has a separate article in this work.

2 Abu' l-Ḥasan Ruzayn Ibn Mu'awiyah Ibn 'Ammār al-'Abdarī (a member of the tribe of 'Abd al-Dar) and a native of Sergossa in Spain, was imām of the Mālikite sect at Makkah. He is the author of a work generally designated by the name of Ruzayn's Book (Kitāb, Ruzayn) in which he assembled and classed all the Traditions contained in the Ṣaḥīḥ of al-Bukhārī, the Ṣaḥīḥ of Muslim, the Muwatt'ū of Mālik, the Jāmi' of al-Tirmidhī and the Sunan of Abū Dāwūd. Another of his productions is a history of Makkah, abridged from the work of al-Azraqī. He died at that city in the month of Muḥarram. A.H. 525 (December, A.C. 1130). He was one of the masters who conferred licences to teach Traditions on the hāfiz al-Silafī (No. 43.—(Hājji) Khalifah—. Al-'Iqd al-Shamīn, MS. No. 720, fol. 233 verso.)

3 The Kashshāf is the title of al-Zamakhsharī's commentary on the Qur'ān, and the Kashf wa'l-Bayān is that of al-Tha'labī's work on the same subject.

*M. de Slane writes Razīn.—Ed.

bounties); a small volume on the art of penmanship; the Kitāb al-Badī' (liber egregiæ materiae), being a commentary on Ibn al-Dahhān's Principles of Grammar; a collection of his own epistles; the Shāfi, or healing, being a commentary on the Imām al-Shāfi'i's Musnad or collection of authenticated Traditions, etc. He was born at Jazīrah Ibn 'Umar, in one of the months of Rabi' A.H. 544 (July-Aug., A.C. 1149). After passing his early youth in that place, he removed to Moṣul, and entered into the service of Mujāhid al-Dīn Qā'imāz (No. 515), the lieutenant-governor of that state, and was employed by him to write his correspondence. On the imprisonment of Qā'imāz, he passed into the service of 'Izz al-Dīn Mas'ūd Ibn Mawdūd, the lord of Moṣul, and was placed at the head of the board of correspondence, which post he continued to fill till that prince's death. He was then attached to the service of Nūr al-Dīn Arslān-Shāh (No. 79), the son of 'Izz al-Dīn Mawdūd, by whom he was treated with great favour, and under whose protection he enjoyed the utmost honour and respect. He served him for some time in the capacity of secretary of state, till a malady deprived him of the use of his arms and legs; this completely debarred him from fulfilling the duties of his office, and obliged him to confine himself to his house, where he had all the men of rank and learning for constant visitors. He erected a ribāṭ (or convent) at a village near Moṣul, called Qaṣr Ḥarb, and (having consecrated) the house which he inhabited at Moṣul (to a similar pious purpose), he settled all his property on these two establishments. I have been informed that he composed all the works above-mentioned after his retirement from office, having then sufficient leisure for the task, and being assisted by a number of persons in the labour of making extracts and copying. Amongst the few pieces of verse which he composed, I may notice the following, addressed to the lord arābak of Moṣul, on his mule's stumbling under him:

"If his mule stumble under him, there is a reason for it. It bears one whose learning is vast (as a mountain) and whose liberality is (ample as) the ocean."

This idea has now become common-place, and occurs frequently in poetry. It is related by his brother, 'Izz al-Dīn Abu'l-Ḥasan 'Alī, that, when he was deprived of the use of his limbs, a native of Maghrib went to them and engaged to cure him ; declaring at the same time that he would not require any payment unless the treatment which he intended to employ were successful in its results. "We readily accepted his proposal," said 'Izz al-Dīn, "and he commenced by the application of an ointment which he prepared himself. The good effects of this remedy were soon evident ; the patient's legs acquired flexibility, and he was able to stretch them out ; but, when there was every prospect of a complete cure, he said to me: 'Give that Maghribiyan a remuneration sufficient to satisfy him, and let him be dismissed.' 'Why,' said I, 'should we do so, since the success of his mode of treatment is so manifest.' To this he replied: 'It is as thou sayest; but, in my present state, I am delivered from the necessity of frequenting the great, and treating them with that ceremony to which their rank entitles them; besides, I have settled down into repose and solitude, I, who but yesterday, when in the enjoyment of good health, had to demean myself by courting their favour. Whereas, now, I remain at home; and when any thing serious occurs, they come in person to ask my advice: thou seest that, between these two states, the difference is very great. Now, I am indebted to my infirmity for this advantage; and I do not therefore think it reasonable to have it removed, or to be treated for it. Besides, I have but a short time to live ; let me therefore pass the remainder of my days as a free man, exempted from the obligation of self-abasement : I have already had an abundant share of worldly honour.' We admitted the validity of these reasons and dismissed the man with an ample reward." Majd al-Dīn died at Moṣul, on Thursday, the 29th of Dhu'l-Hijjah, A.H. 606 (June. A.C. 1210)* and he was interred within the city in the ribāʿ founded by himself in the street of Darraj (Darb Darrāj). We have already spoken of his brother, 'Izz al-Dīn (No. 456), and, in a subsequent part of this work, we shall insert a notice on his other brother, Ḍiyā al-Dīn Naṣr Allāh. Jazīrah Ibn 'Umar is a city on the Tigris, higher up than Moṣul; it is called Jazīrah (isle), because it is surrounded by the Tigris. Al-Wāqidī says that it was built by a native of Barqa'id called 'Abd al-'Aziz Ibn 'Umar.

---

*24 June—Ed.

527 MAJD AL-DĪN AL-MUBĀRAK IBN MUNQIDH

Abu 'l-Maymūn al Mubārak Ibn Kāmil Ibn 'Alī Ibn Muqallad Ibn Naṣr Ibn Munqidh al-Kinānī, surnamed Sayf al-Dawlah (sword of the empire) Majd al-Dīn (glory of religion), was one of the great amīrs of the empire founded by Ṣalāḥ al-Dīn, and comptroller of the board of administration for Egyptian affairs. He belonged to a powerful family, two members of which, his grandfather, Sadīd al-Dawlah<sup>1</sup> 'Alī (No. 458) and his cousin Usāmah Ibn Muṣṣahid (No. 81) we have already noticed. When Shams al-Dawlah Tūrān Shāh (No. 124) was sent into Yaman by his brother Ṣalāḥ al-Dīn, he reduced that country to submission, and appointed Ibn Munqidh to act as his lieutenant in Zabīd. On his return to Syria, Ibn Munqidh, who had been authorized by him to delegate his authority to his own brother, Ḥaṭṭān proceeded to Damascus, and they both returned to Egypt together. On the death of Shams al-Dawlah, Ibn Munqidh was thrown into prison by Ṣalāḥ al-Dīn, who had been informed that a number of persons had been put to death, and their property seized on, by this amīr. He took from him at the same time eighty thousand dinārs, and goods to the value of twenty thousand more. This occurred in the year 577 (A. C. 1181-2). Sayf al-Islām Tuḡhtikīn (No. 282)<sup>2</sup> then set out for Yaman, and having laid siege to the fortress in which Ḥaṭṭān had taken refuge, he induced him to capitulate by promises which he had no intention to fulfil. Having obtained possession of his person, he seized on all his wealth, and imprisoned him in a castle. From that moment, Ḥaṭṭān was never heard of more; some even say that Tuḡhtikīn put him to death. It is mentioned also that Tuḡhtikīn took from his prisoner seventy chests filled with gold. As for Sayf al-Dawlah, he always continued in high influence, and he acquired great renown as an enterprising chief. Being a man of learning, he was fond of it in others: some of the most illustrious poets celebrated his praises, and one

---

1 I suspect that the author meant to write here Sadīd al-Mulk.

2 This person must not be confounded with Abū Maṣṣūr Tuḡhtikīn, prince of Damascus at the time of the first crusade. —See no. 119.

of them, al-Qāḍī al-Wajīh (the honourable qāḍī) Raḍī al-Dīn (accepted for piety) Abu 'l-Hasan 'Ali Ibn 'Abi 'l-Hasan Yaḥyā Ibn Aḥmad, generally known by the surname of Ibn al-Dḥarawī, composed in his honour a qaṣīdah which gained publicity equal to that of a proverb. It begins thus:

"Conduct me, and may prosperity attend thee ! to the all mansions where (the family of my beloved) passed the vernal season. Those dwellings still diffuse the perfume of musk which they acquired from the presence of her I loved. O thou whose heart is wounded with desire! this is a valley held sacred by lovers: take off therefore thy sandals ; none must tread therein with covered feet."

In this poem we find the following passage :

"I have a tame gazelle (a young page) on whom God hath bestowed perfect beauty, and who obliges the mouths of mankind to exclaim : 'God preserve us from temptation!' His ruby lips disclose a row of pearls bathed in moisture, and he displays on his cheek a line of emerald<sup>1</sup>. Censurers reprove me, but I affect to heed them not, though they indulge in every form of blame. They say: who is the person for whom thou diest of love in thy sadness?' Thanks to the Lord ! they know not that person !' A learned scholar travelled abroad, but found not a generous man, who, when he said 'Give!' would answer 'Take!' When about to ride in anger, and ready to undergo the toil of a long journey, I said to him at the moment the camel driver commenced his song. 'Lucky (mubāarak) is the arrival, when the camels stop at the door of al-Mubāarak! and who can deliver (munqidh) suitors (from their cares), unless the son of Munqidh".

In that part of the poem which contains the eulogium, we meet a line composed with wonderful art. It is this :

"Smoother, in peace, than the belly of the serpent; Rougher, in war, than the back of the porcupine."

1 In this metaphorical language, the emerald has the same signification as the myrtle. For the meaning of the latter in poetry, see the introduction to vol. I.

It is a qaṣīdah highly to be prized, but I confine myself to these extracts so as to avoid prolixity. 'Abd 'l-Maymūn al-Mubārak himself composed some poetry; the following, for instance, in which he alludes to fleas:

"A race whom man is permitted to slay, and who profane (draw) the blood of the pilgrim, even in the sanctuary. When my hand sheds their blood, it is not their own, but mine which is shed."

It is thus that these two verses were recited and given as his, by 'Izz al-Dīn Abu 'l-Qāsim 'Abd Allāh Ibn Abi 'Alī al-Ḥusayn Ibn Abi Muḥammad 'Abd Allāh Ibn al-Ḥusayn Ibn Rawāḥah Ibn Ibrāhīm Ibn 'Abd Allāh Ibn Rawāḥah Ibn 'Ubayd Ibn Muḥammad Ibn 'Abd Allāh Ibn Rawāḥah al-Anṣārī, a native of Ḥamāt. This Ibn Rawāḥah was born off the coast of Sicily, in A.H. 560 (A.C. 1164-5), and he died A.H. 646 (A.C. 1248-9), at Jibāb al-Turkmān (the Turkoman wells), a halting-place between Aleppo and Ḥamāt. He died riding on a camel, and he was born in ship. Sayf al-Dawlah al-Mubārak was born at the castle of Shayzar A.H. 526 (A.C. 1131-2), and he died at Cairo, on Tuesday, the 8 of Ramaḍān, A.H. 589 (September, A.C. 1193).* Dharawī means belonging to Dharw, a village in Ṣa'īd (Upper Egypt).

528 IBN AL-MUSTAWFĪ AL-IRBILĪ

Abu 'l-Barakāt al-Mubārak Ibn Abi 'l-Faṭḥ Aḥmad Ibn al-Mubārak Ibn Mawhūb Ibn Ghanimah Ibn Ghālīb al-Lakhmī, surnamed Sharaf al-Dīn (nobleness of religion), and generally known by the appellation of Ibn al-Mustawfī al-Irbilī (native of Arbela), was a ra'īs (officer in the civil service) of high influence, and equally noted for his extreme modesty and noble character. Whenever a stranger distinguished by his talents arrived at Arbela, Ibn al-Mustawfī hastened to visit him, and, having offered him a

1 In giving this long list of names, Ibn Khalikān's object was to show that 'Izz al-Dīn was a lineal descendant of Ibn Rawāḥah al-Anṣārī, a celebrated poet, who had devoted his talents to the service of Muḥammad and proved himself a most useful ally. See Sale's Koran, last note to surat 26

* 7 September.—Ed.

present suited to his merit, he employed every means to gain his heart. This was particularly the case with literary men, who were always sure of being well received. He was a most accomplished scholar, versed in numerous branches of learning: the Traditions, the sciences connected with them, and the names of the persons by whom they were handed down, were so familiar to him, that, on such subjects he merited to be considered as a master of the highest authority. In the belles lettres his acquirements were also of no inferior order: grammar, philology, prosody, the laws of rhythm and literary composition, the poetry of the ancient Arabs, their history, contests, battles, and proverbs were all equally well known to him, and he displayed also a superior talent in the science of dīwān<sup>1</sup>, the mode of accounting (employed) there, and the keeping of the registers; adhering to the conventional forms on which persons of the profession set such high importance. He compiled a (literary) history of Arbela, in four volumes, and to this production I have frequently referred in the course of the present work. His Kitāb al-Naẓām (book of the stringer of pearls) forms ten volumes, and contains a commentary on the poetical works of al-Mutanabbī and Abū Tammām. In the two volumes of which his Kitāb Iḥbāt al-Muḥaṣṣal (ascertained results of investigation)<sup>2</sup> is composed, he elucidates the meaning of the verses cited as grammatical examples, by al-Zamakhsharī, in his Mufaṣṣal. He composed also a work entitled Sirr al-Ṣanī'ah (the secret of laying persons under obligations) (?), and another to which he gave the title of Abū Qumāsh<sup>3</sup>, containing much literary information, curious anecdotes, etc. It was his custom to read this book to the learned men who visited 1 Dīwān may here mean register, account-book, or perhaps the office for keeping the public accounts. From the passage which follows, I am induced to think that the art of book-keeping was not unknown to the Arabs.

---

2 For the meaning I here give to the passive participle muḥaṣṣal, I shall assign as my authority that given by M. de Sacy in his Abdallatif, page 244, to the corresponding active participle muḥaṣṣil. I consider the word here as bearing the passive form, because, in the complete Arabic title, it rhymes to Mufaṣṣal.

3 Abū Qumāsh; in Latin, pater supellectilis or supellectilem congerens. A sort of common-place book.

Arbela, and, as I was generally present at the time, I heard a great portion of its contents. He left also a dīwān of very good poetry. In a couplet of his composition he thus expresses his preference of white to brown<sup>1</sup> :

"Let not a seductive brownness deceive thee : beauty belongs to the white (or brig'ht) alone. The brown lance slays, but with a part which by nature belongs not to it, whilst the (bright) sword slays with every part, and all those parts are of its own substance."

He took this idea from the following verses composed by Abu 'l-Nidā Ḥassān Ibn Numayr al-Kalbi, a celebrated poet of Damascus, and generally known by appellation of al-'Arqalah<sup>2</sup>.

"If thou art seduced by a dark olive complexion, ask the pains I endure what is the effect produced by the silvery white. The part of the (brown) lance which slayeth is but a span in length, whilst every part of the (bright) sword, except one span (the handle), gives deadly wounds."

When Sharaf al-Dīn (Ibn al-Mustawfī) composed the two verses given above, a certain literary man observed that he would have more fully expressed the idea, had he said, that the portion of the lance which slayeth is of the same substance as the sword. An amateur of the belles lettres (whether Ibn al-Mustawfī himself or some other I know not,) then composed the following lines, in which the thought is expressed with that addition :

1 By white and brown are meant fair complexioned females and brunettes.

2 Abu 'l-Nidā Ḥasan Ibn Numayr, surnamed 'Arqalah, belonged to a branch of the tribe of Kalb, settled in the neighbourhood of Damascus. The kātib 'Imād al-Dīn al-Iṣbahānī, who met him at that city, says that he was a great favourite with the princes of the Ayyūbid family, and the constant companion of their convivial parties, which he enlivened by his gaiety. Ṣalāḥ al-Dīn promised to give him one thousand dinārs on becoming master of Egypt, and when that event took place, 'Arqalah proceeded thither and received the sum. He then returned to Damascus and died there towards the year 556 (A.C. 1170). The kātib, who knew him personally, has given us long extracts from his poetical works, arranged in alphabetical order, according to the rhymes. See Kharīdah ; MS. of the Bib. du Roi, No. 1414, fol. 25 et seq.

"The bright-complexioned (the swords) inflict the most fatal wounds, and the wounds of my heart were inflicted by bright beauties (of mortal race). If the brown (the lances) slay, it is because their points are formed of the same substance as the bright (swords)."

Amongst the poems of Ibn al-Mustawfī which were set to music<sup>1</sup>, we may notice the following piece :

"O night during which I remained awake till morning comparing (the beauty of) thy full moon with (that of) its fellow (which I held in my arms) ! Fortune at length granted me that happy night, and if the lover complained of its length, it was surely with sweet reproaches. I made it a night of life (and happiness), but I concealed its existence from my envious foes, whose only thought was to scatter calumnies. She<sup>2</sup> who clung to my neck was sweet in disposition, slender-waisted and possessing all the charms of beauty. Her port might be thought erect, but her slender waist, whilst the zephyr wantoned with it, was ever bending. (She trod with faltering steps like one) intoxicated ; passion hurried me towards her, but piety withheld me, and I blushed at my amorous folly. My hand rested on her neck ; I touched her cheeks ; these I kissed, and the charms of that neck I rifled. Had my sighs not been intermingled with hers (and been thus concealed), they had discovered us both to the spy who wished to betray her. The morning was jealous and angry at the night for having joined us, and its precursor (the dawn) forced us to separate."

The lines which follow are also of his composing :

"Blessings on those nights, short though they were, which brought us together ! may genial showers refresh them and give them new life. From that time, I never said Proceed ! ('lhi) to the friend with whom I whiled away the evenings in conversation, but my heart said : alas ! ('āhā)."

---

1 Literally : Which are sung.

2 Throughout this piece I have changed the gender of the pronouns and made other modifications of a similar kind.

These verses are to be met with in a qasīdah composed by my friend Husām al-Dīn al-Hājirī (No. 493) but most of my acquaintances say that Sharaf al-Dīn (Ibn al-Mustawfī) was their real author. One night, as Ibn al-Mustawfī was returning home from the mosque in the neighbourhood of his house, a man sprung upon him and aimed a dagger at his heart; but he warded off the stroke with his arm, and in so doing received on it a severe wound, which was immediately stitched up, anointed, and bandaged by a barber-surgeon who had been called in. Ibn al-Mustawfī then wrote the following lines to al-Malik al-Mu‘azzam, the sovereign of Arbela, informing him of the attempt which had been made against his life. To the best of my belief, this took place in the year 618 (A.C. 1221-2): I was then a boy, but I remember the circumstance perfectly well. The lines I speak of are these:

“O prince whose prowess would excite the admiration of Mars himself! marks of thy generosity are deeply impressed (upon our hearts), and none of them ever effaces the other<sup>2</sup>. To thee I denounce a heinous deed, the like of which I never suffered from before; a deed which will form an epoch in history. It is the night of my birth, and in proof thereof I cite as witnesses, the

---

1 Abu ‘l-Ma’shar al-Balkhī, generally known in Europe by the name of Albumaser, says in one of his astrological works (MS. of the Bib. du Roi, founts Ducaurroi, No. 24): “Mars is the indicator of (presides over) warriors, armed men, men of might, libertines, and highway-robber. Saturn is the indicator of kings, old men, gardeners, and farmers. Jupiter, of nobles, judges, wazirs, and devout and religious men. Venus, of women, eunuchs, and girls. Mercury, of katibs (penmen, secretaries), arithmeticians, merchants, artisans, and boys. The Sun, of kings and princes; and the Moon, of the post-house establishment (barīd), the common people, their trades, and the means, by which they gain their daily bread.” It may be seen from this that the Arabs have borrowed the attributes of the planets from the Greeks.

2 This verse is entirely composed of technical terms, such as are employed by dogmatic theologians in discussing the verses of the Qur’ān. The meaning of these terms being familiar to persons who have read Pococke’s Specimen and Sale’s preface to the Qur’ān, I think it unnecessary to explain them; the more so, as they are here used with a different signification.

bandages in which I am swathed and the oil with which I have been anointed<sup>1</sup>."

This idea is singularly original. He related that he composed the following lines in his sleep :

"We passed the night together, and my jealous foe bit his hands with anger. So ardent is my passion, that I should give the dark (pupils) of my eyes to prolong the darkness of the night."

In the year 628 (A.C. 1230-1) Sharaf al-Dīn 'Abd al-Raḥmān Ibn Abi 'l-Ḥasan Ibn 'Isā Ibn 'Alī Ibn Ya'rūb al-Bawāzījī, the poet arrived at Arbela, and Ibn al-Mustawfī, who was at that time wazīr, sent him a mathlūm by al-Kamāl Ibn al-Si'ār al-Mawṣilī, a person employed in his service, and the author of a historical work. By mathlūm is meant a dinār from which a small portion has been clipped off. This is a general practice in 'Irāq and the neighbouring countries; they employ these clippings in making purchases, and they called them qurāḍalī (clippings) ; the mathlūms are also employed by them in the same manner ; both sorts are very common among them. Al-Kamāl went to the poet, and said: "The Ṣāhib<sup>2</sup> greets thee, and requests thee to employ this sum for thy present wants, as he will soon send thee something more adequate to thy merit." The poet perceived that the coin was not perfect, and, thinking that Sharaf al-Dīn had sent it to him whole, he suspected al-Kamāl of having clipped it. Desirous of learning the truth of the matter from Sharaf al-Dīn, he wrote to him these lines :

"My lord wazīr ! you whose generosity is proverbial ! you sent me a moon perfect in beauty when at its full (or when with Kamāl!), but the servant brought it to me a crescent. It would not have decreased, had it not reached its full (or got into the hands of Kamāl), for such is the prescribed course of things."

The thought and the double meaning contained in these lines pleased Ibn al-Mustawfī so highly that he bestowed a reward on the poet, and treated him afterwards with great favour.

1 It seems from this that it was then customary to anoint infants with oil.

2 See No. 93.

When I left Arbela, in the year 626 (A.C. 1228-9), Sharaf al-Dīn was mustawfī of the Diwān (or council of state). In that country the istifa (or post of mustawfī) is one of the highest places under government being second only to that of wazīr. In the year 629 he was raised to the wazīrate, and he fulfilled the duties of this office to general satisfaction. He continued in place till the death of Muẓaffar al-Dīn (A.H. 630 ; see No. 522), but then, towards the middle of the month of Shawwāl, the imām (khalif) al-Mustanṣir took possession of Arbela, and Ibn al-Mustawfī received his dismissal. From that time he lived in domestic retirement, receiving, as I have been informed, constant tokens of public respect, till the city was taken by the Tartars, on the 27th of the month of Shawwāl, A.H. 634 (June. A.C. 1237)*. The fatal consequences of this event for Arbela and its inhabitants are well known<sup>1</sup>. (Ibn al-Mustawfī) Sharaf al-Dīn was one of those who took refuge in the citadel, and thus escaped. When the enemy raised the siege of the citadel, he proceeded to Moṣul, where he obtained a pension, and passed the rest of his life universally respected. He possessed a large collection of valuable books. His death took place at Moṣul, on Sunday, the 5 of Muḥarram, A.H. 637, (August, A.C. 1239),† and he was interred in the Sābilah cemetery, outside the Jaṣāṣah Gate. He was born on the 15 of Shawwāl, A.H. 564 (July, A.C. 1169)‡, in the citadel of Arbela. He came of a powerful family which produced a number of men distinguished by the posts which they held under government, or by their learning. The place of istifā at Arbela had been (previously) filled by his father, and by his uncle Ṣafī al-Dīn (pure in religion) Abu 'l-Ḥasan 'Alī Ibn al-Mubārak, a man of eminent abilities. It was he who translated

---

1 In the year 634, the Muḥḥuls took Arbela by storm, and put to the sword all the inhabitants who had taken refuge in the citadel. They then plundered the city, and having burned it down, they directed their attacks against the citadel, but after a forty days' siege, they evacuated the place on receiving a large sum from the garrison. During this period, the inhabitants defended themselves with great courage, but many of them died of thirst. (D'Ohsson's Hist. des Monghols, t. III, p. 73).

* 23 June.—Ed.

† 7 August.—Ed.

‡ 12 July.—Ed.

Abū Ḥāmid al-Ghazzālī's Naṣīḥat al-Mulūk (counsel for kings) from Persian into Arabic, for al-Ghazzālī had composed it in the former language. Sharaf al-Dīn (Ibn al-Mustawfī) notices this circumstance in his History, and I heard it mentioned also, during my residence in that country, as a well known fact. An elegiac poem was composed on the death of Ibn al-Mustawfī, by my friend Shams al-Dīn Abū 'l-'Izz Yūsūf Ibn al-Nafīs al-Irbilī, surnamed Shayṭān al-Shām (the demon of Syria). Shayṭān al-Shām was born at Arbela, A.H. 586 (A.C. 1190-1); he died at Moṣul, on the 16th of Ramaḍān, A.H. 638 (April, A.C. 1241)*, and was interred in the cemetery at the Jaṣāṣah gate. Speaking of Ibn al-Mustawfī, he said :

"O Abū 'l-Barakat ! had death known that thou wert the paragon of the age, it would not have smitten thee. The greatest of misfortunes which Islāmism could experience was the loss of one whom men and genii are lamenting."

Were I not apprehensive of extending this article too much, I should give a great many more anecdotes concerning him, and notice further particulars of his life, with some of the pieces composed in his praise ; for, God be merciful to him ! he was one of the ornaments of the age, and the like of him, for merit and influence, has never since existed in that city. We have already explained the meaning of the word Lakḥmī (No. 65) and need not therefore repeat it here.

529 IBN AL-DAHĤĀN

Abū Bakr al-Mubārak Ibn Abī Ṭālib al-Mubārak Ibn Abi 'l-Azhar Sa'id, surnamed al-Wajīh (the respectable), and generally known by the appellation of Ibn al-Dahḥān (the son of the ointment maker), was a native of Wāsiṭ, and a grammarian. The designation of al-Ḍarīr (the blind) was also given to him because he had lost his sight. He was born at Wāsiṭ, and passed his youth in that city ; he there learned the Qur'ān by heart, and was taught to read it according to the different systems ; he studied also the science (of jurisprudence), and took lessons there from Abū Sa'īd Naṣr Ibn Muḥammad Ibn Sālim, the philologist, Abu 'l-Faraj āl-'Alā Ibn al-Sawādī, the poet (No. 485), and other masters. He then removed to Baghdād, and, having taken up his residence in the Mūẓaffariyah (college), he became the disciple of Abū Muḥammad Ibn al-Khashshāb, the grammarian (No. 325), and Abu 'l-Barakāt Ibn al-Anbārī (No. 344). He attended Abu 'l-Barakāt's lessons with assiduity, and acquired vast information under his tuition. He learned Traditions from Abū Zar'ah* Ṭāhir Ibn Muḥammad Ibn Ṭāhir al-Maqḍisī, and, having abandoned the Ḥanbalite sect, he applied himself to the Ḥanafite system of jurisprudence. Some time after this, the place of grammatical professor at the Nizāmiyah college became vacant, and, as the founder of that professorship had ordained that it should never be filled by any but a Shafite, al-Wajīh Ibn al-Dahhān passed over to the Shafite sect, and obtained the situation. It was on this occasion that al-Muwayyad Abu 'l-Barakāt Ibn Zayd, a native of Tikrīt, composed the following verses :

---

* 31 March —Ed.

"Who will bear from me a message to al-Wajīh ? yet I know that every message will be useless !—Say to him : You passed to the sect of (Abū Ḥanīfah) al-Nu'mān, after following that of Ibn Ḥanbal ; you did so because you had nothing to eat. It was not through devotion that you next adopted the doctrines of al-Shāfi'ī, but through the desire of obtaining a profitable result. You will surely soon go over to the sect of Mālik ; mark what I say !"

Al-Wajīh composed some works on grammar, and taught the Qur'ān-readings during a long period. His conversation was excessively silly, his discourses prolix, his avarice extreme, and his pretensions exorbitant. He composed some poetry, of which may be quoted these verses :

---

1 Ibn Khallikān gives some account of Abū Zar'ah Ṭāhir al-Maqḍisī in the life of that Traditionist's father Muḥammad Ibn Ṭāhir al-Maqḍisī.

*The Egyptian edition gives Zur'aḥ which is supported by Qānūs.—Ed.

"Although thou art the prince of generous men, I do not blame thee for requiring to be pressed before thou fulfillest a promise. The Lord of heaven bound himself to furnish food to all men, yet He must be solicited by prayer."

He was born at Wāsiṭ, A.H. 532 (A.C. 1137-8) ; he died at Baghdād, on the eve of Sunday, the 26 of Shā'bān, A.H. 612 (December, A.C. 1215)*, and was interred in the Wardiyah cemetery.

530 MUJALLĪ IBN JUMAYYI'

Abu 'l-Ma'ālī Mujallī Ibn Jumayyi' Ibn Najā, a member of the tribe of Quraysh and of the family of Makhzūm, a native of Ursūf, and an inhabitant of Egypt, in which country also he died, was a doctor of the sect of al-Shāfi'i, and one of the most eminent in that age. He is the author of an ample treatise on jurisprudence, entitled Kitāb al-Jahkhā'ir (book of treasures), containing a great quantity of matter connected with the Shafite doctrine, and in which he has inserted a number of extraordinary cases, not, perhaps, to be found in any other work. This is an esteemed production, and in great request. In the year 547 (A.C. 1152), he was appointed qādī of Old Cairo by al-'Ādil Ibn al-Sallār (No. 460), who at that time held all Egypt under his rule ; and he was removed from office towards the beginning of the year 549 ; in one of the last ten days of Shā'bān (November, A.C. 1154), it is said. He died in the month of Dhū 'l-Qa'dah, A.H. 550 (December-January, A.C. 1155-6), and was interred in the Lesser Qarāfah cemetery. Ursūf is the name of a small town on the coast of Syria, which has produced many men eminent for learning, and was frequented by numbers of Muslims who kept garrison there (against the crusaders). It is now in the hands of the Franks (the crusaders) ; may God frustrate their project ! Postscript. Ursūf was retaken by al-Mālik al-Zāhir Bibars, in the year 663 (A.C. 1265).

---

* 20 December.—Ed.

531 ABŪ 'ALĪ AL-TANŪKHĪ THE QĀḌĪ

The qāḍī Abū 'Alī al-Muḥassin Ibn Abi 'l-Qāsim 'Alī Ibn Muḥammad Ibn Abi 'l-Fahm Dāwūd Ibn Ibrāhīm Ibn Tamīm al-Tanūkhī: we have already spoken of his father (No. 440), and given some account of his life, with extracts from his poetry, and al-Tha'ālibī (No. 356) speaks of them both in the same chapter (of his Yatīmah). He begins with his father, and then says of Abū 'Alī: He was a crescent of that moon; a branch of that tree; a decisive testimony of the glory and merit of that father; the master-shoot of that stem; his substitute during his life-time, and his successor after his death." It was of him that the poet Abū 'Abd Allāh Ibn al-Ḥajjāj (No. 186) said:

"If we speak of elderly qāḍīs, I acknowledge that I prefer the young to the old. Him who concurs not (with me), I should never strike but in the presence of our lord the qāḍī al-Tanūkhī<sup>1</sup>."

Abū 'Alī al-Tanūkhī is the author of a book called al-Farj ba'd al-Shiddah (solace after suffering). In the beginning of this work he says that, in the year 346 (A.C. 957), he was director of the weighing-office at the mint in Sūq al-Ahwāz<sup>2</sup>; and, a little further on, he states, that he had occupied the place of qāḍī at Jazīrah Ibn 'Umar. He left a diwān of poetry more voluminous than that of his father, and two other works, one entitled Kitāb Nashwān al-Muḥāḍarah (the excitement of conversation), and the other, Kitāb al-Mustajād min Fa'ālāt al-Ajwād (the noblest of the deeds of the generous). He took lessons at Baṣrah from Abū 'l-'Abbās al-Aḥram, Abū Bakr al-Ṣūlī<sup>3</sup>, al-Ḥusayn Ibn Muḥammad Ibn

---

1 I translate literally, but fear that I have neither perceived nor rendered the point of the verses. The poet perhaps means to say that, were they in the presence of al-Tanūkhī, he would strike his contradictor for not admitting the justness of his sentiments; al-Tanūkhī being himself a young man and of an amiable character.

2 This is the same city as al-Ahwāz. It was called also Hurmuz-shahr.

3 His life will be found in this work.

Yaḥyā Ibn 'Uṭhmān al-Nasawī, and other eminent masters of that day ; he then went down to Baghdād, and, having settled there, he continued to teach Traditions till his death. The masters from whom he obtained these Traditions were persons of the highest authority for veracity. He was an elegant scholar a poet, and an historian. He began to learn Traditions in the year 333 (A.C. 944-5), and he commenced his judicial career in A.H. 349 (A.C. 960-1) as qāḍī of al-Qaṣr, Bābil<sup>1</sup>, and the neighbouring districts, acting in the name of Abu 'l-Sā'ib 'Utbah Ibn 'Ubayd Allāh. The khalīf al-Muṭī' lillah then appointed him qāḍī of 'Askar Mukram, Ayḍaj<sup>2</sup>, and Rāmḥurmuz. After that, he (successively) filled a great number of posts in the civil administration, at different places. The following verses of his were composed on a certain shaykh who went out (one day with the people) to pray for rain : there was a cloud in the sky at the time, but when the shaykh finished, it cleared off :

"We went out to obtain rain from the blessed effect of his prayers, and the skirt of the cloud was then nearly touching the earth. But when he began to pray, the sky cleared up ; and he had not ended, before the cloud disappeared."

The following verses were composed, on a similar occasion, by Abu 'l-Ḥusayn Sulaymān Ibn Muḥammad Ibn al-Ṭarāwah, a grammarian, and a native of Malāqah in Spain :

"They went out to implore rain, and a cloud which promised a copious shower had already appeared in the West. When they took their places to pray, and it had begun to drizzle in their sight, it cleared off in answer to their invocations ; one

---

1 In later times the city of Babel (Bābil in Arabic) gave its name to a village which rose in the neighbourhood. As for al-Qaṣr (the castle), it may perhaps be the same as that which al-Idrīsī indicates as situated on the Tigris between Wāsiṭ and Baṣrah.

2 According to the author of the Marāṣīf, the city and canton of Ayḍaj lie between Khuzistān and I'bahān. He says that it possesses a bridge which is one of the wonders of the world.

might have thought they had gone forth to ask for fair weather."

The lines which follow are attributed to Abū 'Alī al-Tanūkhī :

"Say to the fair maiden in the gold-embroidered veil : Thou hast spoiled the devotion of a pious godly man. Between the brightness of thy veil and that of thy cheek, 'tis strange that thy face is not in flames. Thou hast combined the two means (of charming our hearts), and between the lustre of them both, thou canst not escape being beautiful<sup>1</sup>. When an eye is turned to steal a glance (at thee) the radiance of thy face says to it : Be gone, lest thy sight be gone<sup>2</sup>. ! "

How ingeniously imagined is that expression : Be gone, lest thy sight be gone ! These verses, on a veil embroidered with gold, remind me of a story which I read some time back at Moṣul. A certain merchant went to Madīnah with a camel-load of black veils, but, not finding any purchasers, his goods remained on his hands, and he gave way to sadness. A person then said to him that no one could assist him in obtaining a profitable sale for them except Miskīn al-Dārimī<sup>3</sup>. This Miskīn was an excellent poet, celebrated for his wit and licentiousness. The merchant went to him, and found that he had taken to devotion, and never stirred out of the mosque. Having explained his business to him, he received this answer : "What can I do for you ? I have renounced poetry, and given myself up to my present occu-

---

1 This is the meaning of the Arabic verse, which is in reality a succession of puns on a single word.

2 I have here endeavoured to express both the meaning and the quibbling of the original Arabic. The poet, continuing his puns on the different grammatical forms of the root dhahaba adds here : adhābī la tadhhabī. Away ! lest thou shouldst become blind ; or, lest thou shouldst be destroyed.

3 Of the poet Rabī'ah Ibn 'Āmir, surnamed Miskīn al-Dārimī, I have been unable to discover any further information, than that given by M. de Sacy in his Anthologic, Grammaticale, p. 399.

pation." The merchant answered : "I am a stranger here, and have no other goods but that load." In short, he spared no entreaty, till at length Miskīn left the mosque, and having put on the clothes he formerly wore, he composed these verses and gave them to the public :

"Say to the handsome maiden in the black veil : 'What design have you formed against a pious devotee ? He had just girded his loins for prayer, when you sat in ambush for him at the door of the mosque ! ' "

The report immediately spread about that Miskīn al-Dārimī had relapsed into his former mode of life, and become enamoured with a female who wore a black veil. On this, there was not a belle in the city but wanted a black veil, and such was their eagerness to procure them, that the merchant disposed of those he had at exorbitant prices. When all were sold, Miskīn returned to his devout exercises in the retirement of the Mosque. The qāḍī Abū 'Alī al-Tanūkhī wrote the following lines to a man of high rank, in the month of Ramaḍān :

"May you obtain by this fast whatever you desire, and may God protect you from whatever you may dread. As this month excels all the others, so you surpass all mankind ; nay, you are like the night of al-Qadr<sup>1</sup> in it."

He composed many other exquisite pieces. His death took place at Baghdād, on the eve of Monday, the 25 of Muḥarram, A.H. 384 (March, A.C. 994)*. He was born at Baṣrah, on the eve of Sunday, the 26 of the first Rabī', A.H. 327 (January, A.C. 939)†. His son, Abu 'l-Qāsim 'Alī Ibn al-Muḥassin al-Tanūkhī, was an accomplished scholar and a man of great merit. He composed some poetry, but I have never seen any of it. He had been a pupil of Abu 'l-'Alā al-Ma'arri (No. 46), and acquired much

---

1 "The night of al-Qadr is better than a thousand months". See Qur'ān, sūrah 97, and Sale's note.

* 18 April.—Ed.

† 2 April.—Ed.

information under his tuition. A great quantity of poetical pieces were transmitted by him to his own pupils. The family to which he and his brother belonged was noted for producing literary men of distinguished wit and talent. He was born at Baṣrah, on the 15 of Shā'bān, A.H. 365 (April, A.C. 976)*, and he died on Sunday, the 1st of Muḥarram, A.H. 447 (April, A.C. 1055)†. A close intimacy was formed between him and the khaṭīb Abū Zakariyā al-Tabrizī<sup>1</sup>, through the medium of Abu 'l-'Ala al-Ma'arrī. The Khaṭīb (Abū Bakr) (No. 33) has a notice on him in the History of Baghdād, and enumerates the masters from whom he received and transmitted his traditional information; he then mentions that he himself wrote down some pieces under his dictation, and he assigns to his birth and death the same dates as those given here, with the sole difference that, according to him, he died on the eve of Monday, the 2 of Muḥarram, at his own house, in the street of al-Tall. He states also that he attended his funeral, the next day, and said prayers over him. To this he adds, that he (Abu 'l-Qāsim) first began to acquire traditional information in the month of Shā'bān, A.H. 370<sup>2</sup>. He says also that, when quite a youth, the testimony of Abu 'l-Qāsim was received as valid, and that it continued to be so till the end of his life (a decisive proof that his character for morality had never been impeached). He was extremely cautious in giving evidence, guarded in his conduct, and veracious in his discourse. He filled the place of qādl in a number of places, such as al-Madā'in and its dependencies, Ādharbā'ijān, al-Baradān<sup>3</sup>, Qirmīsh (Kirmānshāh), etc.—We have already spoken of the word Tanūkhī (No. 46). It was to Abu 'l-Qāsim al-Tanūkhī that Abu 'l-'Ala al-Ma'arrī addressed the qaṣīdah beginning thus: Speak to me of Baghdād or of Hīt.

---

1 His life will be found in this work (No. 773).

2 He means to say that, at the age of five years, Abū 'l-Qāsim had already learned by heart some Traditions, pieces of verse, etc.

3 Al-Baradān lay on the east bank of the Tigris, at five parasangs above Baghdād.

* 10 March.—Ed.

† 20 January.—Ed.

532 AL-SHĀFI'Ī

The imām Abū 'Abd Allāh Muḥammad Ibn Idrīs al-Shāfi'ī was a member of the tribe of Quraysh, and drew his descent from al-Muṭṭalib, the son of 'Abd Manāf and the ancestor of the Prophet; his father, Idrīs, being the son of al-'Abbās Ibn 'Uthmān Ibn Shāfi' Ibn al-Sā'ib Ibn 'Ubayd Ibn 'Abd Yazīd Ibn Hishām Ibn al-Muṭṭalib Ibn 'Abd Manāf. The remainder of the genealogy, up to 'Adnān, is sufficiently known<sup>1</sup>. His great-grandfather Shāfi' when a boy just grown up, saw the Envoy of God (Muḥammad). Al-Sā'ib, the father of Shāfi'ī, bore the standard of the Hāshimid family at the battle of Badr; he was taken prisoner in that combat, but redeemed himself from captivity. When he subsequently became a Muslim, he was asked why he did not embrace the true faith when made prisoner, and thus avoid paying the ransom; he replied that he was not a man to frustrate the expectations which the Muslims had founded on it. Al-Shāfi'ī (the subject of this article) stood unrivalled by his abundant merits and illustrious qualities; to the knowledge of all the sciences connected with the book of God (the Qur'ān), the Sunnah (the Traditions), the sayings of the Companions, their history, the conflicting opinions of the learned (jurisconsults), etc., he untied a deep acquaintance with the language of the Arabs of the Desert, philology, grammar, and poetry; indeed, he was so well conversant with the last sciences, that al-Aṣma'ī, eminent as he was in these branches of learning, read over the poems of the Hudhaylites under his tuition. He combined in himself such a variety of scientific information as never possessed by any other man, and Aḥmad Ibn Ḥanbal (No. 19) went so far as to say: "I did not know the annulling from the annulled Traditions, till I took lessons from al-Shāfi'ī". "Never did I see a man, said Abū 'Ubayd al-Qāsim-Ibn Sallām (No. 509), "more accomplished than al-Shāfi'ī". 'Abd Allāh, the son of Aḥmad Ibn Ḥanbal, related as follows: "I said to my father: 'What sort of a man was al-Shāfi'ī, that I hear you pray blessings on him so often?' and he replied: 'My dear boy! al-Shāfi'ī was (to mankind) as the sun is to the world and health to body; what can replace them?" "Aḥmād Ibn Ḥanbal said also: "Never, for the last thirty years, have I passed a night without praying God's mercy and blessings upon al-Shāfi'. " Yaḥyā Ibn Mā'in<sup>1</sup> said: "Aḥmad Ibn Ḥanbal forbade us (attending the lessons of) al-Shāfi'; but, meeting him one day walking on foot after al-Shāfi', who was mounted on a mule, I said, to him: 'Abū 'Abd Allāh! you forbade us to frequent him, and you yourself are walking after him!' To which he replied: 'Silence! if I even kept company with his mule, I should profit by it.'" The khaṭīb (No. 33) has inserted in his History of Baghdād the following relation given by Ibn 'Abd al-Ḥakam<sup>2</sup>: "When al-Shāfi' was still in his mother's womb, she dreamt that the planet Jupiter came forth from it and proceeded to Egypt, where it fell, but that a portion of its rays reached every city upon earth. The interpreters of dreams declared this to signify that she would give birth to a learned man, who would communicate his knowledge to the people of Egypt alone, but that it would spread into all other countries." "I went to take lessons from Mālik," said al-Shāfi' "after having learned by heart his Muwaffā, and he told me to go to some person who would repeat the book to me (so that I might learn it), but I replied that I would repeat it myself (to him). I then did so from memory, and he pronounced these words: 'If any person is ever to prosper, it is this youth!'" When Sufyān Ibn 'Uyaynah (No. 249) was consulted on the meaning of a passage of the Qur'ān, or on a point of law, he would turn towards al-Shāfi' and say: "Ask that boy." Al-Ḥumaydī<sup>3</sup> relates that he heard Muslim

<sup>1</sup> See Sale, introduction to Qur'ān; Pococke's Specimen, Hist. ar. page. 49, 50, 51; Eichhorn's Monumenta hist. ar. Tab. I.

---

1 His life is given by Ibn Khallikān.

2 The life of Abū 'Abd Allāh Muḥammad Ibn 'Abd al-Ḥakam is given by our author.

3 The imām Abū Bakr 'Abd Allāh Ibn al-Zubayr Ibn 'Ubayd Allāh al-Asadī al-Ḥumaydī, a member of the tribe of Quraysh and a native of Makkah, was a disciple of the Imām al-Shāfi' and accompanied him to Egypt. The Ḥakīm Ibn al-Bālī styles him the Muṣṭafī and Traditionist of Makkah, and declares that he was for the people of Hijāz what Aḥmad Ibn Ḥanbal was for those of 'Irāq. He died in the month of the first Rabī', A.H. 219 (March-April, A.C. 834). (Ṭabaqāt al-Shāfi').

Ibn Khālid al-Zanjī<sup>1</sup> say to al-Shāfi'i "Give opinions on points of law, O Abū 'Abd Allāh ! it is time for you to do so ; " and that al-Shāfi'i was only fifteen years of age at the time. Maḥfūz Ibn Abī Tawbah, a native of Baghdād, relates as follows : " I saw Aḥmad Ibn Ḥanbal near al-Shāfi'i in the Sacred Mosque, and I told him that Sufyān Ibn 'Uyaynah was then teaching Traditions in another part of the edifice ; on which he said : 'This one would be a loss to me, but the other would not.' " Abu 'l-Ḥassān al-Ziyādī said : "I never saw Muḥammad Ibn al-Ḥasan<sup>2</sup> show so much honour to any doctor as he did to al-Shāfi'i. He was just mounting his horse, one day, when al-Shāfi'i came to see him, and he immediately returned with him into the house, and they remained in private (conversation) till the night set in. Yet Muḥammad Ibn Hasan never admitted any person into his presence." Al-Shāfi'i was the first who ever gave lectures on the fundamentals of jurisprudence, and that branch of science had him for its author. Abū Thawr (No. 2) said : "Whoever pretends that he saw the like of al-Shāfi'i for learning, elegance of language, general knowledge, and solid information, is a liar. He lived without a rival, and, on his death, he left none to replace him." "There is not a person," said Aḥmad Ibn Ḥanbal, "who holds an inkhorn or a sheet of paper, but is under the deepest obligations to al-Shāfi'i." And as for al-Za'farānī (No. 149), he said that the Traditionists were sleeping till al-Shāfi'i came and awoke them. His merits were innumerable. He was born A.H. 150 (A.C. 767-8) ; on the day, it is said, on which Abū Ḥanīfah died ; his birth took place at Ghazzah ; some say, but erroneously, at 'Asqalān, or in Yaman. At the age of two years he was carried from Ghazzah to Makkah, where he passed his youth and studied the Qur'ān.

1 Abū Khālid Muslim Ibn Khālid Ibn Sa'īd, surnamed, for his red complexion, al-Zanjī (native of Zangebār, was one of the imām al-Shāfi'i's masters. He belonged to the tribe of Quraysh and the family of Muḥzūm, being a mawla to Sufyān Ibn 'Abd Allāh. He was an able doctor and juris-consult, but his authority as a Traditionist has been rejected by Ibn al-Madīnī and al-Bukhārī. He succeeded Ibn Jurayj as Muftī of Makkah, and he died in that city, A.H. 180 (A.C. 796-7) Ṭabaqāt al-Fuqahā. MSS. No. 755, fol. 21.)

2 The life of this celebrated doctor will be found in this work.

The history of his journey to see Mālik is so well known that it is needless to lengthen this article by repeating it<sup>1</sup>. In the year 195 (A.C. 810-1) he went to Baghdād, and, having passed two years in that city, he returned to Makkah. In the year 198 he revisited Baghdād, and after a month's residence he set out for Old Cairo, where he arrived A.H. 199 (A.C. 814-5), or 201, by another account. He continued to dwell there till his death; this event occurred on Friday, the last day of Rajab, A.H. 204 (Jan, A.C. 820)* and, on the evening of the same day, he was buried in the lesser Qarāfah cemetery. His tomb is much frequented by pious visitors, and is situated near mount Muqattam. Al-Rabī' Ibn Sulaymān al-Murādi (No. 221) mentioned that he perceived the new moon of the month of Shā'bān as he was returning from the funeral (and this would prove that he was interred on the eve of the first day of the month). "Some time after his death," said al-Rabī', "I saw him in a dream, and said to him: 'O Abū 'Abd Ailāh) how did God treat thee?' and he replied. "He seated me on a throne of gold, and pearls, fresh (from the sea,) were scattered over me. '" All the learned men without exception, Traditionists, juriconsults, dogmatic theologians, philologers, grammarians, etc., agree in acknowledging his veracity, integrity, probity, piety, unblemished character, purity of morals, mortified life, virtuous conduct, intrinsic merit, and generosity<sup>2</sup>. He composed a great quantity of poetry, and I shall insert here a piece of his composition, which I copied from the handwriting of the ḥāfiẓ al-Silafī (No. 43):

"He who is blessed with riches and has not received praises or commendation, is a luckless wight. Wealth brings the most

---

1 The only thing particular in this journey was the short conversation which passed between him and Mālik, and which our author has already given in al-Shāfi''s own words.

2 The manuscript of the Bib. du Roi, ancien fonds, No. 856, contains an account of al-Shāfi', his life, sayings, virtues, etc. It is a short and interesting work; nearly all of what Ibn Khallikān says in the present article is to be found there, and expressed in the same terms.

* 20 January.—Ed.

distant object within reach ; wealth opens every well-barred door. If you hear that 2 piece of wood produced fruits when held in a rich man's hand, believe it. If you hear that a poor man went to drink at a spring, and that the water sank into the earth, hold it to be true. If riches could be obtained by subtle policy, you would have found me clinging to the stars of heaven in search thereof. But he who is gifted with intellect is denied riches : how widely do intellect and riches stand apart ! A proof of God's providence is found in the indigence of the sage and the pleasant life of the fool."

The following verses are attributed to al-Shāfi'ī :

"What will thy guest answer if his family ask how was his reception? Shall he say that he crossed the Euphrates without being able to obtain a drop of its waters, although its waves rolled high? that, when he mounted the ascent of glory, the narrowness of the path prevented him from reaching the object of his wishes? By my adulation you may discover my poverty, as the glass shows the dregs in the water which it contains. But I possess the jewels and the pearls of poetry ; I wear the diadem and the crown of style ; its flowers surpass those of the gardens on the hills, and its smoothness outvies that of an irrigated meadow<sup>1</sup>. An elegant poet is a dangerous serpent, and verses are his poisonous slaver and foam. The enmity of a poet is a dire calamity, but it is easy for the generous man to avert it. "

It was he who said :

"Were it not discredit for men of learning to cultivate poetry, I should be to-day a better poet than Labīd<sup>2</sup>?

The following lines are attributed to al-Shāfi'ī.

"The more experience instructs me, the more I see the weakness of my reason ; and the more I increase my knowledge, the more I learn the extent of my ignorance."

---

1 In the original Arabic, the last words of this verse have such various significations, that I may possibly have mistaken the idea which the poet meant to convey.

2 He means Labīd, the author of one of the seven Mu'allaqahs.

The following verse is also attributed to him :

"He meant good, and wrought harm undesignedly ; thus acts of piety may sometimes become acts of disobedience."

He related that having married a woman of the tribe of Quraysh, at Makkah, he happened to say her in sport :

"How unfortunate that you love one who loves you not! "

And that she answered (in the same rhyme and measure) :

"She averts her face, and you entreat her, but succeed not. "

One of our most eminent shaykhs informed me that he composed thirteen works on the merits of al-Shāfi'ī. When this great imām died, his death was lamented in numerous elegies. One of these elegies is attributed to Abū Bakr Ibn Durayd<sup>1</sup>, and the Khaṭīb has noticed in his History of Baghdād. It contains the following passages :

"See you not the memorials which the son of Idrīs has left of his existence ? in the obscurities of science their guiding lights direct us ; eternal monuments on which time spends its efforts in vain ; they still rear their pinnacles aloft, though ages have expired. (They make the) paths which conduct (to knowledge) and trace (for us) the ways of rectitude. Their obvious meaning is wisdom itself, and the deductions drawn from them embody principles which, till then, had been completely disunited. When calamity darkens the world, the genius of the son of Idrīs, the cousin of Muḥammad, spreads over it a brilliant light. When grave difficulties embarrass the mind, the brightness of that genius clears up all obscurities. God chose to raise him and exalt him ; none can depress the man who is exalted by the master of the (heavenly) throne. Truth was his aim, and piety preserved him from error ; 'tis terror that degrades a man. He recurred to the example of the Prophet, and his decisions are held to be second only to the Prophet's. In his decisions and judgments he placed his reliance on what is fixed by Divine revelation : truth is always plain and clear.

---

1 His life will be found in this work.

In childhood and youth he arrayed himself in piety ; when a boy, he was favoured with the wisdom of old age. He shaped his conduct so sagely, that, when merit was sought for, every finger pointed towards him. He who takes al-Shāfi'i's learning for guide, will find an ample pasture in the field of learning. Salutations to the tomb which encloses his body ! may the dark rain-clouds refresh it with copious showers. The earth of that grave has covered from our view the body of an illustrious man, once highly honoured when auditors flocked around him. Misfortune has afflicted us by his death, but, for its conduct towards him, it must receive affliction in its turn : for his maxims subsist among us, refulgent as the moon ; and his traces remain, luminous as the rising stars."

If it be asked how it came that Ibn Durayd, who was not contemporary with al-Shāfi'i, composed an elegy on his death, we answer that there is nothing extraordinary in such a circumstance, and that it is perfectly natural ; we have besides met other examples of it, as in the case of al-Ḥusayn (the son of 'Alī,) etc.

533 IBN AL-ḤANAFIYAH

Abu 'l-Qāsim Muḥammad, the son of 'Alī, the son of Abū Ṭālib, was generally known by the surname of Ibn al-Ḥanafīyah (the son of the Ḥanafite female), because his mother Khawlah was the daughter of Ja'far Ibn Qays Ibn Salamah Ibn Tha'labah Ibn Yarbū' Ibn Tha'labah Ibn al-Du'al Ibn Ḥanīfah Ibn Lujaym. Some say, however, that she was one of the captives taken in Yamāmah<sup>1</sup>, and that she passed into the possession of 'Alī. Others again say that she was of a black colour and a native of Sind ; that she had been a servant to a member of the tribe of <sup>1</sup> The expedition into the province of Yamāmah by Khālīd Ibn al-Walīd had for object the destruction of the false prophet Musaylamah and his partisans. A very full account of it is given by al-Ṭabarī. See Kosegarten's Taberistanensis Annales, vol. I, page. 149. et seq. See also Price's Retrospect, vol. I. p. 41, etc., and Abu 'l-Feda's Annals, year 11.

---

Ḥanīfah, and that she did not belong to it by birth. They add, that Khālīd Ibn al-Walīd granted peace to this tribe on condition that they should surrender up to him their slaves, not themselves. Relative to the surname of Abu 'l-Qāsim borne by Ibn al-Ḥanafīyah, it is said that he was indebted for it to the kindness of God's blessed Envoy (Muḥammad), who said to 'Alī: "After my death, a son shall be born to thee, and I bestow on him from this moment my own name and surname; but let no other of my people bear them both." (Yet) among the persons who bore the name of Muḥammad joined to the surname of Abu 'l-Qāsim were Muḥammad, the son of Abū Bakr al-Ṣiddīq (the first Khālīf); Muḥammad, the son of Ṭalḥah Ibn 'Ubayd Allāh; Muḥammad, the son of Sa'd Ibn Abī Waqqāṣ, Muḥammad, the son of 'Abd al-Raḥmān Ibn 'Awf; Muḥammad, the son of Ja'far Ibn Abī Ṭālib; Muḥammad, the son of Ḥāṭib Ibn Abī Balta'ah, and Muḥammad, the son of al-Ash'ath Ibn Qays. Ibn al-Ḥanafīyah was a man of great learning (in the law), and profound piety; the shaykh Abū Ishāq al-Ḥārāzī (No. 5) has even given him a place in his Ṭabaqāt al-Fuqahā, or classified list of jurisconsults. Some extraordinary anecdotes are told of his great bodily strength, and one of them is thus related by al-Mubarrad, in his Kāmil: " 'Alī, the father of Ibn al-Ḥanafīyah, had a coat of mail which he found too long, and he therefore ordered a certain quantity of the ring work to be cut off it. On this, his son Muḥammad took the skirt of it with one hand and the body with the other, and tore off the piece at the spot marked by his father. When this circumstance was told to 'Abd Allāh Ibn al-Zubayr, he was seized with an afkal, or trembling fit, so jealous did he feel of Ibn Ḥanafīyah's strength." Ibn al-Zubayr also possessed great strength, and on this subject al-Mubarrad relates the following anecdote in his work<sup>1</sup>: "He that was king of the Greeks in the days of Mu'āwīyah sent to that Khālīf a message expressed in these terms: 'The kings thy predecessors used to send envoys to our kings, and each party endeavoured to produce something by which it might surpass the other; permit me then to do as they.' Mu'āwīyah gave his permission, and the king sent him two men, one, very tall and bulky, the other possessing great strength. Mu'āwiyah then said to 'Amr Ibn al-Āṣī: 'As for the tall fellow, we can find his match in Qays Ibn Sa'd Ibn 'Ubaydah, but, with regard to the strong one, we stand in need of your advice.' 'Amr made answer: 'There are here two (strong) men, but you dislike them both; I mean Muḥammad Ibn al-Ḥanafiyah and 'Abd Allāh Ibn al-Zubair.' 'Come what may,' replied Mu'āwiyah, 'take the one who is nearest (related) to us.' When the two men (sent by the king of the Greeks) were brought in, a message was sent to inform Qays Ibn Sa'd, and he entered soon after. Having made his salutation to Mu'āwiyah, he took off his trousers and handed them to the foreign infidel (who tried them on), and they came up to his breast, on which he hung down his head as one who is vanquished. It is mentioned that they blamed Qays for this action, saying to him: 'Why didst thou take such a liberty in the presence of Mu'āwiyah? why didst thou not send thy adversary another pair?' And he replied:

<sup>1</sup> The life of al-Mubarrad will be found in this work.

'I wished all to know, and in the presence of the envoys, that these trousers belonged to Qays; lest it might be said: 'Qays has kept away, and these trousers belong to a man descended from 'Ād and related to Thamūd'. But I am the chief of eighty men, and mankind consists of those who command and those who are commanded. By my origin and rank I resemble other men, but by the length of my body I surpass them.'

Mu'āwiyah then sent for Ibn al-Ḥanafiyah, and, when he came in, he informed him for what purpose his presence was required. Ibn al-Ḥanafiyah then said (to the interpreters): 'Tell him to take his choice, either to sit down and give me his hand so that I may try and pull him up, or else to stand and I shall sit down'. The Greek preferred sitting down, and Muḥammad Ibn al-Ḥanafiyah pulled him up on his feet, whilst he was unable to pull Ibn al-Ḥanafiyah down. Having then asked Ibn al-Ḥanafiyah to sit, he pulled at him, but was pulled down himself. Both Greeks retired vanquished<sup>1</sup>." Ibn al-Ḥanafiyah bore his father's standard at the battle of the Camel; it is said that, in the early part of the day, he hesitated to take it because it was a war between Muslims, a thing which had never been witnessed before; but his father 'Alī said to him: "Canst thou have doubts concerning (the just cause of) an army commanded by thy father?" These words decided him, and he took charge of the standard. He was once asked how it happened that his father exposed him to dangers and thrust him into difficulties, whilst he never risked his other sons, al-Ḥasan and al-Ḥusayn? To this he replied "They were his two eyes and I was his hands, and he protected his eyes with his hands." One of his sayings was: "He is not a man of prudence who, when in company with a person whom he cannot avoid, does not treat him with politeness, till such times as God may set him free." When 'Abd Allāh Ibn al-Zubayr proclaimed himself Khalif and received the oath of allegiance from the people of Hījāz, he told 'Abd Allāh Ibn al-'Abbās and Muḥammad Ibn al-Ḥanafiyah to take the oath, but they refused, saying: "We shall not enter into such an engagement with thee till thou hast all the land under thy orders, and the people unanimous in thy favour." From that moment he rendered their residence in his neighbourhood extremely irksome, and employed every means of annoying them; he even threatened to burn them alive unless they took the oath. But the history of these proceedings would lead us too far. Ibn al-Ḥanafiyah came into the world (A.H. 21, A.C. 642) two years before the death of the Khalif 'Umar, and he died at Madīnah, on the first of Muḥarram, A.H. 81 (Feb. A.C. 700);* others say 83, 82 and 73. The funeral service was said over 1 I have already made the remark that al-Mubarrad's work seems unworthy of confidence, and I must here express my regret that Ibn Khallikān should have been tempted to quote it so often as he does.

1 'Ād and Thamūd were two Arabic tribes of great antiquity. The Ādites were of prodigious stature, the largest being one hundred cubits high, and the least sixty; so Jalāl al-Dīn and al-Zamaksharī inform us in their commentaries on the Qur'ān, when explaining these words, addressed by the prophet Hūd to the 'Ādites: "Call to mind how He hath appointed you successors unto the people of Noah, and hath added unto your stature largely." (Qur'ān, sūrah 7, verse 67).

---

* 26 February—Ed.

him by Abbān, the son of 'Uthmān Ibn 'Affān, who was then governor of the city. His corpse was deposited in the Baqī' Cemetery; but some persons state that he had fled to Ṭā'if in order to escape from Ibn al-Zubayr, and that he died there. Others again say that he died at Aylāh. The sect called al-Kaysāniyah believe him to be one of the Imāms, and that he is still residing at Mount Raḍwāh. Kuthayyir, the lover of 'Azzah, who was himself a Kaysānite, alludes to this opinion in the following verses from one of his poems:

"A grandson (of the Prophet's) who shall not taste of death till he lead on the cavalry preceded by the standards. He remains concealed and invisible for a time, at Raḍwāh, having honey near him and water."

Al-Mukhtār Ibn 'Ubayd al-Thaqafī was the person who called on the people to acknowledge Muḥammad Ibn al-Ḥanafīyah for Imām, pretending that he was the Mahdī<sup>1</sup>. Al-Jawharī says in his Ṣaḥāḥ, that Kaysān was the surname of this Mukhtār. Other authors say that Kaysān was a mawlā to 'Alī Ibn Abī Ṭālib. The Kaysānites pretend that Ibn al-Ḥanafīyah is still residing in a valley of Mount Raḍwā, and that he is not dead. According to them, he entered there with forty of his companions, and that they were never heard of after; they are still alive, however, and receive their sustenance (from God). They say also that he remains in this mountain with a lion on one side of him and a panther on the other; near him are two springs, running with water and honey, and he will return to 1 Mahdī (for so this word must be pronounced, inasmuch as it is the passive participle of the first form of the verb hadda, to direct) signifies the guided, or the well-directed. Sale and others are mistaken in pronouncing it Muhdī and translating it the director. According to the Muslims, the end of the world will be announced by a number of signs, one of which is to be the appearance of the Mahdī, "concerning whom Muḥammad prophesied that the world should not have an end till one of his own family should govern the Arabians, whose name should be the same with his own name, and whose father's name should also be the same with his father's name; and who should fill the earth with righteousness." (Sale's Preliminary Discourse to the Qur'an).

---

the world and fill it with justice. Muḥammad (Ibn al-Ḥanafiyah) dyed his hair with ḥinnā and katam<sup>1</sup>; he used also to wear his ring on the left hand. The histories told of him are well known. The imāmate passed from him to his son, Abū Hāshim 'Abd Allāh and from him to Muḥammad Ibn 'Alī, the father of (the Khalifs) al-Saffāh and al-Manṣūr. Of this we shall speak in the life of Muḥammad Ibn 'Alī. Al-Ṭabarī says, in his great historical work, under the year 144, that Raḍwā is the mountain of (the tribe of) Juhaynah, and that it is situated in the canton of Yanbū'. Others state that it lies at a day's journey from Yanbū', and at seven days' journey from Madīnah; to the right of it passes the road leading to Madīnah, and, to the left, the road leading to the desert, if the traveller be going up to Makkah. It is at two days' journey from the sea. God knows if this be correct! Abu 'l-Yaqzān<sup>2</sup> says, in his Kitāb al-Nisab that Ibn al-Ḥanafiyah had a son called al-Haytham, and he was held away (muwakhkhadh) from the mosque of the Prophet, being unable to enter it. As a word of the (Arabic) language, al-akhidh (the held) means a prisoner: and al-ukhdha, signifies any charm, such as magic. It would appear from this that the youth was enchanted.

534 MUḤAMMAD AL-BĀQIR

Abū Ja'far Muḥammad, the son of Zayn al-'Ābidīn 'Alī (No. 397), the son of al-Ḥusayn, the son of 'Alī Ibn Abī Ṭālib, surnamed al-Bāqir, was one of the twelve Imāms according to the belief of those who admit the imāmate<sup>3</sup>, and the father

1 The Kalm (buxus dioica of Forskel) is a species of ḥinnā. For its description and use, see Dr. Sontheimer's Heil-und Nahrungsmittel von Ibn Baithar, vol. II, page 348.

2 Abu 'l-Yaqzān 'Āmir Ibn Hafa, surnamed Suḥaym, was a traditionist of acknowledged authority in whatever regarded the history, genealogy, virtues, and vices of the Arabs. He composed a great number of works, mostly genealogical and the titles of which are given in the Fihrist (MS. 874, fol. 31). According to the author of that work, he died A.H. 170 (A.C. 786-7).

3 That is, "Who maintain that 'Alī Ibn Abī Ṭālib was lawful khalif and imām, and that the supreme authority, both in spirituals and temporals, of right belongs to his descendants, notwithstanding they may be deprived of it by the injustice of others or their own fear." (Sale's Preliminary Discourse.)

of Ja'far al-Šādiq (No. 128). Al-Bāqir held a high rank not only by birth but by learning. He received the appellation of al-Bāqir (the ample) because he collected an ample fund (tabaqqar) of knowledge<sup>1</sup>. It is of him that the poet says:

"O thou, copious collector (bāqir) of knowledge for (the instruction of) the pious! and best of those who ever said labbayka<sup>2</sup> on the mountain!"

He was born at Madīnah on Tuesday, the third of the month of Šafar, A. H. 57 (Dec, A. C. 676),* and he completed his third year on the day in which his grandfather al-Ḥusayn was murdered. His mother, Umm 'Abd Allāh, was the daughter of al-Ḥasan Ibn al-Ḥasan Ibn 'Alī Ibn Abī Ṭālib. He died at al-Ḥummaymah, in the month of the first Rabi', A. H. 113 (May-June, A. C. 731); others say, on the 23rd of Šafar, A. H. 114, or in 117, or the year following. His corpse was carried to Madīnah and interred at the Baqī' cemetery, in the tomb wherein are deposited the bodies of his father, and his father's uncle, al-Ḥasan the son of 'Alī; it is placed under the same dome which covers the tomb of al-'Abbās. We have already spoken of al-Ḥumaymah, in the life of 'Alī Ibn 'Abd Allāh Ibn al-'Abbās (No. 400).

535 MUḤAMMAD AL-JAWĀD

Abū Ja'far Muḥammad, the son of 'Alī al-Riḍā (No. 398) the son of Mūsā al-Kāzim<sup>3</sup>, the son of Ja'far al-Šādiq (No. 128), the son of Muḥammad al-Bāqir (see the preceding article), and

1 Others say that he was called al-Bāqir because he split open (Baqara knowledge, that is, he scrutinized it, and examined into the depths of it.

2 Labbayka signifies: Here I am at thy service! It is an exclamation employed by the pilgrims on approaching the city of Makkah. In d' Ohsson's Tab. gen. de l'Empire Othom. tom. III, pages 66 and 67, will be found full information on this subject.

3 His life will be found in this work.

* 16 December.—Ed.

† 24 April (A.C. 732) or 24 March (A.C. 735). Ed.

surnamed al-Jawād (the generous), was one of the twelve imāms. Having gone to Baghdād with his wife, Umm al-Faḍl, the daughter of (the khalif) al-Māmūn, on a visit to (the khalif) al-Mu'taṣim, he died in that city. His wife was then borne to the palace of her uncle al-Mu'taṣin and placed in the harem with the other women. Al-Jawād used to repeat the following saying of 'Alī Ibn Abī Tālib's citing, at the same time, the names of his ancestors through whom it had been successively transmitted down: "The blessed Prophet sent me to Yaman, and he counselled me, saying: 'O 'Alī! he is never disappointed who asks good (from God); and he never has a motive for repenting who asks advice. Make it a point to travel by night, for more ground can be got over by night than by day. O 'Alī! rise betimes! in the name of God for God hath bestowed a blessing on my people in their early rising.' " He used to say: "Whosoever gaineth unto himself a brother in God, hath gained for himself a mansion in Paradise." Ja'far Ibn Muḥammad Ibn Mazyad relates as follows: "I happened to be in Baghdād, when Muḥammad Ibn Mandah Ibn Mihra-yazd said to me: 'Would you like me to introduce you to Muḥammad, the son of 'Alī al-Riḍā?' I replied: 'Certainly, I would.' He then took me in to him, and we saluted and sat down. He (the imām) then said: 'A saying of the blessed Prophet was, that Fāṭimah lived chastely, wherefore God pronounced that her offspring should not be touched by the fire (of hell). But this applied specially to al-Ḥasan and al-Ḥusayn.' " Numerous anecdotes are told of him. He was born on Tuesday, the 5 of Ramaḍān, some say the 15, A.H. 195 (June, A.C. 811)*, and he died at Baghdād on Tuesday, the 5 of Dhu'l-Ḥijjah, A.H. 220 (December, A.C. 835)†. Some say that he died in the year 219. He was interred near his grandfather, Mūsā, the son of Ja'far, in the Cemetery of the Quraysh, and the funeral service was said over him by al-Wāṭhiq, the son of " (the khalif) al-Mu'taṣim.

1 In the printed text, for لعل read. لعل

* According to Edward Mahler's calculation Tuesday did not fall on the fifth or the fifteenth of the month of Ramaḍān. However if three months in succession were of 29 days each, in that case Tuesday could fall on 15 Ramaḍān corresponding to June A.C. 811 or else it was 11 June or 1 June. -Ed.

† 30 November. -Ed.

536 MUḤAMMAD AL-ḤUJJAH

Abu 'l-Qāsim Muḥammad, the son of al-Ḥasan al-'Askari (No. 161) the son of 'Alī al-Hādī (No. 399), the son of Muḥammad al-Jawād (see the preceding article), was one of the twelve Imāms, according to the opinion of the Imamites. He was surnamed al-Ḥujjah (the proof of the truth), and it is he whom the Shi'ites pretend to be the (Muntaẓar the expected), the Qā'im (the chief of the age), and the Mahdī (the directed). According to them, he is the Ṣāhib al-Sirdāb (the dweller in the cistern) and the opinions they hold with regard to him are very numerous. They expect his return (into the world) from a cistern at Sarra man ra'ā, when time is near its end. He was born on Friday, the 15 of Shā'bān, A.H. 255 (July, A.C. 869)*. When his father died, he was five years of age. His mother's name was al-Khamaṭ, but some called her Narjis (narcissus). The Shi'ites say that he entered into the cistern at his father's house whilst his mother was looking on, and that he never again came out. This occurred in the year 265 (A.C. 878-9), and he was at that time nine years of age. Ibn al-Arzaq says, in his History of Mayyāfāriqin: "The birth of the Ḥujjah took place on the 9 of the first Rabi', A.H. 258; others say, and with greater truth, on the 8 of Shā'bān, 256 (July, A.C. 870)†. When he went into the cistern, his age was four years; some say five; and others again state that he entered it in A.H. 275 (A.C. 888-9), at the age of seventeen years." God best knows which of these statement is true.

537 IBN SHIHĀB AL-ZUHRI

Abū Bakr Muḥammad Ibn Muslim Ibn 'Ubayd Allāh Ibn 'Abd Allāh Ibn Shihāb Ibn 'Abd Allāh Ibn al-Ḥārith Ibn Zuhrah, a member of the tribe of Quraysh, and surnamed al-Zuhri, was one of the most eminent Tābi'is, jurisconsults, and Traditionists of

* 29 July.—Ed.

† 11 July.—Ed.

Madinah. He saw ten of Muḥammad's Companions, and a number of the imāms of that age received Traditions from him and transmitted them to others. Of these we may mention Mālik Ibn Anas (No. 524) Sufyān Ibn 'Uyaynah (No. 249), and Sufyān al-Thawrī (No. 248). It is related that 'Amr Ibn Dīnār (No. 249, n.) said : "Let al-Zuhri know what he may, I have met Ibn 'Umar (No. 243, *n.*1), who never went to meet him; and I have met also Ibn 'Abbās (No. 43, n.) who never went to meet him." Al-Zuhri then came to Makkah, and 'Amr said : "Carry me to him ;" for he had lost the use of his limbs. They carried him to al-Zuhri, and he did not return to his disciples till the next morning. They then asked him how he found al-Zuhri, and he replied : "By Allāh ! I never in my life saw the life of that Qurayshite". Makhūl<sup>1</sup> having been asked who was the most learned man he ever saw, answered : "Ibn Shihāb." He was then asked who came next to him, and he answered : "Ibn Shihāb." Being again asked who came next, he replied : "Ibn Shihāb." Al-Zuhri had learned by heart all the legal information possessed by the seven jurisconsults (No. 114) and (the khālif) 'Umar Ibn 'Abd al-'Azīz wrote these words to all the provinces of the empire : "Take the opinion of Ibn Shihāb (on point of law) ; for you will find no one better acquainted than he is with the Sunnah (or usages) of times past." Al-Zuhri was one day at an assembly (majlis) held by Hishām Ibn 'Abd al-Malik, and Abu 'l-Zinād 'Abd Allāh Ibn Dhakwān (No. 249, n.) happened to be present. Hishām then asked al-Zuhri in what month the (regular) donations (from the treasury) were issued to the people of Madīnah ? and the other replied that he did not know. He then addressed the same question to Abu 'l-Zinād, who answered : "In Muḥarram." On this, Hishām said to al-Zuhri : "O Abū Bakr ! there is a piece of information which you have acquired to-day." To this al-Zuhri replied : "The Commander of the Faithful's assembly is the fittest place for acquiring information." When al-Zuhri kept at home, he remained seated with his books around him, and so deeply was he absorbed by their study that he forgot all worldly concerns ; this induced his wife to say to him one day : "By Allāh ! these books annoy me more than three other wives would do (if you had them). " 'Abd Allāh Ibn Shihāb, his great-grandfather, fought on the side of the infidels at the battle of Badr, and he was one of those who, on the day in which the battle of Uḥud was fought, bound themselves by oath to kill God's Apostle if they saw him, or die in the attempt. It is related that a person said to al-Zuhri : "Was thy ancestor present at the battle of Badr ?" and that he replied : "Yes ; but on the other side ;" meaning that he has been in the ranks of the infidels. Muslim, al-Zuhri's father, was a partisan of Muṣ'ab Ibn al-Zubayr. Al-Zuhri remained constantly with 'Abd al-Malik<sup>1</sup> till that khalif's death, and he then continued with Hishām Ibn 'Abd al-Malik. (The Khalif) Yazid Ibn 'Abd al-Malik chose him for qāḍī. He died on the eve of Tuesday, the 17 of Ramaḍān, A.H. 124 (July, A.C. 742)*, (others say, A.H. 123, or 105)†, at the age of seventy-two, some say, seventy-three. It is stated, I know not with what degree of truth, that he was born A.H. 51 (A.C. 671). He was interred at Adāmā, or Adamā, a farm which belonged to him. This place is situated on the other side of Shaghb and Badā, which are valleys (some say villages), between al-Ḥijāz and Syria, on the line of separation between these two provinces. It is mentioned, in the Kitāb al-Tamhīd,<sup>2</sup> that he died at his house in Na'f, a village near those we have just named, and the same at which Umm Ḥazrah, the wife of al-Jarir (No. 127), expired. That poet alludes to the circumstance in the following line from one of his poems :

1 The life of Makhūl is given by Ibn Khallikān.

"Was a valley at Na'f, covered with mouldering stones, a fit companion (for thee) who was the dearest object I possessed ?"

1 We must perhaps read : With Yazid 'Abd al-Malik. The printed text agrees, however, with the manuscripts in giving the reading translated here.

2 Ḥājī khalīfah indicates a number of works bearing this title ; see Flügel's edition, tom. II, p. 422, 423.

* 24 July.—Ed.

† The editor of the Cairo edition observes it is an error and it should be 125.—Ed.

The tomb of al-Zhūrī was placed at the road-side, so that every person who passed by might pray for him. Zuhri means belonging to Zuhrah Ibn Kilāb Ibn Murrah, a great branch of the Quraysh tribe, the same branch which produced 'Āminah, the mother of the Prophet, and a great number of the Companions. Speaking of Shaghb and Badā, Kuthayyir (No. 521), the lover of 'Azza, said :

"It was thou who madest me love the region between Shaghb and Badā, although another country was my native land. When my eyes drop tears, I pretend that it is the dust which makes them water ; but that dust is 'Azzah, if the doctor knew it ! She dwelt for a season at the one, then at the other, and, from her, both these valleys have derived their perfume. "

This passage seems to prove that they are valleys, not villages.

538 MUḤAMMAD IBN ABĪ 'L-LAYLĀ

Muḥammad Ibn 'Abd al-Raḥmān Ibn Abī Laylā Yasār (alias Dāwūd) Ibn Bilāl Ibn Uḥayyāh Ibn al-Jullāh al-Anṣārī was a native of Kūfah. We have already spoken of his father (No. 335). Muḥammad was one of those imāms who decided certain points of law by their own private judgement<sup>1</sup>, and he exercised the functions of qādī at Kūfah for thirty-three years ; first, in the name of the Umayyads, and afterwards, in that of the 'Abbāsids. He was also a jurisconsult and a muftī. Speaking of his father, he said : "I know nothing of my father, except that he had two wives, and two green jars in each of which he made nabīdh, on alternate days<sup>2</sup>." He studied the law under al-Sha'bī (No. 296), and gave lessons to Sufyān al-Thawrī (No. 248). Al-Thawrī said : Our jurisconsults are Ibn Abī Laylā and Ibn Shubrumah (No. 288, note)" Muḥammad Ibn Abī Laylā relates as follows : "I went in to 'Aṭā (No. 394) and he began to consult me, on which one of the persons present disapproved of what he did and spoke to him on the subject, but he replied: 'He is more learned than I.' A slight degree of coolness subsisted between him and Abū Ḥanīfah. It is related that, as he was one day returning from the mosque at Kūfah, wherein he had been sitting in judgment, he heard a woman say to a man: "Thou son of a prostitute and a fornicator (Ya Ibn al-Zāniyah)!" on which he caused her to be arrested, and, having returned to his tribunal, he ordered her to be flagellated twice, inflicting on her each time the number of strokes prescribed by law, and this punishment she underwent standing. When Abū Ḥanīfah was informed of his proceeding, he said: "In this single affair, the qādl has committed six faults, first, in returning to his mosque after the sitting was ended, which it was not requisite for him to do; secondly, by inflicting the punishment of flagellation in the mosque, a thing expressly forbidden by the blessed Prophet; thirdly by flagellating her, and she standing, whereas women should be flagellated in a sitting posture and their clothes on; fourthly, by inflicting the flagellation twice, whereas the calumniator incurs only one flagellation, even if he address the insulting word to a number of persons; fifthly, were the double flagellation incurred, he should have waited, before inflicting the second, till the pain caused by the first had ceased; sixthly he sentenced her to be flagellated, although, no prosecutor had made a complaint against her." When this came to the ears of Muḥammad Ibn Abī Laylā, he sent this message to the governor of Kūfah: "There is here a youth, called Abū Ḥanīfah, who attacks my judgments, and gives opinions in opposition to them, and insults me by saying that I have erred. I wish you would prevent him from so doing." On this, the governor sent to Abū Ḥanīfah, ordering him not to give opinions on points of law. They then relate that Abū Ḥanīfah, was one day in his house, with his wife beside him, and his daughter, and his son Ḥammād, when his daughter said to him: "Papa! I am keeping a fast (of abstinence,) and some blood has come out from between my teeth, but I spat it out till my saliva came clear, without any trace of blood. Should I break the fast if I swallowed my saliva now?" To this her father replied: "Ask thy brother Ḥammād, for the governor has forbidden me to give opinions on points of law". This anecdote is cited as an example of Abū Ḥanīfah's signal merits and of his respectful obedience to the constituted authority; so much so, that he obeyed even in private, and abstained from giving an answer to his daughter; this is the utmost extent to which obedience could be carried. Muḥammad Ibn Abī Layla was born A.H. 74 (A.C. 693-4), and he died at Kūfah, A.H. 148 (A.C. 765-6). He held the post of qāḍī up to the moment of his death, and the place was then conferred on his nephew by the Khalīf Abū Ja'far al-Manṣūr.

<sup>1</sup> Aṣḥāb al-Rā'i, No. 227, note.

<sup>2</sup> This is cited as a proof that he never acquired any legal information from his father, 'Abd al-Raḥmān Ibn Abī Laylā, the celebrated Ṭābi' although it would have been natural to suppose the contrary.

539 MUḤAMMAD IBN SİRĪN

Abū Bakr Muḥammad Ibn Sīrīn, was a native of Baṣrah. His father was a slave to Anas Ibn Mālik<sup>1</sup>, but deemed himself

---

1 Abū Ḥamzah Anas Ibn Mālik Ibn al-Naḍr النضر Ibn al-Najjār al-Anṣārī, surnamed the servant of God's Apostle (khādīm rasūl Allāh), was one of the most eminent among the Companions. When a boy, his mother placed him in the service of Muḥammad, from whom she requested, at the same time, a prayer for her son. In compliance with her wish, Muḥammad pronounced these words: "Almighty God! give him great wealth and numerous children, and make him enter Paradise." The effects of this prayer were manifested later; the riches of Anas multiplied, his date-trees bore fruit twice a year (it is said, and he became the father of seventy-eight sons. At the time of Ibn al-Aṣḥ'ath's revolt, al-Ḥajjāj Ibn Yūsuf reviled Anas in the grossest terms for having sided with that rebel as he had already done with 'Alī and Ibn al-Zubayr. Anas immediately wrote to 'Abd al-Mālik Ibn Marwān, complaining of the indignity with which he, the Prophet's faithful domestic, had been treated; and this brought him a letter of excuses from that khalīf, who addressed at the same time a severe reprimand to al-Ḥajjāj. Anas was ten years in Muḥammad's service, and, on his master's death, he removed to Baṣrah. A great quantity of Traditions were delivered by him, some consisted of the sayings which he had gathered from the lips of Muḥammad himself, and the rest of those which he received from Abū Bakr, 'Umar, 'Uṭhmān, and others. He died A.H. 93 (A.C. 711-2) (Siyar al-Salaf,—Uyūn al-Tawārikh.)

by giving him a written bond for forty, some say twenty thousand dirhams, the amount of which he finally paid up. He was one of the captives taken at Maysān (No. 148, note); others say, at 'Ayn al-Tamr<sup>1</sup>. Sīrīn bore the surname of Abū 'Amrah; he belonged to Jarjarāyā and was a maker of copper pots (for cooking); having gone to 'Ayn al-Tamr, he there followed his trade till made prisoner by Khālīd Ibn al-Walīd, along with forty young men not natives of the place. (This circumstance they represented to Khālīd), but he refused to believe them, and, on their saying that they belonged to good families, he distributed them (as slaves) to persons (in his army)<sup>2</sup>. Šafīyyah, the mother of Abū Bakr Ibn Sīrīn, was a mawlā to (the khalif) Abū Bakr. (Preparatory to her marriage), she was perfumed by three of the Prophet's wives, and they also invoked God's blessing on her; eighteen of the Prophet's Companions who had fought under him at Badr were present at the marriage ceremony; one of them, Ubayyi Ibn Ka'b, offered up prayers, and the rest said Amen. Muḥammad Ibn Sīrīn delivered Traditions on the authority of Abū Hurayrah (No. 244, note), 'Abd Allāh Ibn 'Umar (No. 243, note), 'Abd Allāh Ibn al-Zubayr, 'Imrān Ibn Huṣayn<sup>3</sup>, and Anas Ibn Mālīk; Traditions were learned from him and delivered to others by Qatādah Ibn Dī'āmāh (No. 516), Khālīd al-Hadhhdhā<sup>4</sup>, Ayyūb al-Sakhtiyānī<sup>5</sup>, and others of the Imāms. He was one of the jurisconsults by whose opinions

1 See Kosegarten's Taberistanensis Annales, vol. II, p. 63.

2 Here Ibn Khallikān's text is obscure, and perhaps corrupted. Al-Tabarī relates the fact thus: "In templo quadraginta juvenes invenerunt (Arabes) evangelio students, qui fores occluserant. Fores effregit Chalid, iisque: quinam estis? inquit. Illi vero: obsides sumus. Tunc fortissimis militibus eos dispertivit. Erant ex iis Abū Sīād..... Sīrīn, pater Mohammedis beu Sīrīn, etc." (Kosegarten's Taberistanensis Annales, vol. II, p. 65).

3 'Imrān Ibn Huṣayn al-Khuza'i one of the Prophet's Companions, became qāḍī of Baṣrah, and died there in the exercise of his functions, A.H. 53 (A.C. 672-3). (Siyar al-Salaf.)

4 The ḥafīẓ Khālīd al-Hadhhdhā was a native of Baṣrah and an eminent Tabī'i. He delivered Traditions on the authority of Anas, and died A.H. 142 (A.C. 759-60). He received the surname of al-Hadhhdhā, because he used to sit with the shoemakers (ḥadhhdhā) of the place where he resided. (Al-Yāfi'i's Mir'at).

5 Abū Bakr Ayyūb Ibn Abī Tamīmāh, a native of Ghazzah and a mawlā, the people of Baṣrah were guided, and one of the persons of that age the most noted for their piety. He went to al-Madā'in to see 'Abīdah al-Salmānī<sup>1</sup>, and (speaking of this interview) he said: "I prayed with him, and, when he had finished his prayer, he called for breakfast; on which, bread and milk and butter were brought in. He ate thereof, and we ate with him, and we remained sitting till the hour of the afternoon prayer. 'Abīdah then rose up, and having pronounced the adhān and the iqāmah<sup>2</sup>, he said with us the afternoon prayer; and yet neither he nor any of those who breakfasted with him had made an ablution between the two prayers<sup>3</sup>" Muḥammad Ibn Sīrīn was a friend of al-Ḥasan al-Baṣrī (No. 148) but they at length came to a rupture, and, on al-Ḥasan's death, Ibn Sīrīn absented himself from the funeral. Al-Sha'bī (No. 296) used to say (to students of the law): "Stick to that deaf man!" meaning thereby Ibn Sīrīn; because he was dull of hearing. Ibn Sīrīn possessed great skill in the interpretation of dreams. He was born received the surname of al-Sakḥṭiyānī because he sold dyed leather (sakḥṭiyān) at Baṣrah. He held a high rank as a Ṭabī'ī, and he saw some of the most eminent of that body, such as al-Ḥasan al-Baṣrī, Ibn Sīrīn, Sālim, and Nāfi'. He met also Anas Ibn Mālik. Traditions were given on his authority by Ibn Sīrīn, Qatādah, al-A'maṣh, the imāms Mālik, al-Thawrī Ibn 'Uyaynah, the two Ḥammāds, etc. All doctors agree in assigning him the highest place for learning in the law and for credibility as a Traditionist. Shu'bah called him the chief of the jurisconsults, and Ibn 'Uyaynah declared that amongst eighty-six of the Ṭabī'īs whom he knew, he never met the like of Ayyūb. He died A.H. 131 (A.C. 748-9). (Ṭab. al-Fuqahā).

(Continued from page 154)

1 Abū Muslim 'Abīdah al-Salmānī, a native of Kūfah and a Ṭabī'ī of the first rank, embraced Islāmism two years before the Prophet's death, but never had an opportunity of seeing him. He acquired his legal information from some of the principal Companions. He left Kūfah to assist the Khālif 'Alī in his wars against the Khārījites. When Shurayḥ was unable to resolve a knotty point of law, he sent it to 'Abīdah. This doctor died A.H. 72 (A.C. 691-2). (Ṭab. al-Fuqahā).

2 If the Musalman, before he begins his prayers, has not distinctly heard the call to prayer (or adhān pronounced by the mu'adhḍhin, it is incumbent on him to repeat it and the iqāmah before commencing the regular prayer. The iqāmah is a repetition of the adhān with some additional words. See D'Ohrson's Tab. gen. de l'Emp. Osthom, tom. II, p. 116.

3 This circumstance is cited to prove that 'Abīdah did not consider the act of eating as productive of legal impurity.

(in A. H. 33, A.C. 653-4) two years before the death of Khalif 'Uthmān, and he died at Baṣrah on Friday, the 9th of Shawwāl, A. H. 110 (January, A.C. 729)*, one hundred days after the death of al-Ḥasan al-Baṣrī. He was a draper by profession but, having fallen into debt, he was imprisoned. He had thirty sons by the same wife, and eleven daughters; none of them, however, survived except 'Abd Allāh. He died thirty thousand dirhams in debt, but his son 'Abd Allāh paid off the whole, and, before his own death, his property was estimated at three hundred thousand dirhams. Muḥammad Ibn Sirīn had served Anas Ibn Mālīk in the capacity of a secretary when in Persia<sup>1</sup>. Aṣm'ai (No. 354) used to say: "Al-Ḥasan al-Baṣrī (was, in furnishing Traditions, like) a generous prince; but when the deaf man (meaning Ibn Sirīn) furnishes Traditions, retain them carefully; as for Qatādah (he was, as a collector of Traditions, like) one who gathers fire-wood in the dark, (picking up both bad and good)." Ibn 'Awwf<sup>2</sup> relates as follows: "When Anas Ibn Mālīk was on his death-bed, he desired that Ibn Sirīn should wash his corpse and say over it the funeral prayers. As Ibn Sirīn was then in prison, their friends went to the governor of the city, who was a member of the tribe of Asad, and obtained permission for him to go out. Ibn Sirīn then went and washed the body, shrouded it, and prayed over it in the castle at al-Ṭaff<sup>3</sup>, where Anas made his residence, and then returned directly to prison without going to see his family." I must observe, however, that 'Umar Ibn Shabbah, (No. 466) says, in his History of Baṣrah, that the person who washed the corpse of Anas Ibn Mālīk was Qaṭan Ibn Mudrik al-Kilābī, the governor of Baṣrah; and a similar statement is made by Abū Yaqqān (No. 533, note). Maysān is the name of a village situated in the lower part of the territory of Baṣrah. Of 'Ayn al-Tamr we have already spoken (No. 91).

1 The original Arabic may here bear another signification namely: It was in Persia that (to purchase his liberty) gave his bond to Anas Ibn Mālīk.

2 I read here Ibn 'Awn. Abū 'Awn 'Abd Allāh Ibn 'Awn Ibn Artabān, a mawla of 'Abd Allāh Ibn Durrah, was a distinguished traditionist and one of Ibn Sirīn's disciples. He died A.H. 151 (A.C. 768). Nujūm.

3 No. 521, note. The Qatīl al-Ṭaff (slain at Ṭaff) was Ḥusayn, the son of 'Alī. (Ibn Khaldūn, MS. No. 2402, f. 52 v.)

* 14 January.—Ed.

540 IBN ABĪ DHĪ'B

Abu 'l-Hārith Muḥammad, a member of the tribe of Quraysh and of the family of 'Āmir, and surnamed Ibn Abī Dhī'b, was the son of 'Abd al-Raḥmān Ibn al-Mughayrah Ibn al-Hārith Ibn Abī Dhī'b Hishām Ibn Sa'īd Ibn 'Abd Allāh Ibn Abī Qays Ibn 'Abd Wadd Ibn Naṣr Ibn Mālik Ibn Ḥisl Ibn 'Āmir Ibn Luwayyi Ibn Ghālib Ibn Fihrr Ibn Mālik Ibn al-Naḍr Ibn Kinārah Ibn Khuzaymah Ibn Mudrikah Ibn al-Yās Ibn Muḍar Ibn Nizār Ibn Ma'add Ibn 'Adnān. This illustrious jurisconsult was one of the imām Mālik's disciples, and a sincere freindship united them in the closest attachment. When Mālik went to Abū Ja'far al-Manṣūr, that khalif asked him what masters (in the science of jurisprudence) he had left behind him at Madinah, and he replied: "Commander of the Faithful! Ibn Abī Dhī'b, Ibn Abī Salamah<sup>1</sup>, and Ibn Abī Sabrah<sup>2</sup>." 'Abd al-Raḥmān, the father of Ibn Abī Dhī'b, went to see the emperor of the Greeks (Qaysar), but in consequence of some malicious reports which were made against him, that sovereign had him arrested and confined in prison for life. Abu 'l-Hārith Ibn Abī Dhī'b died at Kūfah. A.H. 159 (A.C. 775-6); some say, 158. He was born in the month of Muḥarram, A.H. 81 (Feb.-March, A.C. 700); some say, A.H. 80, the year of the great torrent (al-Sayl al-Juhāf<sup>3</sup> Ḥisl (as an appellative name) signifies the young of the dubb<sup>4</sup>. If the second syllable of the word Luwayyi be considered as hamza, this name is the diminutive form of lay (bull); but, if not, it is the diminutive of lawā (a sand-hill). Fihrr means a stone.

---

1 Abū 'Abd Allāh 'Abd al-'Azīz Ibn Abī Salamah, surnamed al-Mājisḥūn died at Baḡhdād, A.H. 160 (A.C. 776-7). Ṭabaqāt al-Fuqahā.

2 Abū Bakr 'Abd Allāh Ibn Muḥammad Ibn Abī Sabrah, a member of the tribe of Quraysh, was employed as qāḍī by Abū Ja'far al-Manṣūr. He died A.H. 172 (A.C. 788-9), aged sixty years. Ṭab. al-Fuqahā.)

3 "The year 80 (A.C. 699-700), was that of the great torrent at Makkah called al-Juhāf. It was so denominated because it bore away (jaḥaf) men, women, and camels with their loads." 'Uyūn al-Tawārīkh.)

4 See no. 42, note.

541 MUḤAMMAD IBN AL-ḤASAN

Abū 'Abd Allāh Muḥammad Ibn al-Ḥasan Ibn Farqad, a doctor of the sect of Abū Ḥanīfah, and a mawlā to the tribe of Shaybān, came of a family which resided at Ḥarastā, a village outside the gate of Damascus and in the midst of the Ghūṭah. His father left Syria and proceeded to Wāsiṭ in 'Irāq, where he settled. Muḥammad, the subject of this article, was born in that city, and he passed his early life in Kūfah. He then travelled to collect Traditions, and met a number of the most eminent imāms. During some years, he attended the sittings of Abū Ḥanīfah, after which, he studied jurisprudence under Abū Yūsuf, the disciple of Abū Ḥanīfah. He composed many valuable works, such as the Great and the Lesser Jāmi', or collection of Traditions etc. In his various productions he inserted disquisitions on various obscure points, particularly those connected with grammar. He contributed actively to the propogation of the doctrines taught by Abū Ḥanīfah. He expressed himself with great elegance, and, when he discoursed on any subject, it seemed to the hearer as if the Qur'ān had been sent down to mankind in the language which he spoke. When the imām al-Shāfi'i (No. 532), went to Baghdād, Muḥammad Ibn al-Ḥasan was there, and they both met frequently and discussed points of law in the presence of Ḥārūn al-Rashīd. Al-Shāfi'i was (afterwards) heard to say: "I never saw a person, who, when questioned on a point which required reflection, did not betray some uneasiness by his countenance; but I must except Muḥammad Ibn al-Ḥasan." He said again: "The information which I learned by heart from Muḥammad Ibn al-Ḥasan would suffice to load a camel." The following anecdote was related by al-Rabī' Ibn Sulaymān al-Murādī (No. 221): "Al-Shāfi'i having asked from Muḥammad Ibn al-Ḥasan the loan of some books which he wished to copy, waited for a considerable time without obtaining them, and he at length wrote to him the following lines:

'Say to him whose like was never seen by any eye you ever saw—to him whose aspect would make the spectator think that he had before his eyes (the united merit of) all former doctors:

'Learning forbids the learned to withhold it from the learned.' Perhaps he may bestow it on one deserving ! perhaps he may !'

"Immediately on receiving this note, Muḥammad Ibn al-Ḥasan sent him the books." I found these verses also in the collected poetical works of Maṣṣūr Ibn Ismā'il, a jurisconsult whose life I shall give. He is there said to be the author of them, and to have written them to Abū Bakr Ibn Qāsim ; as for the former statement, it is made by Abū Ishāq al-Shīrāzī (No. 5) in his Ṭabaqāt al-Fuqahā. It is related that al-Shāfi'i said : "I never met with a fat man possessing acuteness of mind, except Muḥammad Ibn al-Ḥasan." Al-Rashīd conferred the qādīship of al-Raqqah on Muḥammad Ibn al-Ḥasan, but afterwards removed him, and this doctor then proceeded to Baghdād. "The following anecdote was related by Muḥammad Ibn al-Ḥasan : "Some persons went to consult Abū Ḥanīfah about a woman who had just died, and in whose womb they felt a child stirring. He told them to extract the infant by making an incision, and it proved to be a boy. The child survived and grew up to a youth ; and this youth, having commenced his studies, used to attend my sittings, where he was known by the appellation of the son of Abū Ḥanīfah." Muḥammad Ibn al-Ḥasan remained constantly with al-Rashīd, till that khalīf made his first journey to Ray ; he then set out with him, and died at Ranbawayh, a village near Ray, in the year 189 (A.C. 804-5). He was born A.H. 135 (A.C. 752-3) ; some say 131 or 132. Al-Sam'ānī (No. 370) says that Muḥammad Ibn al-Ḥasan and al-Kisā'i (No. 408) died at Ray on the same day. It is mentioned that al-Rashīd was heard to say : "I buried at Ray the sciences of jurisprudence and grammar." Muḥammad Ibn al-Ḥasan was cousin by the mother's side to al-Farrā, the celebrated grammarian and philologist.

542 MUḤAMMAD IBN 'ALĪ AL-HĀSHIMĪ

Abū 'Abd Allāh Muḥammad Ibn 'Alī Ibn 'Abd Allāh Ibn al-'Abbās Ibn 'Abd al-Muṭṭalib al-Hāshimī was the father of the two khalīfs al-Saffāh and al-Manṣūr. We have already spoken of his father 'Alī (See No. 400) "This Muḥammad," says Ibn Qutaybah, "was a most handsome man, and lived honoured with the deepest respect. A space of only fourteen years intervend between his birth and that of his son, 'Alī. The latter used to dye his hair black, and the former red; it therefore happened that persons who were not well acquainted with them mistook one for the other." Yazīd Ibn Abī Muslim, the secretary of al-Ḥajjāj Ibn Yūsuf (No. 144), states that he heard his master relate the following anecdote: "We happened to be with 'Abd al-Malik Ibn Marwān, at a country-seat of his, near Dūmat al-Jandal<sup>1</sup>; he was conversing with a physiognomist and addressing questions to him, when 'Alī Ibn 'Abd Allāh Ibn al-'Abbās came in, accompanied by his son Muḥammad. On seeing him approach, 'Abd al-Malik ceased from conversation; his colour changed, and he began to mutter some words between his lips. I immediately sprung up with the intention of preventing 'Alī from advancing, but the khalīf made me a sign that I should let him alone. He then drew near and made his salutation, on which 'Abd al-Malik seated him by his side; and whilst he was passing his hand (carelessly) over his ('Alī's) clothes, he signed to Muḥammad that he also should be seated. He then commenced discoursing with 'Alī, the agreeable tone of whose conversation was well known. A repast being brought in, the khalīf washed his hands, and ordered the tray to be placed near Abū Maḥammad ('Alī), but he said that he was then keeping a fast, and, rising up suddenly, he retired. 'Abd al-Malik followed him with his eyes till he had nearly disappeared from sight, and then, turning to the physiognomist, he asked him if he knew who that was? The man replied that he did not, but that he knew one thing respecting him. The khalīf desired to know what that was, and the physiognomist said: 'If the youth who is with him be his son, there will come forth from his loins a number of Pharaohs, destined to possess the earth and slay whoever attempts, to resist them!' On hearing these words, 'Abd al-Malik, turned pale, and said: 'A monk from 1 The author of the Marāṣid notices a number of places bearing the name of Dūmat al-Jandal; one of them, a castle in the district of Madīnah; another, a village at five parasangs from Damascus; and the third, a place in the vicinity of the Two Mountains of Ṭay (Jabali Ṭay). That which is mentioned in this article seems to be the second indicated in the Marāṣid.

Aylā who once saw him with me, pretended that thirteen kings should come forth from his loins, and he described to me the appearance of each.' ” The authority (of the imāmate) was transmitted to him in the following manner: Muḥammad Ibn al-Ḥanafiyah, of whom we have already spoken (No. 533), was considered by the Shi'ites as having acquired the qualities of the true imām on the death of his brother, al-Ḥusayn. When Ibn al-Ḥanafiyah died, his authority passed to his son Abū Ḥāshim (No. 533). The influence which Abū, Ḥāshim possessed was immense, and the Shi'ites acknowledged him for their chief. Being taken ill in Syria, and at the point of death, he left the authority to Muḥammad Ibn 'Alī, as he had himself no offspring, and he said: “Thou art now the possessor of this authority, and it shall remain with thy children.” He then delivered him his books (or letters), and the Shi'ites immediately turned towards him. When Muḥammad was on his death-bed in Syria he left his authority to his son, Ibrāhīm, surnamed (thence forward) the Imām. Ibrāhīm was imprisoned in the city of Ḥarrān, by Marwān Ibn Muḥammad, the last of the Umayyads, and, feeling convinced that this prince meant to put him to death, he transmitted the authority to his brother, al-Saffāḥ, who was the first of the 'Abbāsīd family who obtained the khālīfate. Such are the main points of the whole proceeding, but to expose the particulars of it would lead us too far. Muḥammad (Ibn 'Alī) was born A.H. 60 (A.C. 679-80); so, at least, I have found it mentioned; but this date cannot be reconciled with that of his father's birth, if, as has been already stated, fourteen years only intervened between them: we have observed (No. 400) that his father's birth took place in the life time of 'Alī, or, in admitting another statement, on the night in which that khālīf was assassinated; now, 'Alī's death occurred in the month of Ramadān, A.H. 40 (January, A.C. 661); how then could fourteen years only have elapsed, when it appears, on the contrary, that there must have been at least twenty years between the two events?—Muḥammad died A.H. 126 (A.C. 743-4), some say 122, the same year in which was born al-Mahdī, the son of Abū Ja'far al-Manṣūr, and the father of Hārūn al-Raṣhīd. Others refer the death of Muḥammad to the year 125, and state that he breathed his last at al-Sharāt. Al-Ṭabarī says, in his History: “Muḥammad Ibn 'Alī expired on the first of Dhu'l-Qa'dah, A.H. 126 (August, A.C. 744)* at the age of sixty-three years." We have spoken of al-Sharāt in the life of his father 'Ali (No. 433). In al-Ṭabarī's historical work, the following passage is inserted under A.H. 98: "Abū Hāshim 'Abd Allāh, the son of Maḥammad Ibn al-Ḥanafiyah, went to see Sulaymān Ibn 'Abd al-Malik Ibn Marwān, by whom he was received with marked honour. He then set out for Palestine, and Sulaymān suborned a person to await his passage on the road, and offer him a draught of poisoned milk. Abū Hāshim had no sooner swallowed the milk than he felt death to be at hand, and he immediately turned off from his way, and proceeded to al-Ḥumaymah. He there found Muḥammad Ibn 'Alī Ibn 'Abd Allāh Ibn al-'Abbās, and told him that he transmitted his rights as legitimate khalīf to 'Abd Allāh Ibn al-Ḥārithiyah, the son of Muḥammad Ibn 'Alī." This Ibn al-Ḥārithiyah is the same person who afterwards bore the title of al-Saffāh. He then delivered to him the letters written by the missionaries (or political agents)<sup>1</sup> and instructed him how to act at al-Ḥumaymah. Al-Ṭabarī takes no notice here of Ibrāhīm the Imām, yet all other historians agree in stating that Abū Hāshim's rights to the khalīfate were transmitted to Ibrāhīm, who did not, however, attain to their full exercise.

543 AL-BUKHĀRĪ

The ḥāfiẓ Abū 'Abd Allāh Muḥammad Ibn Abi 'l-Hasan Ismā'il Ibn Ibrāhīm Ibn al-Mughayrah Ibn al-Aḥnaf Yazdibah (or Yazdezbah, according to Ibn Mākūlā), a mawlā to the tribe of Ju'fī, and surnamed, al-Bukhārī, was the great imām in the science of the Traditions, and the author of the work entitled al-

<sup>1</sup> It has been already observed, (No. 10, note), that some of the Muslim dynasties had the way prepared for their establishment by political agents or missionaries. Those dynasties all claimed kindred with Muḥammad, and this was the basis on which they founded their pretensions to the khalīfate. In M. de Sacy's Exposé de l'Histoire des Druzes, a very clear light is thrown on the proceedings of the Ismā'ilian missionaries.

* 15 August, A. C. 744.—Ed.

Jāmi' al-Ṣaḥīḥ (the authentic collector) and of the (well-known) history<sup>1</sup>. Animated with the desire of collecting Traditions, he went to see most of the Traditionists in all the great cities, and he wrote down in Khurāsān, in the cities of 'Irāq, in Ḥijāz, in Syria, and in Egypt (the information he thus acquired). On visiting Baghdād, the inhabitants gathered round him, and acknowledging his merit, declaring him to be the first man of the age for his learning in the Traditions, and for his talent in delivering them to others. It is related by Abū 'Abd Allāh al-Ḥumaydī, in his Jadhwat al-Muqtabis, and by the Khaṭīb, in his History of Baghdād, that, when al-Bukhārī arrived at that city, the Traditionists assembled, and, having selected one hundred Traditions, they applied to the text of each a wrong isnād<sup>2</sup>, and gave them by tens to ten different persons, whom they directed to attend the conference held by al-Bukhārī, and submit to him these Traditions. When the appointed day came, a great number of Traditionists from Khurāsān proceeded with those of Baghdād to the meeting. The assembly having taken their places, one of the ten men came forward and questioned al-Bukhārī on one of these Traditions. This doctor answered that he was not acquainted with it, and the other proceeded to ask his opinion on the remaining nine, which he submitted to him successively. As al-Bukhārī continued to answer: "I am not acquainted with it;" the jurisconsults present at the meeting began to turn from one to another and say: "The man knows what he is about;" but some of the auditors were led to conclude that he was a man of great incapacity and slight information. Another of the ten men then came forward, and, having proposed in a similar manner his ten altered Traditions, he obtained the same answers as his predecessor. The eight others then advanced successively but the result was always the same. When al-Bukhārī perceived that they had done, he turned to the first man and said: "Thy first Tradition should be said so and so; thy second so and so;" repeating them till he came to the last, and prefixing to the text of each the isnād which belonged to it. He then commenced with the second man, answering him in the same way, and he continued till he ended by the tenth. The whole assembly then acknowledged his abilities as a ḥāfiẓ, and admitted his superior merit. When Ibn Sa'īd<sup>1</sup> spoke of al-Bukhārī, he called him the butting ram (whom none could withstand). Muḥammad Ibn Yūsuf al-Farabrī<sup>2</sup> relates that he heard al-Bukhārī say: "I never inserted a Tradition in my Ṣaḥīḥ till after I had made an ablution, and offered up a prayer of two rak'ats<sup>3</sup>." It is also stated that al-Bukhārī said: "It took me sixteen years to draw up the Kitāb al-Ṣaḥīḥ. I selected the matter which forms its contents from a mass of six hundred thousand Traditions, and I have offered it up to God as a title to his favour." Al-Farabrī mentioned that ninety thousand persons had learned the Ṣaḥīḥ from al-Bukhārī, and, that of all who taught it on the authority of the author, he himself was the sole survivor. Abū-'Isā al-Tirmidhī<sup>4</sup> also taught Traditions on the authority of al-Bukhārī. The birth of al-Bukhārī took place after the public prayer of Friday, the 13th of Shawwāl, A.H. 194 (July, A.C. 810)*; but Abū Ya'lā al-Khalīlī (No. 24, note) states, in his Kitāb al-Irshād, that it happened on the 12th of the above mentioned month. He died at Khartank, on the eve of Saturday, the first of Shawwāl, A.H. 256 (September, A.C. 870)†, after the evening prayer, and he was buried the following day, on the termination of the afternoon prayer. Ibn Yūnus mentions, in his History of Foreigners (No. 343), that al-Bukhārī came to Egypt and died there. This is, however, a mistake, and the truth is as we have just stated. Khālīd Ibn Aḥmad Ibn Khālīd al-Dhuhli, the governor of Khurāsān, banished al-Bukhārī from Bukhārā, and sent him to Khartank; Khālīd then made the pilgrimage, and, on arriving at Baghdād, he was imprisoned by al-Muwaffaq Ibn al-Mutawakkil, the brother of the khalīf al-Mu'tamid, and detained in confinement till he died. Al-Bukhārī was a lean-bodied man

1 See Flügel's Hajjī Khalifah, tom. II, page 117, No. 2174.

2 See vol. I. Introduction.

1 Abū Muḥammad Yaḥyā Ibn Sa'īd, a native of Baghdād and a mawlā to Abū Ja'far al-Manṣūr, was one of the most eminent ḥāfiẓ of 'Irāq. He died A.H. 318 (A.C. 930-1) (Nujūm. Al-Yaḥi'ī)

2 His life will be found in this work.

3 See No. 270, note.

4 His life will be found in this work.

* 19 July. — Ed.

† 2 September. — Ed.

and of the middle size. Different opinions are held respecting the true name of his ancestor (surnamed al-Aḥnaf); some say that he was called Yazdibah, but Ibn Mākūlā says, in his Ikmāl (No. 414), that his name was Yazdizbah. This person was a Magian and died in that religion. The first of his ancestors who embraced Islāmism was al-Mughayrah. In another work, I find the former of al-Bukhārī's ancestors called al-Aḥnaf, it is therefore possible that Yazdibah was really aḥnaf, or club-footed. Bukhārī means belonging to Bukhārā, a great city in Transoxiana, at eight days' journey from Samarqand. Khartank is a village in the district of Samarqand. We have already spoken of Ju'fī (No. 49). Al-Bukhārī bore the surname of Ju'fī because his family were niawlās to Sa'id Ibn Ja'far al-Ju'fī, governor, of Khurāsān.

544 IBN JARİR AL-ṬABARĪ

Abū Ja'far Muḥammad Ibn Jarīr Ibn Yazīd Ibn Khālīd al-Ṭabarī (native of Ṭabaristān) is the author of the great commentary on the Qur'ān and of the celebrated history. Some say that his grandfather Yazīd was the son of Kathīr Ibn Ghālib. Al-Ṭabarī was an imām (master of the highest authority) in many various branches of knowledge, such as Qur'ānic interpretation, Traditions, jurisprudence, history, etc. He composed some fine works on various subjects, and these productions are a testimony of his extensive information and great abilities. He was one of the mujtahid imāms<sup>1</sup>, as he (judged for himself and) adopted the opinions of no particular doctor. Abu 'l-Faraj al-Mu'āfā Ibn Zakariyā al-Nahrawānī, surnamed Ibn Ṭarāra, was a follower of his doctrines. We shall give a notice on this person. Ibn Jarīr al-Ṭabarī is held to merit the highest confidence as a transmitter of traditional information, and his history is the most authentic and the most exact of any. The shaykh Abū Ishāq al-Shīrāzī (No. 5) places him among the mujtahids in his Ṭabaqāt al-Fuqahā (classified list of jurisconsults). I found in some compilation or other the following verses attributed to al-Ṭabarī :

1 See vol. I. Introduction.

“When I am reduced to poverty, I let my brother know it not ; and when I am rich, I enrich my friends. My honest pride prevents me from losing my self-respect ; and if I do ask a favour, modesty is always my companion. But did I condescend to forego my self-respect, I should soon be on a beaten path to riches.”

He was born A.H. 224 (A.C. 838-9). at 'Āmul in Ṭabaristān and he died at Baghdād on Saturday evening, the 25th of Shawwāl, A.H. 310 (February, A.C. 923)*. He was buried, the next day, in the court of his own house. I saw in the Lesser Qarāfah cemetery, at the foot of Mount Muqāṭṭam near Old Cairo, a tomb which is often visited, and at the head of which is a stone bearing this inscription : “This is the tomb of Ibn Jarīr al-Ṭabarī.” The public imagine it to belong to the author of the history, but this opinion is erroneous, the fact being that he was buried at Baghdād ; and Ibn Yūnus himself says, in his History of the foreigners who came to Egypt<sup>1</sup>, that such was really the case. Abū Bakr al-Kh̲wārizmī, a celebrated poet whose life we shall give, was a sister's son to al-Ṭabarī.

545 MUḤAMMAD IBN 'ABD AL-ḤAKAM

Abū 'Abd Allāh Muḥammad Ibn 'Abd Allāh Ibn 'Abd al-Ḥakam Ibn A'yan Ibn Layth Ibn Rāfi' was a native of Egypt and a doctor of the Shāfite sect. He commenced by receiving lessons from Ibn Wahb (No. 302) and Ashhab (No. 97), the disciples of the imām Mālik, but, when al-Shāfi'i went to Egypt, he became his pupil and studied jurisprudence under him. During the persecution at Baghdād<sup>2</sup>, he was taken before the qāḍi Ibn Abī Duwād

1 See no. 343.

2 This was the persecution in which Aḥmad Ibn Ḥanbal displayed the fortitude which rendered him illustrious. (See No 19.) The kalif al-Mu'ta'im endeavoured to force the doctors of that time to hold that Qur'ān was created. See Abu 'l-Ficā's Annals, year 219.

* 15 February,—Ed.

al-Iyādi (No. 31), but, as he refused to do what was required of him, they sent him back to Egypt, where he finally became chief of the Shāfi'ite sect. He was born A.H. 182 (A.C. 798-9), and he died on Wednesday, the first of Dhu 'l-Qa'dah (some say the 15th, A.H. 268 (May, A.C. 882) *). His tomb is stated to be near those of his father and of his brother 'Abd al-Raḥmān, and these two are situated close to al-Shāfi'i's. Of this we have already spoken (No. 301). Ibn Qānī (No. 149, note) mentions that he died at Old Cairo, A.H. 269. Abū 'Abd al-Raḥmān al-Nasā'ī cites him as his authority for some of the Traditions which he gives in the Sunan (No. 28). Al-Muzanī (No. 90) relates as follows: "We used to go to al-Shāfi'i that we might hear his lessons, and we would sit down at the door of his house. Muḥammad Ibn 'Abd Allāh Ibn 'Abd al-Ḥakam would then come, and go in, and make a long stay; he would even sometimes breakfast with him. On coming down al-Shāfi'i would begin to read to us, and, on finishing, he would bring Muḥammad's mule and help him to mount, after which, he would keep watching him till he disappeared, and then say: 'To obtain a son like him, I should consent to be in debt for a thousand dinārs and unable to find wherewithal to pay them.' " It is related that Muḥammad Ibn 'Abd al-Ḥakam said: "I used to go frequently to al-Shāfi'i, and in consequence of this, a number of persons belonging to our sect went to my father," who, as has been said (No. 301), was a Mālikite "and said to him: 'Abū Muḥammad! (thy son) Muḥammad attaches himself exclusively to this man, and frequents him constantly. This indicates that thy son has a dislike for the sect to which he belongs.' My father essayed to cain them, saying: 'He is young, and wishes to learn and examine the different opinions held on the same subject.' He then took me in private and said: 'Stick to that man, my boy! for if you leave this city, and happen to say, when you discuss a question: Ashhab relates that Mālik said you will be asked who was Ashhab. In consequence of this advice I attended with assiduity the lessons of al-Shāfi'i, and the words of my father never left my memory; till, having gone to 'Irāq, the qāḍī consulted me on a question in the presence of the company assembled at his house, and, in discussing it, I happened to say : Ashhab relates that Mālik said'—on which he asked who was Ashhab, and turned towards the company for an answer. One of the persons present replied, as if perfectly ignorant on the subject : 'I know neither Ashhab (brown) nor Ablaq (gray)!' Of Muḥammad Ibn 'Abd al-Ḥakam, numerous anecdotes are related. Al-Quḍā'i states, in his Khīṭaṭ<sup>1</sup>, that this was the Muḥammad whom Aḥmad Ibn Ṭūlūn (No. 70) took by night to the aqueduct which he had constructed at al-Ma'āfir, and the water of which the people hesitated to employ either for drinking or for making ablutions<sup>2</sup>. Muḥammad then drank thereof and made use of it for his ablutions, whereat Ibn Ṭūlūn was so highly pleased, that he detained him no longer and sent him a rich present<sup>3</sup>. It is generally said that the circumstance here spoken of occurred to al-Muzanī, but this is not exact.

* 23 May or 6 June. Ed.

1 The life of al-Quḍā'i will be found in this work.

2 The people refused to make use of the water coming from this aqueduct, because they imagined that the money employed in its construction had not been acquired by the sovereigns in a lawful manner. See No. 171 of this work, the anecdote told by Ibn Khallikān of Abū Ishāq al-Shīrāzī's repugnance to saying his prayers in the Nizāmiyah College.

3 'The compiler of the history of Aḥmad Ibn Ṭūlūn says: When Aḥmad Ibn Ṭūlūn had finished the erection of this aqueduct, he learned that some persons did not consider it lawful to drink of the water which is supplied. Muḥammad Ibn 'Abd Allāh al-Ḥakam—the doctor whose life Ibn Khallikān gives here—"relates as follows: I was one night in my house, when a slave of Aḥmad Ibn Ṭūlūn's came to find me and said: 'The amīr wanteth thee.' Filled with terror and apprehension, I mounted my horse, and the slave led me off the public road. 'Whither dost thou take me?' said I. 'To the desert,' was his answer, 'and the amīr is there.' Convinced that my last hour was come, I said to the slave: 'God help me! I am an aged and feeble man; dost thou know what he wanteth with me?' He took pity on my state and answered, 'Avoid making any remark against the aqueduct. I still went forward with him, till suddenly I perceived torch-bearers in the desert, and Aḥmad Ibn Ṭūlūn on horseback at the door of the aqueduct, with great wax-light burning before him. I immediately dismounted and saluted him, but he did not greet me in return: I then said: 'O amīr! thy messenger hath greivously fatigued me, and I suffer from thirst. Allow me, I beg, to take a drink.' On this, the pages offered me water, but I said: No; I shall draw some for myself.' I then drew water whilst he looked on, and I drank to such a degree that I thought I should have burst. On finishing, I said: 'O amīr! may

546 AL-TIRMIDHĪ THE JURISCONSULT

Abū Ja'far Muḥammad Ibn Aḥmad Ibn Naṣr al-Tirmidhī, a jurisconsult of the sect of al-Shāfi'i, was the ablest of them all in that age, the most devout and the most abstemious. He resided at Baghdād, and taught Traditions in that city on the authority of Yaḥyā Ibn Bukayr al-Miṣrī, Yūsuf Ibn 'Adī, Kathīr Ibn Yaḥyā and other masters. Traditions were delivered on his own authority by the qāḍī Aḥmad Ibn Kāmil (No. 83, note) 'Abd al-Bāqī Ibn Qānī' (No. 149, note), and others. His character as a traditionist is perfectly established, and he bore a high reputation for learning, merit, and self-mortification. Abu 'l-Ṭayyib Aḥmad Ibn 'Uthmān al-Simsār, the father of Abū Ḥafṣ 'Umar Ibn Shāhīn (No. 131, note) relates as follows: "I was at Abū Ja'far al-Tirmidhī's, when a person consulted him about the saying of the Prophet, that God descendeth to the heaven of the world (i. e. the lowest of the seven heavens); and this person expressed his desire to know how there could, in that case, be any thing more exalted (than the lowest heaven)? To which al-Tirmidhī replied: 'The descent is intelligible; the manner how is unknown; the belief therein is obligatory, and the asking about it is a blamable innovation.' " His moderation in respect to food was extreme, and this resulted from indigence, devotion, and patience under poverty. It is related by Muḥammad Ibn Mūsā Ibn Ḥammād,

(Continued from page 168.)

God quench thy thirst at the rivers of Paradise! for I have druek to my utmost wish, and I know not which to praise most—the excellence of the water, joined to its sweetness and coolness or its clearness or the sweet smell of the aqueduct." He looked at me a moment, and said: 'I want thee for something, but this is not the time. Let this man retire., I immediately retired, and the slave said to me: 'Thou hast hit the mark!' To which I answered: 'May God reward thee! were it not for thee, I had perished.' The construction and completing of this aqueduct cost forty thousand dinārs." (Al-Maqrizī's Khīṭat; chapter towards the end of the work, and entitled قنطرة ابن طولون و بيرة.

I Yaḥyā Ibn 'Abd Allāh Ibn Bukayr, a mawlā to the tribe of Maḥzūm was an eminent traditionist of Egypt, and taught Mālik's Muwatṭa' from memory. He died in the month of Ṣafar, A.H. 231 (October, A.C. 845). (Elusn al-Muḥadḍharah).

that al-Tirmidhī told him that he had subsisted seventeen days on five pence, (three pence according to another version) "I then asked him," said Ibn Hammād, "how he had managed, and he replied: 'That sum was all I possessed, and I laid it out on turnips, one of which I ate each day.'" Abū Ishāq al-Zajjāj (No. 12) states that al-Tirmidhī received a monthly stipend of four dirhams<sup>1</sup>, and that he never asked any thing from any person. Al-Tirmidhī used to relate the following circumstance: "I had studied jurisprudence under* Abū Ḥanīfah; when, being, in the mosque of Madinah the year I made the pilgrimage, I had a dream in which I saw the blessed Prophet, and I said: 'O Apostle of God! I have studied the system taught by Abū Ḥanīfah; shall I adopt it?' and he answered: 'No!' I then said: 'Shall I adopt that of Mālik Ibn Anas?' and he replied: 'Adopt that portion of it which is in conformity with my sunnah (sayings and doings).'" I then asked him if I should adopt the system taught by al-Shāfi'i, and he replied: 'It is not his system; he took my sunnah, and nothing more, and he refuted those who contradicted it'. After having this dream, I immediately proceeded to Egypt and copied out al-Shāfi'i's books." Al-Dāraquṭnī (No. 409) styles him a Traditionist of veracity, trustworthy and pious. Al-Tirmidhī mentioned that he passed twenty-nine years in writing out the Traditions. He was born in the month of Dhu 'l-Hijjah, A.H. 200 (July, A.C. 816); some say A.H. 210; and he died on the 11 of Muḥarram A.H. 295 (October, A.C. 907)†. He never dyed his hair (as was customary at that period). Towards the close of his life, his intellect got deranged to an extreme degree. "Al-Tirmidhī" says al-Sam'ānī (No. 370) "means belonging to (Tirmidh) an ancient city on the bank of the river of Balkh, which is called Jayhūn (the Oxus). Various opinions are held respecting the pronunciation of this name; some say Turmidh and other Tirmidh; the inhabitants themselves pronounce it Tarmidh; the pronunciation which 1 Four dirhams are nearly equivalent to half a crown. This stipend was paid to him out of the public treasury: every doctor of the law, regularly ordained, being entitled to a pension from the state.

* M. de Slane's rendering of على مذهب أبي حنيفة is not correct; it should be "of the school of Abi Ḥanīfah."—Ed.

† 22 October.—Ed.

was long familiar to us was Tirmidh; but persons who pretend to exactness, and possess information on the subject, pronounce it Turmudh. Each of these pronunciations has its partisans, who give reasons in support of their opinion." Such are the words of al-Sam'ānī, and I am unable to offer any thing decisive on the subject. Persons who have been there inform me that it is situated, not in the province of Khawārizm, but in that of Transoxiana, and on the same side (of the river) as the latter.

547 IBN AL-ḤADDĀD, THE JURISCONSULT

Abū Bakr Muḥammad Ibn Aḥmad Ibn Muḥammad Ibn Ja'far, surnamed Ibn al-Ḥaddād, was a doctor of the sect of al-Shāfi'ī a native of Egypt, and a member of the tribe of Kinānah. He is the author of the work entitled Kitāb al-Furū' in which he treats of the development of the law according to Shāfi'ite principles. It forms a small volume, but is replete with information, and the questions of which it treats are discussed with extraordinary subtlety. Some of the most eminent imāms have undertaken to comment it; al-Qaffāl al-Marwazī (No. 309) composed a moderately-sized volume on the subject; the qāḍī Abū 'l-Ṭayyib al-Ṭabarī (No. 279) elucidated its obscurities in one large volume, and the shaykh Abū 'Alī al-Sinjī (No. 176) drew up a complete commentary on it, wherein he fully discusses every point. This last is one of the best productions of the kind. Ibn al-Ḥaddād learned jurisprudence from Abū Ishāq al-Marwazī (No. 3). My master 'Imād al-Dīn Ibn Bāṭish (No. 84, note) states, in the work composed by him on (Abū Ishāq's) Muhaddidhah, and in his Ṭabaqāt al-Fuqahā', or classified list of jurisconsults, that Ibn al-Ḥaddād was one of the most distinguished disciples of Abū Ibrāhīm al-Muzanī (No. 90), but this is an oversight on his part, for Ibn al-Ḥaddād was born the year al-Muzanī died. Nay, al-Qudā'ī mentions, in his Khifaf, that his birth took place on the day of al-Muzanī's death. How then could he possibly have been his disciple? I notice this error here lest persons should be led to think

1 His life will be found in this work, al-Qudā'ī mistaken, and Ibn Bā'ish in the right. The latter also attributes to Ibn al-Ḥaddād the verses rhyming in z, which I have quoted in the life of Zāfir al-Ḥaddād, native of Alexandria<sup>1</sup>. Ibn al-Ḥaddād was a doctor of great exactness in the examination of points of law, and singularly skilful in obtaining clear results from the depths of obscurity in which they lay concealed<sup>2</sup>. He occupied the posts of qāḍī and professor at Old Cairo; the princes and the people held him in the highest respect; and it was to his opinion they deferred when doubts arose on a point of law, or when any grave event took place. People used to say: "It would be the strangest circumstance that ever occurred to find an executioner angry (from having nothing to do), or to meet with a heap of dung free from impurities, or to see an opinion of Ibn al-Ḥaddād's refuted<sup>3</sup>." His birth took place on the 24th of Ramaḍān, A.H. 264 (May, A.C. 878)*, and he died A.H. 345 (A.C. 956-7), or 344 according to al-Sam'ānī. He delivered Traditions on the authority of Abū 'Abd al-Raḥmān al-Nasā'ī (No. 28) and other masters. Al-Qudā'ī states, in his Khīṭaṭ, that Ibn al-Ḥaddād expired on his return from the pilgrimage, A.H. 344, at a place called Munyah Harb, near the gate of Old Cairo; on the spot, it is said, where Cairo now stands. He was versed in a great variety of sciences such as those connected with the Qur'ān, jurisprudence, the Traditions, poetry, the combats of the ancient Arabs, grammar, philology etc. During his life he remained without a rival, and was beloved by all persons, from the highest to the lowest. The amīr Abu 'l-Qāsim Anūjūr Ibn al-Ikhshīd attended his funeral, in company with Kāfūr (No. 520) and followed by a crowd of the inhabitants. He lived to the age of seventy-nine years, four months and two days. Ḥaddād means a worker in iron, or one who sells it.

1 See No. 286, the lines beginning thus: "Had he taken refuge in an exemplary patience."

2 Literally: He was an exact doctor and a diver for the meanings.

3 In the original Arabic, this saying consists of three short sentences, rhyming together.

* 30 May. —Ed.

548 ABŪ BAKR AL-ŞAYRAFĪ

Abū Bakr Muḥammad Ibn 'Abd A'lāh, generally known by the name of Şayrafī, was a native of Baghdād and a doctor of the sect of al-Shāfi'. He ranked among the (regular) jurisconsults (of that city). Having studied the law under Abu 'l-'Abbās Ibn Surayj (No. 20), he acquired distinction by his acuteness in the discussion (of points of law not hitherto settled), by his skill in the use of analogical deduction, and by his penetration as a dogmatic theologian. He composed a work of quite an original cast on the fundamentals of jurisprudence; and Abū Bakr al-Qaffāl (see next article) states, in his work on that subject, that Abū Bakr al-Şayrafī was, next to al-Shāfi', the most learned of men in that branch of science. He was the first person of our sect (the Shāfi'ite) who undertook to compose a treatise on the drawing up of bonds<sup>1</sup>, and the work which he produced on this subject is of the highest excellence. He died on Thursday, the 21st of the latter Rabi', A.H. 330 (January, A.C. 942)*. The signification of Şayrafī is well known; it means one who changes gold and silver coin. I mention this here, because many persons mispronounce his surname and say Şrafi.

549 ABŪ BAKR AL-QAFFĀL AL-SHĀSHĪ

Abū Bakr Muḥammad Ibn 'Alī Ibn 'Ismā'il al-Qaffāl<sup>2</sup> al-Shāshī, a doctor of the Shāfi'ite sect, was incontrovertibly the ablest jurisconsult (imām) of that age, and possessed not only a deep knowledge of the law and the Traditions, but was also versed in dogmatic theology, and proved himself a learned philologist and a good poet. The Shāfi'ites did not possess in Transoxiana a man to be compared to him. (In the furtherance of his studies) he travelled to Khurasān, Irāq, al-Hijāz, Syria, and the northern frontier of Mesopotamia, and his reputation spread far and wide.

1 In Arabic: Ilm al-Shurūf. No. 24, note.

2 Al-Qaffāl signifies locksmith. See No. 309.

* 13 January.—Ed.

He learned jurisprudence from Ibn Surayj (No. 20) and composed a great number of works. He was the first who drew up a treatise on the approved method of dialectics (jadāl) employed by the jurisconsults among themselves<sup>1</sup>. He composed also a treatise on the principles of canonic jurisprudence, and a commentary on the Risālah<sup>2</sup>. It was he who propagated the Shāfi'ite doctrines in Transoxiana. He taught Traditions on the authority of Ibn Jarīr al-Ṭabarī (No. 544) and other eminent doctors of that age, and Traditions were delivered on his own authority by the Ḥākim Abū 'Abd Allāh Ibn al-Bayyī<sup>3</sup>, Abū 'Abd Allāh Ibn Mandah<sup>4</sup>, Abū 'Abd al-Rahmān al-Sulamī<sup>5</sup> and many others. He was the father of al-Qāsim, the author of the work cited, under the title of al-Taqrīb (simplification of the Shāfi'ite doctorines), in the Nihāyah and the Basīṭ<sup>6</sup>. Al-Ghazālī mentions him in the second chapter of the section on pledges and mortgages, but calls him Abū 'l-Qāsim, wherein he is mistaken. Al-'Ijlī (No. 87) states, in his Explanation of the Obscurities met with in Wajīz and Wastī in the second chapter of the section of purification with sand, that the author of the Taqrīb was Abū Bakr al-Qaffāl, and that some attribute the work to his son al-Qāsim. He then adds: "And for this reason it is that, in citing him, they designate him by the vague appellation of the author of the Taqrīb." I shall here add that, in the month of Shawwāl, A.H. 665 (July, A.C. 1267). I saw in the library of the 'Ādiliyah college (at Damascus) a copy of the Taqrīb in ten volumes, but bound in six, and bearing an inscription indicating the 1 For the elucidation of this, see the extract from Ibn Khaldūn, given by M. de Sacy in his Anthologie Arabe, pages 474, 475.

2 This is the celebrated epistle composed by al-Shāfi'i on his own doctrine.

3 His life will be found in this work.

4 The life of Ibn Mandah is given by Ibn Khallikān.

5 Abū 'Abd al-Rahmān Muḥammad Ibn al-Ḥusayn Ibn Mūsā al-Sulamī (member of the tribe of Sulaym) was a native of Naysābūr and the most eminent Sūfī doctor of that age. He travelled to all parts in search of instruction, and collected information from the lips of numerous masters. He composed a commentary on the Qur'ān, a history, and nearly one hundred other works. His death took place in the month of Shā'bān, A. H. 412 (Nov.-Dec., A.C. 1021), Nujūm. (Al-Yāfi'i).

6 These works are by Abū Ḥamid al-Ghazzālī. Ibn Khallikān gives his life.

author to be Abu 'l-Ḥasan al-Qāsim Ibn Abī Bakr al-Qaffāl al-Shāshī; and this copy was in the hand-writing of the shaykh Quṭb al-Dīn Mas'ūd al-Naysābūrī, a doctor whose life will be found farther on. It bore also a note written by Quṭb al-Dīn, declaring that he had made a waqf of it<sup>1</sup>. This is a different work from that of al-Sulaym al-Rāzī (No. 251) bearing the same title, yet I have met a great number of jurisconsults who supposed it to be the same. This induces me to draw the reader's attention to the circumstance. Copies of al-Qaffāl's Taqrīb are scarce, but those of al-Rāzī's are in every person's hands, and it is by the work of the latter that the jurisconsults of Khurāsān finish their studies. Some difference of opinion subsists respecting the true date of Abū Bakr al-Qaffāl's death, thus the shaykh Abū Ishāq al-Shīrāzī states, in his classified list of jurisconsults, that he died A.H. 336 (A.C. 947-8), and the Ḥākim Ibn al-Bayyī' says that he breathed his last at al-Shāsh, in the month of Dhu 'l-Ḥijjah, A.H. 365 (August, A.C. 976). He then adds: "I wrote down (pieces of information) under his dictation, and he also did the same under mine." Al-Sām'ānī (No. 370) makes a similar observation in his Ansāb, and then adds: "He was born in the year 291 (A.C. 903-4)." The same author mentions however, in his Dhay'l, or Supplement, that he died A.H. 366, and he repeats the same statement in his Ansāb, under the head of al-Shāshī; but the former date is given by him in the life of al-Qaffāl himself. Shāshī means belonging to al-Shāsh; this is a city beyond the Sihūn<sup>2</sup>, and has produced a number of learned men. This al-Qaffāl is a different person from al-Quffāl al-Marwazī (see No. 309), a doctor who lived at a later epoch.

550 ABU 'L-ḤASAN AL-MĀSARJISĪ

Abu 'l-Ḥasan Muḥammad Ibn 'Alī Ibn Sahl Ibn Muṣliḥ al-Māsarjisī, a Shāfi'ite jurisconsult, was one of the great masters of that sect in Khurāsān, the best acquainted of them with the doctrines promulgated by its founder, with the regular system

1 See No. 21, note.

2 The Sihūn or Cirr, the ancient Jaxartes, falls into the lake of Aral.

which they form, and with the ramifications of those points of controversy to which its main principles give rise. He studied jurisprudence in Khurāsān, 'Irāq and Hijāz, and was the assiduous disciple of Abū Ishā al-Marwazī (No. 3), whom he accompanied to Egypt, and with whom he remained till his death. He then proceeded to Baghdād, where he acted as deputy to Ibn Abī Hurayrah (No. 151) every time that the latter absented himself from his class. In the year 344 (A.C. 955-6) he returned to Khurāsān, and gave lectures at Naysābūr, which were attended by the jurisconsults of that city. He taught jurisprudence to the qādī Abu 'l-Ṭayyib al-Ṭabarī (No. 279), and he himself received lessons from his maternal uncle al-Muwammal Ibn al-Ḥasan Ibn 'Isā al-Māsarjisī. When in Egypt, he collected (legal) information from the disciples of al-Muzanī (No. 90) and from Yūnus Ibn 'Abd al-A'lā al-Ṣadafī.<sup>1</sup> The Ḥākim Ibn al-Bayyī<sup>2</sup> states that, in the month of Rajab, A. H. 381 (September-October, A.C. 991), regular assemblies were held to hear him give dictations in the Dār al-Sunnah (college for teaching the Traditions). He died on Wednesday evening, the 5th of the latter Jumādā, A. H. 384 (July, A.C. 994)*, at the age of seventy-six years, and was interred on the evening of the following day. The shaykh Abū Ishāq al-Shīrāzī (No. 5) says in his Ṭabaqāt, that his death occurred in A. H. 383. Māsarjisī means related to Māsarjis; this person was grandfather to Abu 'l-Ḥasan 'Alī al-Ḥasan Ibn 'Isā Ibn Māsarjis al-Naysābūrī, and had been a Christian, but was converted to Islāmism by 'Abd Allāh Ibn al-Mubārak (No. 300). The doctor Abu 'l-Hasan Muḥammad al-Māsarjisī was son to the daughter of this Abū 'Alī, and surnamed after him, like all the other members of the family.

551 AL-KHATAN

Abū 'Abd Allāh Muḥammad Ibn al-Ḥasan Ibn Ibrāhīm, a native of Istirābād, or of Jurjān according to some, and a doctor

1 His life will be found in this work

2 The life of the Ḥākim is given by our author.

* 18 July.—Ed.

of the sect of al-Shāfi'ī, was generally known by the surname of al-Khātān. He acquired a high distinction by his piety, his talent as a jurisconsult, and the excellent traditional information which he possessed on points connected with the Shāfi'ite law<sup>1</sup>. In the science of controversial reasoning, and in those connected with the Qur'ān and its readings, he held the first rank, and was one of the most eminent amongst the learned whose skill lay in speculative investigations and dialectics. When in his native town, he received lessons from Abū Nu'aym 'Abd al-Malik Ibn Muḥammad Ibn 'Adī, and other masters of the same epoch; in the year 337 (A.C. 948-9) he visited Naysābūr, and remained there two years, after which he proceeded to Iṣbahān, where he studied Abū Dāwūd's (No. 254) Musnad (authenticated collection of Traditions) under the tuition of 'Abd Allāh Ibn Ja'far<sup>2</sup>. He then passed into 'Irāq, and, when upwards of forty years of age, he began to write, and produced numerous works. He was an indefatigable traveller, and received information from the lips of many doctors. A commentary was composed by him on the Talkhīṣ, a work of Abu 'l-'Abbās Ibn al-Qāṣṣ (No. 21). He died on the Festival of the Sacrifice (the 10th of Dhu 'l-Hijjah) A.H. 386 (Dec., A.C. 966)* at the age of seventy-five years. He was called al-Khātān (the son-in-law) because he was thus allied to Abū Bakr al-Ismā'īlī (No. 4, note).

1 Such I take to be the meaning of the words وله وجوه في المذهب, an expression which frequently occurs, and which, in a former part of this work I rendered erroneously by: he had some excellent views on the subject of the Shāfi'ite doctrines. The وجوه are undoubtedly the particular channels through which certain decisions on points of law passed down to posterity by oral transmission. When a doctor was the sole possessor of some traditional information of this kind, and if the persons through whom it descended to him were men of acknowledged credibility, the expression just mentioned was applied to him. If the points of information which he possessed were transmitted down through an unusual channel, the expression employed was: وله وجوه غريبة في المذهب. See also No. 557 of this volume, in the life of al-Fārisī.

2 Read عبدالله بن in the printed text.

* 24 December.—Ed.

552 ABŪ SAHL AL-ŠU'LŪKĪ

Abū Sahl Muḥammad Ibn Sulaymān Ibn Muḥammad Ibn Sulaymān Ibn Hārūn Ibn Mūsā Ibn 'Isā Ibn Ibrāhīm Ibn Bishr al-Ḥanafī al-Ijlī (a member of the tribe of Ḥanīfah, a branch of that of 'Ijlī), and generally known by the name of al-Šu'lūkī, was born at Iṣbahān, the native place of his family, and dwelt at Naysābūr. He was a doctor of the Shāfi'ite sect, an interpreter of the Qur'ān, a scholastic theologian, an adept in the belles-lettres, a grammarian, a poet, a prosodian, and a kātib. The Ḥākim Abū 'Abd Allāh Ibn al-Bayyī' mentions him in his historical work, and says: "He was the chief doctor of the age, and the ablest of contemporary jurisconsults; he had studied the law under Abū Ishāq al-Marwazī, and fathomed all the depths of science. He then proceeded to 'Irāq, and went to Baṣrah, where he continued to give lessons for some years, when his presence was required at Iṣbahān, where he also remained during some years<sup>1</sup>." On learning the death of his uncle Abu 'l-Ṭayyib<sup>2</sup>, he departed secretly for Naysābūr, in the year 337 (A.C. 949), and, for three days, he sat there in public to receive condolences, during which the Shaykh Abū Bakr Ibn Ishāq<sup>3</sup> remained seated at his side, as did also all the chiefs of the civil administration, the qādīs, and the muftīs of the two sects<sup>4</sup>. When the ceremony of mourning was terminated,

1. Being unable to distinguish where the extract from Ibn al-Bayyī' 's work finishes, I indicate it as ending here; but what follows to the date of al-Šu'lūkī's death may perhaps belong to it. I am however inclined to suppose it shorter than I have indicated, and that the last words of it are: The ablest of contemporary jurisconsults.

2. Abu 'l-Ṭayyib Aḥmad Ibn Muḥammad Ibn Sulaymān al-Ḥanafī al-Su'lūkī, an eminent doctor of the sect of al-Shāfi'i, a traditionist and philologist, died in the month of Rajab, A.H. 337 (Jan.-Feb., A.C. 949). Tab. al-Shāfi'in.

3. Abū Bakr Aḥmad Ibn Ishāq Ibn Ayyūb, a native of Naysābūr and sur-named al-Ḍubā'ī (الضبي) was one of the imāms of the Shāfi'ite sect, and a mufti of the highest reputation. He wrote a number of large works, such as the Mabsut (the developed, probably a treatise on Shāfi'ite jurisprudence), a treatise on nouns and adjectives, another on faith and free-will, a fourth on the merits of the four first Khalīfs, etc. Born A.H. 258 (A.C. 871-2); died in the month of Shu'bān A.H. 342 (Dec.-Jan., A.C. 953-4); Ṭabaqāt al-Shāfi'in.

4. The two sects were probably the Ḥanafite and the Shāfi'ite.

regular assemblies were held to hear him discuss points of law, and there did not remain an adversary or an approver of his opinions, but acknowledged his merit and superiority. The *ṣhaykh*s visited him repeatedly, to request him that he would bring to their city those whom he had left behind him (his wife and family) at Iṣbahān, and he at length acceded to their wishes. He then undertook the duties of professor and muftī at Naysābūr, and the jurisconsults of the place received lessons from him. The Ṣāhib Ibn 'Abbād (No. 93) used to say: "We never saw the like of Abū Sahl al-Ṣu'lūkī, and he himself never saw his like." Abū 'l-Walīd<sup>1</sup> being asked concerning the respective merits of Abū Bakr al-Qaffāl (No. 309), and al-Ṣu'lūkī he replied: "Who could possibly equal al-Ṣu'lūkī?" This doctor was born A.H. 296 (A.C. 908-9); he began to learn the Traditions, A.H. 305; he went to attend Abū 'Alī al-Ṭhaqafī's<sup>2</sup> lectures on law in 313, and he died towards the end of the year 369 (A.C. 980), at Naysābūr. His body was borne on a bier to the hippodrome of al-Ḥusayn, and the sultān authoursied Abū 'l-Ṭayyib (No. 264), the son of the deceased, to celebrate the funeral service. He was interred in the mosque where he used to teach. The word Ṣu'lūkī has been already explained (No. 264).

553 ABU 'L-ṬAYYIB IBN SALAMAH AL-ḌABBĪ

Abū 'l-Ṭayyib Muḥammad Ibn al-Mufaḍḍal Ibn Salamah Ibn 'Aṣim al-Ḍabbī, a native of Baghdād, and one of the most eminent 1 Abū 'l-Walīd Ḥasan Ibn Muḥammad Ibn Aḥmad, a member of the Umayyad family and a native of Naysābūr, was one of the imāms of the *Shāfi'*ite sect, and the first Traditionist of his age in Khurasān. He was distinguished for piety and learning. In one of his works, he treated of Muslim's Saḥīḥ, and, in another, of the *Shāfi'*ite doctrines. He composed also an excellent commentary on al-Shāfi''s Risālah (see No. 549, Note). Died in the month of the first Rabi', A.H. 349 (May, A.C. 960), aged seventy-two years. (Tab. al-Shāfi'in).

2 Abū 'Alī Muḥammad Ibn 'Abd al-Wahhāb al-Ṭhaqafī al-Ḥajjājī drew his descent, as his surnames indicate, from al-Ḥajjāj Ibn Yūsuf al-Ṭhaqafī. This imām, equally distinguished for learning and piety, resided at Naysāpūr. Born A.H. 244 (A.C. 858-9; died in the month of the first Jumādā, A.H. 328 (Feb.-March, A.C. 940). (Tab. al-Shāfi'in).

doctors of the Shāfi'ite sect, studied jurisprudence under Abu 'l-'Abbās Ibn Surayj (No. 20). He was noted for his extreme penetration, and this induced Abu 'l-'Abbās to pay him the greatest attention, and take the utmost pains in giving him instruction. Abu 'l-Ṭayyib composed a number of works, and he died in the month of Muḥarram, A.H. 308 (May-June, A.C. 920) : being cut off in the flower of his age. He possessed some excellent traditional information on points connected with the Shāfi'ite doctrines<sup>1</sup>. His father, Abu Ṭālib al-Mufaḍḍal Ibn Salamah Ibn 'Āṣim al-Ḍubbi was a philologist, and author of some celebrated works on various branches of literature, and on the rhetorical figures of the Qur'ān. He belonged to the school of Kūfah<sup>2</sup> and wrote an elegant hand. He met (and received information from) Ibn al-A'rābi<sup>3</sup> and other men eminent for learning, and he composed a book in which he pointed out and corrected the errors committed by al-Khalīl Ibn Aḥmad in his Kitāb al-'Ayn (No. 208). The following is a list of his works: the Kitāb al-Tārikh (book of History), treating of philology; the Kitāb al-Fākhir (liber se jectantis); the Kitāb al-'Ūd wa 'l-Malāhī (on the lute and other musical instruments); the Kitāb Jalā al-Shubah (obscurities cleared up); the Kitāb at-Taif<sup>4</sup>, the Kitāb Diyā al-Qulūb (light of hearts), treating of the rhetorical figures of the Qur'ān, and filling more than twenty volumes; the Kitāb al-Ishtiqāq (on etymology); the Kitāb al-Zarā' wa 'l-Nabāt (on seed and plants); on the members of the human body: on the requisites for a kātib; on the words ending in a long and in a short aif; a Mudkhil, or Introduction to the science of grammar<sup>5</sup>. Abū Bakr al-Ṣūlī<sup>6</sup> transmitted traditional information on his authority, and says that he attended his lessons in the year 290. Salamah Ibn 'Āṣim, the grandfather of Abu 'l Ṭayyib,

1. See No. 546, of this volume.

2. See No. 154, Note.

3. His life is given in this work.

4. This is a treatise on the Ṭayf al-Khiyāl. See vol. I. Introd.

5. Compare this list with that of al-Aḡmā'ī's works, (No. 354), and see an observation on the subject in the Introduction to vol. I.

6. The life of Abū Bakr al-Ṣūlī is given by Ibn Khallikān.

was the pupil of al-Farrā<sup>1</sup>, and the person who transmitted to the world his master's peculiar system of Qur'ān-reading. They belonged to a family of which all the members were celebrated for talent. Al-Mufaḍḍal was a favorite of the wazīr Ismā'il Ibn Bulbul<sup>2</sup>; being informed that the poet Ibn al-Rūmī (No. 438) had composed a satire on him, (he made a complaint to) the wazīr, (who) testified his displeasure towards Ibn al-Rūmī by refusing him a share in the recompenses which he was accustomed to distribute. The poet then composed the following verses against al-Mufaḍḍal:

"Cover yourself with the cloak of al-Kisā'i or dress in the furred garment of al-Farrā—or have al-Khalīl for a friend or Shibawayh for an inseparable companion<sup>3</sup>—or become one of Abu 'l-Aswad's company<sup>4</sup> and take a surname indicative of melancholy; yet God will never permit thee to be counted a man of learning, but will let you be reckoned among the dunces<sup>5</sup>."

---

1 The life of al-Farrā is given in this work.

2 Abu 'l-Ṣaqr (ابوالصقر) Ismā'il Ibn Bulbul was appointed wazīr to al-Mu'tamid by al-Muwaffaq that Khalīf's brother. His noble and generous character gained him many friends, and his talents placed him at the head of the civil and military authority of the empire. This office procured him the title of the grateful (الشكور) wazīr. In his youth he led a disorderly life, but, when invested with power, his conduct gave general satisfaction, and drew from the poets al-Buhturī, Ibn al-Rūmī, and others, the warmest eulogiums. He claimed kindred with the tribe of Shaybān, but this was repelled as an unfounded pretensions by some of his enemies and Ibn al-Rūmī incurred his displeasure by reciting to him a piece of verse in which he said that even if he had not the honour of being descended from Shaybān, he would have been an honour to Shaybān. The poet who thus unintentionally lost his patron's favour, became his enemy, and lashed him in virulent satires. Ibn Bulbul was arrested by al-Mu'taḍid; and after undergoing severe tortures, he was executed in prison by that Khalīf's orders. (Al-Duwal al-Islamiyah, MS. No. 895, fol 233.)

3 Literally: As a pledge in (your) possession.

4 That is: a grammarian. See No. 285.

5 This piece is a mere tissue of puns on the names of the most celebrated grammarians. Their lives are given in this work.

554 IBN AL-MUNDHIR AL-NAYSĀBŪRĪ

Abū Bakr Muḥammad Ibn Ibrāhīm Ibn al-Mundhir al-Naysābūrī (native of Naysābūr), a jurisconsult of great learning and information, is spoken of in these terms by Abū Ishāq<sup>1</sup>, in his Ṭabaqāt al-Fuqahā (classified list of Jurisconsults): "The questions on which jurisconsults disagree were set forth by him in some works of quite an original cast, and which are indispensable for such persons as wish to defend or attack any of those points." I do not know from whom he acquired his knowledge of the law. He died at Makkah, A.H. 309 (A.C. 921-2), or 310. A well-known book of his, on points of disagreement between jurisconsults, is that which bears the title of Kitāb al-Ishrāf (view of the different systems); it is a large work, and proves him to have closely examined the systems of the great jurisconsults (imāms). It is an excellent work, most instructive, and of great utility. Besides this, he composed a treatise called the Mabsūṭ (extended), in which also he sets forth the systems of the principal jurisconsults, and indicates the points in which their opinions differ. This work is larger than the Ishrāf. He left also a small treatise on the ijmā' (points of law on which the imāms unanimously agree):-

555 ABŪ ZAYD AL-MARWAZĪ

Abū Zayd Muḥammad Ibn Aḥmad Ibn 'Abd Allāh Ibn Muḥammad al-Marwazī, al-Fāshānī, a doctor of the Shāfi'ite sect, and one of its most eminent imāms, was distinguished for his skill in the discussion of doubtful points, his life passed in the practices of devotion, his acquirements as a ḥāfiẓ of the sect<sup>2</sup>, and the rare information which he possessed on its doctrines<sup>3</sup>.

1 He means Abū Ishāq al-Shīrāzī, see No. 5.

2 A ḥāfiẓ of a sect is one who knows by heart and transmits to others various legal questions which have been resolved by the doctors of that sect.

3 See No. 551, note.

He learned jurisprudence from Abū Ishāq al-Marwazī (No. 3), and taught it to Abū Bakr al-Qaffāl al-Marwazī (No. 309). Having proceeded to Baghdād, he taught Traditions there, and had among his pupils the hāfiẓ Abū 'l-Ḥasan al-Dāraqutnī (No. 409), and Muḥammad Ibn Aḥmad al-Qāsim al-Maḥāmili<sup>1</sup>. He then set out for Makkah, and resided in that sanctuary seven years, during which he taught the Traditions contained in al-Bukhārī's Ṣaḥīḥ, having himself learned them from Muḥammad Ibn Yūsuf Farabī<sup>2</sup>. The Khaṭīb (No. 33) said of him : "Abū Zayd is the most eminent of those who taught this book by oral transmission;" and Abū Bakr Ibn al-Bazzāz related as follows : "The Jurisconsult Abū Zayd travelled with me from Naysābūr to Makkah, one camel sufficed to bear us both, and, as we sat in baskets slung on to each side of the animal, I was his counterpoise all the way<sup>3</sup>. And I do not think that the recording angels ever wrote down any thing against him." By any thing he means any sin. The jurisconsults Aḥmad Ibn Muḥammad al-Ḥātimī said : I heard Abū Zayd al-Marwazī say : "When at Makkah, I saw in a dream the Apostle of God, and he seemed to say to Jibrīl (the angel Gabriel) : 'O spirit of God ! accompany that man to his home.'" In the early part of his life, he was poor, and bereft of means: so he passed the winter without a cloak, notwithstanding the severity of the cold in that country; and he used to answer, when spoken to on the subject : "I have an incommodity which prevents me from wearing wadded clothing." That incommodity was poverty, and he never was induced to inform any person of his real state. Towards the end of his life, fortune became propitious, but, as he was then advanced in age and had lost his teeth, he could neither chew nor enjoy sexual pleasure; he therefore used to address his prosperity in these terms : "May God withhold his blessing from thee ! thou hast come when I have neither teeth nor strength<sup>4</sup>." He died on 1 This was the father of the Maḥāmili whose life is given in No. 56.

2 The life of this traditionist is given by our author.

3 The Arabic text expresses this very concisely and very clearly; translated literally, it would run thus : I counterpoised the jurisconsult Abū Zayd from Naysāpūr to Makkah.

4 I have modified the meaning of the word نصاب but it is clear enough from what precedes.

Thursday, the 13th of Rajab, A.H. 371 (January, A.C. 982,)* at Marw. The words Marwazl and Fāshānī have been already explained (the first in No. 37. and the second in No. 35)<sup>1</sup>.

556 IBN WARQĀ AL-'UDANĪ

Abū Bakr Muḥammad Ibn 'Abd Allāh Ibn Muḥammad Ibn Naṣr Ibn Warqā al-'Udanī, a jurisconsult of the sect of al-Shāfi'ī was their chief imām in that age. The Hākim Ibn al-Bayyī<sup>2</sup> mentions his name in the History of Naysābūr, and says: On his return from the pilgrimage, he resided with us at Naysābūr, for some time, and surpassed all the other jurisconsults by his self-mortification and by his lamentations for having been remiss in God's service." He died at Bukhārā, in the month of the first Rabi', A.H. 385 (April, A.C. 995), and was buried at Kalābādhi.—'Udanī means belonging to 'Udanah, a village in the dependencies of Bukhārā:" such are al-Sam'ānī's (No. 370) words, but the jurisconsults mispronounce it and say 'Udl. When I was studying the law, I heard one of my masters pronounce it Awḍānī. This doctor had received by tradition some particular information on points connected with the doctrines of his sect<sup>3</sup>. The author of the Wasīṭ (Abū Ḥāmid al-Ghazālī) frequently mentions his name."<sup>4</sup> "Kalābādhi is the name of a quarter in the city of Bukhārā. "It was from this place that a traditionist of great authority, Abū Naṣr Aḥmad Ibn Muḥammad Ibn al-Ḥasan Ibn al-Ḥusayn Ibn 'Alī Ibn Rustum al-Kalābādhi derived his surname. He died on the 22nd of the latter Jumādā, A.H. 398 (March, A.C. 1008),† and he was born in A.H. 460 (A.C. 1067-8)." Such are the words of Abū Sa'd al-

1 As it might be supposed that this doctor's name was al-Kāshānī, not al-Fāshānī, I may be allowed to observe that the latter reading is confirmed by the Ṭabaqāt al-Shāfi'īn where we read that the word is written with a fa and a shīn.

2 His life will be found in this work.

3 See No. 557, note.

* 12 January.—Ed.

† The date should be 23 of the latter Jumādā (5 March).—Ed.

Sam'ānī, but he must be mistaken, since he places al-Kalābādhi's birth subsequently to his death. I have consulted in many quarters, hoping to clear up this error, but could find no indications on the subject ; so I let al-Sam'ānī's words stand as they are<sup>1</sup>.

557 ABŪ BAKR AL-FĀRISĪ

Abū Bakr Muḥammad Ibn Aḥmad Ibn 'Alī Ibn Shāhawayh, a native of Fārs (al-Fārisī) and a doctor of the Shāfi'ite sect, is spoken of in these terms by the Ḥākim Abu 'Abd Allāh Ibn al-Bayyī' in his history of Naysābūr: "He resided for some time at Naysābūr and then proceeded to Buḫārā, whence he returned to the former city ; he then came back to this country, Fārs, and occupied the post of qādī. He subsequently removed to Naysābūr, and taught Traditions in that city." He died there, A.H. 362 (A.C. 972-3). Some points of traditional information connected with the doctrines of the sect, and received from the very highest authorities, were communicated by him to his disciples ; he was the only person in possession of this information, and we have never found it given on the authority of any other person but himself. I do not know from whom he acquired his knowledge of jurisprudence. Shāhawayh is a Persian name, composed of Shāh (king), and wayh (woe !). Relative to this last word, al-Jawharī (No. 9, note) says in his Ṣaḥāḥ: *Shāh*awayh and other names of a similar form are composed of a noun and an interjection, coalescing so as to form a proper name." Fāris is an extensive region, of which the capital is Shīrāz. Its pronunciation is so well known, that it is needless to indicate it.

<sup>1</sup> It appears from the Ṭabaqāt al-Ḥuffāz, that al-Kalābādhi taught traditions at Baḡhdād in the life time of al-Dāraqutnī. That doctor died A.H. 385, whence we may conclude with great probability that the date of 398 is that of al-Kalābādhi's death, and such is, in fact, the statement of the author of the Ṭabaqāt. He places his birth in the year 318.

558 ABŪ 'ABD ALLĀH AL-QUḌĀ'Ī

Abū 'Abd Allāh Muḥammad Ibn Salāmah Ibn Ja'far Ibn 'Alī Ibn Ḥukmūn Ibn Ibrāhīm Ibn Muḥammad Ibn Muslim al-QuḌā'ī, a doctor of the Shāfi'ite sect and author of the Kitāb al-Shihāb<sup>1</sup> is spoken of, in the History of Damascus, by the ḥāfiz Ibn 'Asākir (No. 416); he mentions there that Abū 'Abd Allāh al-Ḥumaydī transmitted Traditions on his authority, and that he was appointed deputy-Qāḍī of Old Cairo by the Egyptian government (the Fātimids), and had been once sent by them on an embassy to the Greek court. He composed a great number of works, such as the Kitāb al-Shihāb (the flambeau), a treatise on the merit of the imām al-Shāfi'ī with an account of his life, the Anbā' an al-Anbiyā (history of the prophets), Tawārīkh al-Khulafā (history of the khalifs), and the Khīṭaṭ Miṣr (topography of Cairo)<sup>2</sup>. The amīr Abū Naṣr Ibn Mākūlā says, in the Kitāb al-Ikmāl (No. 414), that he was conversant with great variety of sciences. He died at Old Cairo on the eve of Thursday, the 16th of Dhu 'l-Qa'dah, A.H. 454 (Nov., A.C. 1062)*; and the funeral service was said over him in the Muṣallā<sup>3</sup> of al-Najjār, on the afternoon of the following day. Al-Sam'ānī (No. 370) mentions, in his article on the Khaṭīb Abū Bakr Aḥmad (No. 33), the author of the History of Baghdād, that the Khaṭīb made the pilgrimage, A.H. 445, the same year as 'Abd Allāh al-QuḌā'ī, and that he learned some Traditions from him. We have already spoken of al-QuḌā'ī in the life of al-Zāhir al-'Ubaydī (No. 457), and that he was 'alāmah writer to al-Jarjarā'ī al-Aqṭa' (the mutilated), that prince's wazīr. QuḌā'ī means belonging to QuḌā'ah, the son of Ma'add Ibn 'Adnān; or according to some, a descendant of Ḥimyar; the latter opinion is more generally held, and comes closer to the truth. QuḌā'ah's real name was 'Umar Ibn Mālik; a great number of tribes draw

1 The Shihāb is noticed by Ḥājji Khalifah; he calls it the Shihāb al-Akḥbār (flambeau of information), and says that it contains more maxims, proverbs, and rules of politeness, extracted from the sayings of the Prophet, by Abū 'Abd Allāh al-QuḌā'ī.

2 This work appears to have been closely copied by al-Maqrīzī, in his compilation usually bearing the same title.

3 See No. 262, note.

* 12 November.—Ed.

their descent from him, such as those of Kalb, Bali, Juhaynah, 'Udhrah, etc. The Najjār (carpenter) whose name is borne by the Muṣallā, was a mawlā to the family of Ghāfiq, and bore the name of 'Imrān Ibn Mūsā al-Najjār; some say, however, that he was called Abu 'l-Ṭayyib Muḥammad Ibn Ja'far al-Baghḍādī al-Najjār, and that he bore the surname of al-Ghundar (the corpulent); he died A.H. 358 (A.C. 968-9), some time previously to the arrival of the Qā'id Jawhar (No. 141) in Egypt.

559 ABŪ 'ABD ALLĀH AL-MAS'ŪDĪ

Abū 'Abd Allāh Muḥammad Ibn 'Abd al-Malik Ibn Mas'ūd Ibn Aḥmad al-Mas'ūdī, a Shāfi'ite jurisconsult, an imām of that sect, and eminently distinguished for his talents and piety, was a native of Marw. He studied the law under Abū Bakr al-Qaffāl al-Marwazī (No. 309), and wrote an excellent commentary on al-Muzani's abridgment of the Shāfi'ite doctrines (No. 90). He taught a few traditions on the authority of his master al-Qaffāl.

1 Another and more celebrated al-Mas'ūdī, the author of the Meadows of gold, is noticed by al-Dhahabī in his Tārīkh al-Islām. MS. No. 646, fol. 211; I there find the following indications: Abu Ḥasan 'Alī Ibn al-Ḥusayn Ibn 'Alī, surnamed al-Mas'ūdī, because (it is said) he drew his descent from Ibn Mas'ūd, one of Prophet's Companions, was the author of the Murūj al-Dhahab (meadows of gold) and a native of Baḡḥdād, but he dwelt for some time in Egypt. This learned historian and transmitter of curious information composed also the following works: Kitāb Dhakhā'ir al-'Ulūm (the treasures of science); the Kitāb al-Rasā'il (book of essays); the Kitāb al-Istizkār, etc., (memoir of what occurred in former times); the Akhlāb al-Umam (history of nations); the Maqālāt fi Uṣul al-Diyānāt (discourses on the dogmas of the different religions); the Akhlāb al-Khawārij (history of the Kharijites), etc. Yaqūt has a notice on him in his Tārīkh al-Udahū (Hājjī Khalīfah, No. 472), or history of learned scholars, but places his death in the year 346, which is not exact. Al-Mas'ūdī held the opinions of the Mu'tazilites. He died in the month of the latter Jumādā, A.H. 345 (Sept.-Oct., A.C. 956). For further information respecting al-Mas'ūdī and his writings see M. de Sacy's notice on the Tanbih wa 'l-Ishraf (another work by the same author, in the eighth vol. of the Notices et Extraits, and an article in the Journal Asiatique for January 1839. The first vol. of a translation of the Murūj has been published by Dr. Sprenger, under the patronage of the Oriental Translation Committee.

Al-Ghazzālī tells an anecdote of him in the Wasīf, third chapter of the section on Faith, wherein he treats of the different modes by which perjury may be committed: speaking of a subtle question of a point of law, he says "Question to which the preceding one gives rise<sup>1</sup>. If a person swear that he will not eat eggs, and he goes afterwards to a man and says: 'By Allāh! I shall eat what thou hast in thy pocket!' and behold, it is an egg! (what, is to be done so as to avoid perjury?). This question was proposed to al-Qaffāl as he was seated in the chair (presiding an assembly of his pupils), but he could not find an answer to it. On this, his pupil al-Mas'ūdī said: 'Let him have a biscuit made with the egg and eat that; he will thus have eaten what was in the man's pocket, and not have eaten the egg. This answer received general approbation, and it was certainly a most ingenious solution of the difficulty<sup>2</sup>.' Al-Mas'ūdī died at Marw subsequently to the year 420 (A.C. 1030). He was called al-Mas'ūdī (the Mas'ūdian) after his grandfather Mas'ud.

560 ABU 'ĀṢIM AL-'ABBĀDĪ

The qāḍī Abū 'Āṣim Muḥammad Ibn Aḥmad Ibn Muḥammad Ibn 'Abd Allāh Ibn 'Abbād al-'Abbādī, a native of Herāt (al-Harawī) and a doctor of the sect of al-Shāfi', studied jurisprudence at Herāt under the qāḍī Abū Maṣṣūr al-Azdī, and at Naysābūr under the qāḍī Abū 'Umar al-Baṣṭāmī. He then became perfectly master of a great variety of sciences and was noted for the subtlety of his investigations. In his travels to different countries he met a great number of shaykhs (masters), and received from them information. He is the author of some useful works, such as a treatise on the duties of a qāḍī, the Mabsūṭ (extended), the Hādī (guide), to the doctrines of the learned, a refutation

1 Literally: Branch; that is: ramification of the principle which precedes.

2 Abū Ḥanīfah resolved this question much better. He said that the egg should be hatched, and that the man should eat the chicken.

of al-Sam'ānī, and a small volume containing a classified list of jurisconsults. Abū Sa'd al-Harawī<sup>1</sup>, the author of the Ishrāf, or elucidation of the duties of a qādī, and of the Ghawāmiḍ al-Ḥukūmat, or obscure judgments, drew some of his information from al-Abbādī. (Abū 'Āṣim al-'Abbādī) received and transmitted Traditions. He died in the month of Shawwāl, A.H. 458 (August-Sept., A.C. 1066); he was born A.H. 375 (A.C. 985-6). 'Abbādī means descended from 'Abbād, the person whose name occurs in 'Abu 'Āṣim's genealogy.

561 AL-KHIDRĪ

Abu 'Abd Allāh Muḥammad Ibn Aḥmad al-Khidrī, a native of Marw and a doctor of the Shāfi'ite sect, was imām and chief jurisconsult of the Shāfi'ites in city. He had studied under Abū Bakr al-Fārisī<sup>2</sup>, and was one of the most distinguished disciples of Abū Bakr al-Qaffāl al-Shāshī (No. 549). He always continued to reside at Marw, devoting his efforts to the propagation of al-Shāfi'i's peculiar doctrines. The retentiveness of his memory was proverbial. He possessed some points of traditional information relative to the doctrines of his sect, and of which he was the sole depository; these were transmitted down orally by the jurisconsults of Khurasān on his authority. He stated that al-Shāfi'i considered as valid the indication of the qiblah by a little boy, but<sup>1</sup>, added al-Khidri, the qiblah here means the niche which is visible in the mosque (and marks the direction of Makkah); otherwise, if the mere direction be pointed out by the boy, according to the best of his belief, the indication is not receivable. Abu 'l-Futūḥ al-'Ijlī (No. 87) writes as follows: "in his Mushkilāt, or elucidation of the obscurities in Wajīz and the Wasf<sup>2</sup> towards the beginning of the section on marriage: "The shaykh Abū 'Abd Allāh al-Khidri was asked if it was lawful for a woman to cut her nails in the sight of a man to whom she was not related? and he reflected a long time without uttering a word. But his wife, the daughter of the shaykh Abū 'Alī al-Shabbū'i, who happened to be present, said to him: 'What need hast thou to reflect? didst thou not hear my father say, in answer to this very question, that, if it be the nails of her fingers which she cuts, the man may lawfully look on; but, if it be the nails of her toes, he must not look on. And the reason is, that her hands are not parts of the body indecent to be shown, whereas the instep is one of those parts which cannot be shown.' Al-Khidri was delighted at these words, and exclaimed: 'Had I only gained this single point of information from frequenting persons of learning, I should think it quite enough for my pains.' " I may here observe that this distinction between the hands and the feet is questionable, for the doctors of our sect say that (a woman's) exposing of her hands during prayer is not indecent; but we consider it indecent (in her) to expose either the hands or the feet before a strange man. It may be perceived that this point requires consideration. Al-Khidri had some knowledge in the Traditions, and his authority therein is held to be good. He died between the years of 380 and 390 (A. C. 990-1000).

1 Abū Sa'id Muḥammad Ibn Abī Aḥmad al-Harawī (native of Herāt), Shāfi'ite doctor and the author of an exposition of the duties of qādīs, entitled al-Ishrāf 'alā Ghawāmiḍ al-Ḥukūmat (elucidation of the obscure principles on which certain decisions are founded), was qādī of Hamadān. He fell a martyr, with his father, in the great mosque of that city, in the month of Shab'ān, 548 (Sept.-Oct., A.C. 1124). Al-Dhahabī says that the doctor who was killed at Hamadān was a Ḥanafite. (Tab. al-Shāfi'in).

2 This must be either the same doctor whose life is given by Ibn Khallikān (No. 557), or else Abū Bakr Aḥmad Ibn al-Ḥusayn Ibn Sahl al-Fārisī, a doctor of the Shāfi'ite sect and author of the esteemed treatise on Shāfi'ite law, entitled 'Uyūn al-Masā'il. He died A.H. 350 (A.C. 961-2), or 305 by another account. He composed some other works, treating of jurisprudence and controversy. (Tab. al-Fuq.)

1 It must be recollected that, with the Muslims, prayers are not valid unless the worshipper face the qiblah when saying them. The qiblah is the point of the horizon in which Makkah lies. Now, if a Muslim be in a country where he does not know the direction of the qiblah, and if he asks a little boy how it lies, and then says his prayers in that direction, is his prayer valid? for the boy might have been mistaken. This is the point on which al-Shāfi'i answered affirmatively. It is true that al-Khidri gives a different turn to the meaning of al-Shāfi'i's words.

2 These are two celebrated treatises on Shāfi'ite law by Abū Ḥāmid al-Ghazālī. See next article.

Khidrī means descended from Khidr; this Khidrī, was one of his ancestors: if the surname be pronounced Khadrī his ancestor's name must then have been Khadr. This is analogous to the derivation of Namarī from Namīrah<sup>1</sup> and this rule is absolute, admitting of no exception. Shabbū'ī means belonging to Shabbuyah; this person was one of the Shaykh Abu 'Alī's ancestors; he was an able jurisconsult and a native of Marw.

562 ABŪ ḤĀMID AL-GHAZZĀLĪ

Abū Ḥāmid Muḥammad Ibn Muḥammad Ibn Muḥammad Ibn Aḥmad al-Ghazzālī, surnamed Hujjat al-Islām (example for the followers of Islāmism) Zayn al-Dīn (ornament of religion) was a native of Ṭūs and a doctor of the Shāfi'ite sect. Towards the close of his life, the Shāfi'ites had not a doctor to be compared to him. He commenced his studies at Ṭūs under Aḥmad al-Rādhkānī, and, having then proceeded to Naysābūr, he attended the lessons of the Imām al-Ḥaramayn, Abu 'l-Ma'ālī al-Juwaynī (No. 353), under whom he studied with such assiduity that, in a short time, he completed his education; and became, even in the life time of his master, one of the most distinguished among the doctors. It was at that period he began his labours as an author. As long as his master lived, he remained with him, and he never ceased furnishing him motives of just pride in having such a pupil. On the Imām's death, he left Naysābūr and went to the army, where he met with a highly honourable reception from the wazīr Nizām al-Mulk (No. 171). A number of men eminent for talent were then at the wazīr's court, and in some public conferences which Abū Ḥāmid had with them, he remained victorious in the debate and acquired a reputation which spread to distant lands<sup>2</sup>. Soon after this, the professorship in the Nizāmiyah College of Baghdād was conferred upon him, and, in the month of the first Jumādā, A.H. 484 (June-July, A.C. 1091), he commenced his lessons. His abilities filled the people of 'Irāq with admiration, and they gradually conceived

1 See M. de Sacy's Grammaire Arabe, tom. I. p. 331, no. 770.

2 Literally: Which travelled with the caravans.

for him the highest respect. In the month of Dhu 'l-Qa'dah, A.H. 488 (Nov., A.C. 1095), he abandoned all the occupations in which he had been hitherto engaged, and entered on the path of ascetism and retirement from the world. He then undertook the pilgrimage to Makkah, and, on his return, he proceeded to Syria and stopped for some time at Damascus. During his residence in that city, he gave lessons in a corner of the Great Mosque situated on the west bank of the Tigris. He then set out for Jerusalem, where he applied himself with ardour to the practices of devotion, and visited the holy monuments and venerated spots of that sacred ground. He next passed into Egypt and remained for some time at Alexandria, whence, it is said, he intended to sail to Maghrib, in hopes of having an interview with the amir Yūsuf Ibn Tāshifīn, the sovereign of Morocco; but, having received intelligence of that prince's death, he abandoned the project. The life of Yūsuf Ibn Tāshifīn will be found in this work. On leaving Egypt, he returned to Tūs, his native place, and, having resumed his studies, he composed those instructive works, on various branches of knowledge, the most celebrated of which are the Wasīṭ (medium treatise), the Wajiz (compendium)<sup>1</sup>, the Khulāṣah fi 'l-Fiqh (quintessence of jurisprudence), and the Ihyā 'Ulūm al-Dīn (revival of the sciences of religion). This last is a most valuable and comprehensive work. To this we may add the Mustaṣfu (chosen extract), treating of the principles of jurisprudence, and which he terminated on the 6th of Muḥarram, A.H. 503 (August, A.C. 1109),* a treatise on polemics, entitled al-Manḥūl wa 'l-Murtaḥal (doctrines falsely attributed to others and falsely claimed by some) the Tahāfut al-Falāsafah<sup>2</sup>, the Maḥakk al-Nazar (whetstone of reflexion), the Mi'yār al-Ilm (the weighing-scale of science)<sup>3</sup>, the Maqāṣid (al-Falāsafah) or tendencies (of the philosophers), the Manḥūn

1 Both of these works treat of Shāfiite jurisprudence.

2 Tahāfut al-Falāsafah signifies literally the rushing of the Philosophers; the words fi 'l-Ḍalāl (into errors) seem to be understood. This treatise has been translated into Latin under the title of Destruction Philosophorum, and published in the collection of Averrohe's works; Venice 1560, tom. IX.

3 This is a treatise on logic.

* 5 August.—Ed.

bihi 'alā ḡhayri Ahlhi (doctrines attributed to wrong persons)<sup>1</sup>, the Maqṣad al-Asnā (the highest aim), being an explanation of the excellent names of God, the Mishkāt al-Anwār (niche for the lights)<sup>2</sup>, the Munqidh min al-Ḍalāl (deliverer from error), and the Ḥaqlqat al-Qawlayn (the truth of the two sayings)<sup>3</sup>. His works are very numerous, and all of them are instructive. Having been recalled in the most pressing manner to Naysābūr, in order that he might resume his lessons in the Niẓāmiyah College, he at length consented, after receiving and refusing repeated invitations to that effect; but he finally renounced this occupation and returned home to his native place, where he erected, in the proximity of his own house, a convent for ṣūfīs, and a college for the study of the law. He thenceforward allotted out his time to pious occupations, such as reading the Qur'ān through, conversing with men of contemplative minds<sup>4</sup>, and holding sittings for the instructing of students; in this mode of life he persevered till he was removed into the presence of his Lord. Some verses composed by him have been handed down traditionally, and amongst them are the following, given as his by the hafīẓ Abu Sa'd al-Sam'ānī (No. 370) in his Supplement :

"The scorpions (ringlets) of her forehead settled in the moon of her cheeks, and she thus became incomparable (for beauty). We have seen the moon in the sign of the scorpion; but here, for a wonder, the scorpion is in the moon."

I found these verses elsewhere attributed to a different person. God knows best which of the two is the author. The Kātib Imād al-Dīn al-Iṣbahānī gives the following verses as his, in the Kharīdah :

1 The manuscript of the Bib. du Roi, ancien fonds, No. 884, contains five treatises by al-Ḡhazālī, one of which appears to be the work here mentioned. The title, however, is different, as it runs thus: Al-Maṣnūn bihi an Ḡhayri Ahlihi (doctrines to be treasured up from the unworthy).

2 This treatise has been published with a French translation by Dr. Schmoelders, in one volume, entitled Essai sur les écoles philosophiques chez les Arabes, Paris, 1842.

3 This may perhaps be a treatise on the two points of the Muslim profession of faith; There is but one God; Muḥammad is the Apostle of God.

4 Literally: With the people of the hearts. This appears to be a technical expression used by the Ṣūfīs.

"Suppose that I were in love as you imagine, and that I enjoyed the pleasure of kissing that ringlet-adorned cheek ; know that I am a seceder from established opinions (a Mu'tazilite), and that the beloved received me with an Ash'arite face!."

The kātib quotes also the preceding verses as al-Ghazzālī's. (Abū Ḥamid al-Ghazzālī) was born A.H. 450 (A.C. 1058-9), and he died on Monday, the 14th of the latter Jumādā, A.H. 505 (December, A.C. 1111)*, at al-Ṭabarān. The accomplished scholar and poet, Abū 'l-Muẓaffar Muḥammad al-Abīwardī, a person whose life we shall give, composed an elegy on his death containing the following line :

"He is gone ! and the greatest loss which ever afflicted me, was that of a man who left not his like among mankind."

On the death of al-Ghazzālī, the Imām Ismā'il al-Ḥakīmī quoted the following verses, from one of Abū Tammām's (No. 143) most celebrated qaṣīdahs, and applied them to himself :

"I wondered at my patience when deprived of him by death ; I, who used to shed tears of blood when he was absent from me. But the age is now so productive of wonders, that it has ceased to excite our wonder."

Al-Ghazzālī was buried at al-Ṭabarān, the citadel of Ṭūs. Of the word Ghazzālī we have already spoken (No. 37) in the life of his brother Aḥmad, the ascetic divine and preacher. Al-Ṭabarān is one of the two towns which compose the city of Ṭūs; of this we have also spoken in the same article.

---

I I have been obliged to modify the meaning of these strange verses, and should have suppressed them, were they not attributed to so grave a divine as al-Ghazzālī. It would seem that he was suspected barbatuli juvenis amore correptum fuisse, and he answers by a scholastic pun. Al-Ash'arī was an ardent opponent of the Mu'tazilite doctrines and ash'arī (ash'arite) signifies belonging to al-Ash'arī, and covered with hair. The simplicity with which Ibn Khalikān quotes these lines would be quite un-accountable, had such passions been considered in any other light but purely platonie.

* 18 December, ---Ed.

563 ABŪ BAKR AL-SHĀSHĪ

Abū Bakr Muḥammad Ibn Aḥmad Ibn al-Ḥusayn Ibn 'Umar, surnamed Fakhr al-Islām (glory of Islāmism), and generally known by the appellation of al-Mustazhiri, was born at Mayyāfāriqin, but his family belonged to Shāsh (No. 549). This doctor, who was the first Shāfi'ite jurisconsult of that age, commenced the study of the law at Mayyāfāriqin under Abū 'Abd Allāh Muḥammad Ibn Bayyān al-Kāzarūnī (No. 153, n), and under the qādī Abū Maṣūr al-Ṭūsī, the disciple of Abū Muḥammad al-Juwaynī (No. 310). He continued to attend their lessons till the removal of Abū Maṣūr from the qādīship of Mayyāfāriqin; he then proceeded to Baghdād and attached himself to the Shaykh Abū Ishāq al-Shīrāzī (No. 5), under whose tuition he pursued his studies and whom he served in the capacity of an under-tutor. He also read over the treatise on jurisprudence, entitled the Shāmil, under the author, Abū Naṣr Ibn al-Ṣabbāgh (No. 374). He accompanied the shaykh Abū Ishāq to Naysābūr, and then returned to Baghdād, after having discussed with great ability, and in the presence of the Imām al-Ḥaramayn (No. 353), a question on a point of law. He is noticed by the hāfiẓ 'Abd al-Ḡhāfir al-Fārisī, in the Siāq, or continuation of the History of Naysābūr (No. 377). On the death of his master Abū Ishāq, he had attained such a reputation in 'Irāq, as a doctor of the law, that he was nominated chief of the Shāfi'ite sect. A number of instructive works were composed by him, such as the Ḥilyat al-'Ulamā (ornament of the learned), wherein he treats of the Shāfi'ite system of jurisprudence. Having composed this work, he added to it the conflicting opinions of the imāms on each point of doctrine, and thus formed a large compilation, to which he gave the title of al-Mustazhiri, because he had composed it by the desire of the imām (khalif) al-Mustazhir bi-Allāh. He wrote also some controversial works. In the year 504 (A. C. 1110-1), he was appointed professor at the Nizāmiyah College of Baghdād, and this place he continued to fill till his death. His predecessors in it were, the shaykh Abū Ishāq al-Shīrāzī, Abū Naṣr Ibn al-Ṣabbāgh, Abū Sa'd al-Mutawalli, the author of the Tatimmat al-Ibānah (No. 340), and Abū Ḥāmid al-Ḡhazzālī. (No. 562). A learned shaykh of our sect informed me that, as Abū Bakr al-Shāshī was one day sitting on the suddah (sofa), as is customary with professors when teaching, he applied his handkerchief to his eyes, and wept bitterly, repeating, at the same time, this verse :

"The dwellings are empty and I am now the chief, though unworthy of authority ; it is for me an affliction to have become the sole depository of power."

In this, he was actuated by a feeling of justice and the desire of acknowledging the merit of his predecessors and their superiority to himself. The verse just mentioned belongs to a piece which is inserted in the Hamāsah<sup>1</sup>. Abū Bakr al-Shāshī was born in the month of Muḥarram, A.H. 429 (Oct.-Nov., A.C. 1037), at Mayyāfāriqīn. He died on Saturday, the 25th of Shawwāl, A.H. 507 (March, A.C. 1114)* at Baghdād, and was interred at the Shīrāz Gate, in the same tomb with his master Abū Ishāq. Some say that he was buried in a grave at the side of his master's.

564 ABŪ NAṢR AL-ARGHIYĀNĪ

Abū Naṣr Muḥammad Ibn 'Abd Allāh Ibn Aḥmad Ibn Muḥammad Ibn 'Abd Allāh al-Arghiyānī was a doctor of the sect of al-Shāfi'ī. Having left his native place (Arghiyān) and proceeded to Naysābūr, he studied under the Imām al-Ḥaramayn (No. 353), and obtained distinction by his knowledge of the law, after which he rose to the rank of an imām (chief doctor of the sect) and acquired a high reputation as a mufti and a devout ascetic. He learned Traditions from Abu 'l-Ḥasan 'Alī al-Wāḥidī, the author of the celebrated commentaries on the Qur'ān (No. 413) and he has transmitted to us the manner in which that doctor explained these words of the Qur'ān: Verily, I perceive the smell of Joseph<sup>2</sup>: according to al-Wāqidī

<sup>1</sup> See Hamāsah, p. c 375.

<sup>2</sup> Qur'ān, sūrah 12. verse 94.

• 4 April.—Ed.

"the East wind asked permission of Almighty God to waft to Jacob, the smell of Joseph, before the bearer of good tidings should reach him with his son's shirt<sup>1</sup>: and, permission having been given, it bore the smell to him. It is for this reason that persons in sadness are revived by the breath of the East wind; the human body softens under its influence and sinks into placid enjoyment; the East wind causes the heart to long for the sight of friends and of home<sup>2</sup>. And a poet has said:

'I implore you, O two mountains of al-Na'mān<sup>3</sup>! to let the breath of the East wind come unto us; that breeze which dispels all cares from a melancholy mind.' "

Abū Naṣr al-Arghiyānī was born A.H. 454 (A.C. 1062-3), and he died on the eve of the 24th of Dhū 'l-Qa'dah, A.H. 528 (September, A.C. 1134)*. at Naysābūr. He was buried outside the city, at a spot called al-Ḥirah, on the roadside. Relative to the fatwās, or legal opinions, extracted from the work entitled Nihayat al-Maṭlab<sup>4</sup>, and which are called the Fatāwa Arghiyāniyah, I was doubtful whether they belonged to Abū Naṣr or to his brother Abu'l-Faṭḥ Sahl (No. 263), as I had not seen the book for a long time before: I even mentioned, in the life of Abu 'l-Faṭḥ, that he was its author, but I have since obtained the certain proof of its having been composed by Abū Naṣr. The word Arghiyānī has already been explained (No. 263).

565 MUḤAMMAD IBN YAḤYĀ

Abū Sa'd Muḥammad Ibn Yaḥya Ibn Abī Maṣṣūr, a doctor of the Shāfi'ite sect, a native of Naysābūr, and surnamed Muḥī al-

1 See Qur'ān, loco laudato.

2 The Arabian poets attribute to the east wind effects which European poets would attribute to the west wind, or Zephyr. Indeed, throughout this work, whenever the east wind is mentioned in a piece of verse, it has been rendered by zephyr in the translation.

3 A great number of places in Arabia bear the name of al-Na'mān; it is therefore difficult to determine which of them the poet means here.

4 According to the author of the Ṭabaqāt al-Shāfi'in, the Nihayat al-Maṭlab here mentioned is the work under that title composed by the Imām al-Ḥaramayn. See No. 353.

* 15 September.--Ed.

Dīn (reviver of religion), was the most eminent of the later jurisconsults, and surpassed them all in learning and piety. He studied the law under Abū Hāmid al-Ghazzālī (No. 562) and Abū 'l-Muẓaffar Aḥmad al-Khawāfi (No. 36). Having acquired a superior knowledge of this science and composed a number of works, some on it, and others in defence of his sect, he was appointed chief of the jurisconsults of Naysābūr. Persons then came from all countries to pursue their studies under him, and, of the numerous students who profited by his tuition, the majority became sayyids (able doctors) and skillful controvertists. His works are: the Muḥiṭ (comprehensive<sup>1</sup>), being an explanation of (al-Ghazzālī's) Wasīṭ; the Intiṣāf fi Masā'il al-Khilāf (justification: treatise on controverted points of Shāfi'ite doctrines), etc. The ḥāfiẓ 'Abd al-Ghāfir al-Fārisi (No. 377) mentions him with commendation in the Siyāq, or Continuation of the history of Naysābur, and adds: "He possessed abilities as an exhorter to piety, and his mind was stocked with copious information on various sciences. He taught in the Nizāmiyah College of Naysābur, and then in the Nizāmiyah College of Herāt. Among the portions of traditional information which he had received, were some transmitted to him orally by Shaykh Abū Hāmid Aḥmad Ibn 'Alī Ibn Muḥammad Ibn 'Abdūs, and (then) read to him by the imām Abū Naṣr 'Abd al-Raḥīm, son of Abū 'l-Qāsim 'Abd al-Karīm al-Qushayrī (No. 396) in the year 496 (A.C. 1102). The following verses, were recited to him by a person of talent who happened to attend one of his lectures, and was struck with his instructive observations and the manner in which they were conveyed:

'The mouldering remains of religion and of Islāmism receive new life from our master Muḥi al-Dīn (the reviver of religion), the son of Yahyā (the living). When he gives a lesson, (it seems) as if he had received a revelation from God, the Lord of the Throne. . . "

I found the following verses attributed to him in a collection of extracts; and I have since read in the life of the shaykh Shihāb al-Dīn Abū 'l-Faṭḥ Muḥammad Ibn Muḥmūd Ibn Muḥammad, a 1 According to the author of the Tabaqāt al-Shāfi'īn, this work forms eight volumes.

Shāfi'ite juriconsults, born at Ṭūṣ. and settled at Egypt<sup>1</sup>, that this doctor said: "The imām Abū Sa'd Muḥammad Ibn Yahyā recited to me the following verses composed by himself:

'When they said that a hair placed in water, and exposed to the sun becomes a serpent, I did not credit their words; but, when the ringlets of my beloved settled on the water of her face<sup>2</sup>, and stung my heart, I found the statement true."

This doctor was born at Ṭuraythīth, A.H. 476 (A.C. 1083-4), and he died a martyr in the month of Ramaḍān, A.H. 548 (Nov.-Dec., A.C. 1153), having been killed by the Ghuzz, when they took Naysābūr after defeating the Saljūq sulṭān, Sinjar (No. 260). They put Muḥammad Ibn Yahyā to death by cramming earth into his mouth. Ibn al-Azraq al-Fāriqī states, in his history (of Mayyāfā-riqln) that this occurred in the year 553, but the former is the correct date. A number of learned men composed elegies on his death, and one of them, Abu 'l-Ḥasan 'Alī Ibn Abi 'l-Qāsim al-Bayhaqī, said in allusion to his fate:

"O thou who hast shed the blood of a man profoundly learned, whose reputation reached to distant kingdoms! tell me, wicked man, I conjure thee, and speak without dread: How couldst thou take away the life of him who was a muhl al-Dīn (giver of life to religion)."

This Shihāb al-Dīn al-Ṭūsī mentioned in this article died in Old Cairo on the 20th of Dhu 'l-Qa'dah, A.H. 596 (September, A.C. 1200),* and was interred in the Qarāfah cemetery. His birth took place A.H. 522 (A.C. 1128). He professed at the college called Manāzil al-'Izz (No. 476), and sojourned in Cairo, at the khanqāh (convent) of Sa'id al-Sa'ādah. Ṭuraythīth is an extensive district in the dependencies of Naysābūr; it has produced a number of eminent men, some of them remarkable for learning.

1 The date of this doctor's death will be found farther on.

2 By the water of her face, he means the clear complexion of her cheeks. It must be recollected also that, in Arabic, ringlets and scorpions, are permutable terms. See Introduction to vol. I.

* 1 September. Ed.

566 ABŪ MANṢŪR AL-BARAWĪ

Abū Manṣūr Muḥammad Ibn Muḥammad Ibn Muḥammad Ibn Sa'd Ibn 'Abd Allāh al-Barawī, a highly distinguished jurisconsult of the *Shāfi'*ite sect, attained the eminent rank which he held by his knowledge of the law, his talent for discussion, and his abilities as a dogmatic theologian and preacher. His style was charming, and his diction pure and elegant. He studied the law under Muḥammad Ibn Yaḥyā, the doctor whose life has been just given, and was one of his best pupils. He composed an excellent and well-known Ta'liqah<sup>1</sup> on the points of controversy between his sect and the other three, and a treatise on dialectics, entitled al-Muqtariḥ fi 'l-Muṣṭaliḥ (the requisite for the conventional). This is also a good and well-known treatise; jurisconsults make it one of their principal subjects of study, and it has been fully elucidated by the doctor Taqī al-Dīn Abu 'l-Faṭḥ Muẓaffar Ibn 'Abd Allāh al-Miṣrī<sup>2</sup>, who was ever afterwards known by the surname of al-Taql (Taql al-Dīn) al-Muqtariḥ, because he knew this book by heart<sup>3</sup>. In the year 567 (A.C. 1171-2), al-Barawī went to Baghdād, and was most honourably received by both high and low. He then obtained the place of professor in the Bahā'iyah<sup>4</sup>, a college situated near the Nizāmiyah, and every day he gave a number of lessons which were attended by crowds of people. He opened also a class for the discussing (of points of law) in the Mosque of the Castle, and this attracted all the professors and other distinguished men. He held sittings also at the Nizāmiyah college for the purpose of giving pious exhortations, and, at

1 See No. 25, note.

2 Taqī al-Dīn Muẓaffar Ibn 'Abd Allāh Ibn 'Alī al-Miṣrī (native of Egypt), and surnamed al-Muqtariḥ because he knew by heart the work bearing that title, composed some works on jurisprudence, dogmatic theology, and controversy, and was remarkable for his piety, humility, and learning. A number of pupils finished their studies under him at Cairo and at Alexandria. His birth took place A.H. 526 (A.C. 1131-2), and his death in the month of Shā'bān, A.H. 612 (Dec., A.C. 1215). (Al-Suyūṭī's Ḥusn al-Muḥāḍirah).

3 I read with Ḥājji Khalifah, نقل يقال له الإلحاح.

4 This Bahā'iyah was probably the college founded by the wazīr Bahā al-Dīn Sābūr Ibn Ardaṣḥir (No. 238). The Nizāmiyah College was founded, as its name imports, by the wazīr Nizām al-Mulk (No. 171).

time, the person who professed there was Abū Naṣr Aḥmad Ibn 'Abd Allāh al-Shāshī. He sometimes betrayed there, by his gestures, his desire of becoming professor at the Nizāmiyah; and, one day, in the course of the sitting, he pointed to the place which the professor used to occupy, and recited the following verses, taken from the commencement of one of al-Mutanabbī's qaṣīdahs:

"I wept, O thou vernal mansion! till I had nearly made thee also weep; I poured forth my feelings, and my tears over thy abodes. Receive my morning salutation! thou hast awakened my heart to sadness; return our greeting, for behold we salute thee. How could time have decreed that the gazelles of the desert were to replace the gazelles (maidens), thy former inhabitants!"

The persons present understood the allusion, and, as he was worthy of the place, he received the promise of obtaining it but death overtook him. He was born at Ṭūs on Tuesday, the 15th of Dhu'l-Qa'dah, A.H. 517 (January, A.C. 1124)*, and he died at Baghdād on the afternoon of Thursday, the 16th of Ramaḍān, A.H. 567 (May, A.C. 1172)*. The next day, Friday, the funeral service was said over him in the Mosque of the Castle by the Khalīf al-Mustaḍī bi Amr Allāh. He was buried the same day, at the Abraz Gate, in the funeral chapel of the Shaykh Abū Ishāq al-Shīrāzī (No. 5). The ḥāfiẓ Ibn 'Asākir (No. 416) mentions, in his history of Damascus that, Abū Maṣṣūr al-Barawī went to that city, in the year 565, and lodged in the ribāṭ of al-Sumaysāṭī. He states also that he read over to him some pieces which had been written down under his dictation. Barawī: I do not know the derivation of this relative adjective, neither it is given by al-Sm'ānāī (No. 370) but I am inclined to think that the place to which it refers is in the dependencies of Ṭūs.

* 4 January. But the day according to Mahler's calculation was Friday.—Ed.

† 11 May.—Ed.

567 ABU 'L-ḤASAN IBN AL-KHALL

Abu 'l-Ḥasan Muḥammad Ibn Abi 'l-Baqā al-Mubārak Ibn Muḥammad Ibn 'Abd Allāh Ibn Muḥammad, surnamed Ibn al-Khall, was a doctor of the Shāfi'ite sect and a native of Baghdād. He studied the jurisprudence under Abū Bakr Muḥammad Ibn Aḥmad al-Shāshī, surnamed al-Muztaḥirī (No. 563), and he attained a high distinction by his learning. It was his custom to remain seated in the mosque of al-Raḥabah a place on the east side of Baghdād, and never to leave it unless in cases of absolute necessity; and there he passed his time, giving opinions on points of law, and instructing pupils. Previously to this, he had been the sole depository, at Baghdād, of the decisions given by preceding doctors on points connected with the Surayjiyan question<sup>1</sup>. He composed a work in the form of a commentary on (Abū Ishāq al-Shirāzī's work), the Tanbīh, or Call, and to which he gave the title of Tawjih al-Tanbīh (the right directing of the Call); it is a short treatise, however, and of no utility, though the first composed on the subject. In another of his works he treats of the fundamentals of jurisprudence. He learned Traditions from Abū 'Abd Allāh al-Ḥusayn Ibn Abi Ṭalḥah al-Ni'ālī, Abū 'Abd Allāh al-Ḥusayn al-Busrī, and other masters. Some Traditions were delivered down on his authority by Abu 'l-Sa'd al-Sam'ānī (No. 370) and others. I heard a jurisconsult mention that Ibn al-Khall wrote an excellent mansūb<sup>2</sup> hand, and that, to obtain specimen of it, the people used to ask him for fatwās (written answers to questions on points of law), although they had no real occasion for them. The quantity of fatwās thus required of him became so great, that he had not a moment left to himself, and, discovering at length the motive of these numerous applications he in future broke the point of his pen before writing his answers. The people then ceased to trouble him. Some say, however, that it was his brother who wrote so well, but God knows best! Ibn al-Khall died at Baghdād in the year 552 (A.C. 1157-8), and his body was taken to Kūfah

1 The Surayjiyan question, so named after Abu 'l-'Abbās Ibn Surayj (No. 20), was a treatise very familiar to Shāfi'ite students, and contained the discussion of some points relative to divorce.

2 See No. 454, note.

for interment. His brother, Abu 'l-Ḥusayn Aḥmad Ibn al-Mubārak wa salso an able jurisconsult and a good poet. 'Imād al-Din al-Iṣbahānī mentions him with commendation in the Kharīdah, and quotes some passages from his poems, with some of his couplets. One of the pieces which he gives is the following, on a certain preacher :

"How vexatious that people should place reliance on the whims of that stuttering madman !—of a shaykh whose piety is tainted with hypocrisy, and whose hypocrisy imposes on very few. When he casts his eyes on the professor's chair, he perks up, as if he meant to say : 'That place, by right, should be mine.' With his bony fist he strikes his bosom<sup>1</sup>, filled (not with compunction but) with hidden hate, and says : 'What shall I say ? words which proceed, not from an abundance of ideas, but from the want of them."

From his dubayts, or couplets, we select the following :

"Behold the object of the passion which I so long concealed, wishing thus to spare the feelings of her whom I adore. O thou who wast the first, and shalt be the last, to cause my torment ! who can tell the ardour of my passion<sup>2</sup> ?"

"They departed, and grief came to settle in my heart ! none ever felt such torments as they made me suffer : love, desire, the burning fires of passion ; my strength fails me ! I sink ! I can bear it no longer !

"It would not have harmed the camel-drivers had they set out less promptly with my beloved friends ! The morning of their departure brought me to my last gasp ! A heart in trouble—tears which flow as if through emulation—whilst my firmness was already shaken by the dread of that separation."

Abu 'l-Ḥusayn Aḥmad Ibn al-Mubārak was born A.H. 482 (A.C. 1089-90) ; he died, A.H. 552 (A.C. 1157-8), or 553.

1 In the printed text, the word على should have been placed in the first hemistich.

2 Literally : Who can interpret the signs (verses) of my passion for me. An allusion to the interpreting of the signs or verses of the Qur'ān.

* 'From the same,' omitted by de Slane. Ed

568 MUḤĪ AL-DĪN IBN AL-ZAKĪ

Abu 'l-Ma'ālī Muḥammad Ibn Abi 'l-Ḥasan 'Alī Ibn Muḥammad Ibn Yahyā Ibn 'Alī Ibn Abd al-'Aziz Ibn Ḥusayn Ibn Muḥammad Ibn 'Abd al-Raḥmān Ibn al-Qāsim Ibn al-Walīd Ibn al-Qāsim Ibn 'Abd al-Raḥmān Ibn 'Abbān Ibn 'Uṭhmān Ibn 'Affān (a descendant of the khalif 'Uṭhmān), a member of the tribe of Quraysh and surnamed Muḥī al-Dīn (reviver of religion) but generally known by the appellation of Ibn al-Zakī, or son of Zakī al-Dīn, was a native of Damascus and a doctor of the sect of al-Shāfi'i. He displayed acquirements of the most varied kinds, being versed in the law, general literature, and other sciences, and having composed some beautiful poetry, sermons (khuṭbahs), and epistles. On Wednesday, the 20th of the first Rabi', A.H. 588 (April, A.C. 1192)*, he was appointed qāḍī of Damascus; so, at least, I have found it written in the handwriting of al-Qāḍi 'l-Fāḍil (No 349), and the same place had been previously filled by his father and grandfather, as it was subsequently by two of his own sons. He possessed to the highest degree, the favour of the sulṭān Ṣalāḥ al-Dīn, and when that prince took the city of Aleppo, on Saturday, the 18th of Ṣafar, A.H. 579 (June, A.C. 1183)†, he recited to him a poem rhyming in b, a masterpiece of perfection. One of its verses, which has since obtained great currency among the public, was the following :

"Thy taking of the Grey Castle<sup>2</sup> in the month of Ṣafar, announces the conquest of al-Quds (Jerusalem) for the month of Rajab."

This was really the case, that city having been taken on the 27th of Rajab, A.H. 583 (Oct-A.C. 1187). Muḥī al-Dīn having been asked how he came by that idea, he replied that he took it from the comment of Ibn Barraḡān<sup>3</sup> on these words of the Qur'ān :

1 See. M. Reinand's Extraits, p. 184

2 The Grey Castle (al-Qal'ae al-Shahbā) was one of the names by which Aleppo was known.

3 Ibn Khallikān gives a short notice of this doctor at the end of the article.

* 5 April, but the day according to Mehle's calculation was Sunday. Ed.

† 11 June Ed.

Alif, lam, mim. The Greeks have been overcome in the nearest part of the land, but, after their defeat, they shall be victorious within a few years<sup>1</sup>. From the moment I met with the verse given above, and learned this account of it, I began searching for the commentary of Ibn Barrajān, and found the statement to be true; but the passage was written on the margin of the leaf and in a different hand from that of the text, and I know not whether it be an interpolation or a part of the work. A long (cabalistic) calculation of his is there given, by which he deduces this result from the words: a few years. When the sultān Ṣalāḥ al-Dīn took Aleppo, he confided to Muḥī al-Dīn the post of chief magistrate and judge*; and gave him for deputy Zayn al-Dīn Banna Abu 'l-Faḍl Ibn al-Bānyāsī. On the conquest of Jerusalem, all the learned men who happened to be in the retinue of the sultān, aspired to the honour of pronouncing the khuṭbah on the ensuing Friday, and each of them sent in for examination a khuṭbah written with great eloquence, in the hopes of being chosen; but the sultān addressed an order to Muḥī al-Dīn, directing him to be the preacher. This was the first Friday on which the public prayer was said at Jerusalem after the taking of the city, and the sultān with all the chief men of the empire attended at the ceremony. Muḥī al-Dīn then mounted the pulpit and commenced his discourse by pronouncing the opening of the sūrah of the Qur'ān, and then said: "God hath cut off the uttermost part of those who acted perversely; so praise be unto God, the Lord of all creatures. Praise be unto God, Who hath created the heavens and the earth, and hath disposed darkness and light! (Qur'an, surah<sup>6</sup>, verse 1) Praise be unto God Who hath not begotten any child, Who hath no partner in the kingdom, nor requireth any one to protect Him from contempt; and magnify Him by proclaiming His greatness (sūr, 17, ver. 111.) Praise be unto God, Who hath sent down unto His servant the book (of the Qur'ān), and hath not inserted therein any crookedness, but hath made it a straight rule; that He should threaten thereby the unbelievers with a grievous punishment from Himself, and should bear good tidings unto the faithful, who work righteousness, that they shall receive an excellent reward (the reward of paradise) wherein they shall remain for ever ; and that He should warn those who say God hath begotten issue (s. 18 v. 1,2,3). Say, Praise be unto God ; and peace be unto His servants whom He hath chosen ! is God more worthy, or the false gods which they associate with Him ? (s. 27, v. 60). Praise be to God, unto whom belongeth whatever is in the heavens and on earth ; and unto Him be praise in the world to come ; for He is wise and intelligent (s. 34, v. 1)!. Praise be unto God, the Creator of heaven and earth ; Who maketh the angels His messengers, furnished with two, and three, and four pair of wings. God maketh what addition He pleaseth unto His creatures ; for God is Almighty (s. 35, v. 1)". "In this, the preacher's design was, to quote all the passages of the sacred Qur'ān in which praise is given to God ; he then commenced the khutbah and said : "Praise be unto God by Whose aid Islāmism hath been exalted, and by Whose might polytheism hath been humbled : Whose orders control all events, and Who rewardeth gratitude by continuing His favours. He hath enveloped the infidels in his toils, Whose justice hath decreed that time should be a series of vicissitudes, Whose bounty hath granted success to those that feared Him, Who spread His shade over His servants, and caused His religion to triumph over every other. In His might He is far above His creatures, and nought can resist Him ; His sway extends over the world, and nought can withstand it. He ordereth what He pleaseth, and none can disobey Him ; He decideth what He will, and none can oppose Him. I praise Him for His victorious assistance ; for His exalting of His friends ; for His aiding of those who aided in His cause, and for His cleansing of His Holy House from the filth of polytheism and its pollutions. (I give Him) such praise as a man can offer whose inmost feelings are conscious of gratitude, and who denotes it by his outward bearing, and I declare that there is no other god but the only God, Who hath no associate in His power. Who is one and eternal ; Who begot no off spring, neither was He begotten, and Who never had any one like unto Him!. Such is the declaration of one who hath purified his heart by the professing of God's unity, and hath given it in

<sup>1</sup> Qur'ān, sūrah 30, verse 1.

* The editor of the Cairo edition of 1948, adds on the 13th of latter Rabi (5 August, 1183)-- Ed.

---

1 Qur'ān. 'Ūrah 112, verse 2.

charge unto his Lord. I bear witness that Muḥammad is His Servant and Apostle, the remover of doubt, the confuter of infidelity, and the dispeller of falsehood; that God transported him by night from the Holy Temple (of Makkah) to the Farther Temple of (Jerusalem)<sup>1</sup>, and raised him up to the highest heavens, even unto the lote-tree of the utmost bound, near which is the garden of eternal abode; and his eye-sight turned not away, neither did it wander<sup>2</sup>: may God's blessing be upon him and upon his Khalif (successor) Abū Bakr al-Ṣiddiq (the veracious), the first to embrace the faith; and upon the commander of the faithful, 'Umar Ibn al-Khaṭṭāb, the first who removed from this house the sign of the cross, and upon the commander of the faithful, 'Uthmān Ibn 'Affān, the possessor of the two lights<sup>3</sup>, the collector of the Qur'ān, and upon the commander of the faithful, 'Alī Ibn Abī Ṭālib, the destroyer of polytheism and the breaker of idols, and God's blessing be on the family of Muḥammad, on his Companions, and on the Ṭābi'īs. O Men, rejoice at good news! God is pleased with your conduct; and that is the utmost term, the highest point, of man's desires; inasmuch as He rendered it easy for your hands to recover this strayed camel (Jerusalem) from the possession of a misguided people, and to bring it back to the fold of Islāmism, after it had been abused by the polytheists for nearly one hundred years. (Rejoice at) the purifying of this house which God allowed to be raised, and in which He permitted His name to be mentioned<sup>4</sup>; the ways of which He hath delivered from ploythesim, after He had spread His tent over it and established His rites within it; a house of which the foundations were laid on the profession of God's unity, for that is the best basis to build on, and of which the edifice was erected to His glory, for it stands founded on piety from ancient times till now. It was the dwelling-place of your father Abraham; the spot from which your blessed Prophet Muḥammad mounted to heaven; the qihlah

1 Qur'ān, Sūrah. 7, verse 1.

2 Qur'ān, Sūrah, 23, verse 14, 15, 17.

3 He was so called because he had married successively two of Muḥammad's daughters.

4 Qur'ān, sūrah 24, verse 36.

towards which you turned to pray at the commencement of Islāmaism, the abode of the prophets: the place visited by the saints; the cemetery of the apostles; the spot where the divine revelation descended, and to which the orders and the prohibitions were sent down; it is the country where mankind will be assembled for judgement; the ground where the resurrection will take place, the holy land whereof God hath spoken in His perspicuous book<sup>1</sup>; it is the mosque wherein the Apostle of God offered up his prayer and saluted the angels admitted nearest to God's presence; it is the town to which God sent His Servant and Apostle, and the Word which He caused to descend on Mary, and His spirit Jesus, whom He honoured with that mission and ennobled with the gift of prophecy, without removing him from the rank He held as one of His creatures: and the Almighty said that Christ will not proudly disdain to be a servant unto God, neither the angels who approach near to the divine presence<sup>2</sup>. They lied, those who said that God had equals, and widely did they err. God hath not begotten issue; neither is there any other God with him, : otherwise every god had surely gone (apart) with that which He had created; and some of them had exalted themselves above the others. Far be that from God which they affirm of Him<sup>3</sup>. They are surely infidels who say: Verily God is Christ, the son of Mary<sup>4</sup>.—Here the preacher repeated the remaining verses of the sūrah" of the Table.— "This temple is the first of the two qiblahs<sup>5</sup>, the second of the two sacred Mosques<sup>6</sup>, the third after the two holy cities (Makkah and Madīnah); the next place, after these two Mosques, to visit which travellers girth their camels; the next spot named after these two mansions, when the number of holy places is counted on the fingers. Therefore, had you not been of

---

1 Qur'ān, sūrah 5, verse 24.

2 Qur'ān, sūrah 4, verse 170

3 Qur'ān, sūrah 23, verse 93.

4 Qur'ān, sūrah 5, verse 76.

5 Muḥammad at first directed the Muslims to pray with their faces turned towards Jerusalem, but soon after, he chose Makkah for the point towards which they were to look on those occasions.

6 Qur'an, sūrah 17, verse. 1

God's chosen servants, of those whom He selected from amongst the dwellers in His cities. He had not honoured you with this favour wherein you will never have a rival, and in the excellence of which you will remain without a competitor. Blessings be on you for an army which hath procured the triumph of the miraculous powers displayed in the Apostle's gift of prophecy, which hath fought battles like those of Badr, which hath shown resolution like that of Abū Bakr, achieved conquests like those of 'Umar's, behaved like the armies of 'Uthmān, and charged like those of 'Alī! You have renewed for Islāmism the glorious days of Qādisiyah, the conflicts of Yarmūk, the sieges of Khaybar, and the impetuous attacks of Khālīd Ibn al-Walīd. May God grant you his best rewards for the service you have rendered to his blessed prophet Muḥammad! may He recompense you for the blood you lost in combating his foes! may He accept from you as an agreeable offering the blood which you have shed! and remunerate you with Paradise, for that is the abode of happiness! Appreciate then (and God be merciful unto you!) this favour at its just value, and thank for it the Almighty with fit acknowledgement, inasmuch as He placed you under deep obligations by conferring this honour upon you, and appointing you for this service! It is a victory which hath opened for you the gates of heaven, and hath illumined by its light the face of the darkness, which hath made the most highly favoured of the angels to rejoice, and hath solaced the eyes of the prophets who were sent unto mankind! How great a favour was that which rendered you the army by whose hand the Sacred City was recaptured in these latter times, the body of troops whose swords set up again the monuments of the faith, after that the mission of prophets had ceased! Soon, perhaps, may God achieve, by your hands, other victories such as this; victories whereat the people of the green (the inhabitants of Paradise) will rejoice yet more than the people of the earth: is this not the House whereof God hath spoken in his book explicitly name in this formal address directed to himself: Praise be unto Him who transported His servant by night from the Holy Temple to the Farther Temple<sup>1</sup>. Is it not the house which all religions honoured? towards which the prophets turned themselves, and in which were read the four books sent down from Almighty God<sup>1</sup>? Is it not the house for the sake of which God staid the sun over Joshua so that it set not, and delayed its pace so that the victory might be rendered prompt and easy? Is it not the house which God commanded Moses to order his people to deliver, yet none obeyed him but two men? Wherefore He waxed wroth against them, and cast them into the wilderness in punishment for their disobedience. Give therefore praises unto God for having helped you to the fulfilment of your resolutions in an undertaking from which the children of Isrā'il, His chosen people, recoiled, and for having prospered you in an attempt wherein the nations of former ages failed, and for having made you of one opinion after that you were divided, and for having enabled you to speak of this as a past event, when before you spoke of it only as an event to come<sup>2</sup>. Receive our congratulations, in as much as God hath mentioned your conduct to those near Him, and hath made you His own troops after you have been troops in the service of your passions; rejoice at the coming of the angels, sent down to thank you for the sweet odour of the profession of God's unity wherewith you have gifted this House, and for the perfume of sanctification and glorification you have spread throughout it, and for having removed from their paths therein the nuisance of polytheism and trinitarian doctrines, and a criminal and evil belief. Now, the angels of the heavens implore God's mercy on you, and pray for you and give you blessings. Therefore, with the help of God, preserve this gift which you have obtained, and protect this favour which you have received, by living in the fear of God, that fear which saveth him who holdeth unto it and delivereth from danger him who clingeth thereto. Beware the seductions of your passions; avoid falling into perdition, or turning back from the path of righteousness, or recoiling before an enemy: seize this opportunity for removing the annoyances which still subsist in the land; fight

<sup>1</sup> Qur'ān, sūrah 17, verse. 1

1 The four books, the Pentateuch, the Psalms, the Gospels, and the Qur'ān.

2 Literally: Who hath enriched you with that which the words kān (was) and qad (already) put in the past tense, in exchange for that which sawf (shall be) and ḥaṭṭā (till such time as) put in the future tense. This quibble must have been highly pleasing to a congregation of Muslims for whom grammar is one of the first among the sciences.

the good fight in the cause of God, and devote yourselves, O servants of God ! to His will, for He hath made of you His chosen servants. Beware lest Satan cause you to slip and lead you into rebellion ; making you imagine that this victory was owing to your sharp swords, your fleet steeds, and your intrepidity in battle. No, by Allāh ! victory cometh not but from the Mighty, the Wise ! Take care, O servants of God ! lest that, after His having ennobled you by this great conquest, this signal favour, and after His having reserved for you so evident a turimph, and placed within your grasp His strong cord (of guidance), take care not to commit such deeds as He hath forbidden or show the grievous sin of disobedience ; lest you be like unto her who undid what she spun, after she had twisted it strongly<sup>1</sup> and like to him unto whom we brought our signs, and he departed from them ; wherefore Satan followed him, and he became one of those who were seduced<sup>2</sup>. Maintain the holy war ; it is the best means which you have of serving God, the most noble occupation of your lives ; support God's cause, and He will support you ; protect His religion and He will protect you ; remember Him, and He will remember you ; thank Him, and He will give you an increase of favours and reward you. Labour to expel the evil (which afflicts us), and tear up the enemy by the root ; purify the rest of the land from this filth which hath angered God and His Apostle ; lop off the branches of infidelity and cut through its roots ; for now the times cry aloud : Vengeance for Islamism and the Muḥammadan religion ! God is mighty ! God giveth victory and aid ! God conquers and subdues ! He humbleth the infidel ! Know therefore, and God be merciful unto you ! that is the opportunity, therefore seize it ; this is the spoil, hasten to obtain it ; this is the serious matter, put forth your serious efforts to accomplish it, and send forward the troops of your resolutions in battle-array ; for each deed is judged by its result, and each merit by its recompense. God hath now made you victorious over this misguided enemy who was equal to you in number, or even surpassed you ; and how it was when you were one to twenty ? Almighty God hath said :

---

1 Qur'ān, sūrah 16, verse 94.

2 Qur'ān, sūrah 7, verse 174.

If twenty of you persevere with constancy, they shall overcome two hundred; and if there be one hundred of you, they shall overcome one thousand of those who believe not, because they are a people who do not understand.)<sup>1</sup> May God enable us and you to follow His commandments and be restrained by His prohibitions! may He aid us, Muslims, with succour from Himself! If God assist you, who can overcome you? and if He deprive you of His protection, who then can help you? The best saying is that which is uttered in fitting place; the arrow which striketh deepest is that which is shot from the bow of speech; the best word by which one can touch the intelligence is that of the only God, the sole God, the Mighty, the Wise, Who hath said: And when the Qur'ān is read, hearken thereto, and keep silence; that ye may obtain mercy.<sup>2</sup> I fly to God from Satan the accursed! in the name of God, the Merciful, the Clement!"! The orator then read the commencement of the Emigration,<sup>3</sup> after which, he said: The Apostle ordered you and me to conform to that which God hath commanded on the subject of devoted obedience to His will; let us therefore obey Him: He forbade you and me to commit the foul sin of disobedience; let us not therefore revolt against Him,<sup>4</sup> I ask pardon of God for myself, for you, and for all Muslims; ask also pardon." He then prayed for the imām 'al-Nāṣir, the khalif of that age, after which he said: "And prolong, O Almighty God! the reign of thy servant, so humble in his fear of Thee, so thankful for Thy favours, so grateful for Thy gifts; Thy trenchant sword, Thy shining flambeau, the defender of Thy faith, the champion and protector of Thy holy land, the firmly resisting, the great, the helping prince, him who gave might to the declaration of the true faith, who vanquished the adorers of the Cross, the weal (ṣalāh) of the world and of religion (al-Dīn), the sultān of Islāmism and of the Muslims; the purifier of the Holy Temple, Abu 'l-Muẓaffar Yūsuf, the son of Ayyūb, the giver of

1 Qur'ān, sūrah 8, verse 66.

2 Qur'ān, sūrah 7, verse 203.

3 Qur'ān, sūrah 59.

4 This was said by the preacher in connexion with the last words of his quotation from the Qur'ān. The quotation finished with the seventh verse of fifty-ninth sūrah.

life to the empire (Muḥl al-Dawlah), the commander of the true believers. Grant, O Almighty God ! that his empire extend over the earth, and that the angels ever encircle his standards ; reward him for the services he hath rendered to the orthodox belief, and for his firm resolution and prompt execution in the defence of the Muḥammadan religion. Preserve his life, we beseech Thee, for the prosperity of Islāmism ; protect his empire for the advantage of the faith, and extend his authority over the regions of the East and of the West. As Thou hast enabled his hand to retake Jerusalem when men had begun to doubt of Thy intentions<sup>1</sup>, and when the Muslims were suffering under their trials, so let his hand take possession of the land far and near ; help him to seize infidelity by the forelock ; let him scatter their squadrons, disperse their multitudes, and send them, band after band, to join their predecessors (in hell). Reward him, O God ! in the name of Muḥammad, for his efforts, and let his orders and prohibitions issue uncontrolled to the East and to the West ; let the centre and the frontiers of the land, and all the regions of the Kingdom prosper under his rule ; let him humble the pride of the infidels, and tame the insolence of the perverse ; spread his dominion unto every city, and post the detachments of his troops on the roads to every country. Maintain, O God ! him and his children in the possession of the empire till the day of judgment ; preserve his days and those of his sons and brethren, princes highly favoured ; strengthen his power by granting them long life, and decide, by Thy will, the exaltation of his friends and theirs. O God ! inasmuch as Thou hast produced, through his means, this lasting advantage for Islāmism, to endure as long as months and years pursue their course, grant him the eternal kingdom in the abode of the pious, and answer his prayer when he says : O Lord ! excite me that I may be thankful for Thy favour wherewith Thou hast favoured me and my parents ; and that I may do that which is right, and well-pleasing unto Thee ; and introduce me, through Thy mercy, among Thy servants the righteous."<sup>2</sup> He then pronounced the usual prayers. This doctor was born at Damascus, A.H. 550

---

1 Literally : When thoughts were entertained.

2 Qur'ān, sūrah 27, verse 19.

(A.C. 1155); he died in that city on the 7th of Sha'bān, A.H. 598 (May, A.C. 1202)* and was buried at the foot of Mount Qāsiyūn. His father Abu 'l-Ḥasan 'Alī, surnamed Zaki al-Dīn, filled the place of qāḍī at Damascus; he was a man of great virtue and piety. Having requested, and obtained, permission to resign his post, he made the pilgrimage to Makkah, and returned to Baghdād in the month of Ṣafar, A.H. 563 (Nov.-Dec. A.C. 1167), and there fixed his residence. He held a high rank as a traditionist, having received Traditions from a great number of persons; and, during his residence at Baghdād, he taught them publicly. He remained in that city till his death, which happened on Thursday, the 28th of Shawwāl, A.H. 564 (July, A.C. 1169)† The funeral service was said over him in the mosque of the Castle, and he was interred in the cemetery of the Imām Aḥmad Ibn Ḥanbal. Abu 'l-Ḥakam 'Abd al-Salām Ibn 'Abd al-Raḥmān Ibn Muḥammad Ibn 'Abd al-Raḥmān al-Lakhmī, the Ibn Barraḡān mentioned in this article, was a man of great sanctity, and the author of a commentary on the Qur'ān wherein he explains the greater part of it according to the mystic system of the Sūfis. He died in the city (مدینه) of Morocco, A.H. 536 (A.C. 1141-2).

569 AL-SADID AL-SALAMĀSĪ.

Muḥammad Ibn Hibat Allāh Ibn 'Abd Allāh al-Salamāsī, surnamed al-Sadīd (the well directed), was a doctor of the Shāfi'ite sect and its chief imām in that age. Having exercised the functions of under-tutor (mu'ld) in the Nizāmiyah College, he mastered various branches of science, and was the first who made known in 'Irāq the Sharīf's Ṭarīqah<sup>1</sup>. It is even said that he could repeat

---

1 The Sharīf Sharaf Shāh Ibn Malik Dād al-'Abbāsī, a celebrated professor in the Nizāmiyah College (of Naysābūr) was a jurisconsult of great acuteness. He composed a Ṭarīqah or systematic defence of the Shāfi'ite doctrines, which acquired extensive circulation, and he wrote some other works on dialectics. He

(Continued on page 215)

* 2 May.—Ed.

† 24 July.—Ed.

the contents of that work without recurring to the book, and that he knew equally well (Abū Ḥāmid) al-Ghazzālī's Wasīṭ and Muṣṭasfā. Pupils came from all countries to study under him, and by his excellent mode of tuition, they all became learned jurisconsults, professors, and authors. Amongst the number were the two imāms and shaykhs 'Imād al-Dīn Muḥammad and Kamāl al-Dīn Mūsā, the sons of Yūnus, whose lives will be found in this work; to these may be added the shaykh Sharaf al-Dīn Abu 'l-Muẓaffar Muḥammad Ibn 'Alwān Ibn Muhājir and other eminent doctors. His opinions on points of law were held to be excellent<sup>1</sup>. He died at Baghdād in the month of Shahbān, A.H. 574 (Jan.-Feb., A.C. 1178-9). Salamāsi means belonging to Salamās, a city in Ādharbā'i-jān which has produced a number of illustrious men.

570 HAFADAT AL-ṬŪSĪ

Abū Munṣūr Muḥammad Ibn As'ad Ibn Muḥammad Ibn al-Ḥusayn Ibn al-Qāsim al-'Aṭṭārī, generally known by the appellation Hafadah, and surnamed 'Imād al-Dīn (column of the faith), was a doctor of the sect of al-Shāfi'i and a native of Naysābūr. He bore the surname of al-Ṭūsī because his family belonged to Ṭūs. This able jurisconsult was also an eloquent preacher and a profound dogmatic theologian. He studied the law at Marw under Abū Bakr Muḥammad Ibn Maṣṣūr al-Ṣam'ānī (No. 370), the father of the celebrated hafiz; he then removed to Marw al-Rūd (No. 22), and continued his studies under the Qāḍī Ḥusayn al-Farrā al-Baghawī (No. 177), the author of the Explanation of the Sunnah and of the Tahdhīb. He proceeded thence to Bukhārā and studied under the Ḥanafite doctor Burhān al-Dīn 'Abd al-'Azīz Ibn 'Umar Ibn Māzah, after which he turned to Marw, and regular assemblies were held there to hear him preach. He remained in that died in the flower of his youth at Naysābūr A.H. 543 (A.C. 1148-9). (Ṭabaqāt al-Shāfi'in.) This is the Sharif whose name I had not been able to discover, when writing the note on Tiriqah (No. 407).

(Continued from page 214)

1 Literally: "He was considered as well directed (musaddad) in fatwās." He probably received the title of Sadīd for this reason.

for some time, but, in the year 548, the disastrous invasion of the Ghuzz obliged him to retire into 'Irāq. Of this invasion we have spoken in the life of the jurisconsult Muḥammad Ibn Yahyā (No. 565). He then passed into Ādharbā'ijān, and proceeded through Mesopotamia to Moṣul. In this city, crowds assembled to hear him preach and deliver Traditions. One of the passages which he dictated to his disciples was the following :

"Al-Shāfi' shines among the learned like the sun among the stars. Say to whoever compares him to one who equals him not : 'Can light be compared to darkness' "

He one day recited these lines from the pulpit :

"May the thunder announce to the dwelling wherein Hind resided the salutation of a genial shower, offered by the dark clouds. She departed from us, and we, seduced by love, lent her our hearts ; but objects lent by lovers are never returned."

The exhortations which he made at his assemblies were admirable. He died in the month of the latter Rabi' A.H. 571 (Oct.-Nov., A.C. 1175), in the city of Tibriz (Tauris) ; but some persons place his death in the month of Rajab, A. H. 573. Notwithstanding all my researches, I have not been able to discover why he was called Hafadah. Tibriz is one of the largest cities in Ādharbā'ijān.

571 AL-KHUBŪSHĀNĪ.

Abu 'l-Barakāt Muḥammad Ibn al-Muwaffaq Ibn Sa'id Ibn 'Ali Ibn al-Ḥasan Ibn 'Abd Allāh al-Khubūshānī, surnamed Najm al-Dīn (star of religion), was an able doctor of the Shāfi'ite sect, and noted for his devout life. He studied jurisprudence under Muḥammad Ibn Yahyā (No. 565), and he so well knew by heart that author's commentary on the Wasīf, entitled the Muḥīṭ (comprehensive), that, it is said, he once repeated it from memory (to his pupils), as he happened not to have a copy of it at hand. We have a large work of his called the Tahqīq al-Muḥīṭ (proofs of the doctrines contained in the), Muḥīṭ and I have seen a copy of it in sixteen volumes. Mention has been already made of his interview with al-'Āḍid al-'Ubaydī (No. 329). When the sultān Ṣalāḥ al-Dīn obtained the sovereignty of Egypt, he took al-Khūbūshānī into favour and treated him with marked honour, having conceived a high opinion of his learning and piety. It was by this doctor's advice, it is said, that he built the college situated near the tomb of the imām al-Shāfi'ī; and, on the completion of the edifice, in the year, 572 (A.C. 1176-7), he appointed al-Khūbūshānī to it, as professor. In this same year he built the hospital in the citadel of Cairo. I met a number of this doctor's old pupils, and they all extolled his talents and piety; remarking at the same time, that he was a man of the soundest moral principle and very little acquainted with the ways of the world. He was born on the 13th of Rajab, A.H. 510 (November, A.C. 1116),* at Ustawā (a place near) Khūbūshān, and he died on Wednesday, the 12th of Dhu 'l-Qa'dah, A.H. 587 (December, A.C. 1191),† at the college of which we have just spoken. He was interred under a cupola at the foot of al-Shāfi'ī's grave, and a grating separates the two tombs. Khūbūshānī means belonging to Khūbūshān, a small town in the district of Naysābūr. Ustawā, pronounced also Ustuwā, is the name of a canton in the same district, containing a great number of villages.

572 KAMĀL AL-DĪN AL-SHAHRUZŪRĪ.

Abu 'l-Faḍl Muḥammad Ibn Abi Muḥammad 'Abd Allāh Ibn Abi Aḥmad al-Qāsim al-Shahrūzūrī, surnamed Kamāl al-Dīn (perfection of religion), was a doctor of the sect of al-Shāfi'ī. Mention has been already made of his father and grandfather (No. 312 and 511). Kamāl al-Dīn studied jurisprudence at Baghdād under As'ad al-Mihani (No. 86), and learned Traditions from Abu 'l-Barakāt Muḥammad Ibn Muḥammad Ibn Khamīs al-Mawṣilī. He filled the place of Qaḍī at Moṣul, and built a college for Shāfi'ites in that city.

* 21 November.--Ed.

† 1 December, but the day does not tally; according to Mahler's calculation it was Sunday.--Ed.

He erected also a convent (ribāṭ) at Madīnah. The atābek 'Imād al-Dīn Zinkī employed him as his envoy, and frequently dispatched him, in that capacity, from Moṣul to (the court of) Baghdād. When Zinkī lost his life at the siege of Qal'at Ja'bar (No. 229), Kamāl al-Dīn was at the army with his brother Tāj al-Dīn Abū Ṭāhir Yaḥyā, the father of the qāḍī Ḍiyā al-Dīn, and they accompanied the army on its return to Moṣul. The sovereign authority having devolved to Sayf al-Dīn Ghāzī, the son of 'Imād al-Dīn, that prince entrusted the qāḍī Kamāl al-Dīn,* with the administration of Moṣul and of all the empire. In the year 542 (A.C. 1147-8) he caused both (brothers) to be arrested, and confined them in the citadel of Moṣul, after which, he sent for Najm al-Dīn Abū 'Alī 'l-Ḥasan, the son of Bahā al-Dīn Abu 'l-Ḥasan 'Alī, who was then qāḍī of al-Raḥabah, and appointed him to the qāḍiship of Moṣul and Diyār Bakr, as successor to his cousin Kamāl al-Dīn. The khalīf al-Muqtafī then sent an envoy to intercede for Kamāl al-Dīn and his brother; this procured their liberation from prison, but they were then kept under arrest at their own houses, whilst Jalāl al-Dīn Abū Aḥmad, Kamāl al-Dīn's son, and Ḍiyā al-Dīn Abu 'l-Faḍā'il al-Qāsim, the son of Tāj al-Dīn, remained prisoners in the citadel. On the death of Sayf al-Dīn Ghāzī, the arrest was suspended, and they both went to see Quṭb al-Dīn Mawdūd, the son of Zinkī, who had been raised to the throne on the death of his brother Sayf al-Dīn. Finding the prince on horseback in the hippodrome, they immediately dismounted and went up to him. They were arrayed in mourning robes, and had left aside their ṣarḥahs.<sup>1</sup> When they drew near, he got off his horse to meet them, and received their condolences on the death of his brother, with their felicitations on his own accession. They then mounted again, and placed themselves one on each side of Quṭb al-Dīn, after which they returned home, discharged from their arrest. From that time, they regularly rode out in the train of the prince. In the year 550 (A.C. 1155-6,) Kamāl al-Dīn entered into the service of Nūr al-Dīn

1 It would appear from a note by M. de Sacy, in his Chrestomathie, tom. II, p. 269, that the ṣarḥah was a sort of hood worn by the chief qāḍī of the Shāfi'ite sect.

* The Egyptian edition adds: "and his brother".—Ed.

Maḥmūd<sup>1</sup>, sovereign of Syria, and remained some time at Damascus. In the month of Şafar. A.H. 555 (Feb.-March, A.C. 1160), he was appointed ḥākim (chief magistrate), in the place of Zakī al-Dīn, who was removed from office; on which he designated his son and nephews to act as his deputies in the different cities of Syria. He then rose to the wazīrship, and exercised the chief magisterial authority over all the Muslim cities of that time, whilst his son, the qādī Muḥī al-Dīn, acted in the same capacity, as his lieutenant at Aleppo. During the reign of Nūr al-Dīn, he not only filled the duties of chief magistrate and president of the council of state, but he had also to direct the whole administration of the empire. That prince sent him as his envoy to the court (of Baghdād in the ḫalīfate of al-Muqtafi, and the latter confided to him the mission of establishing a peace between Nūr al-Dīn and Qilij Arslān Ibn Maṣ'ūd, sovereign of Asia Minor (Rūm). On the death of Nūr al-Dīn Şalāh al-Dīn took possession of Damascus and confirmed Kamāl al-Dīn in his attributions. Kamāl al-Dīn was a jurisconsult, an elegant scholar, a poet and a kātib; he possessed a lively wit and a talent for conversation which rendered him the delight of society. He discoursed remarkably well on the points of difference between the orthodox sects and on the fundamental principles of theology and jurisprudence; he maintained a high eminence by his acuteness and intrepidity, and he was equally distinguished for his charity and beneficence. Numerous pious establishments (waqfs) were founded by him at Moşul, Naşibīn, and Damascus. As the prime minister of the empire, he exercised great influence, and, as a statesman, his abilities were of the highest order. None of his sons could be compared with him, and none of them numerous though they were, ever attained such an exalted rank as he. Mention is made of him by the ḥāfiẓ Ibn 'Asākir (No. 416) in the History of Damascus. He composed some good poetry, and the following lines were repeated to me as his, by persons of his family :

"I went to see thee whilst the stars were my only observers, and the dawn was yet an idea, latent in the bosom of the East.
Impelled by love, I faced every danger, hoping we might meet."

---

1 His life will be found in this work.

It is said that he wrote the following verses to his son Muḥi al-Dīn, who was then at Aleppo; and the author of the Kharidah pronounces them positively to be his:

"I dispatch to thy presence a legion of loving wishes, in the form of letters; thinking of thee, I hold a pleasing conversation with myself, but, alas! it is a mere delusion."

The kātib 'Imād al-Dīn says in the Kharidah, in his article on Kamāl al-Dīn, that these lines were recited to him by the qādī as his own, on the 3rd of the first Rabi', A.H. 571* "They recalled to my mind," he adds, "the words of the sharif Abū Ya'lā Ibn al-Habbā riyah<sup>1</sup>, who said, alluding to the slow approach of morning (after a night of anxiety).

'How many the nights I passed, concealing the flame which consumed me, and uttering complaints to the stars, so as nearly to awake their pity; whilst the East withheld from me the sight of morn. as the hand of the wretched holds closely the favour it obtained.'

He then adds: "If the poet had (changed a single word and) said: (ardently desired) like a tardy favour granted to the wretched, the thought had been excellent." It is said that when Kamāl al-Dīn grew old and feeble, so as to be hardly able to move, he used very often to repeat these lines:

"O Lord! let me not live till I become a burden to any man: take me by the hand (unto thyself). before I am obliged to say, when I wish to rise up: 'Take me by the hand.'"

I am not sure whether these verses be his own or not, and I have since met with them in a poem composed by Abū 'l-Ḥasan Muḥammad Ibn 'Abi 'l-Ṣaqr al-Wāsiṭī. In the life of Ibn

1 The sharif Abū Ya'lā Muḥammad Ibn Muḥammad Ibn Ṣāliḥ Ibn al-Habbāriyah, a native of Baḡdād, was one of the poets patronised by Nizām al-Mulk (No. 171). He had a great propensity to satire, and surpassed, in the gaiety and licentiousness of his poems, Ibn al-Ḥajjāj (No. 186), on whose style his own might be said to be formed. He ended by satirizing Nizām al-Mulk himself. 'Imād al-Dīn gives some passages from his compositions in the Kharidah, MS. No. 1447, fol. 24 et seq.

* 21 September, A. C. 1175. —Ed.

Abi 'l-Šaqr, we shall again speak of them. Kamāl al-Dīn was born at Moṣul, A.H. 492 (A.C. 1098-99), he died at Damascus on Thursday, the 6th of Muḥarram A.H. 572 (July, A.C. 1176) and was interred, the next morning, at Mount Qāsiyūn. He was then aged eighty years and some months. His son Muḥī al-Dīn composed an elegy on his death. One of Kamāl al-Dīn's last requests, was that the chief qāḍiship should be conferred on his nephew, Abu 'l-Faḍā'il al-Qāsim Ibn Yaḥyā Ibn 'Abd Allāh, surnamed Ḍyā al-Dīn, and the sultān acceded to this recommendation by nominating him qāḍī of Damascus. He held this post for some time, but discovering that the prince had a partiality for the Shaykh Sharaf al-Dīn Ibn Abī 'Uṣrūn (No. 313) he asked and obtained his dismissal. Sharaf al-Dīn was appointed to the vacant place.

573 MUḤĪ AL-DĪN AL-SHAHRUZŪRĪ

Abū Ḥamid Muḥammad al-Shahrūzūrī, surnamed Muḥī al-Dīn (reviver of religion), was the son of the qāḍī Kamāl al-Dīn, whose life has been given in the preceding article. Having already mentioned the high rank and authority held by his father, we need not repeat our observations here. The qāḍī Muḥī al-Dīn went to study at Baghdād, and, having distinguished himself by his progress in jurisprudence under the tutition of the shaykh Abū Maṣṣūr Ibn al-Bazzāz, he proceeded to Syria and filled the qāḍiship of Damascus, as his father's deputy. In the month of Ramaḍān,* A.H. 555 (September, A.C. 1160), he removed to Aleppo, where he exercised the chief magistracy in his father's name also, having repiaced, in this office, Ibn Abī Jarādah, surnamed Ibn al-'Adīm<sup>1</sup>. On the death

1 Ibn Abī Jarādah, the grandfather of the historian of Aleppo, refused to hold the place of qāḍī as deputy to Kamāl al-Dīn—MS. No. 728, f. 176. Farther on, we read as follows: "In the year 575 (A.C. 1179-80) some ill-intentioned persons complained secretly of Muḥī al-Dīn al-Shahrūzūrī, qāḍī of Aleppo, to Jamāl al-Dīn Shādbakht, governor of that city, pretending that he favoured the projects of al-Malik al-Šālīh, and producing poems (to the at effect), of his father, he removed to Moṣul and obtained not only the qāḍīship of that city, but the professorship in the colleges founded there, one by his father, and the other by Nizām al-Mulk. Having gained the confidence of 'Izz al-Dīn Mas'ūd, the son of Quṭb al-Dīn Mawdūd, sovereign of Moṣul, he became the uncontrolled director of the state, and was frequently dispatched by his master on missions to the court of Baghād. Baha al-Dīn Yūsuf Ibn Shaddād, qāḍī of Aleppo, mentions, in his work entitled : Maljā al-Ḥukkām 'ind Illibās il-Aḥkām (resource of magistrates when the law is doubtful), that he was in the retinue of Muḥī al-Dīn when that qāḍī proceeded to Baghād on one of his missions. The eminence of Muḥī al-Dīn may be easily appreciated from the fact of his having such a man as Bahā al-Dīn in his service. He was distinguished by his princely beneficence, and it is said that, in one of his embassies to Baghād, he distributed ten thousand amerlan dīnārs<sup>1</sup> to juriconsults, literary men, poets and indigent which they declared to be his. This awakened the apprehensions of Muḥī al-Dīn, who proceeded to Moṣul ; on which the post of qāḍī at Aleppo was offered to my uncle, Abū Ḡhānim Muḥammad Ibn Hibat Allāh Ibn Abi Jarādah, who refused it. My father then accepted the place, and continued to hold it till the death of al-Malik al-Ṣāliḥ." (History of Aleppo by Kamāl al-Dīn Ibn al-'Adīm. This is the work of which a portion has been published by M. Freytag under the title of Excerpta ex Historia Halebi.)

(Continued on page 222)

* The Cairo editon of 1948 adds: And it is said that the event took place in Sha'bān, A.H. 556 (July, A.C. 1161).—Ed.

(Continued from page 221)

1 I am indebted to the author of the excellent Essai sur les Medailles des Sasanides for the following note on the amīrian dīnār :- Les Toulounides, au quatrième siècle, inscrivent sur leurs monnaies d'or le nom du khalife suivi du titre d'emir. Mais la première monnaie d'or frappée par un khalif et portant ce titre paraît être un dinar de Mostarched billah, dont un exemplaire unique et inédit appartient à la bibliothèque royale. Cette monnaie est frappée à Baghād السلام بمدينة en l'année 521. Diun cote on y lit, après le symbole, الإمام المسترشد بالله أمير المؤمنين ; le revers, un peu altéré, permet pourtant de lire : الله محمد رسول الله صلى الله عليه معز الدنيا والدين محمود. Comme le module et le poids des dinars des derniers khalifs étaient plus considérables que ceux des dinars anonymes frappés pendant les trois premiers siècles, on a du, dans le peuple, distinguer ces nouvelles monnaies par une appellation vulgaire. Le titre d'emir étant aussi une innovation pour la monnaie de Baghād, aura frappé l'attention des gens de cette ville qui auront créé la dénomination de dinar emirien. Cette distinction était d'autant plus naturelle due les dinars antérieurs, persons. It is said also that, during the whole period of his magistracy at Moṣul, he never allowed a debtor to be imprisoned for two dinārs or a smaller sum, but discharged the debt himself. Numerous anecdotes are related of his generosity. The great authority and influence which he exercised obtained for him universal respect; and his character, which was of the very noblest cast, was marked by beneficence and affability<sup>1</sup>. He possessed a very fair knowledge of the belles lettres, and composed some good poetry. One of his pieces, recited to me at Damascus by a friend, is on a grasshopper, and offers great novelty in its comparisons; he says:

(Continued on page 223)

"It has the thighs of a camel, the legs of an ostrich, the claws of an eagle, and the breast of a lion. It borrowed its belly from the serpent of the sands, and its head and mouth from the spirited steed."

In a collection of various pieces, I found the following verses of his on the descent of snow from the clouds:

"When time grew hoary with grief at the loss of its generous men, he tore off this hoariness and scattered it upon mankind."

His birth may be placed approximatively in the year A.H. 510 (A.C. 1116-7). The kātib 'Imād al-Dīn says in his Kharidah, I know not on what authority, that he was born in the year 519, to which he adds, in the Sayf, that this event took place in the month of Shā'bān. He died at daybreak, on Wednesday the 14th of the first Jumādā, A.H. 586. (June, A.C. 1190)* according to Ibn al-Dubaythī<sup>2</sup>, but, on the 23rd of the month, according to the kātib quoique ne portant pas de nom de prince. nous montrent quelquefois son titre خليفة place dans le champ de la piece au-dessous du symbole. Je citerai le dinar 190 de al-Mamoun comme offrant un exemple de cette particularie. Adrien De Longprier.

---

(Continued from page 222)

1 The words رقيق الحاشية rendered here by affability, may perhaps signify penetration. It is an expression which has a great variety of meanings.

2 His life will be found in this book.

* 20 June. -Ed.

'Imād al-Dīn, in his Sayl. His death took place at Moṣul, and he was buried in his house, situated in the quarter of the Castle, but his corpse was subsequently carried to Madīnah; so, at least, I have read in an historical work, but Ibn al-Dubaythī states, in his History, that it was removed to a mausoleum built for its reception outside the city (of Moṣul). Having endeavoured to clear up this point, I found Ibn al-Dubaythī's statement to be true. This mausoleum lies outside the Maydān Gate, near the tomb of Qaḍīb al-Bān, the celebrated worker of miracles.<sup>1</sup> Kamāl al-Dīn had another son called 'Imād al-Dīn Aḥmad, who was sent, in the year 569 (A.C. 1173-4), as ambassador from Nūr al-Dīn to the court of Baghdād. His praises were celebrated by the poet Ibn al-Ta'āwidhī<sup>2</sup> in a qaṣīdah of which one of the verses is :

"They said : He is an envoy (rasūl) whose qualities are above description ! and I answered : You speak the truth ; such is the description of every apostle (rasūl)."

574 FAKHR AL-DĪN AL-RĀZĪ

Abū 'Abd Allāh Muḥammad Ibn 'Umar Ibn al-Ḥusayn Ibn 'Alī al-Taymī al-Bakrī<sup>3</sup> al-Ṭabaristānī al-Rāzī (native of Ray in Ṭabaristān), surnamed Fakhr al-Dīn (glory of the faith) and generally known by the appellation of Ibn al-Khaṭīb (the son of the preacher), was a doctor of the Shāfi'ite sect, and born at Ray. Fakhr al-Dīn was the pearl of the age, a man without a peer; he surpassed all his contemporaries in scholastic theology, metaphysics, and philosophy<sup>4</sup>. He composed instructive works on many branches of science, such as a

1 I have not yet succeeded in finding a notice on the ṣūfī surnamed Qaḍīb al-Bān (willow-wand).

2 The life of this poet is given by Ibn Khalikān.

3 The relative adjectives al-Taymī al-Bakrī indicate here that Fakhr al-Dīn al-Rāzī was a descendant of the khalīf Abū Bakr, one of whose ancestors was Taym, the son of Murrah, the son of Ka'b, the son of Luwayyi, the son of Ghālib, the son of Fihri Qurayshī.

4 The words علم الأوائل here rendered by philosophy, signify literally, the science of the ancients. By the ancients is meant the Greeks.

commentary on the Qur'ān containing an immense quantity of rare and curious observations ; it is a most extensive work, but he left it unfinished ; the explanation of the opening sūrah alone fills one volume. On scholastic theology he wrote the works entitled al-Ma'ālīb al-'Āliyah (the loftiest aims) ; the Nihāyat al-Uqūl (limit of human reason) ; the Arba'in (forty traditions)<sup>1</sup> ; the Muḥaṣṣal (summary)<sup>2</sup> ; the Kitāb al-Bāyūn wa 'l-Burhān, etc. (book of elucidation and proof, being a refutation of the partisans of error and impiety) ; the Kitāb al-Mabāḥith al-'Imādiyyah fī 'l-Ma'ālīb al-Ma'ādiyyah ('Imāadian researches on the questions raised concerning the resurrection) ;<sup>3</sup> the Taḥdhīb al-Dalā'il wa 'Uyūn al-Masā'il (correctio argumentorum et fontes questionum) : the Irshād al-Nuẓār ilā laṭā'if il-Asrār (direction of investigators towards subtle mysteries) ; the 'Ajwibat al-Masā'il al-Najjāriyah (replies to the Najjārian questions)<sup>4</sup> the Taḥṣīl al-Ḥaqq (acquisition of the truth) ; the Zubdah (cream)<sup>5</sup> the Ma'ālim (guiding marks) etc. On the fundamentals of jurisprudence he wrote the Maḥṣūl (results) and the Ma'ālim. On philosophy he composed the Mulakhkhaṣ (succinct exposition) ; a commentary on Avicena's (No. 184) Ishārāt (indications or theorems)<sup>6</sup> ; a commentary on (the same author's) 'Uyūn al-Ḥikmah (fontes philosophiae), etc. On the science of talismans he wrote the work entitled al-Sirr al-Maktūm (the hidden secret), and an explanation of the excellent names of God. It is said that he left a commentary on al-Zamaḥshari's grammatical treatise the Mufaṣṣal, another on al-Ghazzālī's treatise on jurisprudence, the Wajīz, and a third on Abu 'l-'Alā's Siqat al-Zand (No. 46). He composed also a compendium on the unattainable perfection of style displayed in the Qur'ān, a collection of excellent strictures on the grammarians, a system of controversy, and a commentary on the Kulliyāt (universalia) of 1 These forty Traditions relate to the dogmas of faith. He drew them up for the use of his son. See Flügel's Hājji Khalifah, tom. I, p. 242.

2 Hājji Khalifah calls this work a Summary of reflexions made by ancient and modern philosophers.

3 Hājji Khalifah notices the title of this work, but does not inform us why these researches were called 'Imādiyah.

4 What those questions were I have not been able to discover.

5 This is said by Hājji Khalifah. to be a work on the dogmas of religion.

6 See Flügel's Hājji Khalifah, tom. I, p. 300.

Avicena's Canon. He wrote also a treatise on physiognomy, and another on the merits of al-Shāfi'<sup>1</sup>. All his works are highly instructive, and have got into circulation (even) in (distant) countries, and, by an effect of the good fortune which attended him in these treatises, the public took them for class-books and rejected those of former authors. He was the first who introduced the systematical arrangement so remarkable in his writings, and which had never been employed by any person before his time. He preached with most impressive effect, both in Arabic and Persian; in the midst of his exhortations, feelings of compunction would draw floods of tears from his eyes. The conferences which he held at Herāt were attended by the principal doctors of the orthodox sects and the chiefs of the philosophical schools, who come to propose questions to him and hear his excellent answers. By his efforts a great number of the Karrāmiyah<sup>1</sup> and other sects were converted to the *Sunni*te doctrines. At Herāt, they gave him the title of Shaykh al-Islām (the chief of Islāmism). His first studies were made under his father, and, after his death, he went to al-Kamāl al-Simnānī, and remained with him as a pupil for some time; he then returned to Ray and studied under al-Majd al-Jili, a disciple of Muḥammad Ibn Yahyā (No. 565). When al-Majd al-Jili was called to Marāghah, in order to give lessons in that city, Fakhr al-Dīn accompanied him, and continued, for a long period, to study scholastic theology and philosophy under his tuition. It is said that he knew by heart the Imām al-Ḥaramayn's treatise on scholastic theology, entitled al-Shāmil. Having then proceeded to Khwārizm, he displayed the highest abilities in all the branches of science, and maintained a controversy with the people of that place on questions connected with the doctrines of his sect and with the principles of faith. Being expelled from the city<sup>2</sup>, he passed into Transoxiana, where he experienced a similar treatment, upon which he returned to Ray. There was then living in Ray an able physician, who possessed a large fortune and had two daughters.

1 The Karrāmians, followers of Muḥammad Ibn Karrām, held the principle of anthropomorphism, See an account of this sect in Sale's Preliminary Discourse to the Qur'an.

2 Probably the city of Korkenj or Jurijāniya, the capital of Khwārizm.

Having fallen sick, and perceiving death to be inevitable, he gave each of those girls in marriage to a son of Fakhr al-Dīn. On his demise, the latter took possession of all his property, and this was the origin of his wealth. He was constantly travelling from place to place : having gone to Ghaznah to recover a sum of money which he had advanced to Shihāb al-Dīn al-Ghūrī, the sovereign of the city, he not only met a most honourable and kind reception, but was enabled, by the protection of the prince, to gain a large sum (besides what he had received). He then returned to Khurāsān, and attached himself to the Sultān Muḥammad Ibn Tukush, surnamed Khwārizm Shāh : this prince treated him with great favour and elevated him to the very highest posts in the empire. The virtues and merits of Fakhr al-Dīn were boundless. To his knowledge of all these sciences, he joined a talent for poetry, and in one of his pieces he says :

“Human reason can reach only to the extent of its chain ; the utmost efforts of mortals mostly serve to lead them into error. Our souls and our bodies are at variance, and the sum of our worldly enjoyments is but bane and evil. Though we pass our lives in investigation, all we can collect may be reduced to this ; it is said, or they say.<sup>1</sup> How many men, how many empires have we seen flourishing, and which rapidly disappeared ; how many mountains to the summits of which men have ascended, who are now gone, and the mountains remain.”

The learned men of (all the neighbouring) countries went to (consult him) and persons journeyed forth from every region to visit him. Sharaf al-Dīn Ibn ‘Unayn, (a poet) whose life we shall give, relates that he happened, on a winter’s day, to be present, with a numerous audience of men eminent for talent, at one of the lessons given by Fakhr al-Dīn in the college of Khwārizm, and that much snow had fallen, that country being extremely cold. Whilst the lesson was going on, a pigeon, pursued by a bird of prey, alighted near the professor, and the other bird disappeared on seeing the people assembled there. As the pigeon was unable to fly off, owing to the effects of terror and of cold, Fakhr al-Dīn went over to it on finishing his lecture, and expressed his pity for the poor thing, as he took it up in his hand. On this, Ibn 'Unayn recited extempore the following lines :

<sup>1</sup> Read رَأَى in the Arabic text.

"Son of the generous ! son of those who fed the poor in winter, when scarcity prevailed and the snow covered the earth !— of those who protected the unfortunate when their souls trembled under the sword and the gory-pointed spear ! Who told the dove that your mansion was a sanctuary, and that you were an asylum for the timorous? It came to visit thee when its death was near, and you bestowed on it new life, in saving it from destruction. Could it receive (such) presents (as men obtain), it would leave thy hand, bearing off a large donation. It came with its complaints to the Solomon of the age<sup>1</sup>, whilst death gleamed at it from beneath the wings of a rapacious, vigorous bird attracted by the sight— nay, by the shadow—of food, and it fled before him with a trembling heart."

Abū 'Abd Allāh al-Ḥusayn al-Wāsiṭī says that he heard Fakhr al-Dīn repeat the following line from the pulpit, at Herāt, on concluding a discourse wherein he reproved the people of that city :

"A worthy man is despised during his lifetime, but when removed by death, his loss is severely felt."

Fakhr al-Dīn mentions, in his work entitled Taḥṣīl al-Ḥaqq that he studied dogmatic theology under his father Ḍiyā al-Dīn 'Umar, who had learned that science from Abu 'l-Qāsim Salmān Ibn Nāṣir al-Anṣārī<sup>2</sup> who had been instructed in it by the Imām

---

1 This may perhaps be an allusion to the following legend : "As David was sitting one day at an assembly of the children of Isrā'īl, with Solomon before him, a pigeon came and settled close to Solomon, and said : 'O son of David ! I am one of the pigeons of this mansion, and young ones have never been bestowed upon me to rejoice me'. Then Solomon stroked it on the back and said : 'Go ; thou shalt produce seventy young ones, and thy breed shall multiply, even unto the day of the resurrection. ! ' " (Nafā'is al-'Arā'is. MS. No. 620 fol. 136 verso).

2 Abu 'l-Qāsim Salmān Ibn Nāṣir Ibn 'Imrān al-Anṣārī, an able jurisconsult, scholastic theologian, and expositor of the Qur'ān, was a pupil of the Imām al-Ḥaramain and of Abu 'l-Qusṭhayrī. He was noted for his piety and mortified life. His works are, : commentary on the Imām's Irshād, and the Kitāb al-Ghaniyuh. He died in the month of the latter Jumādā, A.H. 512 (Sept.-Oct., al-Ḥaramayn (No. 353), to whom it had been taught by Abū Ishāq al-Isfarā'īnī (No. 4), who had received his information in it from the shaykh Abu 'l-Ḥusayn al-Bāhili, whose master was the shaykh al-Sunnah, Abu 'l-Ḥasan 'Alī Ibn Ismā'il al-Ash'arī (No. 404), who had studied it under Abū 'Alī al-Jubbā'i (No. 581), whose (nu'tazelite) doctrines al-Ash'arī afterwards abandoned, and having then returned to orthodox principles, he took the defence of the doctrines held by the Sunnites and the (Muslim) community. As for Fakhr al-Dīn's knowledge of the Shāfi'ite doctrines, he had received it from his father, to whom it had been taught by Abū Muḥammad al-Farrā al-Baghawī (No. 177), who had studied that science under Qādī Ḥusayn al-Marwarrūdī (No. 175), who had been taught it by al-Qaffāl al-Marwazī (No. 309), who received his information in it from Abū Zayd al-Marwazī (No. 555), who had learned it under Abū Ishāq al-Marwazī (No. 3), to whom it had been taught by Abu 'l-'Abbās Ibn Surayj (No. 20), who had for preceptor Abu 'l-Qāsim al-Anmā'i (No. 384), who had studied it under Abū Ibrāhīm al-Muzanī (No. 90), who had been instructed in it by the Imām al-Shāfi'i (No. 532). Fakhr al-Dīn al-Rāzī was born at Ray on the 25th of Ramaḍān, A.H. 544 (Jan., A.C. 1150)*, some say 543; and he died at Herāt on Monday, the 1st of Shawwāl, A.H. 606 (March, A.C. 1210)†. On the evening of the same day, he was interred at the mountain contiguous to the village of Muzdākhān. I saw the dying injunctions dictated by him to one of his pupils, and they clearly prove the soundness of his religious belief. Muzdākhān is the name of a village near Herāt.

575 'IMĀD AL-DĪN IBN MAN'AH

Abū Ḥāmid Muḥammad Ibn Yūnus Ibn Muḥammad Ibn Man'ah Ibn Mālik Ibn Muḥammad, surnamed 'Imād al-Dīn

(Continued from page 228)

A.C. 1118). Ṭab. al-Shāfi'.) The work gives the orthography of the name Salmān, which is incorrectly written in all our manuscripts of Ibn Khallikān.

* 24 January. --Ed.

† 29 March. --Ed.

(column of the faith), was a doctor of the Shāfi'ite sect, and the most able master of that age in Shāfi'ite doctrines, dogmatic theology, and polemics. His reputation was immense, and jurisconsults came from the remotest regions for the purpose of studying under his tuition. Numerous pupils finished their education under him, and became themselves able and distinguished professors. He commenced his own studies, at Moṣul, under his father, a doctor whose life we shall give, and he then proceeded to Baghdād and studied jurisprudence in the Nizāmiyah College under al-Sadīd* al-Salamāsī (No. 569); he acted also as under-tutor (mū'id) in the same establishment when Sharaf al-Dīn Yūsuf Ibn Bindār al-Dimishqī<sup>1</sup> was professor there. He learned Traditions at Baghdād from Abū 'Abd al-Rahmān Muḥammad Ibn Muḥammad al-Kushmīhanī, at the time of that doctor's visit, and he received other Traditions from Abū Ḥāmid Muḥammad Ibn Abi 'l-Rabī' al-Gharnāṭī (a native of Granada in Spain). Having then returned to Moṣul, he gave lessons in a number of the colleges there, and composed some works on the doctrines of his sect, such as the Muḥīṭ, etc. (the comprehensive, being the combination of what is contained in the Muḥadḥḥab and the Wasīṭ<sup>2</sup>; an explanation of al-Ghazzālī's (No. 562) Wajīz; a treatise on dialectics; an exposition

---

1 This sheet was already composed when I perceived that the following note could not apply to the person here named by Ibn Khallikān; but, as it contains information respecting a doctor of some reputation, it seemed to me worth preserving. Yūsuf Ibn 'Abd Allāh Ibn Bindār was born at Damascus, A.H. 490 (A. C. 1096-7), in which city his father had settled on quitting Marāṭḥah, his native place. When Yūsuf had grown up, he went to Baghdād and studied jurisprudence under As'ad al-Mīhanī and became the tutor of that doctor's class. Having displayed great acquirements as a teacher of the Shāfi'ite doctrines, he was raised to the presidency of the Shāfi'ite sect in 'Irāq. He was an acute controvertist, and professed in the Nizāmiyah and other colleges. A college was afterwards built for himself, and regular assemblies were held to hear him preach, but this practice he subsequently renounced, and applied himself to the learning and teaching of the Traditions. He died in the month of Shawwāl, A.H. 563 (July-Aug., A.C. 1168) (Tab. al-Shāf.)

2 The Muḥadḥḥab is a celebrated treatise on Shāfi'ite law by Abū Iṣḥāq al-Shīrāzī, and the Wasīṭ is a work on the same subject by al-Ghazzālī.

* The Cairo edition inserts "Muḥammad" between "al-Sadīd" and al-Salamāsī."

of the Muslim faith, and a ta'lliqh (collection of notes) on controverted points of doctrines. This last work he left unfinished. He filled (at Moşul) the functions of preacher in the Mujāhidī Mosque, and those of professor in the Nūriyah, 'Izziyāh, Zayniyah, Nafsiyah, and 'Alā'iyah colleges. Having acquired great influence at the court of Nūr al-Dīn Arsilān Shāh (No. 79) sovereign of Moşul, he was occasionally employed by that prince as envoy to the court of Baghdād and to that of al-Malik al-'Ādil (brother of the Sulţān Şalāh al-Dīn). In the year 596 (A.C. 1199-1200) he maintained a discussion before the khalīf's council of state, to prove that an infidel could lawfully purchase a Muslim slave<sup>1</sup>. On Thursday, the 4th of Ramaḍān, A.H. 592 (August, A.C. 1196)*, he was appointed qāḍī of Moşul, but, on Wednesday, the 17th of the month of Şafar†, of the ensuing year, he was replaced by Abu 'l-Faḍā'il Yaḥyā al-Shahruzūrī, surnamed Ḍiyā al-Dīn, the same whom we have spoken of in the life of Kamāl al-Dīn (No. 572). He became chief of the Shāfi'ite community at Moşul, and was noted for his profound piety and extreme self-mortification. He never put on new clothes till he had washed them<sup>2</sup>, and he never took up a pen to write without washing his hand afterwards. Mild in disposition, he was an agreeable companion in private society, and enlivened it by his anecdotes and verses. Nūr al-Dīn, the sovereign of Moşul, admitted him into the closest intimacy, and had always recourse to his opinion as a jurisconsult, and his counsel as a statesman. It was for this prince that Ibn Man'ah drew up his exposition of the Muslim faith. He never relaxed his efforts till he induced Nūr al-Dīn to pass from the Ḥanafite sect to that of al-Shāfi'ī; and, in all the Atābek family, numerous as its members were, this prince was the only one who professed the Shāfi'ite doctrines. On the death of Nūr al-Dīn, in the year 607, he proceeded to Baghdād on a mission, the object of which was, to obtain the confirmation of al-Malik al-Qāhir Mas'ūd (as successor to his father). We shall

1 Such is the law, but the practice is against it.

2 He did so lest they might have contracted some impurity, for this would have invalidated his prayers. See d'Ohsson's Tab. Gen. de l'Emp. Othom. tom. II, p. 7

* 1 August. -Ed.

† 8 January (A.C. 1197). -Ed.

speak again of al-Qāhir in the life of his grandfather Mas'ūd. Having succeeded in his mission, he returned with the pelisse of investiture and the diploma, and, from that time, he continued to be treated by al-Qāhir with even greater favour than that prince's father had ever shown him. He possessed the highest abilities, but was not fortunate in his works, as they seem unworthy of his talent. He was born in a small house at the citadel of Arbela, A.H. 535 (A.C. 1140-1); this house he afterwards visited, when on one of his missions, and he then applied to it the well-known verse:

"(Behold) the country in which the amulets were first suspended round my neck<sup>1</sup>, and the first land of which my body touched the soil".

He died at Moṣul on Thursday, the 19th of the latter Jumādā, A.H. 608 (November, A.C. 1211)*. Al-Malik al-Mu'azzam Muẓaffar al-Dīn, the sovereign of Arbela (No. 522), used to relate that, after the death of 'Imād al-Dīn (Ibn Man'ah), he saw him in a dream and asked him if he was not yet dead; to which he replied affirmatively, but added that he still continued respected<sup>2</sup>. Ibn al-Dubaythī<sup>3</sup> speaks of this doctor in his Dhayl, and Ibn al-Mustawfī (No. 528) mentions him in the History of Arbela. We shall notice later his brother Kamāl al-Dīn Mūsā. They came of a family which produced many men of talent. His grandson Tāj al-Dīn (the crown of religion) Abu 'l-Qāsim 'Abd al-Raḥmān, the son of Riḍā al-Dīn Muḥammad, the son of 'Imād al-Dīn Abū Ḥāmid, is the author of a good abridgment of al-Ghazzālī's (No 562) Wajīz, entitled al-Ta'jīz fī l-khtīṣār il-Wajīz (the inimitable, being an abridgement of the Wajīz). He composed also an abridgment of (Fakhr al-Dīn al-Rāzī's) treatise on the fundamentals of jurisprudence, entitled al-Maḥsūl, and another on Rukn al-Dīn

1 The amulets, like the Roman bullæ, are worn by children till the age of puberty.

2 As this anecdote appears very insignificant in the translation, I suspect that in rendering the passage بلى ولكنى محترم, the meaning of the last word may have escaped me.

3 The life of Ibn al-Dubaythī will be found in this work.

* 27 November—Ed.

al-Ṭāwūsī's (No. 392) system of controverted doctrines. He was born at Moṣul, A.H. 598 (A.C. 1201-2); and was still there when Tartars took it<sup>1</sup> but in the month of Ramaḍān, A.H. 670 (April, A.C. 1272), he proceeded to Baghdād, and died in that city about the month of the first Jumādā, A.H. 671 (Nov.-Dec., A.C. 1272).

576 AL-JĀJARMĪ

Abū Ḥāmid Muḥammad Ibn Ibrāhīm Ibn Abi 'l-Faḍl al-Sahlī al-Jājarmī, surnamed Mu'in al-Dīn (defender of the faith), was an eminent doctor of the Shāfi'ite sect, and displayed the highest abilities in various branches of science. He inhabited Naysābūr and professed in that city. His treatise on jurisprudence, entitled al-Kifāyah (the sufficient), includes, notwithstanding its extreme concision, most of those questions which muftis are generally called on to resolve, and forms one volume; his Idāh or elucidation of (al-Ḡhazzālī's Wajīz), in two volumes, is a very good work. He is also the author of a well-known system of controversy<sup>2</sup> and of the celebrated Qawā'id, or fundamental principles (of Shāfi'ite jurisprudence), which bear his name. Numerous pupils acquired great information under his tuition, and, after his death, many derived profit from the study of his works, especially the Qawā'id which became a standard class-book. This doctor died at Naysābūr on Friday morning, the 21st of Rajab, A.H. 613 (Nov., A.C. 1216)*. Jājarmī means belonging to Jājarm, a town lying between Naysābūr and Jurjān, which has given birth to many learned men. When I was at Naysābūr in the year 612, I saw, on the 24th of the month of Dhu'l-Hijjah (April, A.C. 1216)†, (a number of notes in) his handwriting on the margin of a book, in which he

1 Moṣul was taken by the Tartars, A.H. 660 (A.C. 1261) and nearly all the inhabitants were massacred.

2 By system of controversy (Tariqah fi 'l-khilāf) is meant a systematic defence of the opinions held by the sect of the author.

* 4 November.—Ed.

† 14 April.—Ed.

explained Traditions inserted in (Abū Ishāq al-Shīrāzī's) Muḥadḍ-dhiab, and the obscure terms (found therein). A number of jurisconsults had attended the lectures wherein he explained this work.

577 RUKN AL-DĪN AL-'AMĪDĪ.

Abū Ḥāmid Muḥammad, the son of Muḥammad, the son of Muḥammad (some say, of Aḥmad), al-'Amīdī, surnamed Rukn al-Dīn (pillar of the faith) was a doctor of the Ḥanafite sect and a native of Samarqand. He displayed the highest abilities in pole-mics, and particularly in that branch which is termed al-just*<sup>1</sup>:
the first work specially devoted to this subject had him for its author, as all his predecessors had hitherto confounded it with the science of polemics. He commenced his studies under the Shaykh Ridā† al-Dīn al-Naysābūrī<sup>2</sup> and was one of the four doctors styled Rukns, or pillars; for, amongst his fellow students who attained eminence in that branch of science, were Rukn al-Dīn

---

1 Al-Just is a Persian word, and signifies, and disquisition, research. Not knowing the precise nature of the science to which this term is applied, I am unable to render it by an English equivalent.

2 Ridā al-Dīn al-Naysābūrī was celebrated for his abilities as a doctor of the Ḥanafite sect, and wrote several works, two of which, the Makārim al-Akhḷāq and the Tarīqah fi'l-Khilāf, are noticed by Ḥājji Khalīfah. If it be taken into consideration that his pupils Rukn al-Dīn al-Tāwūsī (No. 392). Rukn al-Dīn al-'Amīdī died, the former in and A.H. 600 and the latter in A.H. 615, his own death may be placed with probability between A.H. 550 and A.H. 600. Another person of the same name†, but known only as a Traditionist, died at Naysābūr in A.H. 617 (See No. 725). The author of the Ṭabaqāt al-Ḥanafiyah, MS. fonds St. Germain
No. 132 has a notice on Ridā al-Dīn al-Naysābūrī (fol. 176), in which he gives some particulars respecting his doctrines and opinions, but forgets to inform us of his true name and the date of his death.

* The Cairo edition gives 'al-Baḥṭh' البحث "Dialectics".—Ed.

† The Cairo edition gives Raḍī al-Dīn—Ed.

‡ His name was al-Muayyid.—Ed.

al-Ṭāwūsī (No. 392), Rukn al-Dīn Imām Zādā<sup>1</sup>, and a fourth, whose name I do not recollect<sup>2</sup>. Al-'Amīdī composed a systematical treatise on polemics; it bears a high reputation, and is in the hands of every jurisconsult; he wrote also a work entitled al-Irshād (the direction)<sup>3</sup>, on which commentaries have been composed by a number of masters in that department of science, such as Shams al-Dīn Abū 'l-'Abbās Aḥmad Ibn al-Khalīl Ibn Sa'ādah Ibn Ja'far al-Khuwayyī<sup>4</sup>, a doctor of the sect of al-Shāfi'ī and formerly qāḍī of Damascus, Awhād al-Dīn al-Dūnī<sup>5</sup> qāḍī of Manbaj, Najm al-Dīn al-Mirindī, Badr al-Dīn al-Marāghī (native of Marāghah), and others. Al-'Amīdī composed also a work entitled al-Nafā'is (the precious)<sup>6</sup>, of which an abridgment was made by Shams al-Dīn al-Khuwayyī, the doctor just mentioned, under the title of 'Arā'is al-Nafā'is (the brides from among the number of the precious); besides this, he wrote some more fine treatises of a similar cast. Amongst the numerous pupils who studied with profit under his tuition, was the Ḥanafite shaykh, Niẓām al-Dīn Aḥmad, the son of the Shaykh Jamāl al-Dīn Abū 'l-Mujāhid Maḥmūd Ibn Aḥmad Ibn 'Abd al-Sayyid Ibn 'Uṭmān Ibn Naṣr Ibn 'Abd al-Malik. This Niẓām al-Dīn was a native of Buḥārā, and composed a well-known Ṭarīqah, or system of controversy. He bore the surname of al-Nājirī<sup>7</sup>, and was generally known by

1 The imām preacher, and muftī, Muḥammad Ibn Abī Bakr, generally known by the appellations of Imām Zādā (sprung from an imām), and surnamed Rukn al-Dīn, was a native of a village in the dependencies of Samarqand, called Jazgh جَزْغ. He studied controversy under Riḍā al-Dīn al-Naysabūrī, and law under Burhān al-Dīn al-Zarnūjī, the author of the well-known work entitled Ta'lim al-Muta'allim. He acted as muftī at Buḥārā, and bore a high reputation for virtue, abilities, piety, and eloquence. Besides filling the duties of a preacher, he gave lessons in Shīfism. A work of his, the Shar'at al-Islām, is noticed by Ḥājji Khalīfah. This author places his death in the year 573 (A.C. 1177-8.—(Ḥājji Khalīfah. Ṭabaqāt al-Ḥanafiyah; fol. 194).

2 The fourth Rukn al-Dīn was the imām al-Ḥarā'ini الحارثي (Ṭab. al-Ḥan).

3 This is a work on polemics and controversy.

4 Khuwayyī means native of Khuwayy; a city in the province of Ādārbā'ījān. The date of this doctor's death will be found a little further on.

5 Dūnī means belonging to Dūnah, a village near Nihawand.

6 This is a treatise on dialectics.

7 I am unable to discover the meaning of this surname.

the appellation of al-Ḥaṣīrī<sup>1</sup>. (Al-'Amlīdī) was distinguished for his noble character, profound humility, and agreeable manners. He died on the eve of Wednesday, the 9th of the latter Jumādā, A.H. 615 (September, A.C. 1218.*). Shams al-Dīn al-Khuwayyī died at Damascus on Saturday, the 7th of Shah'būn, A.H. 637 (March, A.C. 1240)†, and was interred at the foot of Mount Qāsiyūn. His birth took place in the month of Shawwāl, A.H. 583 (December, A.C. 1187). Awḥad al-Dīn died at Aleppo subsequently to the taking of the citadel by the Tartars; the citadel was taken twenty-nine days after the fall of the city, an event which occurred on the 10th of Ṣafar, A.H. 658 (Jan., A.C. 1260)‡ Awḥad al-Dīn came into the world in the year 586 (A.C. 1190-1). I do not know whence the relative adjective 'Amīdī is derived, neither is it mentioned by al-Sam'ānī (in his Ansāb); (No. 370). Nizām al-Dīn al-Ḥaṣīrī was slain by the Tartars at Naysābūr, the first time they invaded those countries. This happened in the year 616 (A.C. 1219-20). His father was a doctor of the highest reputation for learning. I met him, on different occasions, at Damascus, where he professed § in the Nūriyah College<sup>2</sup>. He was born at Bukhārā in the month of Rajab, A.H. 546 (Oct.-Nov., A.C. 1151), and he died at Damascus on the eve of Sunday, the 8th of Ṣafar, A.H. 636 (September, A.C. 1238)§§. The next morning, he was buried outside the gate called Bāb al-Naṣr, in the cemetery of the ṣūfīs. He used to say: "My father was known by the surname of al-Nājirī, but there is a quarter in Bukhārā where mats (ḥaṣīr) are made<sup>3</sup>, and in that we resided."<sup>4</sup>

1 This surname is explained lower down.

2 This college was founded by Nūr al-Dīn Maḥmūd, for the teaching of the Traditions.

3 The printed text and the manuscripts have الحمر; I read الحصير.

4 The conclusion to be drawn from this appears to be, that he was surnamed al-Ḥaṣīrī for that reason, and that the title of al-Nājirī was one which the family did not acknowledge.

* 2 September but the day according to Mahler's calculation was Sunday.—Ed.

† 3 March.—Ed.

‡ 26 January.—Ed.

§ The Cairo edition adds: None in the sect of Abū Ḥanīfah was equal to him in his time.—Ed.

|| 19 September.—Ed.

578 IBN DĀWŪD AL-ZĀHIRĪ

Abū Bakr Muḥammad Ibn Dāwūd Ibn 'Alī Ibn Khalaf al-Iṣbahānī (native of Iṣbahān), surnamed al-Zāhiri<sup>1</sup>, was jurisconsult, an accomplished scholar, a poet, and a man of wit. He used to hold discussions with Abu 'l-'Abbās Ibn Surayj, as we have already stated (No. 20). On the death of his father (No. 210), he went to take charge of his class, holding, as he did, the same opinions; but the assembly thought him too young, and suborned a person to come forward and ask him the definition of drunkenness, and in what state a man should be, so as to be considered drunk. The reply which Abū Bakr made, was; "When his cares are dispelled, and he reveals the secret which he had kept hidden." They all approved of his answer, and acknowledged the high rank he had attained in learning. In his early youth, he composed a work entitled al-Zuhrah (the planet Venus), and containing a great quantity of curious anecdotes and novel information on literary subjects, with some charming pieces of verse. He was one day holding a discussion on the subject of 'Ilā<sup>2</sup>, with Abu 'l-'Abbās Ibn Surayj, in the presence of the wazīr Ibn al-Jarrāḥ (No. 10, note), and his adversary said to him, "when you first pronounced this verse of yours: He that looks often (at a female) shall sigh often, you displayed more intelligence than you do when you discourse about 'Ilā." To this Abū Bakr replied: "If I pronounced that verse. I can also pronounce these:

'I permit my eye to roam through the garden of beauty, but I hinder my soul from committing ought unlawful; and I take upon myself such a burden of love, as would break by its weight the solid rock itself. My eye interprets the sentiments of my heart, and, did I not adroitly recall my glances, they would speak aloud. I have seen all are subject to love, but I see no lover woundless and unscathed.'

On hearing these lines, Ibn Jurayj said: "In what point do you think to outdo me? If I pleased, I also could say:

1 See No. 510, note on Al-Zāhiri.

2 In Muslim jurisprudence the term 'ila is employed to designate the oath made by a husband not to have intercourse with his wife. The fulfilment of this oath during four months effects a divorce. See d'Ohsson's Tab-Gen, de l'Emp. Othom, tom V, p. 216.

'(The fair slave)<sup>1</sup> was still awake ; her eyes shot wanton glances, and I passed the night in repelling from her the approach of balmy sleep ; so highly did I prize her sweet discourse and her reproaches ; whilst I turned frequent glances towards her cheeks. So passed the night ; and when the rays of morn appeared, she retired, bearing off the seal of her master and the written deed by which he set her free.' "

Here Abū Bakr exclaimed : "Let the wazīr bear these words in mind, so that the slave may produce (if necessary) two creditable witnesses to the effect of her receiving the seal of her master !" To this Ibn Surayj replied : "In that case I shall incur the same penalty as you have done when you said : I permit my eyes to rove through the gardens of beauty, but I hinder my soul from committing aught unlawful." Here the wazīr laughed and said : "You both possess wit and finesse, and intelligence and learning." In a collection of various pieces, I found the following verses attributed to Ibn Dāwūd :

'Every man has a guest to rejoice him by his presence, but I have no other guests than sorrows and care. (She whom I love) has eyes which shoot arrows into our hearts, and wound deeper than the redoubled stroke of the sword. My beloved asked me how I supported her absence ? and I replied : 'Was it possible to support it at all, that you now ask me how I did support it?' "

Abū Bakr 'Abd Allāh Ibn Ābī 'l-Dunyā<sup>2</sup> relates as follows : "I was present at one of Ibn Dāwūd's assemblies, when a man went up to him and handed him a paper. Ibn Dāwūd took it and reflected over it for a long time, whilst his pupils imagined that it was a question on a point of law to which an answer was requested. He then wrote some words on the back of the paper, and returned it to the man whom we recognised to be the celebrated poet Ibn al-Rūmī (No. 438). The paper contained these words :

"O son of Dāwūd ! O doctor of 'Irāq ! give us your opinion on the eyes whose glances slay us. Can they be punished for the 1 I must observe that in this piece I have substituted the feminine pronouns for the masculine.

2 See No. 228, note Abu 'l-Dunyā.

wounds which they inflict, or may they shed with impunity the heart's blood of lovers ? ”

Here was the answer :

“How can he give you an opinion who has been slain and prostrated by the darts of separation and desire ? The son of Dāwūd opineth that death produced by meeting the beloved is less painful than death caused by separating from her. ”

Ibn Dāwūd was deeply learned in jurisprudence. He left a great number of works, such as the Kitāb al-Waṣūl ilā Ma'rifat il-Uṣūl (the mode of acquiring a knowledge of the fundamentals of jurisprudence) ; the Kitāb al-Indhār (book of admonition) ; the Kitāb al-I'dhār (book of excuses) ; the Kitāb al-Intiṣār etc. [defence of the truth] against Muḥammad Ibn Jarīr and 'Abd Allāh Ibn Shirshīr and 'Isā Ibn Ibrāhīm al-Ḍarīr<sup>1</sup> etc. He died on Monday, the 9th of Ramaḍān, A.H. 297 (May, A.C. 910)*; at the age of forty-two years ; some say erroneously however, that his death took place in the year 296. The qāḍī Yūsuf Ibn Ya'qūb died on the same day. It is related that, when Ibn Surayj received intelligence of the death of Ibn Dāwūd, he threw away the leaves of the volume which he was then writing out, and said : “The man is dead who gave me the most powerful motives to study, for I desired to hold discussions with him and maintain them with ability. ”

579 ABŪ BAKR AL-ṬURṬŪSHĪ

Abū Bakr Muḥammad Ibn al-Walid Ibn Muḥammad Ibn Khalaf Ibn Sulaymān Ibn Ayyūb al-Qurashī al-Fihri (descended from Fihri, the progenitor of the Quraysh family) al-Andalusī al-Ṭurṭūshī (native of Tortosa in Spain, and generally known by the surname of Ibn Abī Randaqah, was a doctor of the Mālikite sect, noted for self-mortification. He studied under Abu 'l-Walid al-Bājī (No. 257), at Saragossa, and learned from him the solution of 1 For Muḥammad Ibn Jarīr, (No. 544), for Ibn Shirshīr (No. 320).

* 21 May.-- Ed.

the objections (made to the doctrines of Mālik) he heard him also teach Traditions, and obtained from him a certificate authorising him to teach in his turn. He studied also, in his native place, the science of arithmetic and the art of calculating inheritance shares. In Seville he cultivated the belles letters under Abū Muḥammad Ibn Ḥazm (No. 423). Having set out for the East in the year 476 (A.C. 1083-4), he made the pilgrimage and visited Baghdād and Baṣrah. He studied jurisprudence under Muḥammad Ibn Aḥmad al-Shāshī, surnamed al-Mustaẓhiri (No. 563), the Shāfi'ite doctor, and under Abu 'l ('Abbās) Aḥmad al-Jurjānī (No. 117, note)<sup>1</sup>. He resided for some time in Syria, and gave lessons in that country. His character was that of a learned imām and devout ascetic, pious, humble, practising self-mortification, leading a life of poverty and content with little. He used to say : "When two advantages are offered to you, one of them worldly and the other spiritual ; seize on the latter, and you will obtain them both." He often recited the following lines :

"God possesses intelligent servants who have renounced the world through fear of temptation. When they considered it and discovered that it was not a fit abode for the living, they took it for an ocean and made of their good works a ship."

Having gone to see al-Afdal Shāhanshāh (No. 266), he spread on the floor a cloak which he had brought with him, and having sat down, he addressed an exhortation to that amīr which drew tears from his eyes. He then said :

"O thou whom it is a pious act to obey, and whose rights all are bound to acknowledge ! (Muḥammad), he for whose sake thou hast been exalted, is considered by that man as a liar."

He here pointed to a Christian who was seated at al-Afdal's side, and the amīr immediately ordered the man away. Al-Afdal had confined al-Ṭurṭūshī in the mosque of Shāqīq al-Mulk, near the observatory<sup>1</sup>, and, as this doctor grew fatigued of staying there, he at length said to his servant : "How long must we suffer with patience ? go and collect for me some of the (food) left out for the use (of the poor).” The servant gathered him food, and he ate thereof for three days ; then, towards the hour of evening prayer, he said to his attendant : "I have hit him now !" and, the very next morning, al-Afdal was assassinated whilst riding out. On the death of this amir, the government of the country devolved to al-Māmūn al-Baṭā'ihī (No. 489, note), and this wazir treated our shaykh with the utmost respect. It was for him that al-Ṭurṭūshī composed his work called Sirāj al-Hudā (flambeau of guidance), a very good treatise of its kind. He is also the author of the Sirāj al-Mulūk (flambeau for princes), a Ṭarīqah, or system of controversy, and other treatises. I met with some poetry attributed to him, the following piece, for instance, which has been also inserted by the hāfiẓ Zakī al-Dīn 'Abd al-'Azīm al-Mundhirī (No. 43, note) in his biographical notice of al-Ṭurṭūshī :

<sup>1</sup> All the MSS. have omitted the word العباس. I adopt it on the authority of al-Yāfi'i, who has copied the entire passage, in the notice given by him on al-Ṭurṭūshī in the Mir'at. See MSS. No. 644, year 520.

"When you wish to advance an affair for the success of which you are anxious, let your messenger be blind, deceitful, deaf and dumb—spare every other messenger, and employ that one which is called money."

In the life of philologist Abu 'l-Ḥusayn Ahmad Ibn Fāris (No. 48), will be found two verses containing nearly the same expressions. "I was one night sleeping in the Holy Temple (at Jerusalem)," says al-Ṭurṭūshī, "when, towards the hour of midnight, I heard a melancholy voice recite these lines :

"Can fear (of God) and sleep exist together ? how strange ! beshrew thee for a heart ; thou art a liar ! I swear by the might of God that, if thou wast true, no portion of thee would ever yield to slumber."

"These words awoke all the sleepers, and brought tears into every eye." Al-Ṭurṭūshī was born in or about the year 451 (A.C. 1059-60), and he died on the last third of the night preceding Saturday, the 26th of the first Jumādā, A.H. 520 (June. A.C. 1126). Ibn Baṣṭakwāl (No. 206) says, in his Ṣilat,

1 For al-Maqrīzī's description of the observatory of Cairo. see Notices et Extraits, t. VII, p. 20.

that he died in the month of Sha'bān of that year, at Alexandria ; the funeral prayer was said over him by his son Muḥammad, and he was interred in the Wa'lah cemetery, near the New Tower (al-Burj al-Qadīd), and to the south of the Green Gate (al-Bāb al-Akḥḍar). Ṭurṭūshī means belonging to Ṭurṭūshah (Tortosa), a maritime city situated at the eastern extremity of the territory possessed by the Muslims in Spain. Randaqah is a Frankish word ; I asked a Frank the meaning of it, and he answered radd ta'āl<sup>1</sup>. We have already spoken of the Wa'lah cemetery in the life of hāfiẓ al-Salafī (No. 43).

580 ABU 'L-HUDHAYL AL-'ALLĀF

Abu 'l-Hudhayl Muḥammad Ibn Hudhayl Ibn 'Abd Allāh Ibn Mak'hūl al-'Abdī, generally known by the surname of al-'Allāf al-Mutakallim (the forage-man, the scholastic theologian), and a mawlā to the family of 'Abd Qays, was the chief doctor of the Baṣrah Mu'tazilites, one of their most learned men, and the author of discourses, conferences and controversies on subjects connected with the Mu'tazilites, tenets. He was an able disputant, employing the strongest proofs and an abundance of demonstrations and decisive arguments. It is related that having met Ṣāliḥ Ibn 'Abd al-Quddūs in great grief for the loss of his son, he said to him : "I know not why you should grieve for him, since, according to you, man is like the corn growing in the field." To this Ṣāliḥ replied : "Abu 'l-Hudhayl ! I grieve for his loss, for the sole reason that he had not yet read the Kitāb al-Shukūk (book of doubts)." "And what book is that, Ṣāliḥ ?" "It is a work composed by me, and whoever reads it is led to doubt of every thing that exists, so as to imagine that it exists not : and to doubt of every thing that <sup>1</sup> The words Radd ta'āl mean render, come hither, and may be held as equivalent to the Spanish words renda-se aca, which Ibn Khallikān and his Frank seem to have considered as the original whence Runaqah, or Rendaque according to the Moorish pronunciation, was formed.

does not exist, so as to imagine that it exists." "Well," said Abu 'l-Hudhayl, doubt of your son's death, and do as if he was not dead, although he is so ; and doubt also about his reading of the Kitāb al-Shukūk, so that you may imagine he has read it, although he never did." One of Abu 'l-Hudhayl's works bears the title of Milās : Milās was Magian who had embraced the Muslim faith after getting up a conference between Abu 'l-Hudhayl and some Dualists<sup>1</sup>, in which the latter were reduced to silence by their adversary. A number of schoolmen were assembled in the presence of Yaḥyā Ibn Khālīd the Barmakide, and he asked them to describe the true nature of love : each of them said something on the subject, and Abu, Hudhayl, who was one of the company, spoke as follows : "O wazīr ! love seals up the eyes and the heart ; its pasture-ground is the body, and its watering-place the liver<sup>2</sup> ; he who is possessed by it revolves in his mind a crowd of fantastic thoughts ; the enjoyment of his wishes is never free from alloy, and the accomplishment of his desires is never pure from trouble ; contrarieties hasten to afflict him, whilst he himself drains the beverage of death, and quenches his thirst at the ponds of sorrow for the loss of the beloved ; unless, indeed, that love come from an ardour of character and a vivacity of disposition which render the lover like a mettlesome steed, heedless of the voice of control and not to be reclaimed<sup>3</sup> by the check of reprimand." Thirteen schoolmen were present at this sitting, and Abu 'l-Hudhayl was the third who spoke. To avoid lengthening this article, I suppress what the others said. I read in a collection of anecdotes, that an Arab woman, a native of the desert, described love in these terms : "It tries to be concealed from sight, and yet it is too great to be kept secret ; it lies hidden (in the bosom) as fire in the flint ; if you strike it, it is given out, and if you let it alone, it remains unseen : if it be not a mode of madness, it is at least an essence extracted from magic." Abu 'l-Hudhayl was born A.H. 131 (A.C. 748-9)

1 The Magians were called Dualists, because they believed in the existence of two independent first causes, one producing good and the other evil.

2 See No. 52, note on My heart.

3 I read ولا يصحح. The whole passage is more or less corrupted in each of the manuscripts.

or, by other accounts, either in 134 or the following year ; he died in the year 235 (A.C. 849-50) at Sarra man ra'ā. Al-Khaṭīb al-Baghdādī (No. 33) places his death in the year 226, and al-Mas'ūdī states, in his Murūj al-Dhahab (or meadows of gold), that he died in the year 227. Before his death, he lost the use of his sight, and his intellect grew disordered. He did not, however, forget any of the fundamental principles of doctrine, but the weakness of his head put it out of his power to maintain a discussion or confute an adversary.

581 ABŪ 'ALĪ-AL-JUBBĀ'Ī

Abū 'Alī Muḥammad Ibn 'Abd al-Wahhāb Ibn Salām Ibn Khālīd Ibn Humrān Ibn Abbān, generally known by the appellation of al-Jubbā'ī, was one of the doctors of the Mu'tazilite sect, and an able master in the science of dogmatic theology. His ancestor Abbān was mawlā to (the khalīf) 'Uthmān Ibn 'Affān. Al-Jubbā'ī acquired his knowledge of theology from Abū Yūsuf Ya'qūb Ibn 'Abd Allāh al-Shaḥḥām al-Baṣrī, who was at that time the head of the Mu'tazilite sect at Baṣrah. He left a number of celebrated discourses on the doctrines of the Mu'tazilites. It was from him that the Shaykh al-Sunnah (the sunnite doctor) Abū 'l-Ḥasan al-Ash'arī (No. 404), learned dogmatic theology, and some of the learned have transmitted down to us the following account of a discussion which the pupil had with his master : he proposed to him the case of three brothers, one of whom was a true believer, virtuous and pious ; the second an infidel, a debauchee and a reprobate ; and the third an infant : they all died, and al-Ash'arī wished to know what had become of them. To this al-Jubbā'ī answered : "The virtuous brother holds a high station in paradise ; the infidel is in the depths of hell, and the child is among those who have obtained salvation." "Suppose now," said al-Ash'arī, "that the child should wish to ascend to the place occupied by his virtuous brother, would he be allowed to do ?"

“No,” replied al-Jubbā’ī; “it would be said to him: ‘Thy brother arrived at this place through his numerous works of obedience towards God, and thou hast no such works to set forward.’” “Suppose then,” said al-Ash‘arī, “that the child say: ‘That is not my fault; you did not let me live long enough, neither did you give me the means of proving my obedience.’” “In that case,” answered al-Jubbā’ī, “the Almighty would say: ‘I knew that if I allowed thee to live, thou wouldst have been disobedient, and incurred the severe punishment (of hell); I therefore acted for thy advantage.’” “Well,” said al-Ash‘arī, “and suppose the infidel brother were here to say: ‘O God of the universe! scince you knew what awaited him, you must have known what awaited me; why then did you act for his advantage and not for mine?’” Al-Jubbā’ī had not a word to offer in reply. This discussion proves that the Almighty elects some for mercy, and others for punishment; and that His acts are not the results of any motive whatsoever. I have since read, in Fakhr al-Dīn al-Rāzī’s (No. 574) commentary on the Qur’ān, in the sūrah entitled al-An‘ām (cattle), that, when al-Ash‘arī ceased attending the conferences held by al-Jubbā’ī and renounced his doctrines, he frequently contested his master’s opinions, and each conceived a profound aversion for the other. It afterwards happened, that, one day, when al-Jubbā’ī was holding a conference as an exercise for his disciples, a great number of persons were assembled to hear it, and al-Ash‘arī went there also and concealed himself in a place where al-Jubbā’ī could not see him. He then said to a woman who was near him: “I will give you a question to propose to this shaykh,” and prompted her to ask one question after another, till at length al-Jubbā’ī was reduced to silence; but he perceived that these questions could not have originated with the woman, and that they must have proceeded from al-Ash‘arī. I read in Ibn Hawqāl’s geographical work, entitled al-Masālik wa ‘i-Mamālik (routes and realms), in the chapter on Khūzistān, that Jubbā is the name of a city and an extensive district covered with date-trees, sugar-cane plantations, etc.; and that it produced Abū ‘Alī al-Jubbā’ī, the eminent shaykh, the chief of the Mu‘tazilites, and the first dogmatic theologian of the age. Al-Jubbā’ī was born A.H. 235 (A.C. 849-50), and he died in the month of Shahbān

A.H. 303 (Feb.-March, A.C. 916). We have already spoken of his son, Abū Hāshim 'Abd al-Salām, and of the meaning of the word Jubbā'i (No. 358).

582 THE QĀḌĪ ABŪ BAKR AL-BĀQILĀNĪ

The Qāḏī Abū Bakr Muḥammad Ibn al-Ṭayyib Ibn Muḥammad Ibn Ja'far Ibn al-Qāsim, surnamed al-Bāqilānī and a native of Baṣrah, was a celebrated dogmatic theologian. He professed the doctrines of the shaykh Abū 'l-Ḥasan al-Ash'arī (No. 404), and being a staunch partisan and supporter of his opinions, he obtained the presidency of the Ash'arite sect. He resided at Baghdād, and composed a great number of works on dogmatic theology and other subjects. In learning he stood without a rival, and obtained great renown by his talent as a successful investigator of truth, by the readiness of his replies, and the quantity of Traditions which he had collected. He was noted for his prolixity in discussion, and it happened one day that, whilst engaged in an argument with Abū Sā'id al-Hārūnī, during which he multiplied his illustrations and made a discourse of extreme diffuseness, he turned to the auditors and said: "I take you to witness that, if my adversary repeat what I have just uttered, without making any change in my words, I shall not require any further answer from him." On this al-Hārūnī exclaimed: "And I also take you to witness that if he himself repeat it, I shall admit the whole as true!" The qāḏī Abū Bakr al-Bāqilānī died at Baghdād on Saturday evening, the 21st of Dhu 'l-Qa'dah, A.H. 403. (June, A.C. 1013),* and was interred the next day. A contemporary poet composed the following elegy on his death:

"Behold a mountain (of learning) borne off on the shoulders of men! Behold what brilliant talents are now encasing in the tomb! Behold the sword of Islāmism, now sheathing in its scabbard! Behold the pearl of Islāmism, now restoring to its shell."

* The Cairo edition gives 23 Dhu 'l-Qa'dah which was Saturday, 6 June; otherwise the day does not jally, with the date.—Ed.

His corpse was interred in his house, in the street of the Magians (Ḍarb al-Majūs), and the funeral prayer was said over it by his son al-Ḥasan. It was afterwards removed to the cemetery at the Ḥarb Gate. Bāqilānī is derived from baqilā (beans), and designates the seller of such vegetable food. Some pronounce the latter word baqillā. This relative adjective is formed irregularly, the letter n being inserted (before the formative final letter). It is analogous in its form to the words Ṣan'ānī (native of Ṣan'ā) and Bahrānī (belonging to the tribe of Bahrā), which adjectives are employed as the relatives of Ṣan'ā and Bahrā. Al-Ḥarīrī condemns this form in his Durrat al-Ḡhawāṣṣ, and says that bāqilā, with a short final a, takes bāqill for its relative, and that baqillā, with the long final, takes Baqillāwī or Baqillā'ī. He adds that the relatives derived from Ṣan'ā and Bahrā should not be considered as examples proper to sanction a rule, inasmuch as they are exceptional cases. The first form of this relative has not, however, been condemned by al-Sam'ānī (No. 370). God best knows which is right.

583 ABU 'L-ḤUSAYN AL-BAṢRĪ

Abu 'l-Ḥusayn Muḥammad Ibn 'Alī al-Ṭayyib al-Baṣrī (native of Baṣrah) was a theologian (mutakallim) of the Mu'tazilite school and one of their most distinguished doctors. His language was pure, his style highly elegant, and his information copious. He ranked as the first imām of that age. A number of excellent works were composed by him on the fundamentals of jurisprudence, such as the Mu'tamid (the well-supported), a voluminous treatise, from which Fakhr al-Dīn al-Rāzī (No. 574) extracted the materials of his Kitāb al-Muḥṣūl; the Ṭaṣaffūḥ al-Adillah (examination of proofs), in two volumes; the Ḡhurar al-Adillah (brilliant demonstrations), in one large volume; a commentary on the (Uṣūl al-Khamsah)<sup>1</sup> a work on the imāmate, and others on dogmatic theology. His writings were studied by numbers with advantage and profit. He inhabited Baghdād, and died in that city on Tuesday, the 5th of the latter Rabī', A.H. 436 (October, A.C. 1044) *, and was interred in the Shūnīzī Cemetery. The qādī Abū 'Abd Allāh al-Ṣaymarī<sup>2</sup> said the funeral prayer over his corpse. "The word mutakallim (discourser, dogmatic theologian) is employed to designate persons conversant with the science of kalām (discourse), by which word is meant the dogmas of religion. It was called the science of discourse, because the first difference of opinion which arose in the (Muslim) religion sprung from this question: the Word of Almighty God (the Qur'ān) is it created or not? People discoursed on this branch of science, and it therefore received the name of the science of discourse 'ilm al-kalām'; being specially designated by this term, although all the other sciences are propagated also by means of discourse"<sup>3</sup>. Such are the words of al-Sam'ānī (No. 370.)

584 IBN FURAK

Al-Ustād (the master) Abū Bakr Muḥammad Ibn al-Ḥasan Ibn Fūrak, a noted dogmatic theologian, philologist, grammarian, and preacher, was a native of Iṣbahān. He remained for some time in 'Irāq, giving lessons, and then proceeded to Ray, but, as the innovators in religion spread calumnies against him, he removed to Naysābūr on the invitation of the people in that city. A college and a house were then built for him; and, by the aid

1 Hājji Khalīfah is not very satisfactory in his note on this work; he merely says. al-Uṣūl al-Khamsah, the five foundations on which Islāmism was erected composed by the Shaykh Abū Muḥammad al-Bāhili, who died in the year..... and also by Shaykh Ja'far Ibn Ḥarb. On the first of these was composed the commentary of Abū 'l-Ḥusayn Muḥammad Ibn 'Alī al-Baḥrī.

2 Al-Ṣaymarī was qādī of Karkh, the suburb of Baghdād. (See No. 279.)

3 The word mutakallim is employed also in a more restricted sense, and then means scholastic theologian. Ibn Khallikān does not appear to make any distinction between dogmatic and scholastic theology.

* 30 October --Ed.

of the Almighty, he revived numerous branches of science. The divine favour which attended his endeavours was there manifested in the progress of all those who studied jurisprudence under him. The number of his works on the fundamentals of jurisprudence, the dogmas of religion, and the style of the Qur'ān, approached to nearly a hundred. He was subsequently invited to Ghaznah, and he maintained frequent controversies in that city. One of his sayings was: "The burden of a family is the result of lawful passion; what then must be the result of unlawful passion?" He evinced great ardour in confuting the partisans of Abū 'Abd Allāh Ibn Karrām<sup>1</sup>. Having left that place with the intention of returning to Naysābūr, he died of poison on the road. His corpse was borne to Naysābūr and interred at al-Ḥīrah. The funeral chapel which covers his remains is a conspicuous object and much frequented by pilgrims: when the people are in want of rain, they offer up prayers at his tomb, and their request is always granted. He died A.H. 406 (A.C. 1015-16). Abu 'l-Qāsim al-Qushayrī, the author of the celebrated epistle* (No. 369), states that he heard Abū 'Alī al-Daqqāq<sup>2</sup> relate as follows: "I went to visit Abū Bakr Ibn Fūrak when he was ill, and he shed tears on seeing me. On this, I said to him: 'The Almighty will cure you and restore you to health; and he replied: 'you think that I stand in fear of death, but know that my fear proceeds from the thought of what cometh after death.'"
Al-Ḥīrah is the name of an extensive quarter in the city of Naysābūr; it has produced some learned men, who bore surname of al-Ḥīrī. This place is liable to be confounded with the Ḥīrah which lies outside of Kūfah. Ghaznah is a large city and lies just within the confines of India, where that country borders on Khurāsān.

585 ABU 'L-FATH AL-SHAHRASTĀNĪ

Abu 'l-Fath Muḥammad Ibn Abi 'l-Qāsim 'Abd al-Karīm Ibn Abi Bakr Aḥmad al-Shahraṣṭānī, a dogmatic theologian of the 1 Ibn Karrām taught anthropomorphism.

2 Some account of Abū 'Alī al-Daqqāq is given in the life of Abu 'l-Qāsim al-Qushayrī.

* Risālah.—Ed.

Ash'arite sect, was also distinguished as an imām and a doctor of the law. Having studied jurisprudence under Aḥmad al-Khawāfi (No. 36), Abū Naṣr al-Qushayrī (No. 369), and other masters, he displayed the highest abilities as a jurisconsult. In scholastic theology he had for master Abu 'l-Qāsim al-Anṣārī, and he remained without an equal in that branch of science. His works are : the Nihāyat al-Iqdām (the limits of progress), on scholastic theology ; the Kitāb al-Milal wa 'l-Niḥal (treatise on religions and sects), and the Talkhīṣ al-Aqsām li-Madhāhib al-Anām (succinct exposition of the (work called) al-Aqsām (sections), for the use of persons of all denominations). He knew by heart a great quantity of traditional information, his conversation was most agreeable, and he used to address pious exhortations to his auditors. In the year 510 (A.C. 1116-7), he proceeded to Baghdād, and resided there three years, during which period a high degree of favour was manifested towards him by the public. He received Traditions, at Naysābūr, from 'Alī Ibn Aḥmad al-Madīnī, and other teachers ; and, of the Traditions which he himself delivered, some were taken down in writing by the ḥāfiẓ Abū Sa'd 'Abd al-Karīm al-Sam'ānī (No. 370). This writer speaks of him in his Dhayl, or supplement. "Al-Shahrestānī was born at Shahrestān, A.H. 467 (A.C. 1074-5)"; so I find it written in my rough notes, but I do not know whence I took it : al-Sam'ānī says, in his Dhayl, that he asked al-Shahrestānī concerning the year of his birth, and he replied : "In 479 (A.C. 1086-7)." He died at Shahrestān, towards the end of the month of Sha'bān, A.H. 548 (November, A.C. 1153) : some place his death, but erroneously, in 549. Towards the commencement of the Nihāyat al-Iqdām, he has inserted the following lines :

"I have roamed through all these monuments, and surveyed the various memorials (left by man) ; and I saw nought but wretches tearing their beards in despair, or gnashing their teeth with remorse."

He omits naming the author of these verses, but I have found them attributed to Abū Bakr Muḥammad Ibn Bājā, surnamed Ibn al-S'ā'igh, a native of Spain, whose life will be found in this work. Shahrestān is a name borne by three cities ; the first in Khurāsān, and situated between Naysābūr and Khwarazm. on the edge of sandy desert which forms the frontier of Khurāsān, and extends to Khwārazm : this is the one generally known, and the same which produced Abu 'l-Faṭḥ Muḥammad (the subject of this notice) and many other learned men. It was built by 'Abd Allāh Ibn Ṭāhir (No. 318), the amīr of Khurāsān, in the khalīfate of al-Māmūn. The second Shahraštān is the capital of the district of Sāpūr, in the province of Fārs ; so, at least, it is stated by Ibn al-Bannā al-Baṣṣhārī<sup>1</sup>. The third, called also Jay, lies on the bank of the river Zindarūd, at a mile's distance from al-Yahūdiyyah (the Jewish quarter), now the modern city of Iṣbahān ; a market is held there, and it contains the tomb of the imām (khalif) al-Raṣḥīd, the son of al-Mustarṣhid. The name itself is a compound Persian word ; shahr signifying city, and istan, country ; it is therefore equivalent to the city of the country. Such are the observations made by Yāqūt al-Ḥamawī, in his Muṣhtarik, to which we have added some remarks of our own. Al-Shahraštānī used to repeat the following saying, uttered by al-Nazzām al-Balkhī Ibrāhim Ibn Sayyār (No. 84, note), and authenticated by a chain of evidence through which he traced it up to that learned and celebrated scholar : "If discord could assume a visible form, the hearts of men would be appalled at its aspect and the very mountains would tremble : its burning heat would be less supportable than that given out by live coals of ghaḍā wood<sup>2</sup> ; and if the people of hell were tormented with it, they would seek shelter in their former punishments, as in a place of repose." He gave also as authentic the following passages, attributing them both to Ibn Durayd :

"I bade him farewell, but my soul withheld its adieus and departed with him. We separated, and my heart shrunk within me, but my tears gushed out.

O you who bear away a heart love-broken and wretched ! love is a torture, but the torture which I endure surpasses all".

1 Perhaps this name must be pronounced al-Buṣḥārī, in which case the person who bore it was a native of Alpuxaras, near Granada.

2. See No. 498, note on 'ghaḍā'

The preceding anecdotes are given by Abū Sa'd al Sam'ānī, in his supplement to the history of Baghdād. Towards the end of the article, he says: "I was at Bukhārā when I heard of his death."

586 MUḤAMMAD IBN IṢḤĀQ

Abū Bakr, or, according to others, Abū 'Abd Allāh, Muḥammad Ibn Iṣḥāq Ibn Yasār Ibn Jabbār (alias Sayyār) Ibn Kūnān, the author of the work called al-Maghāzī wa 'l-Siyar (the conquests and expeditions of the Muslims), was a native of Madinah and a mawlā (client) to the family of al-Muṭṭalib; his grandfather, Yasār, having been made prisoner by Khālīd Ibn al-Walid at 'Ayn al-Tamr, and delivered as a mawlā (slave) to Qays, the son of Makhrumah, the son of Muṭṭalib, the son of 'Abd Manāf, member of the tribe of Quraysh. Muḥammad Ibn Iṣḥāq is held by the majority of the learned as a sure authority in the Traditions, and no one can be ignorant of the high character borne by his work, the Maghāzī. "Whoever wishes to know the (history of the Muslim) conquests," says Ibn Shihāb al-Zuhri (No. 537), "let him take Ibn Iṣḥāq (for guide)" and al-Bukhārī himself cites him in his history. It is also related that al-Shāfi'i said: "Whoever wishes to obtain a complete acquaintance with the (Muslim) conquests, must borrow his information from Ibn Iṣḥāq." Sufyān Ibn 'Uyaynah (No. 249) declared that he never met any one who cast suspicions on Ibn Iṣḥāq's recitals, and Shu'bah Ibn al-Ḥajjāj (No. 207, note) was heard to say: "Muḥammad Ibn Iṣḥāq is the Commander of the Faithful", meaning that he held that rank as a traditionist. It is related, that, as al-Zuhri went to a village of which he was the proprietor, a number of the seekers of Traditions<sup>1</sup> were following him, on which he said: "Why do you keep away from the squinting boy?" or (by another account): "I left the squinting boy with you"; meaning Ibn Iṣḥāq. Al-Sājī<sup>2</sup> mentions that al-Zuhri's pupils had

1 The seekers of traditions (Ṭalabāt al-Ḥadīth): see Introduction to vol. I.

2 The ḥafīẓ Abū Zakariyā Yaḥyā al-Sājī, a native of Baṣrah, and one of al-Muzani's disciples, died in that city. A.H. 307 (A.C. 919-20). He is the author of some works. (Ṭabaqāt al-Fuqahā).

recourse to Muḥammad Ibn Ishāq, whenever they had doubts respecting the exactness of any of the Traditions delivered by their master; such was the confidence which they placed in his excellent memory. It is stated that Yaḥyā Ibn Ma'in<sup>1</sup>, Aḥmad Ibn Ḥanbal (No. 19), and Yaḥyā Ibn Sa'id al-Qaṭṭān<sup>2</sup> considered Muḥammad Ibn Ishāq as a trustworthy authority, and quoted his Traditions in proof of their legal doctrines. Though al-Bukhārī (No. 543) did not quote from him (in his Ṣaḥīḥ), he nevertheless held him for a trustworthy traditionist; and if Muslim Ibn al-Ḥajjāj cited only one of his Traditions, and that one relative to the stoning of adulterers, it was on account of the attack which Mālik Ibn Anas had directed against him: Mālik had been told that he said; "Bring here Mālik's Traditions; I am the doctor to cure their infirmities"; and this induced him to exclaim: "And what is Ibn Ishāq? He is one of the Dajjāls (antichrists), but we shall drive him out of the city!" alluding, perhaps, by these words, to (the declaration of Muḥammad) that the Dajjāl shall not enter al-Madīnah (the city). Muḥammad Ibn Ishāq went to (the khalīf) Abū Ja'far al-Manṣūr at Hīrah, and put the Maḡhāzī in writing for his use; from this it resulted that the learned men of Kūfah had the advantage of hearing him read and explain that work. He gave (one or some) of his Traditions on the authority of Fāṭimah, the daughter of al-Mundhir Ibn al-Zubayr, and the wife of Hishām Ibn 'Urawh Ibn al-Zubayr; Hishām was informed of the circumstance and denied Ibn Ishāq's statement, saying: "Did he then go and visit my wife?" The khaṭīb Abū Bakr Aḥmad (No. 33) relates, in his History of Baghdād, that Muḥammad Ibn Ishāq saw Anas Ibn Mālik (No. 539, note) with a black turban on his head, and all the little boys running

1 His life will be found in this work.

2 Abū Sa'id Yaḥyā Ibn Sa'id al-Qaṭṭān, an imām and ḥāfiẓ of great reputation for veracity and piety, was a native of Baṣrah. Aḥmad Ibn Ḥanbal declared that he never saw his like, and Ibn Bindār mentions that he frequented his society for twenty years, and thought him incapable of having ever offended God by an act of disobedience. "During twenty years" says Ibn Ma'in, "Yaḥyā read the Qur'ān through once every night, and for forty years he never missed the evening prayer at the mosque." he gave Traditions on the authority of Ja'far al-Ṣādiq, Mālik, and Ḥumayd al-Ṭawīl; Ibn al-Madīnī and others delivered Traditions on his authority. He died in the month of Ṣafar A.H. 198 (Oct. A.C. 813). (al-Yāfi's Mir'at; al-Dhahabī's Tab. al-Ḥuffāz).

after him and exclaiming: "There is one of the blessed Prophet's companions, who is not to die till he meets the Dajjāl<sup>1</sup>." Muḥammad Ibn Ishāq died at Baghdād, A.H. 151 (A.C. 768); other accounts place his death in 150 or 152, and Khalifah Ibn Khayyāṭ (No. 207) says that his death took place in 153, according to one statement, or in 154, according to another. The date first given comes probably nearest the truth. He was buried in the cemetery at the Khayzurān Gate, on the east bank of the Tigris. This cemetery, the most ancient of those on that side of the river, is called also after al-Khayzurān, the mother of Hārūn al-Rashīd and al-Hādī, because she was buried there. It was from Ibn Ishāq's works that 'Abd al-Malik Ibn Hishām (No. 355) extracted the materials of his Sīrat al-Rasūl (history of the Prophet), and every person who treated this subject has been obliged to take Ibn Ishāq for authority and guide. We have spoken of 'Ayn al-Tamir in the life of Abu 'l-'Atāhiyah (No. 97).

587 AL-TIRMIDHĪ THE TRADITIONIST

Abū 'Isā Muḥammad Ibn 'Isa Ibn Sūrah Ibn Mūsā Ibn al-Ḍaḥ ḥāk al-Salamī<sup>2</sup> al-Ḍarīr al-Būghī al-Tirmidhī (the blind native of Būgh, belonging to Tirmidh) a celebrated ḥāfiẓ, was one of those great masters in the science of the Traditions whose authority was generally followed. His work entitled al-Jāmi 'wa'l-Ilal (collection of the Traditions, and motives of the Prophet's sayings) is the production of a well-informed man, and its exactness is proverbial. He had been pupil to Abū 'Abd Allāh Muḥammad al-Bukhārī (No. 543), and he received Traditions from some of those shaykhs to whom al-Bukhārī was indebted for his own; such were Qutaybah Ibn Sa'īd<sup>3</sup>

1 See Sale's Introduction to the Koran. Section IV.

2 The patronymic سلمی if pronounced Salmī, means descended from a person called Salm; if pronounced Salamī, it signifies belonging to the tribe of Salamah, or native of Salamiyah, and if pronounced Sulamī, it means belonging to the tribe of Sulaym. I have not discovered which is the proper pronunciation in the present case.

3 The imām and traditionist Abu 'l-Rajā Qutaybah, Ibn Sa'īd Ibn Ḥamīd, a mawlā to the tribe of Thaqīf, was a native of Ḡhaylān, a village near Balkh. He travelled to various countries for the purpose of learning Traditions, and he taught some of his own on the authority of Mālik Ibn Anas. Ahmad Ibn

(Continued on page 255)

'Alī Ibn Ḥujr<sup>1</sup>, Ibn Bashshār, and others. He died at Tirmidh, on the eve of Monday, the 13th of Rajab, A.H. 279 (October, A.C. 892).* Al-Sam'ānī (No. 390) says that he died at the village of Būgh in 275; and he repeats this in his Ansāb, under the article Būghī. Būgh is a village in the district of Tirmidh, and at six parasangs from that city. Of Tirmidh and the different manners of pronouncing the name we have already spoken (No. 546).

588 IBN MĀJAH

Abū 'Abd Allāh Muḥammad Ibn Yazīd Ibn Mājah al-Qazwīnī, a mawlā to the tribe of Rabi'ah (al-Rab'i) and a celebrated hāfiẓ, is the author of the work on the Traditions entitled Kitāb al-Sunan (book of the sunnah). He ranked as a high authority in the Traditions, and was versed in all the sciences connected with them, and acquainted with every thing respecting them. He travelled to 'Irāq, Baṣrah, Kūfah, Baghdād, Makkah, Syria, Egypt, and Ray, for the purpose of writing down the Traditions under the dictation of the masters who taught them in those countries. He is the author of a commentary on the Qur'ān and a very fine historical work<sup>2</sup>; as for his book on the Traditions, it is counted as one of the six Ṣaḥīḥs (authentic collections). His birth took place in the year 209 (A.C. 824-5), and he died on Monday, the 22nd of Ramaḍān, A.H. 273 (February, A.C. 887).† On the following day he was interred, and his brother Abū Bakr said the funeral prayer over the corpse, and deposited it in the tomb with the assistance of 'Abd Allāh, the third brother. Rabi'i means belonging to Rabi'ah: a number of tribes bear this name,

(Continued from page 254)

Ḥanbal gave Traditions on his authority. Born A.H. 150 (A.C. 767-8); died A.H. 241 (A.C. 855-6). (Nujūm).

1 The imām Abu 'l-Ḥasan 'Alī Ibn Ḥujr Ibn Ayyās Ibn Muqātil al-Sa'dī, a learned jurisconsult and Muftī, a hāfi, of great reputation and a poet, was born A.H. 154 (A.C. 771). He ranked as one of the first doctors in Khurāsān. The Traditions which he had collected in various countries were taught by him at Marw, his native place. He died A.H. 244 (A.C. 858-9). (Nujūm.)

2 According to Hājji Kḥalīfah, this work is a history of Qazwin.

* 9 October.—Ed.

† 20 February.—Ed.

and I do not know which of them it was that counted Ibn Mājah among its members. Qazwīnī means belonging to Qazwīn a celebrated city in Persian 'Irāq, which has produced many learned men.

589 AL-ḤĀKIM IBN AL-BAYYI' AL-NAYSĀBŪRĪ

Abū 'Abd Allāh Muḥammad Ibn 'Abd Allāh Ibn Muḥammad Ibn Ḥamdūyah Ibn Nu'aym Ibn al-Ḥakam al-Ḍabbī al-Ṭahmānī<sup>1</sup> surnamed al-Ḥakim al-Naysābūrī (the magistrate of Naysābūr), and known also by the appellation of the ḥāfiẓ Ibn al-Bayyi' was the most eminent traditionist of his time, and the author of some celebrated works of quite an original cast. This highly learned and accomplished individual studied jurisprudence under Abū Sahl Muḥammad Ibn Sulaymān al-Su'lūkī (No. 552), the Shāfi'ie doctor; he then proceeded to 'Irāq and read (legal treatises) under the tuition of the jurisconsult Abū 'Alī Ibn Abī Hurayrah (No. 151), after which he travelled to various countries for the purpose of collecting Traditions, and devoted himself to that object with such perseverance, that he established his reputation on that basis. The number of persons from whose lips he learned them was immense; the alphabetical list of his masters consisting of nearly two thousand names; he even cited as his authorities for part of the information which he conveyed, some persons who survived him; so great was the quantity of Traditions which he had acquired and the number of teachers from whom he received them. He composed upwards of one thousand five hundred juz<sup>2</sup> on the sciences connected with the 1 Al-Ṭahmānī signifies descended from Ṭahmān, one of the Ḥakim's ancestors must have borne this name. Al-Ḍabbī signifies descended from the tribe of Ḍabbah, or from a person named Ḍabbah, or native of Ḍabbah, a town in Hijāz. It may be added that three of the Arabian tribes bore the name of Ḍabbah.

2 The word juz signifies volume, and section of a work. It probably means quire in this place.

Traditions, such as the Two Ṣaḥīḥs (al-Ṣaḥīḥān)<sup>1</sup>; the ʿIlal (the motives of Prophet's sayings); the Amālī<sup>2</sup>; the Fawā'id al-Shuyūkh (instructive observations made by his masters); the Amālī 'l-'Ashiyāt (evening dictations); and the Tarājim al-Shuyūkh (biographical notices of his masters). The works for which the public were indebted to his own special researches are: the Ma'rifat-al-Ḥadīth (knowledge of the Traditions); the Tārīkh 'Ulamā Naysābūr (history of the doctors of Naysābūr); the Mudkhil ilā 'Ilm il-Ṣaḥīh (introduction to the knowledge of the Ṣaḥīh); the Mustadrak 'ala 'l-Ṣaḥīḥayn (strictures on the two Ṣaḥīḥs); a treatise on the distinguishing characteristics of the two imāms (al-Bukhārī and Muslim), and another on the merits of the imām al-Shāfi'ī. He travelled twice to Ḥijāz and 'Irāq, and, in his second journey, which he made in the year 360, he held discussions with the traditionists (ḥuffāz), conferred with the shaykhs and wrote down under their dictation. He had also an argument with the ḥāfiẓ al-Dāraquṭnī and convinced him. In the year 359 (A.C. 969-70), he held the qāḍī-ship of Naysābūr under the Sāmānid government during the wazīr-ship of Abu 'l-Naṣr Muḥammad Ibn 'Abd al-Jabbār al-'Utbi, subsequently to which he was offered the qāḍī-ship of Jurjān, but refused it. This dynasty occasionally sent him on political missions to the court of the Buwayh (Buide) princes. He was born at Naysābūr in the month of the first Rabī', A.H. 321 (March, A.C. 933) and he died in that city on Tuesday, the 3rd of Ṣafar, A.H. 405 (August, A.C. 1014)*. (Abū Ya'lā) al-Khalilī (No. 33) says, in his Irshād, that the Ḥākim died A.H. 403, that he began to learn the Traditions in 330, and that he made dictations in Transoxiana in 355, and in 'Irāq in 357; he adds, that al-Dāraquṭnī attended his lessons with assiduity, and that Abū Bakr al-Qaṣṣāl al-Shāshī, with other doctors of the same period, obtained some of their information from him. He received the appellation of al-Ḥākim (the magistrate), because he had filled the place of qāḍī.

1 Ḥājji Khalifah does not notice this work under the title given here: it may perhaps be a combination of the matter contained in the Ṣaḥīḥs of al-Bukhārī and Muslim.

2 See No. 370. Note.

* 3 August — Ed.

590 ABŪ 'ABD ALLĀH AL-ḤUMAYDĪ

The celebrated ḥāfiẓ Abū 'Abd Allāh Muḥammed Ibn Abī Naṣr Fatūḥ Ibn 'Abd Allāh Ibn Ḥumayd Ibn Yaṣil al-Ḥumaydī, was a member of the tribe of Azd and a native of the Spanish island of Majorca, but his family originally belonged to al-Ruṣāfah, a suburb of Cordova. He delivered traditional information on the authority of 'Alī Ibn Ḥazm al-Zāhiri (No. 423) to whom he had been particularly attached, and from whose lips he had learned so much, that he became generally known by the appellation of Ibn Ḥazm's disciple. One of the other masters whose authority he cited was Abū 'Umar Yūsuf Ibn 'Abd al-Barr, the author of the Kitāb al-Istī'āb<sup>1</sup>. In the year 448 (A.C. 1056-7) he set out for the East and made the pilgrimage to Makkah. Having heard Traditions taught in that city and in Ifriqiyah, Spain, Egypt, Syria, and 'Irāq, he finally took up his residence in Baghdād. He bore a high reputation for nobleness of character, learning, solid information, piety, and devotion; the progress which he made in studying the written texts of the Traditions was evidently a mark of divine grace. The amīr Ibn Mākūlā (No. 414), the author of the Ikmāl, speaks of him in these terms: "We have been informed by our friend Abū 'Abd Allāh al-Ḥumaydī, a man of great learning, talent, and intelligence"; he then adds: "And I never saw his like for virtue, austerity of life, piety, and application to study." Al-Ḥumaydī is the author of a celebrated work, entitled: al-Jam' o bayn al-Ṣaḥīḥayn (the united contents of the Ṣaḥīḥs) of al-Bukhārī and Muslim; this production he taught publicly. Another of his works is a history of the learned men of Spain, to which he gave the title of Judḥwat al-Muqtabis (a brand for him who wishes to light his fire) and which forms one volume. In the preface, he mentions that he wrote it from memory at the request of some persons in Baghdād. He used to say: "There are three points connected with the study of the "Traditions to which, first of all, attention should be directed; namely: the ('Ilal or) motives of the Prophet's sayings, and the best treatise thereon is that of al-Dāraquṭnī (No. 409); the Mu'taliḥ wa Mukhtaliḥ (synonymy of proper names), and the best work on the subject is that of the amīr

1 The life of this ḥāfiẓ is given by our author.

Abū Naṣr Ibn Mākūlā; the third point is, to know the precise date of each traditionist's death, but on this we possess no work. I undertook to compile one on the subject and the amīr told me to draw it up in chronological order and, under each year, to arrange the names alphabetically." "But," says Abū Bakr Ibn Ṭarkhān<sup>1</sup>, his attention was so much engaged by the two Ṣaḥīḥs. that he died without being able to execute that task." The same person relates as follows: "Abū 'Abd Allāh al-Ḥumaydī recited to us the following verses composed by himself :

"Visiting (learned) men produces nothing useful ; all we gain by it is (that we may afterwards repeat their words under) the stupid form of an it is said, or such a one said Visit them therefore but seldom ; unless it be to acquire knowledge or amend thy conduct."

Al-Ḥumaydī met the Khaṭīb Abū Bakr (No. 33) at Damascus, and has given some information on his authority; and his own authority is occasionally cited by the Khaṭīb. He was born some time before the year 420 (A.C. 1029), and he died at Baghdād on the eve of Tuesday, the 17th of Dhu 'l-Hijjah, A.H. 488 (December, A.C. 1095)* Al-Sam'ānī says, in his Ansāb, under the word al-Mayūrqī (belonging to Majorca) that al-Ḥumaydī's death took place in the month of Ṣafar A.H. 491; so at least I found it written in the abridgment which 'Alī Ibn al-Aṭhīr al-Jazarī (No. 435) composed of that work. Suspecting this to be a fault of my own copy, I examined the passage in a number of other manuscripts, and found them all to agree ; al-Sam'ānī's original work, of which we possess Ibn al-Aṭhīr's abridgment, I had no means of consulting, as it was not to be found in this country (Egypt). The great discordance of these two dates remained upon my mind, and having at length consulted al-Sam'ānī's Supplement, I met the following passage : "Al-Ḥumaydī died on the eve of Tuesday, the 17th of Dhu 'l-Hijjah, A.H. 488, and was interred the next morning in the cemetery at the Abrez gate, near the tomb of Abū Ishāq al-Shīrāzī. The funeral prayer was said over the corpse in the great mosque of the citadel (Jāmi' al-Qaṣr), by the jurisconsult Abū Bakr Muḥammad Ibn Aḥmad al-Shāshī (No. 563); but, in the month of Ṣafar, A.H. 491, <sup>1</sup> Abū Ḥagr Ibn Ṭarkhān was one of the masters under whom Ibn al-'Arabī studied at Baghdād. (Ṣīlat).

* 18 December.—Ed.

it was removed to the cemetery at the Ḥarb gate and buried near the tomb of Bishr Ibn al-Ḥārith al-Ḥāfi (No. 111)." By this I perceived that the fault originated with Ibn al-Aṭhīr whilst he was making his abridgment; the copy of the work which he was then condensing may have here offered a fault of the transcriber, and Ibn al-Aṭhīr copied it without searching for the date in other quarters; or perhaps the copyist may have omitted a line, a circumstance which sometimes happens. Al-Ḥumaydī was so called after his ancestor Ḥumayd: I have been informed by an historical writer that he found this surname mentioned, in a work on history, as being derived from the name of Ḥumaydī, the son of 'Abd al-Raḥmān, the son of 'Awf<sup>1</sup>; but this derivation is false, for Abū 'Abd Allāh al-Ḥumaydī belonged to the tribe of Azd, and 'Abd al-Raḥmān to the Zuhrah family, a branch of the tribe of Quraysh; how then could any relationship have subsisted between them? Mayūrqah (Majorca) is the name of an island in the Western Sea, near the land of Spain.

591 AL-MĀZARĪ AL-MĀLIKĪ

Abū 'Abd Allāh Muḥammad Ibn 'Alī Ibn 'Umar Ibn Muḥammad al-Tamīmī (member of the tribe of Tamīm) al-Māzarī

1 'Abd al-Raḥman Ibn 'Awf al-Zuhri, an eminent member of the tribe of Quraysh and one of the eight first converts to Islāmism, was also one of the ten persons to whom Muḥammad promised paradise. Before his conversion he bore the name of 'Abd al-Ka'bah. During the persecution, he took refuge in Abyssinia. He fought at the combat of Badr and at all the other engagements in which Muḥammad commanded; at the battle of Uḥud, he received a severe wound in the leg, and halted ever after. In the lifetime of Muḥammad he acted as mufī. On the death of 'Umar, he was one of the six delegates (aṣḥāb al-shūrā) appointed to make choice of another khalīf. His birth took place ten years after the year of the Elephant; he died at Madinah A.H. 32 (A.C. 652-3), at the age of seventy-five, and was interred in the Baqī' cemetery. He had acquired great wealth in mercantile pursuits. On one occasion, he contributed half his property to the service of Islāmism; another time, he sold lands to the value of forty thousand dinārs and bestowed the amount on the poor. He equipped also five hundred horse and fifteen hundred foot for the cause of religion. On his death, the eighth part of his estate, the share allotted by law to be divided among the widows of the deceased, amounted to three hundred and twenty thousand (pieces of silver). (Siyar al-Salaf,--Al-Baḥr al-Zāḥir.)

was a doctor of the sect of Mālik and one of the most noted persons of the age for his knowledge of the Traditions and the manner in which he lectured on that subject. He composed a good commentary on Muslim's Ṣaḥīḥ and entitled it Kitāb al-Mu'lim bi sawā'id kitāb Muslim (the indicator of the instructive passages contained in the book of Muslim); this work served the qāḍī 'Iyāḍ (No. 486) as the basis of his Ikmāl, which is, in fact, the complement of al-Māzarī's treatise. He composed also a number of literary works and a book called 'Iḍāḥ al-Maḥṣūl fī Burhān il-Uṣūl'. This doctor, so highly distinguished for his talents and varied information, died at al-Mahdiyyah (in the province of Tunis) on the 18th of the first Rabi', A.H. 536 (October, A.C. 1141)*, aged eighty-three years. Some place his death on Monday, the second day of that month†. Māzarī means belonging to Māzar (Mazzara), a village in the island of Sicily.

592 ABŪ MŪSĀ AL-IṢBAHĀNĪ

Abū Mūsā Muḥammad Ibn Abī Bakr 'Umar Ibn Abi 'Iṣā Aḥmad Ibn 'Umar Ibn Muḥammad Ibn Abī 'Isā al-Iṣbahānī al-Madinī, the first ḥāfiẓ of the age for his vast memory and learning, composed a number of useful works on the Traditions and their subsidiary sciences. His Kitāb al-Mughīth (the assister), in one volume, forms the complement of al-Harawī's Kitāb al-Gharibayn (No. 35); in it he corrects the faults of that author, and it is really a useful book. He left also a small volume entitled Kitāb al-Ziyādāt (book of additions), designed by him as a supplement to the Ansāb, a work composed by his master Abu 'l-Faḍl Muḥammad Ibn Ṭāhir al-Maqdisī<sup>2</sup>: in this treatise he indicates the errors and omissions of the Ansāb. After travelling abroad in search of Traditions, he returned to Iṣbahān and continued to reside in 1 This work is not noticed by Ḥājji Kḥalifah; its title seems to indicate that it was a commentary on a work of divinity or jurisprudence, entitled: Burhān al-Uṣūl.

2 See the next article.

* 22 October.—Ed

† 6 October.—Ed.

that city. He was born in the month of Dhu 'l-Qa'dah, A.H. 501 (June-July, A.C. 1108), and he died on the eve of Wednesday, the 9th of the first Jumādā, A.H. 581 (August, A.C. 1185).* His birth and death took place at Iṣbahān. Madīnī means belonging to the city (madīnah) of Iṣbahān; the hāfiẓ Abu 'l-Sa'd al-Sam'ānī states, in his Ansāb, that this adjective may mean: (1) belonging to Madīnah; (2) belonging to Marw; (3) belonging to Naysābūr; (4) belonging to Iṣbahān; (5) belonging to the city (madīnah) of al-Mulārak near Qazwīn; (6) belonging to Bukhārā; (7) belonging to Samarqand; (8) belonging to Nasaf. He adds that, to express belonging to Madīnah, the relative adjective Madanī is generally used.

593 ABU 'L-FADL IBN AL-QAYSARĀNĪ AL-MAQDISĪ

Abu 'l-Faḍl Muḥammad Ibn Ṭāhir Ibn 'Alī Ibn Aḥmad al-Maqdisī, generally known by the appellation of Ibn al-Qaysarānī, was one of those doctors who had undertaken long journeys in search of Traditions. He heard (traditional information delivered) in Ḥijāz, Syria, Egypt, Mesopotamia and its northern borders, Arabian and Persian 'Irāq, Fārs, Khūzistān, and Khurāsān. He then took up his abode in Ḥamadhān and obtained a high reputation for his knowledge of the Traditions and his learning in the sciences connected with them. A great number of works and compilations were drawn up by him on that subject, and they all serve to prove the extent of his learning and the correctness of his information. He composed the Aṭrāf (index of the principal words) of the Six Books, that is to say, of the Ṣaḥīḥs of al-Bukhārī, Muslim, Abī Dāwūd, al-Tirmidhī, al-Nasā'ī and Ibn Mājah: the Aṭrāf of al-Ḍaraqutnī's al-Ḡharā'ib (obscure terms occurring in the Traditions), and the Kitāb al-Ansāb (book of patronymics). This last work forms a small volume, and is the same for which the hāfiẓ Abū Mūsā al-Iṣbahānī (see the preceding article), composed a supplement. He possessed a sound knowledge of the science of Sūfism and its different divisions; there even exists a work by him on the subject. He left also some good poetry. The hāfiẓ Abū Mūsa and some others wrote Traditions under his dictation. Abu 'l-Faḍl al-Maqdisī was born at Bayt al-Maqdis (the house of the holy place, Jerusalem), on the 6th of Shawwāl, A.H. 448 (December, A.C. 1056);* he commenced learning Traditions in 460; he entered Baghdād in 467 (A.C. 1074-5) and afterwards returned to Jerusalem, where he assumed the pilgrim dress and proceeded to Makkah. He died at Baghdād on Friday, the 28th of the first Rabi', A.H. 507 (September, A.C. 1113)†. on his return from the pilgrimage, which duty he had fulfilled more than once. His body was interred in the Old Cemetery (al-Maqbarat al-'Atiqah), situated on the west bank of the Tigris. Some place his death on Thursday, the 20th‡ of the month just named. His son Abū Zar'ah Tāhīr Ibn Muḥammad al-Maqdisī was renowned for the extent and high authority of his information in the Traditions, but he was unacquainted with the science (of jurisprudence); his father having merely sent him, when a boy, to hear the lessons of some (Traditionists), such as Abū Muḥammad 'Abd al-Raḥmān Ibn Aḥmad al-Dūbī, who was then teaching at Ray, Abu 'l-Faṭḥ 'Abdūs Ibn 'Abd Allāh at Hamadhān, Abū 'Abd Allāh Muḥammad Ibn 'Uṭhmān al-Kāmiḳhī, and Abu 'l-Ḥasan Makki Ibn Manṣūr al-Sallār. He then took him to Baghdād, where he heard the lessons of Abu 'l-Qāsim 'Alī Ibn Aḥmad Ibn Rayyān and other masters. On the death of his father, he went to reside at Hamadhān, whence he proceeded to Baghdād (every year) to see the pilgrim caravan and teach the greater part of the Traditions which he had learned. Amongst those who received Traditions from him were the wazīr Abu 'l-Muẓaffar Yaḥyā Ibn Hubayrah<sup>1</sup> and others. He was born

* 8 August.--Ed.

---

1 'Awn al-Dīn Abu 'l-Muẓaffar Yaḥyā Ibn Hubayrah, wazīr to the Khalīf al-Muqtafī li-amr Allāh, was born at al-Dūr, a village situated in the province of Dujayl, and, afterwards called, on his account, Dūr al-Wazīr (the mansion of the wazīr). His father, a husbandman of that place, encouraged him to pursue the study of literature, and took him occasionally to Baghdād, where he attended the most eminent masters. Left an orphan at an early age, he nevertheless persevered in his studies. and after undergoing all the evils which poverty

(Continued on page 264)

* 19 December.—Ed.

† 12 September.—Ed.

‡ 4 September.—Ed.

at Ray, A. H. 481 (A.H. 1088-9), and he died at Hamadhān on Wednesday, the 7th of the latter Rabi', A. H. 566 (December, A.C. 1170.* Qaysarānī, 'means belonging to Qaisariyuh (Caesarea), a maritime village of Syria which is now in the hands of the Franks' whom God confound! † (I say : Then al-Malik al-Zāhir Rukn al-Dīn Bībars al-Šāliḥ<sup>1</sup> reconquered it in the months of A.H. 663 A.C. 1264-65), and devastated it and it is now waste).

594 ABŪ 'ABD ALLĀH IBN MANDAH

Abū 'Abd Allāh Muḥammad Ibn Yahyā Ibn Mandah al-'Abdī, a celebrated transmitter of traditional information, and the author of a history of Iṣbahān, was a ḥāfiẓ of the highest authority. He belonged to a family of eminence which produced a number of learned men ; he did not draw his origin from the tribe of 'Abd (as could inflict, he entered into the civil service, successively advancing from one post to another, till he was finally appointed wazīr to al-Muqtafī. This place he filled for a considerable time, and a yearly salary of one hundred thousand pieces of gold gave him the facility of fully indulging his generous disposition. Such was his liberality, that, at the end of the year, he never had even a piece of silver remaining in his coffer. He displayed great abilities in resisting the encroachments of the Saljuq dynasty, and the Khalifs al-Muqtafī and al-Mustanjid used frequently to declare that the 'Abbaside family never had a wazīr like Yahyā Ibn Hubayrah. This eminent statesman died A.H. 560, whilst prostrated in prayer. Amongst the numerous anecdotes related of his generosity, may be noticed the following. When appointed wazīr, he entered the dīwān, clothed in his robes of state ; and, observing a servant employed in the office who was keeping in the background, he called him forward with an encouraging smile, and bestowed on him some gold and a cloak. He said : "There is no god but God ! I remember that, once coming into this dīwān, I sat down on one of the seats, and this boy came, and, taking me by the hand, made me stand up, telling me that that was not my place. Seeing him now standing there with terror marked on his countenance, I felt a pleasure in allaying his fears and setting his mind at ease, (al-Duwal al-Islāmiyah, No. 589 p. 281 et seq). Ibn Khallikān also gives a notice on this wazīr.

(Continued from page 263)

1 Caesarea was retaken by the sultan Bībars in the year 663 (A.C. 1265).

* 15 December.—Ed.

† This information is added on the authority of Egypt edition.—Ed.

he surname 'Abdī would imply), but Barrah, his mother, was connected with the tribe of 'Abd Yālīl' through her father Muḥammad, and Ibn Mandah bore this surname after his maternal ancestors. The ḥāfiẓ Abū Mūsā al-Iṣbahānī mentions him in the Ziyādāt (No. 592) and traces up his genealogy, but this list I shall not insert on account of its length. Al-Ḥāzimī (No. 599) speaks of him also in the Kitāb al-'Ujālāh, but omits the genealogy. The ḥāfiẓ Ibn Mandah died A.H. 301 (A.C. 913-4). In a subsequent part of this work, we shall give the life of his descendant, Yaḥyā Ibn 'Abd al-Wahhāb.

595 AL-FARABRĪ

Abū 'Abd Allāh Muḥammad Ibn Yūsuf Ibn Maṭar Ibn Šālih Ibn Bishr al-Farabrī is well known as the teacher, from memory, of al-Bukḥārī's Ṣaḥīḥ, which work he had learned under the author. People came from all quarters to hear him repeat this book. He was born A.H. 231 (A.C. 845-6), and he died on the 3rd of Shawwāl, A.H. 320 (October, A.C. 932). * Farabrī means belonging to Farabr, a town situated on the bank of the Jihūn (Oxus) and on the same side of the river as Bukḥārā. Al-Farabrī was one of al-Bukḥārī's pupils, and the last survivor of those who taught, from memory, their master's Ṣaḥīḥ.

596 AL-FURĀWĪ

Abū 'Abd Allāh Muḥammad Ibn al-Faḍl Ibn Aḥmad Ibn Muḥammad Ibn Aḥmad Ibn Abi 'l-'Abbās al-Šā'idī al-Furāwī al-Naysābūrī (native of Naysābūr), surnamed Kamāl al-Dīn (perfect in religion)<sup>1</sup> was a distinguished jurisconsult and Traditionist. He attended the sittings of the Shāfi'ite doctor Imām al-Ḥaramayn, author of the Nihāyat al-Maṭlab (No. 353), and took notes of his lessons on the principles (of Jurisprudence). Al-Furāwī passed his youth among the Ṣūfis, and became a doctor of the law, a Traditionist, a muftī, a controvertist, and a preacher. Though advanced in age, he used to carry food to travellers, and serve at table when visitors came to see him. Having set out on the pilgrimage to Makkah, he preached before crowded assemblies at Baghdād and the other towns through which he passed. In the two Holy Cities (of Makkah and Madīnah) he gave public lessons. On his return to Naysābūr, he took his seat as professor in the Nāsihiyyah college, and discharged also the duties of imām in the mosque of al-Muṭarriz. He learned Muslim's Ṣaḥīh from 'Abd al-Ḡhāfir al-Fārisī (No. 377) and al-Bukhārī's from Sa'id Ibn Abī Sa'id. His other masters were Abū Ishāq al-Shīrāzī (No. 5), Abū Bakr Aḥmad al-Bayhaqī (No. 27) Abū 'l-Qāsim 'Abd al-Karīm Ibn Hawāzin al-Qushayrī (No. 369), and the Imām al-Ḥaramayn. He was the sole person authorised to repeat and explain some of the ḥāfiẓ al-Bayhaqī's works, such as the Dalā'il al-Nubuwwah (proofs of Muḥammad's prophetic mission), al-Asmā wa 'l-Ṣifāt (the names and attributes of the Divinity), al-Ba'th wa 'l-Nushūr (the resurrection and revivification of mankind) and the two collections of prayers, the greater and the less. It was (punningly) said of him : al-Furāwī alfu rāwī (al-Furāwī is worth one thousand transmitters of traditional information). He was born at Naysābūr, A.H. 441 (A.C. 1049-50), some say, 442 ; at the age of six years he commenced learning Traditions, and he died on Thursday morning, the 21st—some say, the 22nd—of Shawwāl, A.H. 530 (July, A.C. 1136).* Furāwī means belonging to Furāwah, a village on the frontiers of Khuwārizm ; it is called also Ribāṭ Furāwah, and was built in the Khalīfate of al-Māmūn, by 'Abd Allāh Ibn Ṭāhir, the governor of Khurāsān.

---

1 'Abd Yālīl, the son of Jurham, left his name to a Yemenite tribe established in Hijāz.

* 7 October.--Ed.

<sup>1</sup> According to al-Yāfi', in his Mir'at, and al-'Uṭhmānī, in his Ṭabaqāt al-Fuqahā al-Furāwī bore also the surname of Faq'h al-Ḥaram (the jurisconsult of the sacred territory of Makkah.)

* Thursday, 23 July.—Ed.

597 AL-'ĀJURRĪ

Abū Bakr Muḥammad Ibn al-Ḥusayn Ibn 'Abd Allāh al-'Ājurri, a jurisconsult of the sect of al-Shāfi'i and a Traditionist, is the author of that collection of forty Traditions which is called after him Arba'in al-'Ājurri. This doctor, who was noted for his piety and virtue, delivered Traditions on the authority of Abū Muslim al-Kajji, Abū Shu'ayb al-Ḥarrānī, Aḥmad Ibn Yaḥyā al-Ḥulwānī, al-Mufaḍḍal Ibn Muḥammad al-Jundī, and a great number of other masters contemporary with them. Muḥammad Ibn Ishāq al-Nadīm mentions him in the work entitled al-Fihrist<sup>1</sup>. Al-'Ājurri composed many treatises on the law and the Traditions. In the History of Baghdād the Khaṭīb Abū Bakr al-Baghdādī (No. 33), speaks of him as conscientious, veracious, pious, and the author of numerous works; he taught Traditions at Baghdād previously to the year 330 (A.C. 941). He then proceeded to Makkah, and continued to reside there till his death. A number of hāfiẓes gave traditions on his authority, and Abū Nu'aym al-Iṣbahānī (No. 32), the author of the Ḥilyat al-Awliyā, was one of them. A certain learned man informed me that when al-'Ājurri entered Makkah, he exclaimed, in admiration: "I implore of thee. O God! the favour to remain here one year", and that he heard a voice reply: "Nay, thirty years." He survived thirty years, and died at Makkah in the month of Muḥarram, A.H. 360 (November, A.C. 970). The Khaṭīb says that he found this date on his tombstone, and, in a copy of (Ibn Bashkuwāl's) Ṣilat, I myself read the following marginal note: "The imām Abū Bakr, surnamed al-'Ājurri because he belonged to a village near Baghdād called al-'Ājurr, resided at Makkah, and died there on the 1st of Muḥarram, A. H. 360." 'Ājurri is derived from Ājurr (brick) but I know not why he received this surname.

598 AL-SALĀMĪ THE ḤĀFIẒ

Abu 'l-Faḍl Muḥammad Ibn Nāṣir Ibn Muḥammad Ibn 'Alī Ibn 'Amr, a native of Baghdād and generally known by the sur-

<sup>1</sup> See No. 273, Note.

* 4 November.—Ed.

name of al-Salāmi, was an accomplished scholar and the most eminent ḥāfiẓ of Baghdād at that epoch. He possessed great literary acquirements, having studied the belles-lettres under Abū Zakariyā al-Tibrizī<sup>1</sup>. The works which he transcribed were of the utmost correctness.

He was indefatigable in the search of useful hints and instructive observations, and these he carefully noted down. A great quantity of information has been given on his authority by the very first masters. The learned men of that age were his pupils, and the ḥāfiẓ Abu l-Faraj Ibn al-Jawzī (No. 345), who was one of the number, cites his authority very frequently. The ḥāfiẓ Abu Sa'd al-Sam'ānī (No. 370) mentions him in his different works. Al-Salāmi's birth occurred on the eve of Saturday, the 15th of Shā'bān, A.H. 467 (April, A.C. 1075)* and he died at Baghdād on the eve of Tuesday, the 18th of Shā'bān, A.H. 550 (October, A.C. 1155).† The next morning, his body was carried forth, and funeral prayers were said over it thrice, near the mosque of the Sulṭān (Jāmi' al-Sulṭān); it was then taken across the river to the mosque (Jāmi') of al-Manṣūr, where the funeral service was again performed, after which they bore it to the Ḥarbiyah cemetery, at the Ḥarb Gate, and interred it under the sidrah<sup>2</sup> at the side of Abū Manṣūr Ibn al-Anbārī the preacher's tomb. "Salāmi means native of Madīnat al-Salām (the city of welfare), that is, Baghdād. "Such" says al-Sam'ānī, "was the note written by himself on his own surname."

599 AL-ḤĀZIMĪ THE ḤĀFIẒ

Abū Bakr Muḥammad Ibn Abī 'Uṭhmān Mūsā Ibn 'Uṭhmān Ibn Mūsā Ibn Uṭhmān Ibn Ḥāzim al-Ḥāzimī al-Hamadḥānī (native of Hamadḥān), surnamed Zayn al-Dīn (ornament of religion), was

1 His life is given by Ibn Khallikān.

2 The word sidrah means lotus tree. It may perhaps designate here some religious edifice.

* 4 April.—Ed.

† 18 October.—Ed.

distinguished by the exactitude of his information as a ḥāfiẓ, and the eminent sanctity of his life. Having learned by heart the sacred Qur'ān, he attended the lessons of Abu 'l-Waqt 'Abd al-Awwal al-Sijazī (No. 378) at Hamadān and learned Traditions in the same city from Abū Mansūr Shihirdār Ibn Shirūyah the Daylamite, Abū Zur'ah Ṭāhir Ibn Muḥammad al-Maqdisī (No. 593), the ḥāfiẓ Abu 'l-'Alā al-Ḥasan Ibn Aḥmad<sup>1</sup> and a great number of other masters. He studied the law at Baghdād under the Shaykh Jamāl al-Dīn Wāṭḥiq Ibn Faḍlān<sup>2</sup> and others; it was there also that he heard Traditions delivered by Abu 'l-Ḥusayn 'Abd al-Ḥaqq and Abū Naṣr 'Abd al-Raḥīm, the sons of 'Abd al-Khālīq Ibn Aḥmad Ibn Yūsuf, Abu 'l-Faṭḥ 'Ubayd Allāh Ibn 'Abd Allāh Ibn Shātil, and others. He then undertook to collect Traditions himself, and with that view he visited a number of the cities of 'Irāq, whence he proceeded to Syria, Moṣul, Fārs, Iṣbahān, Hamadhān, and most of the towns in the province of Ādharbā'ijān. He wrote down Traditions under the dictation of nearly all the Shaykhs at these places, and devoted his attention so specially to this branch of study, that he attained in it a great eminence and a high reputation. He composed on this and on other subjects a number of instructive works, such as the Nāsikh wa 'l-Mansūkh (the annulling and the annulled) traditions, the Kitāb al-Fayṣal (discriminator), treating of those patronymics the origin and pronunciation of which might be mistaken; the Kitāb al-'Ujālāh (the ready assister) on

---

1 Abu 'l-'Alā al-Ḥasan Ibn Aḥmad, a ḥāfiẓ and teacher of the Qur'ān-readings, died A.H. 569 (A.C. 1173-4) aged 81 years. He was a native of Hamadhān. — Nujūm Ḥuffāẓ.

2 The learned imām Jamāl al-Dīn Abu 'l-Qāsim Wāṭḥiq Ibn 'Alī Ibn al-Faḍl Ibn Hibat Allāh Ibn Faḍlān, a doctor of the Shāfi'ite sect, was born at Baḡhdād, A.H. 515 (A.C. 1121-2). He made his studies at Baḡhdād and Naysābūr, and became professor in the Nizāmiyah college of the former city. His death occurred in Sha'bān, A.H. 595. (June, A.C. 1199). The author of the Ṭabaqāt al-Fuqahā observes that some persons call this doctor Yaḥyā, not Wāṭḥiq, and Ibn Qāḍī Shuhbah gives him the name of Yaḥyā in his Ṭabaqāt al-Shāfi'in. The latter author says that Ibn Faḍlān held a high rank as a jurisconsult, a theologian, a controvertist, and a dialectician. The author of the Ṭabaqāt al-Fuqahā informs us that Abū 'Abd Allāh Muḥammad, the son of this Ibn Faḍlān, was professor at the Mustanṣiriyah college in Baḡhdād, that he acted as qāḍī 'l-quḍāt for the Khālif al-Nāṣir li-Dīn Allāh, and died A.H. 631, (A.C. 1233-4).

patronymics and ethnic names ; a work on geographical synonyms and the name of places which, when written, are liable to be mispronounced ; the Silsilat al-Dhahab (golden chain), treating of the Traditions delivered by Ibn Hunbal (No. 19) on the authority of al-Shāfi'i (No. 532); the Shurūṭ A'imnah (conditions of the imāms), etc. He resided at Baghdād, on the east side of the river, constantly engaged in study and the practice of virtue, till fate cut through the branch of his life whilst yet green. This event happened at Baghdād on the eve of Monday, the 28th of the first Jumādā, A.H. 584 (July, A.C. 1188)* : He was interred in the Shūnizī cemetery, beside (the grave of) Samnūn Ibn Ḥamzah<sup>1</sup> and opposite to the tomb of al-Junayd (No. 140). Crowds of people attended the funeral service which was said over him in the court of the Mosque of the Castle (Jāmi' al-Qaṣr) ; the body was then taken to the west side of the river, and the prayer was there repeated. His books were distributed among the Traditionists. Al-Hāzimī was born A.H. 548 (A.C. 1153-4), or 549, on the road leading to Hamadhān. He was carried to that city, and in it he passed his youth. He bore the surname of Hāzimī because one of his ancestors was called Hāzim.

600 ABŪ BAKR IBN AL-'ARABĪ

Abū Bakr Muḥammad Ibn 'Abd Allāh Ibn Muḥammad Ibn 'Abd Allāh Ibn Aḥmad, generally known by the surname of Ibn al-'Arabī, was a celebrated hāfiẓ, a member of the tribe of Ma'āfir and a native of Seville in Spain. Ibn Baṣḥkuwāl speaks of him in these terms, in his Ṣilat : "That hāfiẓ filled with learning to overflowing ; the last of the learned, the last imām and <sup>1</sup> Abu 'l-Ḥasan Samnūn Ibn Ḥamzah al-Khawwāṣṣ a disciple of al-Sarī al-Saqī (No. 239) and other ṣūfis. He used to discourse with great eloquence on the love of God, and he replied, when asked what was ṣūfism : "to possess nothing and to let nothing possess you." The eminent shaykh died some time after al-Junayd. Lawāqih al-Anwār fī-Ṭabaqāt il-Akhlāyār, by 'Abd al-Wahhāb al-Sha'rānī ; Ms. of the Bib du Roi, fonds Asselin.

* 25 July.—Ed.

the last ḥāfiẓ of Spain. I met him in the city of Seville on Monday morning, the 2nd of the latter Jumādā, A.H. 516 (August, A.C. 1122). He informed me that it was on Sunday, the first of the first Rabi', A. H. 485 (April, A. C. 1092)*; that he set out with his father on their journey to the East<sup>1</sup> and that he went to Syria, where he met Abū Bakr Muḥammad Ibn al-Walīd al-Ṭurtūshī (No. 579), under whom he studied jurisprudence. Having gone to Baghdād, he heard Traditions from some of the most eminent masters and then proceeded to Ḥijāz. He performed the pilgrimage in the year 489, and, on his return to Baghdād, he became the pupil of Abū Bakr al-Shāshī (No. 563), Abū Ḥamid al-Ghazzālī (No. 562), and other doctors and philologists. He then left Baghdād, and went to Egypt. In Miṣr and Alexandria he met a great number of the Traditionists, and wrote down Traditions under their dictation, communicating to them the fruits of his own researches whilst he received theirs. In the year 493, he returned to Spain, and entered Seville with a greater stock of information than any person who travelled to the East had ever brought back before. He was deeply versed in a variety of sciences, and had attained a high proficiency in all the branches of knowledge; on the subjects he discoursed with great ability, and, being enabled by his penetrating genius to comprehend them all, he displayed the utmost ardour in diffusing information, whilst he employed the acuteness of his mind in distinguishing what was exact therein from what was not. We may add that he was equally distinguished by the amenity of his character, the charm of his manners, his affability, humility, nobleness of mind, obliging disposition, and constancy in friendship. Having been appointed qādī in his native town, he rendered the highest service to the inhabitants by the firmness with which he discharged his duties and the severity which made him an object of terror for the wicked. On his removal from office, he turned his mind to the task of 1 Ibn al-Arabī wrote an account of this journey; Ibn Khaldūn mentions it, in his History of the Berbers, under the title of (Riḥlah journey), and informs us that the author speaks in it of his shipwreck on the coast of Barqā, where he and his father were hospitably treated by the nomadic Arabs of that region.

* 11 April. - Ed.

diffusing learning. I asked him the date of his birth, and he informed me that he was born on the eve of Thursday, the 21st of Shā'bān; A.H. 468 (April, A.C. 1076)*. He died in North Africa and was interred in the city of Fez, in the month of the latter Rabi', A.H. 543 (Aug.-Sept., A.C. 1148)." To these words of Ibn Bashkuwāl I may add that the ḥāfiẓ Ibn al-'Arabi left a number of works, and amongst others that entitled al-'Āriḍat-al-Aḥwadhī fī-sharḥ il-Tirmidhī (the fluency of the expert, being a commentary on the Traditions collected by al-Tirmidhī)<sup>1</sup>. He was born at Seville; some say in the year 469 (A.C. 1076-7). His death is stated to have taken place in the month of the first Jumādā, whilst he was returning from Morocco to Fez, and at a day's journey from the latter city. His corpse was transported to Fez and interred in the cemetery of al-Jayyānī. His father was born A.H. 435 (A.C. 1043-4), and he died in the month of Muḥarram, A.H. 493 (November-December, A.C. 1099), in Egypt, on his return from the expedition which he and his son had made to the East: he was an accomplished scholar and an able kātib. The title of Ibn al-'Arabi's work al-'Āriḍat-al-Aḥwadhī, requires explanation; 'āriḍah' means command of language. They say: such a one has an extreme 'āriḍah, to indicate that he has a great command of language; ahwadhī means: one who gets through a business lightly, owing to his skill; or, according to al-Aṣma'i, one expert in business, completely master of it, and who lets no part of it escape his attention.

601 AL-NAQQĀSH AL-BAGHDĀDĪ

Abū Bakr Muḥammad Ibn al-Ḥasan Ibn Muḥammad Ibn Ziyād† al-Muqri (teacher of the readings of the Qur'ān, and) surnamed al-Naqqāsh, belonged to a family of Moṣul, but was born

1 There exists in the Bibliothèque du Roi a large volume of mysticism in five hundred and sixty chapters, and entitled al-Fuṭūḥat al-Makkiyah (Makken revelations). The author of this work is also an Ibn al-'Arabi; his names are Muḥī al-Dīn Muḥammad Ibn 'Alī, and he died A.H. 638 (A.C. 1240).

* 31 March.—Ed.

† The Egyptian edition adds: Ibn Hārūn Ibn Ja'far Ibn Sanad: between Ziyād and al-Muqri.—Ed.

and brought up at Baghdād. He possessed great learning in the Qur'ān and its interpretation, on which last subject he composed a work entitled : Shafā al-Ṣudūr (Medicine of the heart). Amongst his other productions we may notice the Ishārah (indication), on the obscure terms of the Qur'ān; the Mawḍiḥ (elucidator), on the Qur'ān and its style; the Didd al-'Aql (contradictory to reason); the Manāsik (rites of devotion); the Falḥ al-Manāsik (comprehension of the rites); the Akhhār al-Quṣṣās? (History of the story-tellers); the Dhamm al-Ḥasad (dispraise of envy); the Dalāl al-Nubūwat (proofs of Muḥammad's prophetic mission); the Abwāb (doors, or chapters), on the Qur'ān; the Iram Dhāt al-'Imād (the Iram of many columns)<sup>1</sup> the greater, the less, and the medium dictionary of Qur'ān-readers and their readings; the greater Book of the Seven (readings), with the reasons of these readings; the lesser Book of the Seven (readings); the medium Book of the Seven (readings), and the *al-Sāfir al-Kubr** (the great traveller) to the East and West. He heard Traditions delivered at Kūfah, Baṣrah, and Makkah, in Egypt, Sayria, and Mesopotamia, at Moṣul, in Persian 'Irāq, Khurāsān, and Transoxiana, but some of those which he taught are merely rejected Traditions headed with approved isnāds<sup>2</sup> His name happening to be mentioned in the presence of Ṭalḥah Ibn Muḥammad Ibn Ja'far, this person said: "He was false in his Traditions, and addicted to story-telling." He delivered orally pieces of literature on the authority of the most eminent among the learned, and his own authority was cited by them for some which they delivered. Al-Barqānī<sup>3</sup>

1 See Lane's Thousand and one Nights, vol. II, p. 342 for the description of this fabulous place.

2 See Introduction to vol. I.

3 The ḥafīz Abū Bakr Aḥmad Ibn Muḥammad Ibn Aḥmad Ibn Ghālib al-Barqānī, born (at Barqān, a village) in Khuwārizm, A.H. 339 (A.C. 950-1), died in the month of Rajab, A.H. 425 (May-June, A.C. 1034). He had some acquaintance with Arabic Philology ('arabiyah) and composed a Musnad, or authenticated body of Traditions, in which he inserted the contents of al-Bukhārī's Ṣuḥūḥ and those of Muslim's. The Khaṭīb, who, as well as al-Bayhaqī and Abū Ishāq al-Shīrāzī, gave some Traditions on his authority.

(Continued on page 274)

* The Egyptian edition gives سافر الكثير i.e. he travelled much. This cannot be the name of a book.- Ed.

said: "All the Traditions taught by al-Naqqāsh are false, and in his interpretation of the Qur'ān, there is not a single genuine Tradition." Al-Naqqāsh was born A.H. 266 (A.C. 879-80); some say, 265; and he died on Tuesday, the 2nd of Shawwāl, A.H. 351 (November, A.C. 962)*. The next day, he was interred. By other accounts his death is placed a year sooner, or a year later. Naqqāsh means a painter of walls and ceilings, etc.; which profession this doctor had followed in the early part of his life.

602 IBN SHANBŪDH

Abu 'l-Ḥasan Muḥammad Ibn Aḥmad Ibn Ayyūb Ibn al-Ṣalt Ibn Shanbūdh, an eminent master of the Qur'ān readings and a native of Baghdād, was pious and well-intentioned, but weak-minded man. It is said that he uttered much nonsense and little real learning. Having become the sole depository of some rare and singular readings of the Qur'ān, he introduced them into his recitations from that book whilst presiding at the public prayer<sup>1</sup>. By this he incurred general reprehension, and the wazīr Abū 'Alī Muḥammad Ibn Muqlah, the celebrated penman, having been informed of his conduct and that he had changed some passages of the Qur'ān by substituting certain words for others belonging to the primitive revealed text, had the delinquent brought before him, in the beginning of the month of the latter Rabi', A.H. 323 (March, A.C. 935), and kept him prisoner in the place for some days. On Sunday, the 7th† of the same month, he convoked an assembly composed of the qāḍī Abū 'l-Ḥusayn 'Umar Ibn Muḥammad, Abū Bakr Aḥmad Ibn Mūsā Ibn al-'Abbās Ibn says: "Amongst all our masters we did not find one possessing more solid information than he. His piety was conspicuous and he possessed deep learning in the law."— (Nujūm, al-Yāfi'ī, Ṭab. al-Ḥuffāz.)

(Continued from page 273)

1 Literally: He read (the Qur'ān) with them, in the Miḥrāb.

* 4 November.—Ed.

† 15 March.—Ed.

Mujāhid, teacher of the Qur'ān-readings, and other persons of the same profession. Ibn Shanbūdḥ was then brought in and examined in the presence of the wazīr, but he replied with great insolence to him, the qāḍī, and Ibn Mujāhid, calling them persons of little information and reproaching them with not having travelled in the pursuit of learning as he had done; the qāḍī was even treated by him as a mere dotard. On this, the wazīr ordered him to be flogged, and the prisoner, whilst undergoing this punishment, which consisted in seven distinct beatings invoked God's vengeance on Ibn Muqlah, praying that his hand might be cut off and his prosperity ruined; and such was really the case, as will be seen in our account of that wazīr's life. They then examined him relative to the readings which he was accused of having employed, and he answered by denying those which gave scandal, and declaring that some readers did make use of the others. Being called on to recant, he consented and said; "I renounce my manner of reading, and in future I shall follow no other than that of the manuscript drawn up by (the khalif) 'Uthmān Ibn 'Affān, and that which is publicly received." The wazīr ordered this declaration to be taken down and made him subscribe his name to it. This subscription contained evidently the expression of Ibn Shanbūdḥ's sincere repentance. The words of the document were: "Muḥammad Ibn Aḥmad, generally known by the name of Ibn Shanbūdḥ, being questioned as to the report of his having read: When you are called to prayer on the day of the assembly, go<sup>1</sup> to the commemoration of God; he acknowledged it. And being questioned as to the reading: and (do) ye make this your gratitude that ye declare (the Qur'ān to be false ?<sup>2</sup>) he acknowledged it; and as to the reading: may the hands of Abū Lahab perish, and he has already perished<sup>3</sup> he acknowledged it; and as to the reading: because

1 Go; in Arabic, ṣaḥḥū. The received text has fas'aw (hasten). See Qur'ān sūrah 62, verse 9.

2 For gratitude (shukr), the Qur'ān has rizq (sustenance). Sale renders the passage thus: "And do ye make (this return for) your food (which ye received from God), that ye deny yourselves to be obliged to him for the same." "Sūrah 56, verse 81.

3 Qad tabḥa, for the received reading tabḥa (and may he perish). Sūrah 111, verse 1.

there was a king before them, who took every ship by force<sup>1</sup> he acknowledged it ; and as to the reading : like wool carded<sup>2</sup> he acknowledged it ; and as to : this day we will save thee on account of thy invocation<sup>3</sup> he acknowledged it ; and as to : and, when he fell down, the men plainly perceived that the Genii, had they known that which is secret, had not continued (a year) in ignominious punishment<sup>4</sup> he acknowledged it ; and as to : by the night when it spreads its shades! by the day when it shineth forth! by the male and the female!<sup>5</sup> he acknowledged it ; and as to : the infidels have already charged (Muḥammad) with imposture, but (the punishment) shall be eternal<sup>6</sup> he acknowledged it ; and as to : and that there may be a band of you inviting to the best (religion), and commanding that which is just, and forbidding that which is evil, and asking God's assistance against the misfortunes which befall them ; these shall be happy ones<sup>7</sup> he acknowledged it ; and as to : if you do it not, there will be trouble in the earth and wide-spread corruption<sup>8</sup> he acknowledged it. And the witnesses here present have written their testimonies to this instrument, showing it to accord with his own declaration, and Ibn Shanbūdh has written with his own hand what follows :- I, Muḥammad, the son of Aḥmad, the son of Ayyūb, generally known by the name of Ibn Shanbūdh, acknowledge the contents of this paper to be true, and to be my words and belief ; and I take to witness Almighty God and the persons here present. And if I act against this declaration, or if any thing in my conduct denote other

1 Before (amām), in place of behind (warā) Sūrah 18, verse 78.

2 Wool' (ṣūf), in place of wool of various colour ('ihn). Sūrah 101, verse 4.

3 On account of thy invocation (bi mida'ika), for with thy body (bi-badunika). Sūrah 10, verse 92.

4 The Qur'ān has : "And when he fell-down, the Genii plainly perceived that, if they had known that which is secret, they had not continued in ignominious punishment." Sūrah 34, verse 13.

5 Qur'ān, sūrah 92, verses 1 and 2. The last words are not to be found there.

6 The Qur'ān has : "Ye have already charged." etc. Sūrah 25, verse 77.

7 Qur'ān sūrah 3, verse 100, Ibn Shanbūdh read fiyet (band) for ummat (people), and inserted the words : and asking God's assistance, etc.

8 Qur'ān sūrah 8, verse 74. Ibn Shanbūdh interpolated the words : if ye do it not, and substitute ' arīḍ (wide) for kabīr (great). To judge from the specimens, his readings were generally plausible.*

* This remark is uncalled for, and untenable.—Ed.

sentiments than those here expressed, I declare that the Khalif may lawfully shed my blood. Written on Sunday, the 7th of the first Rabi', of the year 323,* at the sitting held by the wazir Abū 'Alī Muḥammad Ibn 'Alī Ibn Muqlah; may he long enjoy the favour of God!" Abū Ayyūb al-Simsār then interceded with the wazir in order to procure Ibn Shanbūdh's liberation, but observed to him that if he allowed his prisoner to return home, the unfortunate man would be murdered by the populace. He, therefore, requested that he should be sent by night to al-Madā'in, whence, after a few days' delay, he might return to Baghdād privately, and not appear in public for some time. The wazir granted this request and sent Ibn Shanbūdh to al-Madā'in. This reader died at Baghdād on Monday, the 3rd of Šafar, A.H. 328 (November, A.C. 939)†, some say that he died a prisoner in the sultān's palace. Abū Bakr Ibn Mujāhid died on Wednesday, the 18th of Šha'bān, A.H. 324 (July, A.C. 936),‡ and was interred in a mausoleum erected for him in the Sūq al-'Iṭr (the perfume market). His birth took place in the year 245 (A.C. 859-60).

603 IBN AL-SAMMĀK

Abu 'l-Abbās Muḥammad Ibn Šabīḥ,§ surnamed al-Madhkūr<sup>1</sup>, and generally known by the appellation of Ibn al-Sammāk, was a mawīā to the tribe of 'Ijl, a native of Kūfah, and a professional narrator of anecdotes. His devotion and self-mortification, the elegance of his language, his pious exhortations and sayings (which were collected and learned by heart,) acquired him great celebrity. He met some of the Muslims belonging to the class called al-Šadr

---

1 Al-Madhkūr signifies, the mentioned, the well-remembered. It here seems to be a surname, for in the Nujūm, under the year 183, there is an article on him in which he is called Muḥammad Ibn Šabīḥ Abu 'l-Abbās al-Madhkūr.

* 14 February, A.C. 935.—Ed.

† 18 November.—Ed.

‡ The date should be 19, corresponding to 13 July.—Ed.

§ The Egyptian edition gives: Al-Šubāḥ and omits al-Madhkūr.—Ed.

al-Awwal<sup>1</sup> such as Hishām Ibn ‘Urwah<sup>2</sup> and al-A‘maṣh (No. 253) and received information from them ; Traditions were given on his authority by Aḥmad Ibn Ḥanbal and that imām’s contemporaries. It was in the time of Hārūn al-Raṣhīd that he left Kūfah, his native place, and proceeded to Baghdād ; after remaining in that city for some time, he returned to Kūfah and died there. One of his sayings was : “Fear God as if you had never obeyed him, and hope in Him as if you had never disobeyed Him.” Hārūn al-Raṣhīd, having sworn one day that he himself was one of those who were to enter Paradise, consulted doctors of the law on the subject<sup>3</sup>. None of them opined that he was one of those persons, and as Ibn al-Sammāk’s name was then mentioned to him, he had him called in and asked his opinion. Ibn al-Sammāk proposed to him this question : “The Commander of the faithful, had he ever the occasion of committing an act of disobedience towards God, and abstained from it through fear of offending Him?”. “Yes,” said al-Raṣhīd ; “in my youth, I loved a slave girl belonging to a person in my service, and having once found a favourable opportunity, I resolved on committing the wicked act with her, but reflecting on the fire of hell and its terrors, and recollecting that fornication was one of the grievous sins, I abstained from the girl through fear of Almighty God.” “Then let the commander of the faithful rejoice ! thou art one of those who shall enter Paradise,” said Ibn al-Sammāk. “How,” said al-Raṣhīd, “dost thou know that?”. “From the words of the Almighty Himself,” replied the other ; “He has said : But whoever shall have dreaded the appearing before his Lord and shall have restrained his soul from lust ; verily Paradise shall be his abode<sup>4</sup>”. These words gave al-Raṣhīd great joy. Ibn al-Sammāk went one day to intercede with a grandee in favour of a man for whom he felt interested, and he

1 M. de Sacy renders the words الصلوات by les musulmans des premiers temps. See his Abdallatif, page 473, line 26.

2 His life is given by our author.

3 Had his oath been declared false, he would have been obliged, in conscience, to expiate it in the prescribed forms. See No. 24, note on al-Muzanī.

4 Qur’ān, sūrah 79, verse 40—Ibn al-Sammāk’s argument is not conclusive, for the virtuous may relapse.

addressed him in these terms: "The beseecher and the besought will feel honoured if the request for which I come be granted, and disgraced if it be refused. Choose therefore for thyself the honour of giving, not the shame of refusing and choose for me the honour of obtaining, not the shame of being refused." The request was granted. One of his sayings was: "He who, being inclined to the world, is sated with its sweetness, will be drenched with the bitterness of the other world, though he abhor it." Having held a discourse one day in the hearing of his slave-girl, he asked her what she thought of it. She replied that it would have been good, were it not for the repetitions. "But," said he, "I make use of repetitions in order to make those understand who do not." "Yes," she replied; "and to make those understand who do not, you weary those who do." The anecdotes told of him and the exhortations which he delivered are very numerous. He died at Kūfah, A.H. 183 (A.C. 799-800). Sammāk means a seller, or a catcher of fish (samak).

604 ABŪ ṬĀLIB AL-MAKKĪ AL-ḤĀRITHĪ

Abū Ṭalib Muḥammad Ibn 'Alī Ibn 'Aṭiyah al-Ḥārithī al-Makkī, a celebrated preacher and the author of the work entitled Qūt al-Qulūb (food for the heart)<sup>1</sup> was noted for his piety and the austerity of his life. He pronounced discourses in the mosque, and composed some treatises on the Tawḥīd<sup>2</sup>. Al-Jabal (Persian 'Irāq) was his native country, but, as he had resided at Makkah, he obtained the surname of al-Makkī. He carried the practices of self-mortification to such a length that, it is said, he abstained from ordinary food during a considerable period and lived on 1 This work was designated as a guide to novices entering into the ṣūfī or contemplative life.

2 Tawḥīd signifies the profession of the divine unity, but, in the technical language of the Ṣūfis, it means: the unification of the soul with the Divinity. This is the highest station to which the soul can be elevated by contemplation and the practices of the devout life. This is the point which the Ṣūfī must reach in order to obtain eternal felicity.

nothing but wild herbs. In the use of this nutriment he persevered so long, that his skin took a green tinge. In the Traditions and Şūfism he received the lessons of numerous masters. He went to Baṣrah, after the death of Abu 'l-Ḥasan Ibn Sālim<sup>1</sup> and represented himself as a follower of his doctrines. Having proceeded to Baghdād, he gave a public exhortation, but got so much embroiled in his discourse that the audience retired and never returned to him again. Muḥammad Ibn Ṭāhir al-Maqdisī (No. 593) relates, in his Ansāb, that, when Abū Ṭālib al-Makkī went to Baghdād and preached to the crowded congregation which had assembled to hear him, he got embroiled in his discourse, and in one passage he was well recollected to have said: "Nothing is more hurtful to the creature than the Creator<sup>2</sup>." This caused the people to exclaim against him as a heretic, and, finding himself abandoned by them, he renounced preaching. Abū Ṭālib al-Makkī died at Baghdād on the 6th of the latter Jumādā, A.H. 368 (June, A.C. 996),* and was interred in the Mālikīyah cemetery; his tomb, situated in the eastern side of that burying-ground, is a well-known monument and attracts pious visitors. Ḥārithī means related to al-Ḥārith, or to al-Ḥārithah; a number of tribes are designated by these names, and I do not know to which Abū Ṭālib belonged. Makkī signifies native of Makkah.

605 IBN ŞAM'ŪN

Abu 'l-Ḥusayn Muḥammad Ibn Aḥmad Ibn Ismā'il Ibn 'Anbas Ibn Ismā'il, surnamed Ibn Sam'ūn, was a native of Baghdād and a celebrated preacher. For extemporaneous speaking he had not an equal, and, in the eloquence of his exhortations, the charm of his allusions, and the grace of his style, he remained without a rival. Amongst the numerous doctors whom he had met and on whose authority he delivered Traditions, we may mention Abū

1 This Ibn Sālim appears to have been a Şūfī.

2 He probably meant to say than the world, but pronounced khāliq instead of khāliq.

* 26 June.—Ed.

Bakr al-Shiblī (No. 214). The Ṣāhib Abu 'l-Qāsim Ismā'il Ibn 'Abbād (No. 93) relates that he heard Ibn Sam'un utter these words one day, when seated in the preacher's chair: "Extolled be the Being who hath enabled (man) to speak by (means of a piece of) flesh, and to see by (means of a piece of) fat, and to hear by (means of) a bone!"—an ingenious allusion to the tongue, the eye, and the ear. One of his sayings was: "Seeing sin to be vile, I renounced it through a feeling of dignity, and it was replaced in me by devotion." His discourses abounded in delicate turns of thought. The people of 'Irāq conceived the highest opinion of his merit and became his enthusiastic admirers. It is to him that al-Ḥarīrī alludes, in the beginning of his twenty-first maqāmah, entitled al-Rāziyah<sup>1</sup>, where he says: "And I saw there, a certain morning, bands after bands, swarming like locusts and running like race-horses; describing to each other the preacher whom they were going to hear, and setting Ibn Sam'un beneath him." Never did such a preacher exist since that time. He died at Baghdād in the month of Dhu 'l-Ḥijjah, A.H. 387 (December, A.C. 997); others say on Friday, the 15th of Dhu 'l-Qa'dah of that year; * and was buried at his residence, in the street called † Shāri' al-'Attābīn. On Thursday, the 11th of Rajab, A.H. 426, ‡ his corpse was removed to the cemetery at the Ḥarb Gate and there interred; it is said that his shroud was still in perfect preservation. Sam'un is stated to be an alteration of Isinā'il, the name of his grandfather. The primitive signification of 'Anbas (the name of his great-grandfather) is lion; but the word was subsequently employed as a proper name for men. The latter n of this word is not a radical; 'anbas being formed from 'ahūs (to frown) as fan'al is formed from fa'l.

606 ABŪ 'ABD ALLĀH AL-HĀSHIMĪ, THE ASCETICS

Abū Abd Allāh Muḥammad Ibn Aḥmad Ibn Ibrāhīm al-Qurashī al-Hāshimī (descended from Hāshim of the tribe of Quraysh), <sup>1</sup> See de Sacy's Hariri, page 204.

* 19 November.—Ed.

† The Cairo edition gives al-'Annābīn.—Ed.

‡ 22 May, A. C. 1034.—Ed.

§ [al-Zāhid.—Ed.]

a holy and pious ascetic al-Zāhid and a native of al-Jazīrat al-Khaḍrā (Algeziras in Spain), was distinguished by the gift of miracles. I heard the people of Egypt relate most extraordinary things of him, and I saw a number of his disciples who had all participated in the divine favour shown to their master; from them I learned that he had promised to some of his followers an exaltation in holiness which they really attained. He ranked among the great saints of the first class, and, when in his native country, the West, he frequented the society of the most eminent ascetics and profited by their instructions. On his arrival in Egypt, all those who became his disciples, or even saw him, derived advantage from the circumstance. Having gone to Syria, on a pilgrimage to Jerusalem, he continued there till his death. This event took place on the 6th of Dhu'l-Hijjah, A.H. 599 (August, A.C. 1203).* The funeral prayer was said over him in the (mosque called) al-Masjid al-Aqṣā. He died at the age of fifty-five years. His tomb is a remarkable object and attracts pious visitors, anxious to participate in the divine favour through his merits. Al-Jazīrat al-Khaḍrā (the green island) is a city in Spain, opposite to Ceuta. One of his counsels to his disciples was: "Journey towards God though you be lame or crippled (in soul); to wait for healing is to remain in idleness."

607 IBN AL-A'RĀBĪ

The philologer Abū 'Abd Allāh Muḥammad Ibn Ziyād, generally known by the surname of Ibn al-A'rābī, was a native of Kūfah and a mawlā to the Hāshim family, being a client of al-'Abbās Ibn Muḥammad Ibn 'Alī Ibn 'Abd Allāh Ibn al-'Abbās Ibn 'Abd al-Muṭṭalib (Ibn Hāshim). His father Ziyād was a slave brought from Sind; other; say, a mawlā to the Banū Shaybān, or some other tribe; but the first statement is the most correct. Ibn al-A'rābī had a cast in his eyes<sup>1</sup>: he was a genealogist, a <sup>1</sup> Obliquity of vision was considered by the Arabs as a mark of beauty.

* 16 August.—Ed.

philologer of the highest reputation, and one of those masters who transmitted orally the poems composed by the Arabic tribes. It is said that, of all the learned men of Kūfah, Ibn al-A'rābī came nearest to those of Baṣrah in respect to the readings of the poems taught by him<sup>1</sup>. He was brought up by al-Mufaḍḍal Ibn Muḥammad al-Ḍabbī, the author of the Mufaḍḍaliyāt<sup>2</sup>, who had married his mother. He obtained his knowledge of literature from him, Abū Mu'āwiyah al-Ḍarīr (No. 84, note), al-Qāsim Ibn Ma'an Ibn 'Abd al-Raḥmān Ibn 'Abd Allāh Ibn

<sup>1</sup> See No. 154, note.

<sup>2</sup> Abu 'l-'Abbās (or Abū 'Abd al-Raḥmān) al-Mufaḍḍal Ibn Muḥammad Ibn Ya'lā Ibn 'Amir Ibn Sālim, a member of the tribe of Ḍabbah, a branch of that of l-Ha'labah Ibn al-Sind, was a native of Kūfah. Having sided with Ibrāhīm Ibn 'Abd Allāh Ibn Ḥasan surnamed al-Nafs al-Zakīyah who revolted against al-Manṣūr in the year 145 (A. C. 762-3), he was taken prisoner, but received his pardon from that Khalīf, who attached him to the service of his son al-Mahdī. It was for this young prince that he compiled his Mufaḍḍaliyāt, a selection of one hundred and twenty-eight qasīdahs composed by the Arabs. He died A.H. 168 (A.C. 784-5). In the manuscripts of the Mufaḍḍaliyāt, the number and the order of these poems vary, having been taught traditionally by different persons. They were commented by Ibn al-A'rābī and Abū Zakariyāh al-Tabrizī. The collection commences with the poems of Ta'abba a Sharran. The other works of al-Mufaḍḍal al-Ḍabbī were, a book, of proverbs, a treatise on prosody, another on the ideas usually expressed in poetry, and a vocabulary. Al-Mufaḍḍal was held to be of the first authority as a philologer, a genealogist, and a relator of the poems and battle-days of the desert Arabs. Jāḥẓah (No. 54) tells the following anecdote of him: "We were together at al-Raṣḥīd's and he said to al-Mufaḍḍal: 'Let us know the best thing the Arabs have said of the wolf, and you shall have this ring,' which cost one thousand six hundred dinārs. The other replied: 'The best thing said of him is this:

ينام بأحدى مثلتي ويتقى - بأخرى الناياء فهو يقظان نائم

"[He sleeps with one eye and guards against danger with the other; thus at once waking and sleeping.]" Al-Raṣḥīd here said: 'God brought that passage to your lips for the sole purpose of taking away my ring.' He then handed it to him. When Zubaydah was told of the circumstance, she sent al-Mufaḍḍal one thousand six hundred pieces of gold for the ring, which she offered to al-Raṣḥīd, observing that she had remarked how much he liked it. The Khalīf immediately gave it to al-Mufaḍḍal a second time, saying: 'Keep it and keep the money, for I am not a person to take back what I give away.'"
-- Fihrist, fol 95. Nujūm. See also my Dīwan d' Amro 'l-Kals, p. 117)—It was probably an edition of Mufaḍḍaliyāt which Ibn al-Anbārī gave under the title of the Jāhiliyāt. See his life in this work.

Mas'ūd, the same whom the khalif al-Mahdī appointed qāḍī<sup>1</sup>, and al-Kisā'i (No. 408). Amongst his own disciples were Ibrāhīm al-Ḥarībī (No. 19, note), Abu 'l-'Abbās Tha'lab (No. 42), and Ibn al-Sikkīt<sup>2</sup>. He examined closely the productions of the learned, and pointed out a great number of faults committed by those who transmitted down philological information. He held the first rank by his knowledge of the rare and exalted expressions of the language (al-ḥalām al-gharīb), and he pretended that Abū 'Ubaydah and al-Aṣma'i never produced anything good. He said that it was allowable in Arabic to substitute the letter qāḍ (ق) for the letter zā (ز), and vice versa, and that no one should be censured for so doing; he then recited this verse:

"To God I complain of three qualities in a friend whom love, each of which excites my anger (ghayḍ);"

Pronouncing ghayḍ instead of ghayz; "and thus" said he, "did I hear it pronounced by the most correct speakers among the desert Arabs." His sittings were attended by crowds of people, anxious for instruction, and to them he addressed his dictations<sup>3</sup>. Abu 'l-'Abbās Tha'lab said: "I went to the sittings held by Ibn al-A'rābī, and found there upwards of one hundred persons, some asking him questions and others reading to him; and he answered every question without referring to a book. I attended his lessons upwards of ten years, and I never saw him with a book in his hand; and yet he dictated to his pupils camel-loads of (literary) information". Never was a man seen who knew by heart a greater quantity of poetry. Observing one day at his sitting two persons engaged in conversation, he learned with surprise, on asking them whence they came, that one

1 Al-Qāsim Ibn Ma'an Ibn 'Abd al-Rahmān Ibn 'Abd Allāh Ibn Mas'ūd al-Mas'ūdī, a native of Kūfah, surpassed all his contemporaries by the variety of his information; the Traditions and traditionists, poetry and poets, history and historians, scholastic theology and theologians, genealogy and genealogists, being the subjects on which he displayed the extent of his acquirements. He died A.H. 175 (A.C. 791-2).—(Fihrist, fol. 77, Nujūm.)

2 The life of Ibn al-Sikkīt will be found in this work.

3 See No. 370, note.

belonged to Isfijāb and the other to Spain. He then recited this verse :

“(We are) two companions, once separated till time joined us ; for the separated sometimes meet and unite together.”

After which he dictated to the assembly the rest of the piece, which ran as follows :

“We halted at the tent of a female, allied both to the tribe of Qays and to the Arabs of Yaman, nobly descended from pious forefathers ; and she said, whilst drawing the curtain of the tent before her : ‘What is your country ? who are you two men ?’ I replied : ‘My companion and his people are of the tribe of Tamīm ; I draw my origin from Yaman. (We are) two companions, once separated till time joined us ; for the separated sometimes meet and unite together.’”

Abu 'l-‘Abbās Tha'lab gives the following lines as having been dictated to him and his fellow-students by Ibn al-A'rābi :

“May God shed his favour on a tribe whose dwelling-place is near Buṭnān ! may blessings attend the youths therein and the men grey with years ! Though they reside far away, I and they are (united) like wine mingled with water in the glass.”

Amongst the works composed by Ibn al-A'rābi were : the Kitāb al-Nawādir (book of anecdotes), a large work ; the Kitāb al-Anwāl ; the Ṣifat al-Khayl (description of the horse) the Ṣifat al-Zar'i (description of corn in the blade) ; the Kitāb al-Nabāt (book of plants) ; the Kitāb al-Khayl (book of horses) ; The Tārīkh al-Qabā'il [history (or epochs) of the tribes] ; the Ma'ānī al-Shi'r (ideas occurring in poetry) ; the Tafsīr al-Amṭhāl (explanation of proverbs) ; the Kitāb al-Alfāz (vocabulary) the Nisab al-Khayl [pedigrees of (famous) horses] ; the Nawādir al-Zubayriyyin (anecdotes respecting the family of Zubayr) ; the Nawādir banī Faq'as (anecdotes of the tribe of Faq'as) ; the Kitāb al-Dhubāb (book on flies) etc.<sup>2</sup> The anecdotes told of him,

1 Like many other works on the same subject, this one doubtless contained observations in prose and verse relative to the supposed influence of the anwā, or mansions of the moon, on the weather.

2 The nature of these and similar works is explained in the Introduction to the first volume.

and the philological observations which he dictated, are very numerous. Tha'lab said: "I heard Ibn al-A'rābi mention that he was born on the night of the imām Abū Ḥanīfah's death;" and this, according to the most authentic account, took place in the month of Rajab, A.H. 150 (August, A.C. 767). Ibn al-A'rābi, died at Sarra man ra'ā on the 14th of Shā'bān, A.H. 231 April A.C. 846);* al-Ṭabarī says in his History, on Wednesday the 13th† of that month. Some place his death in the year 230, but the former date is nearer the truth. The funeral prayer was said over the corpse by the qādī Aḥmad Ibn 'Abī Duwād al-Iyādi (No. 31). The relative adjective A'rābi is derived from A'rāb; Abū Bakr Muḥammad Ibn 'Uzayr al-Sijistānī<sup>1</sup>, generally known by the appellation of al-'Uzayri, says, in his work wherein he explains the uncommon words occurring in the Qu'rān: "They call a man A'jami or A'jani if there be an 'ujmah (impediment) in his tongue (or language) even though he belong to the Arabian race; and they call a Persian 'Ajami, even though he speak (Arabic) with correctness. A man is A'rābi, if he be an inhabitant of the desert, though not an Arab; and he is 'Arabi if he belong to the Arabian race, even though not an inhabitant of the desert." Isfijāb is a city in the farthest part of the East; I imagine it to belong to the climate (kingdom) of China, or to be near it<sup>2</sup>. Buṭnān is a plural of baṭn, which word signifies a low ground.

608 MUḤAMMAD IBN AL-KALBĪ

Abu 'l-Naḍr‡ Muḥammad Ibn al-Sā'ib Ibn Bishr (or Mubashshir) Ibn 'Amr al-Kalbī, a native of Kūfah, the author of an <sup>1</sup> Abū Bakr Muḥammad Ibn 'Uzayr (عزير) al-Sijistānī, the author of the Gharīb al-Qur'ān, a work on the composition of which he spent fifteen years, was a man of great piety and virtue. He resided at Baḡhdād and was still living towards A.H. 330 (A.C. 941-2). His father's name is often mistaken for 'Aziz (عزير) Al-Dhahabī's Tārikh al-Islām. (No. 646).

<sup>2</sup> This place lay in Transoxiana.

* 15 April.—Ed.

† 13 April.—Ed.

‡ The Egyptian edition gives Abu 'l-Naḍr.—Ed.

interpretation of the Qur'ān and a genealogist, was a master of the highest authority in these two branches of science. Muḥammad Ibn Sa'd<sup>1</sup> sets forth his genealogy thus : Muḥammad Ibn al-Sā'ib al-Kalbī Ibn Bishr Ibn 'Amr Ibn al-Ḥārith Ibn 'Abd al-Ḥārith Ibn 'Abd al-'Uzzā Ibn Imra al-Qays Ibn 'Āmir Ibn al-Nu'mān Ibn 'Āmir Ibn 'Abdūn Ibn Kinānah Ibn 'Awf Ibn 'Udhrah Ibn Zayd Ibn 'Abd al-Lāt Ibn Rufaydah Ibn Thawr Ibn Kalb. I then consulted Hishām Ibn al-Kalbī's Book of Genealogies, and found their descent given as here indicated, with the exception of the link 'Abd al-Ḥārith, which is omitted. The following anecdote was related by him and has been transmitted down by his son Hishām : "I went into the house of Ḍirār Ibn 'Uṭārid Ibn Ḥājjib Ibn Zurārah al-Tamīmī, at Kūfah, and found with him a man similem mentulae molienti in rima muliebri<sup>2</sup>; and this was al-Farazdaq the poet. Ḍirār winked at me and told me to ask him who he was. I put the question, and the other replied : 'If thou art a genealogist, trace down my descent ; I am sprung from Tamīm'. I immediately repeated the list of Tamīm's descendants till I came to Ghālib, the father of al-Farazdaq of whom I said : 'And Ghālib begot Hamām' " this was al-Farazdaq's real name.—"On this al-Farazdaq sat up and exclaimed : 'By Allāh ! my parents never called me by that name except for a single 'hour of my life'. 'And, by Allāh !' replied I, 'I know the day on which thy father called thee al-Farazdaq'. 'What day was it ?' 'He sent thee out on some business, and, as thou wert walking forth with a mustuqah (cloak) on thy shoulders, he said : By Allāh ! one would take thee for a farazdaq (a loaf) made by the farmer of such and such a village, in the mountain<sup>3</sup>. 'That is quite true,' replied the poet. He then asked me if I could repeat any of his poems. 'No,' said I, 'but can repeat one hundred of Jarīr's (No. 127,) qaṣīduhs. 'Ah,' said he 'thou canst repeat Ibn al-Marāghah's (No. 127, note) verses, and canst not repeat mine ! By Allāh ! I shall satirize the tribe of Kalb for a whole year, unless

1 His life will be found in this work.

2 The meaning of this obscene comparisons is unknown to the translator.

3 Or, "like Farazdaq, the dihqān of such and such a village," etc. In the life of al-Farazdaq, we shall find mentioned that he received the nickname of Farazdaq (dough) because his face was marked with the small-pox. The similitude appears to lie here in the porous appearance of leavened bread.

